All Fernheim children must attend the local village school for six years. If they wish to continue their education, they may attend the Zentralschule (secondary school), which offers an additional four-year course of study. Those wishing to become teachers or enter other higher professions can attend the Pedagogical Institute (Pädagogisches Institut) for an additional two years, making it possible to receive a total of 12 years of schooling in the colony itself, not including Bible school. While other colonies also have their secondary schools, the pedagogical school serves all Paraguayan Mennonite settlements and provides their teachers.

There are three groups within the colony today: the Mennonite Brethren with 567 members, the Mennonite Church (GCM) with 350 members, and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, also known as the Allianzgemeinde, with 171 members. The work of these churches is co-ordinated through the interchurch committee known as the Komitee für kirchliche Angelegenheiten (KfK, q.v.). On Jan. 1, 1955, the population of the colony was 2,491 persons. In 1954 there were 14 deaths and 78 births. C.J.D.

A. L. Elwood, Paraguay—Its Cultural Heritage, Social Conditions, and Educational Problems (New York, 1931); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953); C. Kempski, La Agricultura en el Chaco Paraguayo (Buenos Aires, 1948); Fritz Kliewer, Die deutsche Volksgruppe in Paraguay (Hamburg, 1941); Annemarie Krause, Mennonite Settlement in the Paraguayan Chaco (Chicago, 1952); W. Quiring, Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (Karlsruhe, 1936); idem, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Karlsruhe, 1938); W. Smith, Paraguayan Interlude (Scottdale, 1950); H. S. Bender, "With the Mennonite Refugee Colonies in Brazil and Paraguay —A Personal Narrative," MQR XIII (January 1939) 59-70; H. A. Fast, "Mennonites in Paraguay," Menn. Life, January 1946, 36-39; W. Hiebert, "Mennonite Education in the Gran Chaco," Menn. Life, October 1947, 28-32; Fritz Kliewer, "The Mennonites of Paraguay," MQR XI (January 1937) 92-97; W. Quiring, "The Colonization of the German Mennonites from Russia in the Paraguayan Chaco," MQR VII (April 1934) 62-72; G. H. Fadenrecht, "Mennonite Migration to Paraguay" (M.A. thesis, University of Kansas, 1947); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Scottdale, 1945).

Fernheim Bible Institute, Filadelfia, Chaco, Paraguay, was opened in March 1956, with the assistance of the Mennonite Brethren Board of General Welfare of North America, with a faculty of six, G. H. Sukkau of Yarrow, B.C., serving as principal. Its purpose is to train ministers, mission workers, and Sunday-school workers for witness and service in South America, primarily for the Mennonite Brethren Church. H.S.B.

Fernheim Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Colony Fernheim in the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized on Oct. 5, 1930, with 44 members, under the leadership of Nicolaus Wiebe. Its statutes, with slight modifications, were those of the Krimmer Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church of Russia, from where a large number of its members came in 1930-31. The work of the church is carried on in complete co-operation with the G.C.M. and M.B. groups in the colony. In 1942 an adobe brick church with a seating capacity of 300 was built in the village of Waldesruh; it was remodeled in 1949. The membership of the congregation in 1953 was 171, under the leadership of Abram Harder and his assistant Johann Käthler, both of whom have rendered valuable service as leaders of the KfK (q.v.), the interchurch organization. In addition nine other ministers and two deacons also serve the congregation. Worship services are held twice monthly for members only, and on the remaining Sundays with the other groups. Communion and footwashing are observed on the first Sunday of each month. Youth work and choir work are carried on regularly. The entire church actively supports the Indian Mennonite missions in the Chaco. B.W.

Fernheim Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the Paraguayan Chaco, South America, was organized on June 9, 1930, by a group of immigrants from Russia under the leadership of Isaak Jakob Braun of Barnaul, South Russia, as the Paraguayan Mennonite Brethren Church. It consisted of 50-60 members. It was joined later that year by two other immigrant groups from Russia, and because of poor roads and communications the entire Mennonite Brethren Church was divided into two groups on April 7, 1931; the group settling to the west under the leadership of Gerhard Isaak of the Crimea, Russia, being called the "Schönwieser Lokale," and the group settling to the east under the leadership of Isaak Jakob Braun being called the "Lichtfelder Lokale." Upon the arrival of another group of immigrants from Russia via Harbin, China, in 1932, a third group was formed under the leadership of Johann Schellenberg, Ignatyevo, Russia, and was called the "Orloffer Lokale." The name in each instance was that of the village in which meetings were held. In 1932-44 these three groups were co-ordinated under the leadership of Isaak Braun, then Gerhard Isaak, and later Gerhard Balzer. In 1947 the Schönwieser Lokale and the Lichtfelder Lokale were united as the Filadelfia Mennonite Brethren Church, with a total membership of 400. A brick church was built in 1945 in Filadelfia with a seating capacity of 350. In 1950 another church was built with a seating capacity of 1,000. Because of difficulties in communication the Orloffer Lokale has remained separate and in 1953 had a membership of 140. In 1948 both the Filadelfia Mennonite Brethren Church and the Orloffer Lokale became members of the South American District Conference and thereby members of the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren of North America. The ministers of the congregations receive partial financial support. Most of the members live on farms, or farm from Filadelfia. Sunday schools and young people's work are carried on regularly. While the regular church services are attended also by members of the G.C.M. and E.M.B. groups, the first Sunday of each month is set aside for worship of the M.B. group alone. In church men and women are seated separately, the men remaining seated until the women have left the church. The church has no musical instrument. The total membership (1955) is 567. G.B.

Fernheim Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Colony Fernheim in the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized at a meeting of 30 members immigrating from Russia, in Trebol, Chaco, on June 22, 1930. Johann Bergmann, formerly of Siberia, Russia, called the meeting and was elected as the spiritual leader of the new church, with Johann Teichgraef and Heinrich Unruh (not ordained) as assistant ministers. Jakob Boschmann was elected deacon. Coming from various scattered Mennonite churches in Russia, with their own separate customs, many former members failed to find satisfaction in the new church; even four ministers left to join the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. After this difficult and trying period, the new church in Fernheim grew, happy in the new-found freedom after their experience of Communist oppression and persecution. Since 1947 the church has been a member of the General Conference Mennonite Church. In 1950 a church was built in Filadelfia with a seating capacity of 500 and a full basement. All church meetings are held in co-operation with the M.B. and E.M.B. groups with the exception of the special services for members only on the first Sunday of every month. Saturday evening meetings known as Wochenschluss are held regularly. Footwashing is not practiced. Youth work, choir work, and ladies' aid circles are carried on regularly and the Chaco Indian missions are actively supported. The membership in 1953 was 350, under the leadership of Jakob Isaak. J.I.

Fernheim Zentralschule. The Mennonites in Paraguay have a public school system based on six years of elementary and four years of high school. The Fernheim Zentralschule was organized in 1931 in the village of Schönwiese (No. 7) and was taught by Wilhelm Klassen, Julius Legiehn, and Fritz Kliewer. In 1936 this school was moved to Filadelfia, which is the center of the Fernheim Colony. In 1940 there was added to its curriculum a pedagogical course of two years to train public school teachers for the colony.

In its beginning the school drew much support from Germany in the way of literature and supplies. After World War II much aid for the school came from North America through the Mennonite Central Committee in the way of supplies, money, and teachers. In 1947 the building of a much larger and better school building was begun.

The Zentralschule offers a four-year high-school course and two years of teacher training. Courses are prescribed and patterned largely after the European system and method. Although the school is independent of the Paraguayan governmental school system, it does follow certain government stipulations such as the teaching of several Spanish subjects and the observance of the Paraguayan holidays.

The immediate purpose of the school is to train leaders for the colony, especially in the field of education, industry, and religion.

Its facilities include the above-mentioned new building, plus dormitories for both girls and boys, a kitchen, and three teacherages. The school is owned and operated by the colony. The enrollment increased from 28 in 1945 to 180 in 1950, and the number of teachers employed increased from 3 in 1945 to 8 in 1950. C. C. Peters of Abbotsford, British Columbia, was principal in 1947-52. Two teachers were sent to Switzerland for training in 1952-55. In 1955 Peter Wiens was appointed director. W.D.H.

Fernland Mennonite Church (MC), located near Germfask, Schoolcraft Co., Mich., began as a mission station under the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite District Mission Board. In the spring of 1938 it was organized into a congregation with Chester C. Osborne serving as pastor. He resigned in October 1947, and Bruce Handrich was ordained and continues as pastor. The membership (1955) is 24. This is the first Mennonite church to be established in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. C.C.O.

Ferrara: see Italy.

Ferrière (La), a village in the Courtelary district of the canton of Bern, Switzerland, near the French border. In 1870-93 an Amish congregation existed here, which at first held its meetings in the homes of the members. The lack of space was a severe handicap. When David Ummel-Stähli of La Chaux d'Abel in La Ferrière bought a farm for his son-in-law Menzi, he had a room furnished for the use of the congregation. Meetings were held here every two weeks. The membership numbered about 45. The elders were Ummel-Stähli (1797-1896) and David Gerber of Torneret near Le Locle (1838-1921), who emigrated to America.

Through emigration to America the congregation was so greatly reduced in numbers that the few remaining members united with the small congregation at La Chaux d'Abel (q.v.). After this merger the chapel was built in Aux Bulles in 1894. The congregation kept no records. (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 40; Müller, Berner Täufer, 234; ML I, 642.) A.-T.

Ferry Bank, a Hutterite Bruderhof, established in 1949 near Ponoka, Alberta. It had a population of 75 in 1950. M.G.

Ferwerd, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 65 persons in 1568-82. Blaupot ten Cate (Friesland, 306) supposes that this large number proves the existence of a congregation at that time, but nothing is known of such a congregation, and it is more likely that the newly baptized joined churches in the neighborhood. vdZ.

Fest, Ludwig. The little that is known of this martyr is found in the Hutterite chronicles and a few documents in the archives of Tirol. He was a native of Pinnegg, and in the days when the Tirolese authorities were searching for Jakob Hutter with all the means at their disposal, Fest was trying to win converts in the mines around Schwaz in the Inn Valley. Here he was captured and taken to Schwaz. Several attempts were made to convert him to the Catholic Church, and because he was adamant he was sentenced to death and beheaded July 3, 1533. In prison he wrote a letter (still extant) to the church at Rattenberg on the Inn, Austria, which admonishes "that we should not be selfish, for greed is the root and the origin of evil," and which names several persons who are better known in the annals of the suffering of the Brethren; since he names Marpeck's wife, it is likely that he belonged to the circle of Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.). LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 107; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 83; Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; his letter is found in MQR XV (1941) 23-25; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 104; ML I, 642.

Feyerer (Feirer), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, whom the chronicles name as a preacher (Diener des Worts). He was probably active in Munich, Germany, and vicinity after Georg Wagner's execution (Feb. 8, 1527). He was baptized by Leonhard Dorfbrunner. In Bavaria the Anabaptist movement was extensive at that time, but was soon severely suppressed by Dukes Wilhelm and Ludwig. On Nov. 15, 1527, they issued a decree from Munich ordering that all Anabaptists be seized and punished as criminals by death and confiscation of property. Many fled. Several Munich families went to Augsburg, which was at that time the center of the Anabaptist movement in South Germany. Anyone who was suspected of Anabaptist ideas was arrested. All the prisons in the entire country were filled with Anabaptists; it was especially bad in the Falkenturm in Munich, from which no Anabaptist was released without punishment (Winter, 35).

Feyerer was also arrested and apparently subjected to several cross-examinations and finally sentenced to death and burned at the stake at Munich with five companions as "obstinate Anabaptists" on Jan. 28, 1528. Three days later his wife and the wives of two other martyrs of this group, also remaining true to their faith, were in mercy first drowned and then burned. Evidently the authorities had dealt with them in hope of leading them back to the Catholic Church. The chronicler Sender writes that they were "much more obstinate than their husbands." HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 24; Sender, Augsburger Chronik (1894) 188; Mart. Mir. D 18, E 428; V. A. Winter, Gesch. der bayrischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809): ML I, 642 f.

Fichter, Konrad (Füechter, Kuntz), an Anabaptist martyr, executed for his faith at Sterzing in the Adige Valley, Tirol, Austria, in 1532. He was treasurer of the Hutterian brotherhood, and evidently influential. In 1532 he was taken prisoner while working in Tirol. The Chronicles relate that he was so severely racked that the hangman thought he would "break."

From prison he wrote two epistles. One contains consolations and greetings to Jakob Hutter, Hans Amon, and his wife, as well as the request to support him with prayers in his coming struggle. The other one is written to the earnest believers in the Adige Valley in South Tirol (q.v.), which seems to indicate that this was his chief field of labor. This epistle is particularly remarkable for its folkloristic or popular slant and the vigor of its expression. It has been published in full (MQR XV, 1941, 16-23) by A. J. F. Zieglschmid, with a plate showing a facsimile of the beginning of this epistle in one of the codices.

Repeated attempts by the clergy to convert Fichter failed, and therefore he was put to death. He is reputedly the author of the hymn, "Als man mit dem Kreuze ging." LOSERTH.

J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 508; R. Friedmann, "The Epistles of the Hutterite Brethren," MQR XX (1946) 164 f., with excerpts of one of these epistles in translation, Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; ML I, 643.

Fieguth (Figut, Fiegeth, Fiut, Viegut), a Mennonite family name in rural Flemish congregations of West Prussia, first mentioned 1656 at Pasewark. Only one family of this name was listed in 1776, 120 persons in 1910, 112 persons in 1935. A few members of this family also migrated to Russia and America (Paso Robles, Cal.). G.R.

Stammbaum der Familie Fieguth, ed. Abraham Fieguth (Marienburg, 1938).

Figken, Benedikt (1625-93), a Protestant clergyman in Danzig, the author of a peculiar book, Historia Fanaticorum oder eine vollkommene Relation und Wissenschaft von den alten Anabaptisten und newen Quäkern, with a Zugabe was mit etzlichen Quäkern hiesiges Ortes . . . passiert ist (Danzig, 1664; second ed., 1701). It is the translation of an English book by R. Blome, The Fanatic History or an Exact Relation and Account of the Old Anabaptists and New Quakers (London, 1660), the first 65 pages of which are a reprint of an anonymous booklet published in London in 1642, A Short History of the Anabaptists of High and Low Germany. This book presents utter nonsense as historical truth; it relates with relish and in great detail the abominations of Münster; it does not mention Menno Simons, and barely touches Melchior Hofmann's work. It tells terrible but contradictory stories about the Mennonites in Amsterdam and Switzerland. It is incomprehensible that all of this could be printed, and it is regrettable that the book is cited and used as an authentic source. (ML I, 643.) NEFF.

Fije (Feije Bauckezoon), an Anabaptist martyr, was seized with Eelken (q.v.) three weeks before Easter 1549 at Oldeboorn, Dutch province of Friesland. During his trial he confessed that he had attended many secret meetings, at which he heard the Scriptures explained by "lay persons." Before the judge they were both greatly excited, kissed each other, and danced for joy in being permitted to suffer martyrdom; in this they were an exception to most of the martyrs. They were in the same prison as the noted martyr Elisabeth. Fije was first (June 7, 1549) sentenced to death by beheading, but "persisting in his unbelief," the sentence was increased in severity, and he was executed on that very day by burning at the stake. At his execution Fije refused the bread and wine offered him, saying he had food prepared for him in heaven. Fije was burned, Eelken was beheaded on June 7, 1549, at Leeuwarden, in the presence of some monks. To the spectators he cried out, "Weep not for me, but for your sins." A hymn was written on his martyrdom, "Nae u belooft, o goede Heer" (According to Thy promise, O good Lord. (Offer, 430-36; Mart. Mir. D 84 f., E 484; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 643.) K.V.

Fije Danen, an Anabaptist martyr of Amsterdam, a native of Loenen, Dutch province of Utrecht. She had lived for many years in Woerden, Dutch province of South Holland, and had been (re)baptized by Gerrit van Benschop (q.v.) in his own house at Benschop near Woerden. In March 1534 she had joined the group which sailed from Amsterdam to Hasselt, en route to Münster in Westphalia. With a large number of other Anabaptists she was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.), but escaped or was set free. Back in Amsterdam, she took part in the meetings of the Anabaptists and had contacts with many Anabaptist leaders. She often brought letters or messages to Jacob van Campen (q.v.), bishop of the congregation at Amsterdam; at the time van Campen was wanted by the police (March 2, 1535) and had hidden, Fije daily brought him food. She was arrested in May 1535 and because she refused to recant, she was sentenced to death on July 10, 1535, and on that very day executed at Amsterdam by being hanged and strangled, which was an unusual execution for women. Her few goods were confiscated. vdZ.

Grosheide, Verhooren, 99, 105-8, 109; Mellink, Wederdopers, 96, 126-30, 135, 147.

Fijne Mennisten (in Germany Feine Mennonisten, Strict Mennonites), the designation of those Mennonites in the 18th and 19th centuries in Holland and West Prussia (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 767) who in opposition to the Grove Mennisten (Common Mennonites, such as Lamists and Zonists, q.v.) conservatively maintained the strict old doctrines and practices of Mennonitism like avoidance (shunning), footwashing, old-fashioned clothing, and arrangement of meetinghouses and liturgy. S. F. Rues states that there were Fijnen and still Alderfijnsten (Most Strict Ones). A hundred years or more ago the name was very common, but now it has completely disappeared. Neff, vdZ.

S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1745) 8-13; ML I, 637.

Fijne, Passchier de (1588-1667), born at Leiden, Holland, whither his parents had fled from French Flanders to escape persecution, was at first a weaver, then studied theology, and in 1611 became a Reformed pastor at Jaarsveld; in 1619 he was dismissed because of his Remonstrant (q.v.) opinions. Until 1633 he mostly traveled about in Holland, and from 1633 until his death he was a Remonstrant minister at Haarlem. De Fijne published a large number of pamphlets, some of which deal with the Mennonites. He defended them against the vilification of Petrus Bontemps (q.v.), but found fault with the fact that so many Mennonites sympathized with the Rijnsburg Collegiants (q.v.). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 507 ff.; N.N.B.Wb. VI, 530 ff.; Catalogus Amst., 122, 160, 200-2.

Fijnje, Wybo, b. Jan. 24, 1750, at Zwolle, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1766-67, and then at the University of Leiden, where he obtained his Ph.D. in 1774. He was a son of Jan Wybes Fijnje of Harlingen (and Johanna Seije), who studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1739-45, served for a while at Zwolle and 1751-ca. 63 at Haarlem. Wybo Fijnje was for a time pastor of the Mennonite congregation at Deventer, but resigned in order to devote himself to political science. He was editor of the Delftsche Courant and was compelled to flee in 1787 on account of his "Patriot" opinions. After the revolution of 1795 he was made director of affairs in the government of the Dutch East Indies. In 1798 he had to flee again. When he returned to The Hague he was seized but was released upon the intercession of the French ambassador. He died in Amsterdam on Oct. 2, 1809. He is the author of the following works: Beknopt tydrekenkundig overzicht der algemeene geschiedenis (1783) and Theoriae systematis universi (1774). His son H. F. Fijnje van Salverda (1796-1889) was chief inspector of the water office and planned the reclamation of the Haarlem Lake. K.V., vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 157 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1691; 2458 f.; DB 1919, 94 f.; ML I, 644.

Fijt Pilgrims (Veit Pelgrims, Fitus to Pilgrams), an Anabaptist martyr, who was brutally tortured at Gladbach in the duchy of Jülich, Germany, in 1532 (1537?), when he steadfastly confessed his faith, and was then burned at the stake. (Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 15, 437; ML III, 375.)

Fijts, Simon: see Simon Fijts.

Filadelfia, a town located in the Colony Fernheim of the Paraguayan Chaco, was founded in 1931. Upon arrival of the Fernheim Colony group in 1930 they decided to concentrate their common undertakings, such as hospital, schools, industry, and printing press, at one site centrally located, from where the colony would also be administered. In July 1931 a committee was appointed to determine the geographical center of the colony, and on Aug. 26, 1931, a camp was selected as the future site of the town. A site about 2½ x 2¼ miles (4 x 3.85 kilometers) was staked off for this purpose. A study commission recommended that the town plan be drawn in four circles, the first of which would contain 240 building lots, the second 300, the third 440, and the fourth 530, totaling 1,510 building lots of 1.8

acres (three-quarters hectare) each. Because of the help of European and North American brotherhoods to make the settlement possible, and because it was to be the center of all co-operative undertakings, it was decided to call the town Filadelfia, meaning "brotherly love." The names of the principal streets are Asuncion Street, Bender Street, Cemetery Street, Lengua Street, Miller Street, Menno Street, Market Street, Russia Street, Main Street, and Unruh Street. The first four families to settle in the new town by 1932 were Gerhard Isaak, administrator of the hospital; David Neufeld, warehouse manager; Johann Funk, warehouse bookkeeper; Peter Boldt, cafe owner. The first school was opened in 1934. Filadelfia today is the center of the Chaco settlements—Menno, Neuland, and Fernheim, as well as being Fernheim's administrative center, with industries such as a cotton gin, oil expeller, furniture plant, creamery, essential oil extract plant, blacksmith shop, printing press where the biweekly paper Menno-Blatt is published, airport, hospital, dentist, telephone switchboard, all of which serve not only Fernheim but all Chaco Mennonites. It has one Mennonite Brethren church and one Mennonite church; one co-operative and two private stores; two public schools and one high school and normal school; the Chulupi Indian mission and the Chaco MCC workers' home. Because of its greater conveniences as electric light, nearness to shopping center, and others, many retired farmers are moving to Filadelfia. Its population in 1950 was 546; in 1954 it was about 700. C.J.D.

W. Quiring, Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (Karlsruhe, n.d., 1936?); F. Kliewer, Die deutsche Volksgruppe in Paraguay (Hamburg, 1941); A. Krause, Mennonite Settlement in the Paraguayan Chaco (Chicago, 1952) 122-28; J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953).

Filadelfia Experimental Farm, five miles north of the town of Filadelfia, the capital of the Fernheim Colony (q.v.), Paraguay, was established in August 1946 as a result of the joint efforts of the Mennonite Central Committee and the Fernheim Colony. Menno Klassen from Gretna, Man., was sent to Paraguay to establish this work. Significant progress has been made. The buildings erected include a large ranch-style house, a combination laboratory, office, workshop, and seed storage building. In 1952 there were five full-time workers engaged on the farm. The chief objectives are experimentation with seeds and soils, production of seeds of grasses, vegetables, and farm crops, and nursery stock, the setting up of demonstration units, and a general program of agricultural extension and information service. Since agriculture had not been carried on in the Chaco prior to the coming of the Mennonites nothing was known as to the best types of crops to grow, the long-time characteristics of the growing season, the rainfall, and the general climatic conditions. Chaco farmers had neither time nor money to carry on the experimentation needed.

The experimental farm has made valuable contributions to farming in the area by growing seedlings so that farmers may eventually produce their own fuel and timber supply. Experiments have also been carried on with green manure crops which are needed to fertilize depleted soils. By means of contact with the United States Government personnel in Paraguay (STICA) helpful information has been secured about crops, trees, and seeds best adapted to the Paraguayan climate. Assistance has also been received in fighting pests that damage crops. Pamphlets are often translated into German for the colonists' use. The experimental farm was at first not enthusiastically supported by the colonists but during its short life it has proved its worth and farmers are increasingly coming to recognize how valuable an aid it is to intelligent farming and successful colonization. J.W.F.

Filer, Idaho, a town (pop. 1,400) in Twin Falls County on a branch of the Union Pacific in south central Idaho. The Mennonites (MC), of whom there were 101 members in the community in 1954, first located here in 1912. In 1914 they organized a congregation and in 1915 built a church in Filer. The United Missionary Church (MBC) located here about five years earlier. S.H.

Filer Mennonite Church (MC), located at 115 Fifth St., Filer, Idaho, a member of the Pacific Coast Conference, was organized on Jan. 31, 1914, with 22 charter members, and with David Hilty as bishop, Samuel Honderich as minister, and Chris Snyder as deacon. In 1955 the membership was 106. The first church was dedicated on Sept. 19, 1915, enlarged in 1953. The 1954 ministerial body was E. S. Garber, bishop; Samuel Honderich and Louis Landis, ministers; Joe E. Slatter, deacon. The General Conference Mennonites organized a congregation here in 1955 with 19 members. S.H.

S. G. Shetler, Church History of the Pacific Coast Mennonite Conference (Scottdale, 1931).

Filer (Twin Falls Co., Idaho) United Missionary Church was organized Feb. 16, 1905. In 1949 the membership was 69 and David Johnson served as pastor. He was followed by A. B. Neufeld, who served for three years, and was succeeded by T. J. Sparr. In 1955 J. K. Myer was assigned the pastorate. D.J.

Filips Bostijn was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Antwerp. In 1566 he came to Friesland with other elders and preachers from Flanders, to mediate in the problems that had arisen there between the Frisians and the Mennonites who had immigrated to Friesland from Flanders. vdZ.

K. Vos, "De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de zestiende Eeuw," in Bulletin . . . d' Hist. de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 363, 376; DB 1893, 35, note 2.

Filips, Dirk: see Dirk Philips.

Filips, Lucas, a preacher of the Old Flemish Mennonite Church at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, in the early 17th century, quarreled with his copreacher Vincent de Hondt (q.v.) about the practice of banning and shunning. De Hondt was of the opinion that a young brother of the church, who he thought had acted improperly with his fiancée, should be banned from the congregation. Filips, however, considered the ban too serious a punishment. Thereupon de Hondt banned not only the young man but Filips as well with all who shared his view. The adherents of Filips were called Lucas-Filipsvolk or Borstentasters. The separation, which took place in 1620, lasted only for a few years. Then the Lucas-Filipsvolk and the de-Hondtvolk reunited. (DB 1863, 135; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 58.) vdZ.

Filips, Obbe: see Obbe Philips.

Fill (or Vill), a village near Neumarkt in the Adige Valley of Tirol, Austria. In the late 1520's Benedikt von Bruneck, a former lay priest, was active here in the Anabaptist cause. As a priest he had protested against the execution of heretics, and was called to account and promised to desist. But the courage, piety, and conduct of the Anabaptists won him completely. It was he who held Blaurock's congregation together after the latter's death and served it by preaching and baptizing in Fill and Tramin. The Hutterite chronicles list eight Anabaptists seized in Fill in 1529. They were Wolfgang of Moos near Deutsch-Nofen; Thoman im Wald near Aldain; Georg Frick of Wirtsburg; Mang Karger of Füssen; Christina Tollinger of Penon, a widow; Barbara of Thiers, the wife of Hans Portzen; Agatha Kampner (q.v.) of Breitenberg, and her sister Elisabeth. They were taken to the castle and examined on the rack. They revealed that Wolfgang von Moos had been baptized in August 1528 with two companions by Michael Kürschner, who was later executed at the stake in Gufidaun. Thoman im Waldt was baptized by Blaurock, and Georg Frick by Benedikt, Elisabeth Kampner and Christian Tollinger by Blaurock, Barbara of Thiers by Benedikt, and Agatha Kampner in Switzerland near St. Gall by Tepich. They all remained steadfast and were executed. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 64 ff.; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I (Vienna, 1892) 61; ML I, 644.

Finger, Jakob, Mennonite lawyer and statesman, b. Jan. 13, 1825, at Monsheim, Hesse, Germany, d. Jan. 31, 1904, at Darmstadt as retired Hessian Minister of State. When he was a child in the public school in Monsheim, his teachers and especially his pastor, Leonhard Weydmann, recognized his talents, the latter taking the boy along to Crefeld when he took over the pulpit there. Here the boy received thorough instruction in the classical languages.

But already in the next year he was called home on account of the serious illness of his father. Since he was now too far advanced for the village school at Worms he was sent at the age of 12 to the Gymnasium at Worms. At this time it was very unusual for the children of South German Mennonites to receive academic training. At the age of 16, he was admitted to the University of Giessen to study law, and a year later he went to the University of Heidelberg, where he became the friend of B. C. Roosen (q.v.), who was a student of theology, and who later became pastor of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church. Finger was tempted to study theology rather than law, but finally remained with the course he had begun. After another year at Giessen he passed his first juristic examination with honor, and continued his study at the University of Berlin until 1846.

Finger's first position was with the court at Alzey. Here he became engaged to the daughter of the state's attorney. Then for a time he was assistant judge in the court at Oppenheim. In 1855 he began to practice law in Alzey. From 1862 to 1865 he was a member of the lower chamber of Hesse. In 1872 he was called to Darmstadt into the ministry of justice, and had charge of the reorganization of the department of justice. From 1884 to 1898 he was Minister of Justice and rendered his country outstanding service. In 1898 he retired.

Until his death Finger remained a faithful member of the Mennonite Church of Monsheim, coming regularly for communion and remaining a faithful supporter. For the Mennonite Church in Hesse he acquired a legal status unique in South Germany.

His brother Christian Finger (1830-1907), a farmer and miller at Kriegsheim near Monsheim, was from 1896 to 1905 a member of the curatorium of the Vereinigung der deutschen Mennoniten-Gemeinden and from 1885 to 1907 on the board of his local congregation. (ML I, 644 f.) NEFF.

Fink, Anthonius Ruardus, d. Oct. 27, 1834, at Winterswijk, a Dutch Mennonite minister who had previously been a Lutheran pastor at Pekela and at Kampen. In 1795 he resigned and became a bookseller at Leeuwarden, since he was a Patriot (q.v.) and deeply interested in politics. He soon became a representative of the Frisian people in the legislature, and thereupon a judge in the Court of Friesland. Being somewhat disappointed in his political ideals, he left the magistracy to enter the ministry again. This time he served a Mennonite congregation, having been introduced by his fellow Patriot and friend Abraham Staal, the Mennonite minister of Leeuwarden. He was baptized on Oct. 10, 1802, at IJlst and for a short period he served the IJlst congregation as assistant pastor; in 1802-34 he served the congregation of Winterswijk. vdZ.

Finland Mennonite Church (MC), located in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., is the result of mission effort of near-by congregations. Visitation and cottage meetings held in the community finally led to the organization of a Sunday school on May 17, 1931, and the monthly church services beginning on Nov. 1, 1931. Claude Shisler served as mission superintendent from March 12, 1933, to Nov. 22, 1938, when he was ordained as pastor of the growing congregation. The mission was first housed in a store building in the village of Finland. The present building was erected in 1939. The congregation was organized in 1940. The membership in 1953 was 101. Q.L.

Firdale Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, near Airlie, in southern Polk Co., southwest of Salem, Ore., was organized under the Pacific Coast Mennonite Conference. Mennonite families moved into the area in the fall of 1913. Their first religious service was held in October 1914, with an attendance of 35. Soon after this, the group began meeting at the Berry schoolhouse, where they met until the church was disbanded. The congregation was listed as a rural mission station of the Pacific Coast Conference from October 1914 until its organization as a church in December 1915, when the name Firdale was chosen. In 1916 G. D. Shenk was ordained minister of the church. At one time the membership reached 68, but poor soil conditions caused the members to move away. The last service was held in September 1924. M.G.

S. G. Shetler, Church History of the Pacific Coast Menn. Conference District (Scottdale, 1932?) 32-4.

Fire and Storm Aid, an organization of the Reformed Mennonite Church of the United States and Canada, was organized on Jan. 6, 1924. It covers assessable property of seven million dollars. Their rate is $1.50 per thousand for houses, $4.50 for barns, and $6.50 for "hazardous risks." The assessment of $31,000 is made only every two or three years, when the general fund gets down to $5,000. The annual loss on houses is one fifth of the total, the other two categories being equally divided. Frank E. Eshelman is the secretary. Its headquarters is at Lancaster, Pa. I.D.L.

First Names. In the areas and brotherhoods which did not follow the custom of having names given by godparents, the parents gave their children the first names of their own parents (the children's grandparents). This was the case with the Reformed on the Lower Rhine and quite particularly with the Mennonites. For example, they named their oldest son after one grandfather, the oldest daughter after the other grandmother. For the second son and the second daughter they reversed this procedure. With the following children names of the nearest relatives were used in succession and when these were exhausted Biblical names. It remained this way until the Enlightenment slowly put an end to this loyal custom. This custom for the assignment of names was called the Leitnamensitte by Heinrich Müllers, a former archivist in Rheydt; from this method of naming he developed a method of research which makes it possible to determine with some assurance the name of the grandfather from the name of the grandson. Since the church records of the Mennonite congregations of the Lower Rhine only rarely give the names of the parents of the bridal couple this method of the Leitnamensitte gives a safe means for the investigation of Mennonite families.
W.N.

First Mennonite Church (GCM) of Butterfield, Minn., formerly known as Bergthal Church, located four miles north of the town of Butterfield, was organized in 1878 under the sponsorship of what is today the First Mennonite Church of Mountain Lake. The members of this group had been affiliated with the Bergthal (q.v.) congregation of the Bergthal Mennonite settlement in South Russia, whose elder was Gerhard Wiebe. Elder Wiebe and his whole congregation migrated to America in 1874. Wiebe and the majority of his people chose Manitoba as their future home, but a smaller group, settling in the vicinity of Butterfield, constituted the Bergthal Church, today known as the First Mennonite Church.

During the early years services were conducted in the homes. Elder Neufeld and his co-ministers David Loewen, Johann Schultz, Gerhard Fast, Peter Voth, and Cornelius Enns served the two parishes of the one congregation at Mountain Lake and near Butterfield. A meetinghouse was built in 1882 and remodeled in 1942. In 1892 David Harder was elected to the ministry, and in 1900 Jacob Stoesz. Both served the congregation for many years, Jacob Stoesz as elder 1919-30. When Elder Stoesz laid down his work there came a succession of leaders chosen from the outside: John Warkentin, Sam Quiring, Victor Sawatzky, M. M. Lehman, and R. A. Heinrichs. At present, May 1956, the congregation is without a pastor; its membership in 1955 was 95. The congregation is a member of the Northern District Conference. J.J.F.

Fischart, Johann (ca. 1546-90), a German author of Alsace, wrote Bewärung und Erklärung des Uralten gemeynen Sprüchworts: Die Gelehrten die Verkehrten: Etwan vor vielen Jaren (in massen solchs ohn disz art zureimen bezeugen) von eim guthertzigen Wargelehrten etlicher massen aussgelegt. Nun aber bei heutigem vnauffhörlichen vnd vnabwehrlichen einreissen der Verkehrung der Letz vn Falsch gelehrten/ durch ein Warheitlieber Gerngelehrten/ auff ein Newes durchgangen vnd angelegt. Darbey neben andern nötigen Erinnerungen vnd Lehren/ auch dise daran hangende Fragen begriffen. Ob man jemands zum Glauben zwingen soll/ vn ob durch Schwert/ brand/ bann/ zang/ strang/ vnd zwang in der Religion ein einigkeit sei zustifften. Item/ was zwischen Welt vnd Christenheyt/ vnd deren beider Oberkeit/ sei für ein vnderscheyd. Anno M. D. LXXXIIII. The frequently combined edition is based on two originally independent rhymed poems opposing suppression of religious freedom, "Die Gelehrten die Verkehrten" and "Vom Glaubenszwang," which Wilhelm Scherer in his introduction to the reprint attributed to the Anabaptists. Hauffen, however, has shown that they were probably written in 1531 by Sebastian Franck in Strasbourg. E.C.

A. Hauffen, "Johann Fischart," in Schriften des wissenschaftlichen Instituts der Elsass-Lothringer im Reich (Berlin and Leipzig, 1921-22), which gives the rather extensive older literature; the Deutsche Bibliothek IX (Leipzig, 1866) Part II, contains a reprint of the Bewärung; ML I, 645.

Fischbach, a village near Hochspeyer in the Palatinate, Germany, where in the 17th and 18th centuries there was a small Mennonite congregation, the members of which lived in Fischbach, Münchhof, Diemerstein, Frankenstein, and Enkenbach. There were Mennonites here before 1687, for a contract of lease dated July 9, 1687, by which a Mennonite named Peter Küntzi of Buchholderberg, Switzerland, acquired from the Countess Palatine Marie bei Rhein the delapidated mill of Diemerstein, and which states that he and his family were permitted to exercise their faith, "just as the people on the Hof have hitherto practiced."

In 1732 the congregation in the village of Fischbach and vicinity numbered 35 families. The preachers were Johann Würtz and Johann Neff, with Hans Langenacker as deacon. They assembled in a building that later became a school and also in the Diemerstein mill, where there was a small building for that purpose, which was torn down in 1842. A Mennonite cemetery still in existence was begun in Diemerstein in 1783. "Previously the corpses of the Mennonites of Diemerstein were taken to Fischbach; they could, however, not be carried on the highway, but had to be quietly carried through the Diemerstein valley across the mountain."

Toward the end of the 18th century the Fischbach congregation merged with Sembach (q.v.). The last preacher of the Fischbach congregation, Christian Schnebele, elder (völliger Diener) 1782-98, preached occasionally in Sembach. The congregation slowly declined on account of agricultural reverses, and loss of members by moving to other congregations, emigration to America, and mixed marriages. The combined congregation long kept the name "Fischbach-Sembach." G.H.

Church Record book of the Sembach church, p. 269; Müller, Berner Täufer, 212; Menn. Bl., 1855, 53; ML I, 645.

Fischer, Christoph Andreas (1560- after 1610), a Jesuit priest, one of the most aggressive opponents of the Hutterite Brethren in Moravia around 1600. He was born in Glatz, Silesia, was educated as a cleric at the Jesuit colleges of Vienna and Rome, where he seems to have received also his theological doctorate. In the 1590's he returned to Vienna and soon after became the parish priest of Feldsberg, Lower Austria, near the Moravian border. He was one of the many fighters in the great Catholic Counter Reformation (q.v.) in Austria, and should be grouped together with Georg Eder (q.v.), Christoph Erhard (q.v.), and the Jesuit Cardaneus, the father confessor and biographer of Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.), all of whom fought relentlessly both the Lutherans and the Anabaptists. Their program allowed no further compromise (as in the days of Maximilian II) but aimed at complete elimination of all non-Catholics. That the relative tolerance of the Moravian nobles toward the Hutterites and their economic activities was to these men a real "scandal" can be easily seen; they tried to oppose it with every possible means. In many regards Fischer was more dangerous than Eder or Erhard because he did not confine his polemics to the religious field, but attacked the Brethren above all from an economic angle, appealing to the jealousy of the surrounding population and denouncing the economic prosperity of Hutterite large-scale farming and crafts. It seems, however, that the manorial lords of southern Moravia, knowing their own advantage, protected the Brethren and were fairly immune to the invectives of Fischer.

Although Fischer must have known the Brethren from personal contact, he yet was also familiar with the polemical writings of his forerunners; he quotes Eysvogel's (q.v.) Lied and repeats his arguments in detail.

Four books or pamphlets are known from his pen: (1) Von der Wiedertauffer verfluchtem Ursprung, gottlosen Lehre, und derselben gründliche Widerlegung. Nach welcher gefragt wird, ob die Wiedertauffer im Lande zu leiden sein oder nicht . . . 1603, gedruckt zu Bruck an der Teya. It was dedicated to the lord Karl von Liechtenstein (a family once much in sympathy with the Anabaptists). In its first part Fischer describes the "heretical doctrines and vices" of the Brethren; he knows surprisingly much of the (manuscript) literature of the Brethren which must have circulated then among the neighboring population. Often he also quotes Peter Riedemann's Rechenschaft (q.v.). In its second part he exhorts the Viennese authorities to wipe out and exterminate these Brethren without mercy, else they would spoil all good "Christians."

To this pamphlet the Hutterite Vorsteher (bishop) Claus Braidl (q.v.), a man of strong and upright character, answered with a pamphlet, Ein Widerlegung und warhafte Verantwortung der alten, grausamsten, abscheulichen . . . Gotteslesterung, Schmach und unwarhafftigen Beschuldigungen so Christoph Andreas Fischer . . . über uns Brüder erdacht (n.p., 1604), defending the Brethren as well as he could against all these calumnies.

(2) Fischer replied with another booklet, Antwort auf die Widerlegung, so Clauss Breutel, der Wiedertauffer König oder Oberste sampt seinen Spiessgesellen hat getan . . . Gedruckt im Kloster Bruck an der Teya, Anno 1604 (156 pages). As text he uses Prov. 26:5, "Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit." In the main it contains but a repetition of number 1. It is necessary, he says, to forbid them all their farms, sheep runs, mills, etc. The nobles should not use their women as wet nurses for "Christian children lest they get all false ideas with their milk." In this book Fischer also reprints the great mandate (General Mandat) of the government of Emperor Rudolphus II of 1601 which ordered the expulsion of all Brethren from Austria within three months. The mandate also claims (with Eysvogel), and Fischer repeats it, that the Brethren snatch away profit and food from the artisans and the entire "Christian" citizenry of the country.

(3) The next book was dedicated to the lord Maximilian von Dietrichstein (q.v.), otherwise known in the Hutterite Chronicle as being rather in sympathy with the Brethren. It has the inciting title, Der Hutterischen Wiedertauffer Taubenkobel, in welchem all ihr Mist, Kot und Unflat . . . zu finden, auch des grossen Taubers, des Jakob Huters Leben . . . angehängt. Durch Chr. A. Fischer, Gedruckt zu Ingolstadt . . . Anno 1607 (67 pages). The title page has a woodcut illustrating this simile that the Bruderhofs are like dovecotes where the brethren deposit all their refuse. Like doves they fly in and out (see illustration). These Bruderhofs are found in the finest places of the country. Again complete expulsion of the Brethren is demanded.

(4) The climax and worst type of this Brethren-baiting is the last pamphlet, entitled: 54 erhebliche Ursachen warum die Wiedertauffer nicht sein im Lande zu leiden. Gedruckt zu Ingolstadt . . . Anno

1607 (54 Strong Arguments Why the Anabaptists Should Not Be Allowed to Live in This Country) (130 pages). The title page has the same woodcut as number 3: the symbolic dovecote. Its text is Ex. 22:18, "Thou shalt not permit a sorcerer to live" (the Bible has "witch" or sorceress). Among the many arguments he mentions also the fact that "the nobles run to the Brethren bathhouses and use their barbers and physicians, and also their drugs, as if no one else knew that art." Fischer claims that the Brethren taught contempt for the authorities. "They steal your religion and call you pagans and infidels." He closes about this way: "Do not allow your country to fall into the disrepute of being a den of murderers because of the presence of these murderers, adulterers, and renegade monks."

A vindication of the Brethren in the face of these slanders is hardly necessary; the article Economic History of the Hutterites provides some of the factual background of this hostile propaganda. At first Fischer's fight was not very successful since the lords wanted to keep these industrious people on their estates; even Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.), the very head of the Counter Reformation in Moravia, kept the Brethren around Nikolsburg, at least for the next decade.

Fischer, however, seems to have moved away from this area, for already in 1607 he is in Ingolstadt, Bavaria, a famous Jesuit center, involved in a "collouquy" with William Laud, the later Anglican archbishop (d. 1645), who published this debate in English. No further information about Fischer is available. LOSERTH, R.F.

Loserth, Communismus, 62-66; ML I, 646-48; pamphlets number 2, 3, and 4 are in Goshen College Library, number 1 in Bethel College Library.

Fischer, Gall, a member of the Augsburg (q.v.) Anabaptist congregation, and after Huber's defection a deacon with Hans Kiessling. He was a weaver, and had already reached an advanced age when he joined the congregation. He was baptized by Siegmund Salminger (q.v.), but was soon thereafter captured. Because he recanted he was not executed, but with four others, including Eitelhans Langenmantel, was expelled from the city Oct. 18, 1527. But he remained a member of the congregation after his expulsion, and in February 1528 he and Augustin Bader (q.v.) were sent to visit the newly formed congregation in Kaufbeuren (q.v.). On Saturday before Easter, April 11, about 40 persons met to worship in his house in Augsburg in his absence. On the next day the council struck the congregation an annihilating blow. They surprised them at a meeting in the home of the sculptor Doucher (q.v.) and seized 88 members, some of whom were executed and some after torture expelled from the city. Four women, in whose homes meetings had been held, had their cheeks burned through with hot irons; one of these was probably Elisabeth, Gall Fischer's wife.

Gall was likely wandering about in Swabia with Augustin Bader as a fugitive. The experiences of their dearest friends who were tortured and even killed, as for instance the leader of the Kaufbeuren congregation who had been chosen under their supervision and who was beheaded June 13, 1528, with 5 men who would not recant, and 30 men and 5 women who were either branded or whipped out of the city, all of whom Gall Fischer had baptized, weighed heavily upon the two men and confused them. On the basis of visions and dreams they proclaimed the imminence of the judgment and the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. Their contacts with the Anabaptists, who rejected these new ideas, were entirely lost. At Lautern near Ulm, where they had found shelter in a barn, Fischer claimed to have received a great vision (see Bader, Augustin), upon which Bader furnished himself with royal insignia. The purchase of these objects aroused suspicion and on Jan. 16, 1530, led to the arrest of the entire group of five men, three women, and eight children. The government feared revolution, and though the fears were proved groundless, Fischer was taken to Nürtingen and subjected to questioning on the rack. He maintained his loyalty to Bader throughout, and was executed about March 26, 1530, at Nürtingen. HEGE.

G. Bossert, "Augustin Bader von Augsburg," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. X (1913) 117 ff.; F. Roth, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht des hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVIII (Augsburg, 1902) 31 ff.; K. Alt, Wiedertäufer in und aus Kaufbeuren (Kempten, 1930); K. Schornbaum, TA: Bayern II; G. Bossert, TA: Württemberg, 930-34, 953-55; ML I, 648.

Fischer, Michael, an Anabaptist martyr. His death sentence, pronounced on Aug. 7, 1587, in Ingolstadt, states that he had joined the Anabaptists about 20 years previously and persuaded others to do so. During his imprisonment of 12 weeks the Jesuits tried in vain to lead him back into the Catholic Church. An account of the execution as given by an eyewitness and found in the Hutterian chronicles relates that as soon as the sentence was pronounced he was at once led to the site of execution, accompanied by a Jesuit and another monk, who were still trying to convert him. At the place of execution they held a crucifix before his eyes and bade him look at it. Fischer shook his head and told the executioner to proceed, for he wished to die loyal to his faith; he knelt, motionless and unafraid. The executioner was so dismayed by this exhibition of courage that he did not behead him correctly, and had to be led back into the city with a firm supporting hand.

Fischer's martyrdom is sung in an anonymous hymn beginning "Mich ursacht euch zu singen." It is found in two manuscripts in Pressburg, one in Gran, and one in Budapest, and also in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, p. 785 f. LOSERTH.

Die Lieder der Hutterischen Bruder (Scottdale, 1914); Wolkan, Lieder, 235; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 299 f.; Mart. Mir. D 756, E 1062, where he is called Michael Vischer; ML I, 648 f.

Fischer, Volkmar, an Anabaptist peasant of Rohrborn, a village in the district of Erfurt, Hesse, Germany, baptized by Hans Römer (q.v.), apparently took part in an attack on Erfurt, escaped all persecution, arrived at Basel, where he stayed in the home of Michael Schürer, a tailor from Freiburg. Here he renounced all ideas of revolution and joined the quiet Anabaptists. He left for Bohemia six weeks later, and was imprisoned in Prague for a while.

For about a year he was a distiller of whiskey at Kaaden on the Eger, and then worked as a day laborer in various villages in the Erz Mountains. On Nov. 1, 1534, he was arrested by the council of Erfurt and probably executed the following March. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913) 41 ff.; ML I, 649.

Fisher, Ill., a town (pop. 800) located in east central Illinois in Champaign County, about 20 miles northwest of Champaign-Urbana, and serves the fertile agricultural area near by. The Mennonite settlement began in 1883, when a few Mennonites came from Tazewell Co., Ill., to the northwest corner of Champaign County. In 1954 the Mennonite population is located for the most part north, east, and west of the town. Over half of the membership of some 500 live within shopping distance of Fisher; of this number nearly 100 actually live in town. The Mennonite population of the town has been increasing steadily during the past decade. The Mennonites in this area are served by the East Bend Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles north and one mile east of Fisher. K.L.M.

Fisherville (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct. On Aug. 9, 1874, the first services were held in a new meetinghouse 3 miles north of Halifax in Dauphin County, 28 miles north of Harrisburg. Slate Hill and Strickler ministers were in charge. With exclusively German preaching, the young people were lost by 1900 and the house was sold. In 1928 eight members from Virginia located here and church privileges were granted them from Slate Hill in an abandoned schoolhouse. By 1930 the group had scattered and services were discontinued. I.D.L.

Flag Run Conservative Amish Mennonites: see Beachy.

Flamingh, Hans: see Vlamingh, Hans.

Flanagan, Ill., is located in Livingston County, in the north central part of the state, and has a population of 680. Three branches of Mennonites live in the vicinity of Flanagan, all of Amish background: the Evangelical Mennonites, Salem Mennonite Church; Mennonites (MC), Waldo Mennonite Church; and Central Conference Mennonites, Flanagan Mennonite Church. The settlements are southeast, south, and southwest of Flanagan. Mennonites have lived in this area since 1859 and at that time were known as Amish Mennonites. At present approximately 90 Mennonites live in Flanagan, and practically all in the general area live within shopping distance of the village.

In 1898 the Salem Orphanage, now known as the Salem Children's Home, was founded two miles southeast of Flanagan by the Salem Mennonite Church and continues to be supported by the Defenseless Mennonites, now the Evangelical Mennonite Church. J.O.

Flanagan Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Central District Conference (formerly known as Central Conference of Mennonites), located about two miles southwest of Flanagan, Ill., began as a Sunday school for Amish residents in the vicinity. In 1878 the congregation was organized with Christian Rediger as its pastor. Four years later a church was built. Succeeding ministers and/or bishops were Stephen Stahley 1885-1916, Joseph Zehr 1890-1934, Emanuel Ulrich 1918- . A full schedule of regular Sunday services is carried on. In 1954 the membership was 79. R.L.H.

Flanders (Dutch, Vlaanderen), once a county extending along the coast of the Low Countries, covering the present Belgian provinces of East Flanders and West Flanders and (in the 16th century) the area of the French departement of Nord from Dunkirk to Lille (Rijssel). In the southern part of Flanders the French language predominated; but in by far the larger area Dutch was spoken. It is strange that this part of Belgium is now strictly Catholic, whereas in the Middle Ages it was a center of all sorts of faiths and in the 16th century there were at first many Anabaptist congregations, followed by still more numerous Reformed congregations.

It may be that Bakhuizen van den Brink is right in saying that the origin of Anabaptism here is not to be found in Melchiorite influence as is the movement in Holland and Friesland, nor in the Swiss Brethren influence, but in the remnants of Waldensian groups which existed here in concealment. Bakhuizen may also be right in believing that about 1565 great numbers of Anabaptists joined the Reformed Church. Fruin calls attention to the astonishing fact that in consequence of the hatred of the working classes against the immoral clergy and of the economic conditions of the populace, they were led into a very destructive iconoclasm, only to unite in droves under the banner of the suppressors of the Reformation. On the other hand, the courage of hundreds of martyrs shines gloriously, and there is no area in western Europe where the soil was so thoroughly watered by the blood of the heroes of faith and where execution stakes were so frequently set up; and hundreds of Flemish fled to Holland, Friesland, Groningen, East Friesland, Twente, the Rhine Province, and England.

A number of these refugees apparently settled in the north in 1555-66, before the breaking of the images and the arrival of Alba. They were of great importance for the northern congregations. They produced a number of families of ministers, and were of great influence in introducing an element of trade into our churches of sailors and peasants. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror lists nearly 400 Anabaptist martyrs from Flanders, and since that time research in the archives by Edouard de Coussemaker and especially A. L. E. Verheyden (Martyrologia of Brugge, Gent, etc.) has brought many more to light. Not all the archives of Flanders have been investigated, and some are no longer in existence, such as the important archives of Ieper, which were destroyed in World War I in 1916.

The beginning of Anabaptism in Flanders, especially in the great trade centers of Gent, Brugge, Kortrijk (Courtrai), Meenen, and Ieper, is best explained as being slumbering remnants of former religious anti-Catholic movements and as the result of the cosmopolitan population of these cities, their extensive but dwindling industry and their international trade with the shipping connected with this trade, creating here a fertile soil for reformatory efforts and easy entry for new ideas.

It is, however, remarkable that among the Flemish weavers in the Middle Ages there were many adherents of religious brotherhoods, and that Anabaptism found its following chiefly among the workers in the textile industries; and also in the disinclination of the city authorities to persecute religious faiths, since it would be injurious to international trade. It was actually the servants of the rulers that led the persecution, supported principally by the monasteries, whose members, however immorally they might be living, were willing to furnish inquisitors, such as the abhorrent Brother Cornelis Adriaansz of Brugge. The adherents of the new ideas were very likely the descendants of the party of Klauwaarts, whose freedom-loving views conflicted with those of the party of Leliaart. Behind our heroes of faith rises the shadow of the great man of the people, Jacob van Artevelde.

Henri Pirenne in his history of Belgium (III, 404 ff.) has drawn a sad picture of the moral decline of the clergy of the time. Their education and scholarship was as slight as their sins were great. The tie with the church, which was actually hated by the populace, became so loose that it was quite easily broken by the reading of a reformatory writing that was secretly printed in Antwerp. Here we have the center of religious enlightenment through literary means. But, above all, the new doctrine was propagated both openly and privately by itinerant preachers, who proclaimed the new faith in small gatherings held here and there in a granary or a basement, as well as in larger concourses in remote woods, and occasionally, like the martyr Gillis van Aken (q.v.), preached on the street or the market place following the example of the preaching monks. From foreign countries came dealers and seamen and related in the inns what was believed in other lands.

The first Anabaptist victims in Flanders were Willem Mulaer, who was beheaded in Gent on July 15, 1535, and Arendt de Jagher and Jan van Gentbrugge, who were beheaded four days later. The first proclamation against the Anabaptists was posted at Antwerp on Feb. 12, 1535. This was the time of the disturbances in Münster. The authorities everywhere now saw in Anabaptism only a revolutionary movement dangerous to the security of the state. From now on, it was threatened with severe punishment, viz., the stakes for men and drowning for women, while those who sheltered its adherents or promoted their work were banished; the death penalty was set for holding meetings. Münsterite preachers such as Jan van Geelen and Jacob van Herwerden moved through Flanders preaching their doctrine. But it may be assumed that the number of their followers was rather small in comparison with that of the northern areas, and that there was little desire here to institute the New Jerusalem with the sword. But here too, as is seen in the accounts of Hans van Overdam (q.v.), who died as a martyr at Gent, they originally called themselves Bondgenooten (q.v.). The notorious Jan van Batenburg (q.v.) was arrested at Artois in 1537; in his confession made in the castle of Vilvoorden, he betrayed a number of names, among them some from the south.

Presumably at about this same time the preacher Wouter van Stoelwijk (q.v.) was arrested and in 1541 after many years of imprisonment executed as a martyr. His writing, which is found in the Martyrs' Mirror, is both inspiring and dogmatically sound. But there had already been other similar movements in Flanders. The David Jorists had a number of followers. There were also some followers of Hendrik Nicolai (Familists), members of the "House of Love." The secrecy practiced by both groups blocks the inquiry into their numbers. Nevertheless it is certain that they were favored. The "sermons" of Brother Cornelis reveal that there were some in Brugge, and that the unitarian ideas of Adam Pastor, on account of which he was banned by Menno and Dirk Philips, found an echo in Flanders, as, e.g., in the case of the martyr Herman van Vlekwijk (q.v.). This has been proved by Hans Alenson (q.v.) (BRN VII, 196).

The doctrine of the Incarnation as adopted by Menno from Melchior Hofmann was not shared by all the Belgian Anabaptists. It is, for example, rather strange that the publishers of the Haarlem Offerboek for this reason omitted a part of a letter by Claes de Praet (q.v.). Also Jacob van de Wege, who was burned at the stake at Gent in 1573, held a different view. He had a brother Hans, who had died at the stake three years before. They were nephews of Claes, the colleague of the notorious Inquisitor Pieter Titelman, deacon of Ronse (Renaix), their home.

Another characteristic doctrine found among the Anabaptists was the "sleep of the soul" (q.v.), i.e., the human soul is in a state of sleep until the final judgment. A surgeon of Rijssel (Lille) was drowned at Metz in 1538 on account of this heresy. Several other Flemish Anabaptists have been discussed by K. Vos in the Theologisch Tijdschrift of 1918, viz., Jacob de Rore or Keersgieter, a preacher at Brugge (d. 1569), Hans de Vette (Gent) and Hans van der Maes at Warneton near Ieper (both d. 1559), and Hendrik Verstralen at Rupelmonde (d. 1571), who said, "That we may go to our chambers (graves) with peace and calm and await the coming of the Lord, who will awaken us below the ground." But most of the martyrs believed that they would at once inherit heaven.

Presumably most of the martyrs died without possessions. Confiscation rarely produced any goods. Only rarely is there a statement regarding making property secure. It seems that those who had means succeeded in fleeing. Only in 1567 are five rich men of Rijssel (Lille) mentioned, who were sentenced at Antwerp. The nobility as well as the wealthy risked grave losses when they opposed the government. Nor should it be forgotten that this religious movement arose at a time of decreasing prosperity and declining industry, in which the coming of the kingdom of Christ upon a new earth was expected for half a century, and that its adherents were found for the most part among those who were dissatisfied with their lot on earth.

Furthermore, it seems that in only two periods (1534-35 and 1566) did any great number of the laboring class join the movement for a time, but only a few of these became members, and these gave an adequate account of their transfer. They were able to read the Bible and the reformatory writings, they composed good letters, and their confessions of faith were well considered. There were also some writers of songs among them. A number were able to give pointed replies to the inquisitor. Actually, the brotherhood made lofty demands of its members. Baptism was imparted only to those whose confession of faith and conduct were considered worthy.

The trials also show that the meetings were attended by 20 persons at the most; this was the usual number found by the authorities when they surprised a meeting. And only a few persons were baptized at a time. The prisoners on the rack were never able to give more than a few names, which suggests that the congregations were not large. But the members must have had unusual financial resources, for in no other way could the large number of published writings be explained. It must also be considered that in the Frisian vs. Flemish disputes one of the causes for friction was the costly clothing of the Flemish, and that one reason why Leenaert Bouwens was removed from his office of elder was that he drank too much wine.

The organization of the congregations was also different from that of the north, partly because of difference in national characteristics, and partly because they had other preachers. Menno and Dirk Philips were never in Flanders; nevertheless they were no doubt very highly regarded here. The Flemish congregations were more independent. Whereas in the north only the elder could perform the rite of baptism, in the south it was frequently performed by men who were not yet ordained as elders.

The strict adherents of the ban and shunning did not live in Flanders. On the contrary, there were many here who favored milder views. Still, they did not want to be too lenient. The martyr Christian Rijcen (burned at the stake at Hondschoote in 1588), formerly a preacher in Leyden, had to resign from his office for that reason.

The following preachers and leaders served in Flanders: Leenaert Bouwens, who baptized about 350 persons in Flanders in 1554-82, Joachim Vermeeren, Joost Verbeeck, Herman de Timmerman, Hans Busschaert de Wever, Gillis van Aken, Jan van Ophoorn, Jan van de Walle, Gillis Bernaerts, Michiel Bernaerts, Adriaan du Rieu, Hendrik van Arnhem, Paulus van Meenen, Hans Symons of Rijssel, Olivier Willems, Gillis de Hevile, and Filips Bostijn (all of these are discussed by K. Vos, De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de 16. eeuw). Additional names are Joos de Tollenaar, Hendrik van Rosevelt, Martin van der Straten, Wouter van Stoelwijk, Christiaen Rijcen, Jacob de Rore, Hartman Sybrands, and Christoffel van Leuvene.

Without doubt Gent (q.v.) had the largest congregation. Other congregations that produced martyrs were: Aire, Armentières, Bailleul (Belle), Brugge, Cassel, Comines, Dixmuiden, Halewijn (Halluin), Hondschoote, Ieper, Kortrijk (Courtrai), Meenen, Messines, Middelburg, Nieppe (Nijpkerke), Oostende, Oudenaarde, Pamele, Rijssel, Rupelmonde, Thielt, Vinderhoute, Waastene (Warneton), Wervik, and Wynoksbergen. Anabaptists were also living at Harelebeeke, Ronse, Rousselare, Steenwerk, and Swevegem.

The last Anabaptist martyr of Flanders was Michiel de Cleercq (q.v.), executed at Gent in 1592. Thereafter the Mennonites in Flanders died out or emigrated. Until about 1630 Mennonite congregations were found in the neighborhood of Gent, at Lovendeghem (q.v.) and Zomerghem (q.v.). At this time many Mennonites fled to the Netherlands, especially to Aardenburg (q.v.). Others went to the Rhine Province of Germany. Among the Mennonite families in the Netherlands of Flemish descent (in large part they have died out) are the Anselmus, Apostool, de Block, Beheydt, Boekenoogen, van de(n) Boogaert, Calvaert, Claeys, de Clercq, Coppens, Couwenhoven (Kauenhoven), Cranen (Craen), van Daele (Dalen, Daalen), Dobbelaere, Dyserinck, van Eeghen, Fack, de la Faille, de Forest, de Fremery, Goudeseboys, Gryspeert, de Haan, van Halmael, Hartsen, van Outryve (Hauteryve), d' Hoye (de Hoeye), van Houcke, Hebberecht, de Heere, Hennebo, Huygaert, van de(n) Kerckhove(n), van der Meersch, Mehoude, Messchaert, Mulier, de Neufville, de Pla, Plovyer, le Poole, des Rameaus, Roose(n), de Sitter (de Suttere), van (der) Sluys, van der Smissen, van de Steenkiste, Ta(c)k, Verhamme, de Wale (de Wael), de Wolff. K.V., vdZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "Introduction to the History of the Mennonites in Flanders," MQR XXI (April 1947) 51-63; idem, Brugge; idem, Gent; idem, Courtrai-Bruxelles; idem, Le Protestantisme à Nieuport au XVIe siècle (Brussels, 1951); idem, "History of the Mennonites in Flanders," to be published in 1957 at Scottdale; K. Vos, De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de zestiende eeuw (Brussels, 1920); ML I, 649-52.

Flatland Mennonite Church (GCM) of the Eastern District Conference is located in Richland Twp., Bucks Co., Pa. In 1837 Mennonites of the Swamp and Springfield congregations living in this community built a small stone meetinghouse, which with subsequent interior changes, remains to the present day. In the early days the congregation sometimes was known as "Tohickon," the name of the near-by stream. In 1847 most of the congregation followed Jacob Benner out of the Franconia (MC) Conference into the new conference, while George Landis and perhaps a few others remained with the old conference and went elsewhere. In 1857 a portion of the congregation left the conference and with William N. Shelly joined the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.), later known as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ.

Known ministers and their terms of service are as follows: George Landis 1837-47, John H. Oberholtzer ca. 1842-70, W. N. Shelly ca. 1847-57, L. O. Shimmel (?) ca. 1858-69, A. B. Shelly 1864-1913, Harvey W. Shelly 1914-18, Harvey G. Allebach 1919-21, Peter E. Frantz 1922-25, Seward M. Rosenberger 1925-29, Arthur S. Rosenberger 1930-34, A. J. Neuenschwander 1934-49, William Denlinger 1949- .

A Sunday school was begun perhaps as early as 1853, although it was not continuous. The present Sunday school was organized in 1886. The membership just before 1847 is reported to have been about 50; in 1864 it was 30; in 1908 it was 44, and in 1954 it was 61. The common names today are Frei, Ahlum, Fluck, Kilmer, and Yeakel. J.H.F.

"Flatland Mennonite Church," 1899 Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac (Quakertown); "Building the Flatland Meetinghouse," 1938 Yearbook of the General Conf. (Berne); J. C. Wenger, Hist. of the Menn. of the Franconia Conf. (Telford, 1937).

Fleckenstein, a small Mennonite congregation in the Lower Alsace, near the German border, not far from Wissembourg, now extinct, which held its meetings on the Fleckensteinerhof until 1929. (See also Essingen and Lembach.)

Fleetwood Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, located in Berks Co., Pa., was organized about 1875. In 1954 the congregation had 138 members, with T. D. Gehret serving as pastor. In 1868 a church was built here by the United Mennonites. J.B.H.

Fleiner, Joachim, an Anabaptist martyr, of a respected family in Esslingen, Württemberg, the young son of a guildmaster, was probably baptized in 1528 by Wilhelm Reublin or Christoph Freisleben (Eleutherobion). In September 1528 Augustin Bader (q.v.) of Augsburg invited him to a meeting of his followers at Schönberg near Gerodseck, at which baptism, ban, and communion were to be discussed. Fleiner, impressed with Bader's knowledge of Scripture, accepted, but was repelled by Bader's ideas of grandeur and returned to Esslingen the next day. He was prominent among the Anabaptists here, baptizing others.

At the end of 1529 he was arrested. No fewer than 14 learned men tried to convert him. His relatives, brothers, and sister begged him with tears to renounce his faith. He replied that he would renounce evil, but do good. At his trial he denied that the Anabaptists wanted all property to be held in common. It was good not to swear, but one might swear or refuse to do it. In all temporal matters they wanted to obey the commands of the government unless they were contrary to God's commands. No one should offend another; therefore it is not right to bear arms.

On Feb. 21, 1530, Fleiner was taken to the place of execution with Ludwig Lichtenstein. On the way he sang, "Aus tiefer Not schrei ich zu dir," and asked the pardon of all as he also pardoned all. Then he looked up and said, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit," made a cross with his right foot, and knelt. The executioner again asked him to recant, pointing to the body of Lichtenstein, who had already been executed. He replied, "I shall not die today, I shall be with God," and amid the general weeping he continued to speak. His courage deeply impressed the people. G.Bo.

A. Diehl, ed., Dreytweins Esslinger Chronik (Tübingen, 1901) 104 ff.; K. Pfaff, Gesch. der Reichsstadt Esslingen (Esslingen, 1840) 476; Keim, Reformationsblätter der Reichsstadt Esslingen, 1860, p. 31; Arch. für Ref.-Gesch. XI, 115 ff. (ev. 35 und 36); G. Bossert, TA I: Württemberg (Leipzig, 1930) 963, 966; J. Rauscher, Württemb. Ref.-Gesch. (1934) 85; ML I, 652.

Fleischer, Frederik Cornelis, b. 1863 at Amsterdam, d. 1929 at Beekbergen, at first a teacher, then a Dutch Mennonite pastor, serving Broek op Langendijk 1896-1902, Makkum 1902-9, and Winterswijk 1909-24. He is known for his interest in social work and as the founder of a Dutch Association for public hygiene, called Het Groene Kruis (The Green Cross), in 1900, of which he was the president, serving until his death. Its purpose is to promote public health by fighting tuberculosis, by training nurses and maternity nurses, by giving material help during illness, etc. This undertaking of Pastor Fleischer, who planned the organization for the benefit of all the Dutch people, has proved to be very successful. The work, which at first was done from the Mennonite parsonages of Makkum and Winterswijk, has spread all over the country. In 1919 an office was established in Utrecht, and the Groene Kruis was subsidized by the government. Besides this work Fleischer also served as secretary of the Dutch General Committee of Foreign Needs from July 1, 1921, until his death. He energetically organized the Dutch Mennonite aid for the suffering Russian brethren, whom he visited in the Ukraine in 1922 (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden). Fleischer published a booklet on Menno Simons (Amsterdam, 1892); Bloesemknoppen (sermons) (Broek op Langendijk, 1902); Die Taufgesinnten in den Niederlanden (n.p., 1904); De Doopsgezinden (Baarn, 1909); De Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Winterswijk (Winterswijk, 1911); a number of sermons and some articles in the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje on the activities of the Committee of Foreign Needs (DJ 1923, 43-78; 1924, 61-78). From 1896 to 1910 he was the author of the yearly statistical surveys in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen. Besides this he published a large number of articles in the Zondagsbode and in various Dutch non-Mennonite daily and weekly papers.

In 1908, while visiting the Unitarian Conference at Boston, Mass., he also visited some Mennonite congregations in America, e.g., in Philadelphia. His son Willem Isaak Fleischer is also a Mennonite pastor, serving Terschelling 1930-33, Balk and Woudsend 1933-42, Steenwijk and Meppel 1942-46, Meppel 1946-49, and Groningen since 1949.

A.G.v.H., vdZ.

DB 1908, 200; DJ 1931, 21-29 with portrait; Catalogus Amst., 13, 43, 91, 318; ML I, 653.

Flemish Mennonites (Dutch, Vlamingen or Vlaamschen) was the name of a branch of Mennonites that originated in 1566 in opposition to the Frisians (q.v.). The conflict and hence the division arose after many Mennonites, in order to escape from the most oppressive persecution, had emigrated or fled from Belgium, and especially from Flanders (hence they were usually called Flemings or Flemish), to the Netherlands. Many of them settled in the Dutch province of Friesland. Here the four congregations of Harlingen, Franeker, Leeuwarden, and Dokkum formed a union in 1560 on the basis of 19 articles on various questions of congregational life. The union was known as the Ordinantie der vier steden. Among other things they stipulated that a preacher chosen for one of the congregations should also serve the other three, and that all matters of discord arising in one should be settled by the preachers of all four churches. The care of the poor was also provided for in common. By this arrangement the autonomy of the individual congregation, a fundamental principle of the brotherhood, was abrogated, and this gave rise to the fateful division between the Frisian and Flemish members.

The Flemish had come to these four cities too. The difference of background soon led to all manner of disagreement. The Frisians were offended by the Flemish way of living and dressing, and the latter resented the greater stores of linen and household goods possessed by the Frisians, and accused them of siding more with the world, whereas they (the Flemish) had proved their world-denying faith in persecution. It was stated in this way: the Flemish are worldly in respect to their dress, the Frisians in their homes.

In Franeker (q.v.) Jeroen Tinnegieter, a refugee from Henegouwen (Hainaut), Belgium, was chosen preacher. This choice seemed questionable to Harlingen. With the aid of preachers from outside (Hoyte Renix, Nette Lipkes, and Hans Bouwens Busschaert) the difficulty was settled; but a sting remained. Tinnegieter was hostile to the union of the four cities, seeing in it—probably correctly—the real cause of his having been rejected. At a meeting of the brotherhood he declared that the Franeker congregation was leaving the union. A part of the congregation, which had not been heard, protested this move. The two sections held separate church services. This marked the beginning of the baneful division, which soon reached Harlingen also. The designations Frisian and Flemish were already current.

All efforts to reunite them were futile. Again preachers from outside were asked to aid; this time they were Jan Willemsz (q.v.) and Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), both of Hoorn. They succeeded on Dec. 19, 1566, in effecting a compromise and both groups agreed on four specific points. But the general discussion at Harlingen on Feb. 1, 1567, did not lead to harmony; and the unyielding attitude of Dirk Philips (q.v.), who had been called to arbitrate and traveled to Emden with two other delegates from Danzig, made the schism permanent. The Flemish pronounced the ban upon all the Frisians (June 1567). Anyone marrying into the other party was subject to the ban; any member of one party wishing to join the other had to be rebaptized. Dirk Philips took the part of the Flemish, whereas Leenaert Bouwens joined the Frisians. Not only in Friesland, but all over the Netherlands the churches became involved and divided, and in most towns there were henceforth found both a Flemish and a Frisian congregation. The congregation of Zierikzee (q.v.) in Zeeland, which refused to decide either for the Flemish or for the Frisians, but which wished to remain neutral, was banned both by the Flemish and the Frisians.

The name "Flemish" is not geographic; it does not mean that its members came from Flanders, nor does "Frisian" mean that its members live in Friesland, or are natives of this province. Flemish and Frisian have become party names. The Frisians were in the majority in North Holland and Friesland, while in Groningen and Overijssel the Flemish were more numerous.

Once again in 1568 an attempt was made to reconcile the divisions. The congregations at Blokzijl, Giethoorn, and Steenwijk, who had as yet not been involved in the strife, investigated the matter and sided with the Flemish, presented their view in a statement of Jan. 3, 1569, called the Stichtsche groote presentatie, and after useless negotiations they broke off fraternal relations with all the Frisian congregations (there were more than 50 of them) on April 2, 1569. This step made the rupture final. Neither the Humstervrede (q.v., peace of Humsterland, 1574) nor the negotiations at Hoorn (1574) and Emden (April 2 and May 22, 1578), nor the discussion at Haarlem (1582), or the confession of guilt by the Frisian and Flemish preachers (1589), could bridge the gulf and bring about a union. In the Netherlands it took 200 years to wipe out the last signs of the division. (An account of the Flemish division and its course is found in DB 1893, 1-90.)

Twenty years after the Flemish-Frisian schism a new division arose in the main Flemish body. In Franeker, Friesland, the elder of the Flemish congregation, Thomas Byntgens (q.v.), bought a house; because Thomas's purchase seems not to have been above reproach a quarrel arose in 1586 and the Franeker Flemish congregation was divided into two groups, that of Byntgens, soon called Huiskoopers (q.v.) (Housebuyers), and a group led by the deacon Jacob Keest (q.v.), called Contra-Huiskoopers. Attempts were made by the Flemish congregations of Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Hoorn to reconcile the two groups, but in vain, and soon the whole Flemish body was divided in two parties: Huiskoopers, Thomas Byntgens-volk, or as they were mostly called, Oude Vlamingen (Old Flemish), while the others were called Contra-Huiskoopers, Jacob-Keest-volk, Zachte (mild) Vlamingen, or simply Vlamingen (Flemish). (Concerning this quarrel see Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 479; 558 III; DB 1912, 49-60.)

It seems somewhat ridiculous and even sad, that the buying of a house could divide the Mennonites, but this was only the outer motive. The point of the quarrel was rather a different conception of the church among the Flemish, whether the church should be conceived as strictly separated from the world, as a church without spot or wrinkle or not (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 430-31). The (mild) Flemish were less conservative than the Old Flemish, and more moderate in banning and shunning. There were also a few local schisms; viz., among the Old Flemish at Haarlem and Danzig in 1598 the Vermeulensvolk (q.v.) or Bankrottiers; in Haarlem and Amsterdam in 1620 the Borstentasters (q.v.) or Vincent de Hondtvolk. The Flemish congregation at Haarlem was divided in 1685 into two congregations, the Thomas-Snepvolk (q.v.) and the Jan-Evertszvolk (q.v.).

Shortly after 1600 many among the (mild) Flemish realized that those pitiful and unprofitable divisions among the Mennonites must be ended. Some of them made contacts with the Bevredigde Broederschap (q.v.), a group of United High German, Waterlander, and (Young) Frisian Mennonites. At Harlingen (q.v.), Friesland, the Flemish congregation merged with the Frisians about 1610. This was much censured by many other Flemish congregations, especially those of the province of Groningen, who banned the Harlingen peacemakers (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 522, 523, 539, 557, 558 V, 561, 564, 570).

In 1626 the four preachers of the Lamist Flemish church at Amsterdam, who already had previously defended the Harlingen group against the ire of the Groningen churches, made an attempt to unite all Dutch Mennonites, except the Waterlanders (q.v.) who were excluded. For this purpose they sent an invitation to peace, attended with a confession of faith, the well-known Olijftack (q.v.), which was printed in 1629 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 565). The result was disappointing; the Old Frisians and their leader P. J. Twisck (q.v.) repudiated such a "monstrous" alliance (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 566, 568). The Flemish churches in Groningen too warned against a union with High Germans and Frisians (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 564-65). But in Amsterdam after negotiations which lasted for a number of years a union was accomplished in 1639 between the Flemish congregation and that of united Frisians and High Germans (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 184-200).

In the meanwhile the Olijftack had scored a great success at Dordrecht in 1632, by uniting the Flemish and most Old Flemish congregations on the basis of the confession of Adriaan Cornelisz (Dordrecht Confession) (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 583-92, 595-98; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 195-96). Only two groups of the Flemish did not join this general union: first a large number of congregations in the province of Groningen and elsewhere in the country, which from the beginning had protested against the Olijftack, and now separated from the main body (about 1637). They are called Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.) or after one of their most influential leaders Uckowallists (q.v.) (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 557, 562-64, 571, 575-77, 600, 605 f., 934; II, Nos. 1413-20). The other group which did not agree and remained separated comprised a number of conservative Old Flemish churches, who were then called Huiskoopers, or "Dantziger (Danziger) Old Flemish" (q.v.). Thus the Groningen and Danziger Old Flemish remained independent of the union.

After the Old and Mild Flemish had united in 1632 and merged with the Frisian-High German group in 1639, the Waterlanders applied for admissian to this large body of Dutch Mennonites in 1647. But the conference of Flemish leaders at Haarlem in 1649 refused this, and the Waterlanders remained excluded. Since in the Lammerenkrijg (q.v., War of the Lambs) new party-names of Galenisten and Apostoolsen came forth, soon called Lamisten and Zonisten, the name "Flemish Mennonites" disappeared in Holland. Only the Groningen and Danziger Old Flemish, mentioned before, maintained the name until the 19th century.

The Flemish-Frisian schism, begun at Franeker, Friesland, in 1566, was not limited to the Netherlands. In Flanders too the church was divided; especially in the congregation of Antwerp there were found both Flemish and Frisian followers. But in general the matter was less of an issue in Belgium, for nearly all the congregations belonged to the Flemish party.

In Prussia also the church had its schism, and here and later in Russia the split lasted much longer than in the Netherlands. In Prussia too the names of Flemish and Frisian do not refer to the origin of the members of a congregation from Friesland or from Flanders, but are also merely names of the parties.

The Flemish congregations in Prussia were Danzig (meeting outside of the Neugarten gate, formerly op het Schotland), Heubuden, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Tiegenhagen, Fürstenwerder and Elbing-Ellerwald, Wintersdorf and Kleinsee, Culmsche Niederung (Schönsee), and Königsberg. Of this group the congregations of Wintersdorf and Kleinsee-Jeziorka belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish; Königsberg probably belonged to the Danziger Old Flemish. Frisian congregations (later also called Waterlanders) in Prussia were Danzig (Petershagen gate), Orlofferfelde, Thiensdorf, Markushof, Montau-Gruppe, Schönsee, Stuhmsche Niederung (Tragheimerweide), Memelniederung, and Obernessau.

Variant practices in the observance of communion and baptism still show slight remains of the division. In the Flemish congregations the preachers read their sermons while seated (Menn. Bl. 1912, 5), whereas in the Frisian congregations the sermons were not read. In the Flemish group the baptismal candidate had to name two character witnesses, whose names were read from the pulpit; they baptized by pouring, and the Frisians by sprinkling. In the communion ceremony the Flemish preacher distributed the bread to the members, who remained seated; in the Frisian congregations the members filed past the elder, who put the bread on the handkerchief of the member (DB 1886, 21). In Friedrichstadt the unification occurred in 1698, in Danzig not until 1808 (Mannhardt, 89, 104). In West Prussia the preachers and elders of the two groups held annual conferences together beginning in 1772. The first instance of reception into the other group without rebaptism occurred in 1768. Since the great Flemish conference at Petershagen on Feb. 9, 1778, where the question was discussed, but blocked by the Flemish, intermarriage between the two groups was quietly accepted.

Concerning the relationship in Russia, Friesen (Brüderschaft, 44) says that in accordance with an old Flemish regulation, only the elders, not the preachers, were ordained by the laying on of hands; this practice continued in some Flemish congregations until 1900. At the time of the original settlement in Russia (1789) the opposition between the two groups was still so sharp that the Flemish organized themselves into the Chortitza congregation and the Frisians into the Kronsweide congregation, and maintained strict separation between the two. The Dutch Mennonites made an appeal in a letter dated May 10, 1788, to the new settlers to unify: not until decades later did this happen, and then only gradually. (See Friesische Mennoniten, ML II, 8 f.) Neff, vdZ.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Friesen, Brüderschaft; Kühler, Geschiedenis I and II; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Het verbond der vier steden," DB 1893, 1-90; ML I, 649.

Flensburg, a city (pop. 50,000) in the Prussian province of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, in which a colloquy with Melchior Hofmann took place on April 8, 1529. Neff.

B. U. Krohn, Gesch. der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer vornehmlich in Niederdeutschland (Leipzig, 1758) 149 ff., gives the official records of the debate as published by Bugenhagen; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885) 134 ff.; ML I, 654.

Fliedner, Theodor, b. Jan. 21, 1800, at Eppstein in Taunus, Germany, d. Oct. 4, 1864, in Kaiserswerth, the founder of deaconess (q.v.) work in the Protestant Church. He received the idea on a money-raising visit to Amsterdam, where the Mennonites had deaconesses in their church work. In his book Collektenreise in Holland und England 1831 he devotes a chapter to the Mennonites under the title, "Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnte, grobe und feine Taufgesinnte." His detailed description, given with thorough knowledge and acute judgment, is still of value. In it he describes the character of the Dutch Mennonites, their customs, and their life, their church organizations, and their benevolent institutions, even though his verdict is somewhat colored by his orthodoxy. Neff.

G. Fliedner, Theodor Fliedner, Leben und Wirken (2 vols., Kaiserswerth, 1908, 1910); ML I, 654.

Fliesteden, Peter of, a Protestant martyr, who died with Adolf Clarenbach (q.v.) at the stake in Cologne, Germany, Sept. 28, 1529. It is not clear whether or not he was an Anabaptist. He was born in Fliesteden in Jülich. In December 1527 he went to Cologne. During the celebration of the Mass in the cathedral he kept his head covered and was otherwise disrespectful toward this "idolatry," and was therefore arrested and so terribly tortured that the executioners pitied him. But neither the rack nor a two-year imprisonment in the dungeon altered his views. He remained true to his convictions and endured his martyrdom with admirable courage. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 114 ff.; ML I, 654.) Neff.

Flinck, Govert, a Mennonite artist, b. Jan. 25, 1615, at Cleve, Germany, d. Feb. 4, 1660, at Amsterdam. His parents wanted to educate him for the textile trade, but his employer discharged him because he was always drawing. The Mennonite preacher and painter Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.) at Leeuwarden convinced his parents that artists were not necessarily frivolous; they then permitted him to follow his bent. After his apprenticeship with Jacobsz he went to Amsterdam with Jacob Backer (q.v.), and there became Rembrandt's pupil. He soon gained fame and wealth, and painted many portraits for mayors and princes. His chief work was in portraits, religious scenes, and genre paintings. In the museums of Munich, Dresden ("David Presenting the Letter to Uriah"), Berlin, and Paris, as well as The Hague, and Amsterdam ("Isaac Blesses Jacob"; "Amsterdam Sharpshooters Celebrating the Peace of Westphalia"; "Joost van den Vondel," q.v.) his best-known works are found. He also painted the portrait of Gozen Centen, the property of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church, but loaned to the national museum at Amsterdam. K.V.

H. Dattenberg, "Die Beziehungen von G. Flinck zu seiner Heimatstadt Cleve," in Die Heimat, Krefeld, XIX (1940) 69-71; W. Martin, Rembrandt en zijn tijd (3d ed., Amsterdam, 1944) 115-19 and notes 148-55 on p. 506; ML I, 654.

Flines, de, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Flanders, from where they emigrated to the Netherlands because of their faith. In the 17th century they are found in Middelburg, Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Leiden, as members of the Waterlander (Amsterdam, Haarlem) or the Flemish branch (Middelburg, Leiden). Especially at Amsterdam, where they now have died out, they were very numerous in the 17th century and related by marriage with a number of other Mennonite families like Willink and Leeuw. Some of them were deacons of the Amsterdam Toren Waterlander congregation—Gillbert de Flines 1625-48, Gijsbert Philips 1649-54 and 1660-71, and Sibrand after 1663, while Jaspar de Flines was a deacon of the united Lamist and Toren congregation 1674-79 and 1680-85. vdZ.

Flint Conservative Amish Mennonite Mission, located at 2124 East Williamson Ave., Flint, Mich., was organized in 1928, by the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference. The mission had 24 members in 1953. Both the meetinghouse and the residence were built in 1929. Noah Swartzendruber was ordained in 1929 to be superintendent of the mission. He was followed by Edwin Albrecht, Andrew Jantzi, and Jesse L. Yoder, who was appointed superintendent in 1948. During World War II, many Civilian Public Service men in dairy service in Michigan worshiped at the Flint Mission. J.We.

Flint-Dartmouth (Mich.) United Missionary Church had a membership of 65 in 1953, with J. A. Bradley serving as minister. M.G.

Flint-Hamilton Avenue (Mich.) United Missionary Church had a membership of 87 in 1953, with G. N. Bridges serving as minister. M.G.

Flintstone Mennonite Mission (MC) is located near Flintstone, Md., 12 miles east of Cumberland on U.S. Route 40. The first services were held in private homes about 1925, but with the exception of a few years have since been held in a Brethren church near by. The work is in charge of the district mission board of Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Mennonite Conference. The 1953 membership was six. In 1954 a meetinghouse was built for the group by the Mennonites of Washington Co., Md. J.D.R.

Floh, a Mennonite family of Crefeld, of importance for its mercantile business. Derich Derichsen Floh was living in Dülken in 1638 and built a house there, and then, having been expelled from Dülken, he came to Crefeld. The line of his son Paul died out soon after 1800. Derich's son Johann lived in Gladbach after his marriage (about 1650). He was expelled from that town in 1654; from 1669 to at least 1680 he was living in the Rheydt house (see Bylandt). In 1687 he was granted permission to return to Gladbach (see München-Gladbach) if he would introduce "Haarlem bleach" there. But in 1694 he had to leave again, and in that year he became a citizen of Crefeld. He was the most important linen dealer of his time along the Lower Rhine. His descendants continued the linen trade and weaving until they changed to velvet and silk in the 19th century and became very wealthy. The line became extinct soon after 1900 with the unmarried children of the linen manufacturer and councilor Peter Floh. In the 17th and 18th centuries there were in the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist congregation a number of members of the du Flo family; this family, which is of Flemish descent, may be related to the Floh family of Crefeld. W.N., vdZ.

Floh, Jacob Hendrik, a Dutch Mennonite preacher and author, b. 1758 at Crefeld, Germany, the son of Johannes Floh and Arnolda Albertine Mauritz. He is probably the Hendrik Floh who was baptized at Cleve in 1776. He studied at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam 1777-83, was called as preacher to Nijmegen in 1783, but moved to Enschede in the same year, and remained there until 1829, with the exception of a few years devoted to politics. He died in Enschede on March 25, 1830. He was an ardent Patriot (q.v.) and took an enthusiastic part in the events leading up to the revolution of 1795. In 1796 he was elected to the States-General of Holland, and was for a time secretary of the first chamber of the body representing the "Batavian Republic." He was a member of the committee of popular representatives that planned the separation of church and state. Then he returned to the pulpit. In 1800 he was also made school inspector of the province of Overijssel, and later secretary of the provincial board of education.

He wrote: Vertrouwelijke gesprekken over verlichting, vrijheid en gelijkheid, 1795; Onderrigtingen, raadgevingen en wenken voor . . . schoolonderwijzers, 1808; Handleiding tot het oprigten en in stand houden van . . . industrieschoolen, 1813; Volksgeluk zonder volksdeugd onbestaanbaar, 1822. He won several contests put on by learned societies. In addition he wrote: Proeve eener beredeneerde verklaaringe der geschiedenissen van's Heilands verzoekinge in de woestijne, 1790; and Iets over bedestonden, 1817. In the States-General meeting on Aug. 23, 1796, he advocated granting the rights of citizenship to the Jews. On this question several polemics were published by E. Kist and others; Floh was defended by J. Brouwer of the Mennonite Church at Leeuwarden. (Biogr. Wb. III, 65-69; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1718-20; Naamlijst 1829, 41; ML I, 654.) K.V.

Floodwood Bible Chapel (EMB), located in the town of Floodwood about 60 miles west of Duluth, Minn., was organized in 1934 at Meadowlands, 10 miles northeast of Floodwood, with 24 charter members under the leadership of C. H. Funk, who was their first pastor. They met for worship in an old store building until 1939, when they rented the Methodist church in Floodwood, a frame structure 22 x 40 ft. In 1945 with the help of the conference they purchased the church and also the parsonage about 3½ blocks from the church. The membership in 1953 was 34 and the average attendance was 61. The following have served as pastors: C. H. Funk, Ferdinand Thiessen, Gustave Schroeder, E. E. Peters, and A. F. Lutke, the pastor in 1953. H.H.Di.

Floradale Mennonite Church (MC), located about 16 miles north of Kitchener, Ont., is affiliated with the Ontario Conference. The first Mennonite services in the community were held in 1857. Various places of worship were used before an Evangelical church was purchased in 1868, which was used until 1899 when a division took place and the Old Order Mennonites obtained the building. After worshiping in the homes and in the village Evangelical Church, in 1896 the congregation constructed a building one-half mile north of the village. This was used until 1936 when a new church was built in Floradale. Sixty-four members recently transferred their membership to two newly organized Mennonite congregations in the vicinity; the 1953 membership was 136. Rufus Jutzi was the minister and Ivan Gingrich and Simeon Weaver the deacons. R.D.

Florida, a peninsula in the extreme southeastern part of the United States, is increasingly becoming a favorite winter resort because of its attractive climate. Mennonites and Amish, largely from Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, first came to Florida in the 1920's, most of them going to Sarasota County, located over halfway down the peninsula on the west coast. The number of permanent settlers was very small and the combined total with the winter visitors never exceeded 300 until 1945. Old Order Amish, Conservative Amish Mennonites, and Mennonites (MC) all held union services in various schools and other temporary meeting places. By 1944 the M.C. group of permanent residents was large enough to organize a congregation. A new church building was dedicated in February 1946. In that same year a large bakery was bought to provide a meeting place for Old Order Amish, Conservative Amish Mennonites, and those Mennonites who cared to continue meeting with them. Thus two permanent places of worship were established about six miles apart, each being about three miles from the business district of the city. The winter of 1944-45 brought a great increase of winter visitors. Since that time there has been a steady increase in the number of permanent settlers and a phenomenal growth in the number of Mennonite tourists. The establishment of a congregation and the new church building seem to be an added attraction for permanent settlers as well as for tourists. An increasing number of Mennonites own their own winter homes in Sarasota which are unoccupied during the summer. During January and February 1949, about 1,200 persons were in attendance at Sunday morning services in the two meeting places. Attendance during the summer months at the two places combined in 1948 averaged something over 100. A mission operated by the Lancaster Mennonite Conference (MC) was established at Tampa on the west coast in 1927. In 1955 there were a total of nine organized Mennonite congregations in Florida; five at Sarasota (belonging to four conferences: Lancaster, Virginia, Ohio and Eastern, and Conservative Mennonite), with a total of 248 permanent members, and a colored mission with 10 baptized members, two in Tampa and vicinity with 43 members, belonging to the Lancaster Conference, four additional Lancaster Conference missions with 23 members, and a newly founded Conservative Mennonite mission-colonized congregation at Blountstown, 50 miles west of Tallahassee. The total baptized Mennonite membership in Florida in 1955 was thus approximately 350. T.H.B.

Florimont, a French village on the Swiss border, about 12 miles southeast of Belfort, the center of a Mennonite congregation. In the villages and on the farms in the vicinity of Florimont a number of Mennonite families are living, some of them on Swiss soil. Nothing is known of the origin of the congregation, but since Florimont belonged to Alsace (q.v.), its history is a part of Alsatian history. The family names indicate Bernese origin.

In 1780 a report was made to the magistrate of Alsace, which stated that most of the Mennonite families around Belfort had long been there; they were farmers or linen weavers; the former were tenants on the large estates; they were preferred as farmers, for they raised larger crops and paid their rent more regularly. The weavers quietly pursued their trade in remote houses. There were 12 families of them living in the forest of Normanvillars, which belonged to Florimont. If the government should find it necessary to reduce the number they might begin with these, for the farmers were more needed. Until the end of the 19th century there were linen weavers among them; now they are all engaged in agriculture, with some fishing, for the forests abound in small lakes.

Until the middle of the 19th century their meetings were held in the homes of members. In 1849 a church (Chapelle des Fermes, or des Bois) was built and a cemetery laid out. Twice the church was destroyed by fire—in 1904 by arson and again in World War I. In 1921 it was rededicated, and services are held in it every two weeks. Since 1880 the services have been conducted in French.

Like all the French congregations, Florimont is Amish. In 1871 Elder Peter Klopfenstein opposed footwashing, thereby causing some tension in Alsace. A conference was called Feb. 19, 1876, to be held in Basel-Binningen, in which an unequivocal position was taken against Klopfenstein. But footwashing was not reinstated in Florimont. The congregation is thus somewhat isolated. It long resisted all attempts to secure co-operation between the several congregations. At present, however, there is increasing co-operation with the French-speaking congregations. In 1953 the baptized membership was about 160, with 60 children. In 1954 the church was enlarged to accommodate the growing congregation. The elders in 1955 were Joseph Freidinger, Joni Geiser, and Henri Zaugg; the ministers were René and Armand Klopfenstein and René Yoder. Chief family names are Klopfenstein, Riche, Roth, Zaugg, Graber, Yoder, Kaufmann, Amstutz, Boegli, Widmer, Bourquin, Choffat, Geiser, Schnegg, Zbinden. (See Normanvillars.) P.So.

D. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 89-95; P. Sommer, "Assemblée de Florimont," Christ Seul, June 1930, 9 f.; ML I, 655.

Floris, Foecke (ca. 1650-ca. 1700), was a blacksmith and a Mennonite preacher at Surhuisterveen in the Dutch province of Friesland. On April 16, 1683, Franciscus Elgersma (q.v.), a Reformed preacher of Grouw, charged him openly with Socinianism, and wrote Rechtzinnige leer van het sacrament des hl. Doops (Leeuwarden, 1685). Foecke replied with Beschermingh der waerheyt Godts (Leeuwarden, 1687). Elgersma again brought his accusations before the Leeuwarden Reformed Synod and with their approval wrote the following booklets: Seedige verhandeling van de hooge verborgentheit der hl. Drieëenheid and Kanker der Sociniaansche ketterij (Leeuwarden, 1688). An anonymous friend now entered into the dispute, defending Foecke with a pamphlet: Klaar vertoog, Dienende tot wederlegginge van de ongefondeerde beschuldingen (1689).

Meanwhile the Reformed Synod of Harlingen had taken the affair in hand. Both parties were summoned to appear before it. By a decision of Nov. 18, 1687, they condemned Foecke's book, ordered all copies to be burned, and forbade him to preach on penalty of five years' penitentiary. Soon afterward he was arrested and brought to Leeuwarden; but he found so much sympathy that over 2,000 persons came to visit him. Eight weeks later he was banished and went to Oost-Saandam (Zaandam in the province of North Holland) where he again began to preach. In 1688 the Synod of North Holland decided to bring their charges before the bailiff of Kennemerland. Then the persecuted man presented an appeal to Prince William, which had been drawn up by Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.). The prince gave orders to let the matter rest until more information could be gathered (this letter with the signature of the prince is found in Arch. Amst. I, 456). Hence the synod of 1690 was unable to proceed further. Representatives of the synod were given audience by the prince in two successive years, and both times received a noncommittal answer. Then the bailiff of Kennemerland came to the rescue of the synod and forbade Foecke to preach in August 1692.

Nevertheless he resumed his preaching in March 1693. Apparently his influence declined from this point, at least the complaints ended. But his following in Grouw did not disappear. In Jan Klaassen (q.v.) he had a worthy successor. Foecke's writings reveal that he was not a full-fledged Socinian, but that he was on the other hand not entirely free of unorthodox views. He wrote also Leerregel der Bibels, Eenige vorbeelden onzer loffelyke vaderen, and Een Hemelsch ABC (Haarlem, 1690), and Afdeeling der H. Bibelwetten (Amsterdam, 1696). K.V.

S. D. van Veen, "Foecke Floris," in DB 1887, 49-85; S. Blaupot t. C., Holland 229; N.N.B.Wb. III, 71-73; ML I, 655.

Floris Ysbrantsz, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded in 1535 (exact date unknown) at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. Under torture he admitted that he had received (re)baptism. vdZ.

Bijdr. en Mededelingen Hist. Genootschap Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 202-3; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 750; DB 1917, 153.

Flugschriften: see Pamphlets.

Fluri, Adolf, b. Feb. 15, 1865, at Tramelan, J.B., Switzerland, d. 1930 in Bern, teacher of French in the Muristalden Training School at Bern, Switzerland, who rendered notable service in research on Anabaptist history and aided in the amplification of Ernst Müller's (q.v.) noted book on the Bernese Anabaptists (1895) with respect to their cultural history. In the center of Fluri's later work was the question of the history of the Bible and its distribution in the field of the Swiss Reformation. The first Bible printers in Zürich at that time, the Froschauers (q.v.), belonged to the religiously radical circles. Fluri's investigations on the Bible brought him in direct contact with Anabaptist history through the phenomenon peculiar to them of having their own editions of the Bible. (Täufertestamente). He was the first to make a thorough study of this one phase of Anabaptist history. Previously he had already confirmed and added to the Martyrs' Mirror ("Täuferhinrichtungen in Bern im 16. Jahrhundert," in Berner Heim, 1896, Nos. 35 ff.). In 1903 he received the honorary doctor's degree from the University of Bern.

Most of Fluri's published material is found in Blätter für Bernische Geschichte, Kunst und Altertumskunde. Some of the more important articles are "Bern und die Froschauerbibel mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der sogenannten Täufertestamente" (XII, 342; XIII, 263 ff.), and "Das Täufertestament von 1687" (XIX, 1 ff.). His earlier writings from this journal also appeared in a separate reprint volume under the title, Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912), including "Der Märtyrerspiegel," "Das Waisenhaus als Täufergefängnis," a valuable example of Bernese persecution in the 1670's, "Das Wiedertäufermandat vom 9. August 1659" with commentary, and "Die Lötscher von Latterbach" (later changed to Latscha), in which the typical Anabaptist family is excellently characterized. Die Beziehungen Berns zu den Buchdruckern in Basel, Zürich und Genf, 1476-1536 (Bern, 1913) includes a discussion of the Anabaptist colloquy (Täufergespräch) of 1531 and that of 1532 at Zofingen. He wrote the article "Froschauer Bibeln und Testamente" for the MENNONITISCHES LEXIKON (ML II, 15), which has been translated and published in this ENCYCLOPEDIA (II, q.v.). A valuable feature of Fluri's work is his thorough bibliographical notation, which presents otherwise unobtainable material. (ML I, 658.) E.H.C.

Foam Lake (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized in 1938 with 30 members. Until 1945, when a new church was built, the services were conducted in a community hall. Its 1953 membership was 17. Its leaders have been Nick Janz, David Thiessen, Henry Regehr, P. P. Penner, and the present leader Gerhard Petkau. J.H.E.

Fock, an old Mennonite family which has held an influential position among the Dutch Mennonites, has produced outstanding leaders in economics and politics up to the most recent times. In the 18th century its members were among the wealthiest merchants and freighters of Holland. Abraham Fock of Danzig (1695-1759) settled in Amsterdam as a merchant, acquired citizenship in 1723, and became a deacon in the Mennonite church in 1725. From his third marriage with Katharina Fortgens a son Abraham (1732-96) was born, who married Cornelia de Clercq. His son Jakob Fock, b. April 15, 1770, d. Nov. 21, 1835, who was a member of the firm Jakob de Clercq, married Johanna de Bondt. He was a deacon 1797-1803 and 1810-14, and after the Wars of Liberation was made financial adviser to the King of the Netherlands. He was influential in establishing the Bank of Holland, and became its first managing director. He was also the moving spirit in the union between the Lamist and Zonist branches in 1801. His sister Geertruida Margaretha (married to P. Bel) was a deaconess (1804-9).

Jacob's son, Abraham Fock, b. Aug. 2, 1793, d. Sept. 24, 1858, married to Alida Johanna van Heekeren, was also director of the Bank of Holland, a deacon 1820-24 and 1830-34, besides serving as executive officer of the North and South Holland Widows' Fund. Also his three sons, Jakob, Justus Hendrik, and Cornelis, filled important posts in church and in civil life. Jakob, b. May 16, 1817, d. Dec. 9, 1891, married Cecilia Dorothea de Kock, and later her sister Sarah Adriana Dorothea, a close friend of J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (q.v.), and with him set up a fund for the improvement of the salaries of Mennonite preachers. His daughter Cecilia Dorothea (married to J. P. Portielje) was also a deaconess. He was also a director of the Bank of Holland. Justus Hendrik, b. 1826, d. 1911, was a merchant and deacon (1858-62). Cornelis, b. Nov. 29, 1828, d. May 9, 1910, married to Maria Anna Uyttenhoven, was mayor of Vreeland, Wijk-bij-Duurstede, Haarlem and Amsterdam (1866), Minister of the Interior (1868-71), a member of the second chamber, royal commissioner in South Holland (1872-1900), and chief curator of the University of Leyden. Around 1880 he spent much energy in organizing a Mennonite congregation in The Hague, and became its first deacon. Mention should be made of some of his children: Alida Johanna Jakoba, married to J. W. C. Tellegen, mayor of Amsterdam, Cornelis Fock, b. 1871, Rear Admiral and commandant of Den Helder, and Dirk Fock (q.v.). K.V.

D. G. van Epen, Nederlands Patriciaat VIII (1917) 148-53; DB 1898, 2, 29-31, 36; ML I, 658 f.

Fock, Dirk, a Dutch Mennonite lawyer and statesman, b. at Wijk-bij-Duurstede, June 19, 1858, married W. C. C. Doffegnies, earned his degree of LL.D. and Ph.D. at the University of Leiden. He practiced law in Semarang (Java), and served as consul for Austria-Hungary in Batavia. In 1898 he returned to the Netherlands and settled in Rotterdam as adviser on East Indian affairs. Here he was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation. In 1901 he was elected to the local council and the legislature of the province of South Holland. In 1901 he was elected to the Second Chamber of the States-General. In 1905-8 he was Colonial Minister, and 1908-11 governor of Surinam. After his return he was chosen to represent Haarlem in the Second Chamber (1913) and in 1917-20 he was its chairman. In addition he was chairman of the society for the promotion of music. He traveled through China, Japan, and America, and visited Tunisia and Algeria. Many articles from his pen were published in important journals. In 1921-26 he was Governor General of the Dutch East Indies; during his governorship the Indian population acquired greater influence on public affairs than it had had before. On his return to the Netherlands he was elected a member of the First Chamber, 1929-35. In 1928 he was appointed Minister of State, an honorary position without rights or duties. He died at The Hague on Oct. 18, 1941. (ML I, 659.) K.V., vdZ.

Focsen (Foksen, not Focpen as it is sometimes written), Adriaen Antheunis, a schoolteacher, one of the Anabaptist Naaktloopers (q.v., people who went naked through the streets for religious reasons) at Amsterdam, and was sentenced to death by beheading on Feb. 25, 1535. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 57-58; DB 1917, 117, No. 63.) vdZ.

Folk Meetinghouse, built in 1878 in Somerset Co., Pa., former name of the Springs Mennonite Church (q.v.). M.G.

Fonda Mennonite Mission (GCM) station located 8½ miles west and 5 miles north of Canton, Dewey Co., Okla. Work among the Cheyenne Indians in this district was begun by Rodolphe Petter under the Board of Foreign Missions of the General Conference in 1907 as an outstation from Cantonment. From 1913 to 1916 H. Albert Claassen was in charge of Cantonment and Fonda; 1916-21 Fonda was a separate station in charge of H. T. Neufeld. It was supplied from Cantonment by G. A. Linscheid 1921-38, Benno Toews 1938-40, and from Canton by Arthur Friesen 1940-47, and Alfred Wiebe 1947- . The total number baptized up to 1954 was 332. In 1954 there were 156 members, which included those living around Seiling, Cantonment, Longdale, and Fonda. A.Wi.

Fondament, ofte de principaelste liedekens over de poincten des Christelijcken Geloofs (Haarlem, 1633), is a Dutch Mennonite songbook, of which, however, no copy has been found as yet (DJ 1837, 64). vdZ.

Fonds tot Ondersteuning van Weduwen en Weezen van Doopsgezinde Predikanten in de Provincien Noord- en Zuid-Holland (Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of Mennonite Ministers in the Provinces of North and South Holland), usually called Noordhollands Weduwenfonds, founded at Amsterdam on April 8, 1794. This is the oldest fund of its kind in the Netherlands. The initiative in its founding was taken in 1789 by Ragger Bos, preacher of the Noordeinde van Graft (q.v.) congregation, and the question was discussed at the meetings of the Rijper Sociëteit (q.v.) in 1791 and 1792. The Fund is supported by contributions made by the member congregations and ministers. In 1844 the Fund, which still is active, was opened to ministers in other provinces of the Netherlands. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 967-85; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 69-70; L. G. le Poole, Bijdrage tot . . . het kerk. Leven onder de Doopsgez. te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 244-49.

Fonds tot verhooging van Doopsgezinde Leeraars tractementen (Fund for the Raising of the Salaries of Mennonite Ministers) was founded in 1911 and administered by the treasurers of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference). In the province of Friesland a Verhogingsfonds was founded in 1919 by the Friesche Sociëteit (Conference of Mennonite Congregations of Friesland) in order to raise the salaries of the ministers. vdZ.

Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden (Dutch Relief Fund for Foreign Needs), a substantial relief undertaking of the Dutch Mennonites for the aid of persecuted and suffering foreign brethren. The history of this important fund has not yet been written. The archives of the Mennonite Church in Amsterdam contains several hundred documents, the description of which occupies about 300 printed pages. A few of these were described by A. van Gulik (DB 1905, 1906, and 1908), and de Hoop Scheffer wrote an account (DB 1869) of the relations between the Fund and Pennsylvania.

The sufferings of the Mennonites in the 17th century in Switzerland, the Palatinate, Poland, and Prussia, usually caused by persecution by the state, induced the Dutch Mennonites to raise collections, e.g., in 1660 for Danzig, 1662 for Poland, 1665 for Moravia, 1672 for Switzerland, 1674 and 1678 for the Palatinate. A persecution of the Palatine brethren in 1690, which was repeated in 1694, was the occasion for taking up two collections by the entire Amsterdam Mennonite Church, in which 52,279 florins was raised.

In 1709, when the severe persecution in Bern began, the Amsterdam Mennonites invited delegates to meet in a conference in Amsterdam on Feb. 24, 1710. There were delegates from Rotterdam, Leiden, Haarlem, Gouda, Alkmaar, Hoorn, Enkhuizen, Monnikendam, Zaandam, Koog-Zaandijk, Wormerveer, Krommenie, Wormer, Jisp, de Rijp, Graft, and Harlingen. Resolutions were passed: (1) that the Amsterdam representatives (Willem van Maurik, Jan Willink, Abraham Fries, Frans van Aken, Herman Schijn, Jacob Vorsterman, Cornelis Beets), with the support of the Rotterdam delegation (Hendrik Toren and Jan Suderman), Haarlem, Gouda, Hoorn, Alkmaar, Dordrecht, and Monnikendam present a petition to the States-General requesting aid to the Swiss Brethren through diplomatic channels; (2) that the Amsterdam congregation should bear the chief responsibility for the negotiations. But Amsterdam's ensuing attitude gave rise to some dissension, since the delegates of Rotterdam, Leiden, and Haarlem thought the conference had decided that these three congregations were to work together with the Amsterdam representatives. At a second meeting held on Nov. 5, 1710, this disunity was eliminated by the conciliatory talks by Steven Cremer of Deventer. Amsterdam was given the authority to act. If anything unusual should arise, two representatives of the Haarlem, Leiden, Rotterdam, and Zaandam congregations were to be called. In the following year two Frisians were called (Hans Douwens, Sieuwerd Edens) together with Steven Cremer.

Fifty thousand florins was at once collected, letters were sent to Switzerland with intervention made by the mayors of the cities, and correspondence carried on with Runckel (q.v.), the Dutch ambassador in Switzerland. To ensure good management of the funds, the congregations were divided into seven classes:

1. Amsterdam (Lamist), Beverwijk, Emmerich, Middelburg, Vlissingen, Enschede, Cadzand, Zierikzee, Brouwershaven, Rees, Zutphen, Deventer (Flemish), Almelo, and Ameland.
2. Amsterdam (Zon), Hamburg, Zwolle, Uithoorn, Dordrecht, Goes, Brielle, Aardenburg, Kampen, Aalsmeer, Harlingen (Flemish), Blokzijl, Hazerswoude, Zoetermeer, Emden.
3. Alkmaar, Hoorn, Enkhuizen, Medemblik, Monnikendam, Edam, Purmerend, de Rijp, Graft, Westzaan, Koog-Zaandijk, Zaandam-Oost, Zaandam-West, Wormerveer, Uitgeest, Krommeniedijk, Knollendam, Durgerdam, Ilp, Graftdijk, Barsingerhorn, Niedorp, den Hoorn, Burg, Vlieland, Terschelling.
4. All the Frisians in North and South Holland.
5. Haarlem, Leiden, Rotterdam, Schiedam.
6. Harlingen, Leeuwarden, Hindelopen, and Groningen Old Flemish.
7. Deventer, Old Groningen (Danzig Old Flemish), and Jan-Jacobsvolk.

On Aug. 2, 1711, four boats with 400 refugees from Basel arrived at Utrecht. From Amsterdam as headquarters they were sent out to Deventer, Groningen, Hoogezand, Kampen, and Sappemeer. In 1713 another troop of refugees arrived.

In 1714, 10,000 florins was raised for Polish Prussia, and in 1715 and 1717 about 12,000 florins. But since this money was soon spent, it was decided in 1726 to take a general collection for the purpose of establishing a permanent fund. The occasion for this decision was the oppression of 1714 in Polish Prussia, causing many to emigrate to Lithuania, who by 1724 had been compelled to flee again in order to avoid military service. Some fled to Elbing and Thorn in Polish Prussia. In addition there were new complaints from the Palatinate. The general collection of 1727 amounted to over 30,000 florins, that of 1733, 64,000 florins, and 1736, 51,000 florins. In 1734 the Dutch congregations which had not yet contributed raised over 1,000 florins. In a half century more than 270,000 florins were contributed by the Dutch congregations for relief of foreign distress.

The Fund supported many brethren in other lands and saved them from starvation, and enabled three dozen Prussian Mennonites to emigrate to Pennsylvania in 1731, and helped numerous Swiss and Palatine brethren to come to the Netherlands. A twofold colonization of Prussians on Walcheren, an island in Zeeland in 1732, and at Wageningen failed through the inadaptability of the settlers, depleting the Fund by about 50,000 florins. It was therefore decided in 1744 not to assist persons who of their own free choice wished to settle elsewhere, but to give aid only to those who were banished from a country for the sake of their faith, or were impoverished through war, flood, fire, etc.

When the persecution in foreign countries ceased, the Fund ceased to operate. The last meeting was held in 1758. Eleven representatives from Amsterdam were appointed as managers of the Fund. Since for nearly a half century there had been no use for the money, Amsterdam decided to liquidate the Fund. In its name a circular letter was sent to the congregations by P. Lugt and B. de Bosche in March 1803. After voluminous correspondence, about 27½ per cent of the contributions made in earlier years was returned to the congregations in 1803. The sum amounted to about 40,000 florins. (ML I, 659-61.) K.V.

After World War I the situation of the Mennonites in Russia had become very critical; much suffering was caused by the Revolution and civil war. In 1919 the American Mennonites organized shipments of food and clothing and other relief. In Germany the Mennonitische Hilfskasse had begun to function. Soon the Dutch Mennonites too became aware of the situation of their Russian brethren through publications in the Mennonite press of America and through letters written by Benjamin H. Unruh (q.v.). The congregations in Holland were informed by the booklet by T. O. Hylkema, De Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde gemeenten in Rusland in de oorlogs- en revolutiejaren 1914-20 (Steenwijk, 1920), and by reports in the Dutch Mennonite weekly, De Zondagsbode. On Nov. 7, 1920, a Dutch relief committee was founded, which was named the Algemeene Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Nooden on Dec. 8, 1920. The first executive board consisted of Pastor A. Binnertsz Sz of Haarlem, Pres.; D. Woelinga of Vlissingen, Sec.-Treas.; and Pastor T. O. Hylkema of Giethoorn; in March 1921 J. W. van der Vlugt of Haarlem became the treasurer, and in October 1921, Pastor F. C. Fleischer (q.v.) secretary. Contacts were made with the MCC, the German Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge, the Quakers in England, and soon also with the Dutch Red Cross. Jacob Koekebakker, then pastor of Middelburg, Zeeland, succeeded in penetrating into Russia and reaching Moscow on Sept. 13, 1921.

In the meantime money had been collected in the Netherlands. Between October and December 1920, the sum of 5,383 Dutch guilders was collected, and in 1921 nearly 22,000 guilders. When relief work ended in February 1924, a total of 239,991 guilders had been collected, besides clothing sent to Russia. In October 1922 a total of 1,576,180 kilograms of food and clothing was shipped from the Netherlands to Sevastopol and distributed among the Mennonites. With the Mennonite committee a number of other organizations co-operated: the Dutch Red Cross contributed 10,000 guilders. F. C. Fleischer visited Ukraine in the spring of 1922 and organized the relief. R. J. C. Willink of Haarlem had charge of the work in Russia, staying there in 1922-23. In the summer of 1922 a children's home was founded at Ohrloff, under the special care of the youth group of Amsterdam. Relief ended in the summer of 1923, when it was no longer possible to get into Russia.

Then another activity was laid upon the Dutch Mennonites. Many Russian Mennonites escaping from Russia came to Holland, hoping to go to America. Many of them stayed for some months in Dutch Mennonite homes. Then in June 1924 the Hollandsch Doopsgezind Emigranten Bureau (q.v., Dutch Mennonite Board of Emigration) was founded to aid the Russian refugees in obtaining transportation to the New World. The Board of Emigration was founded by the Mennonite Church of Rotterdam in co-operation with the Algemeene Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Nooden. After World War II the Algemeene Commissie was replaced (1948) by the Stichting voor Bijzondere Noden in de Doopsgezinde Broederschap, which raised funds for relief in Germany and Austria.

vdZ.

W. J. Kühler, "Dutch Mennonite Relief Work in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," MQR XVII (1943) 87-94; Hiebert and Miller, Feeding the Hungry; Russian Famine 1919-25 (Scottdale, 1929); archives of the committee, DJ 1922, 71, 78-93; 1923, 43-78; 1924, 61-78; A. P. van de Water, "Relief Work in Holland," Proceedings of the Fourth Menn. World Conf. (Akron, 1950).

Fontanus, Johannes (1545-1615), an important Reformed preacher and zealous Calvinist, who served at Neuhausen near Worms, Germany, and from 1578 on at Arnhem, Dutch province of Gelderland. Here he opposed the Mennonites and induced the council to take steps to suppress them (March 23, 1591, and regulation of 1596) and forbid their meetings (Nov. 1, 1607, and Aug. 21, 1608). (DB 1863, 48 ff.; ML I, 661.) NEFF.

Fontein, a Dutch Mennonite family, which according to a family tradition (which is probably erroneous), had emigrated about 1520 from French Flanders to Friesland (see Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 178, note) and lived at Harlingen (q.v.) in Friesland; here Jurjen Scheltes Fontein and his son Schelte Jurjens were both burgomaster. It could not be decided whether these two men belonged to the Mennonite Church, but probably they did. Claes Jurjens Fontein, b. 1616 at Harlingen, d. there 1670, a deacon in the church and the son of Schelte, was a sheriff of the city of Harlingen and later its tax collector and steward. Claes's son was Reyner Claesen Fontein, b. 1654 at Harlingen, d. there 1727. He was a well-to-do merchant and owner of a salt work. Besides this he served his home church (Flemish and Waterlander congregation) as a preacher. He was among the founders (1695) of the Friesche Sociëteit (Conference of Friesland). The address delivered by Reyner Claesen in 1719 at Leeuwarden to make peace between the proponents and opponents of baptism by immersion in the Mennonite congregation of Leeuwarden is found in Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 319-20. Reyner Claesen was rather liberal, an adherent of Collegiant (q.v.) principles (DB 1878, 79-86, 90-91). Reyner Claesen Fontein had no sons; his daughter Auckje was married to Dirk Pietersz (1686-1737), a member of the congregation, sheriff of Harlingen, and a saltmaker. This Dirk Pietersz adopted his wife's family name. One of their children was Pieter Fontein (q.v.), Mennonite minister of Rotterdam and Amsterdam; another son of Dirk Pietersz was Claes Dirksz Fontein, d. 1787, who was a deacon of the congregation of Harlingen and treasurer of the Friesche Sociëteit 1771-87. His son Feddrik Fontein ab Andla, b. 1736 at Harlingen, d. there 1765, was a physician at Harlingen. Claes Dirksz was married to Grietje Feddriks van Deersum, who was a collateral descendant of the Frisian Andela family (mentioned as early as 1300) and who inherited the stately country-seat of Andla State at Ried near Franeker. She was a daughter of Feddrik Anskes van Deersum, who had been a copreacher of Reyner Claesen Fontein, the grandfather of her husband.

A great-grandson of Dirk Pietersz was Freerk Dirksz Fontein (1777-1843), a merchant or wholesale dealer like most members of this family, living at his country house Salverd near Franeker; he was renowned for his beautiful collections of rare books, engravings, and valuable manuscripts and honored for his studies in history and genealogy by being appointed (1829) member of the Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (Association for Dutch Literature) (N.N.B.Wb. VI, 518). The Fontein family was related by marriage with other Mennonite families of Harlingen like Braam, Dreyer, Hannema, Huidekoper, Oosterbaan, Stinstra. A lateral branch of this family is found in Franeker, where some Fonteins also served as deacons. vdZ.

Vorsterman van Oyen, Stam- en Wapenboek III (Groningen, 1890) 399-406.

Fontein, Pieter, b. 1708 at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, d. Aug. 7, 1788, at Amsterdam, studied theology at the University of Franeker and the Athenaeum and the Remonstrant seminary in Amsterdam and in 1732 was called as pastor to the United Mennonite Church in Rotterdam. Here he created some trouble in the congregation by his declaration that he did not like the expression weerloose Doopsgezinden (nonresistant Mennonites). From 1739 until 1748 he served the Lamist congregation in Amsterdam and then retired to devote his full time to the study of literature. He was a highly respected scholar in Latin and Greek literature and published a number of books in this field. He bequeathed his extensive library to the Amsterdam church; it forms a part of the theological library which the church maintains for the use of students in the Mennonite seminary. In addition he bequeathed 4,000 guilders to the library. He was married to Jozina Stol (d. 1746). K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 2325-26; II, No. 616; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd I (Amsterdam, 1865) 17, 174-76; II (1866) 258; DJ 1840, 113; 1850, 136; Biogr. Wb. III, 94-96; K. Vos, De Doopsgez. te Rotterdam (1907) 30; ML I, 661.

Fonteyn, Thomas, of Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, in the first half of the 17th century printed a number of Mennonite books and hymnals, including Soetjen Gerrits, Een geestelijck Liedtboecxken (1632) and Geestelijck Bloem-Hofken (1637); Wtganck: ofte Bekeeringhe van Menno Symons . . . (1633). (ML I, 662.) K.V., vdZ.

Fonteyne des Levens, De, is a Dutch devotional book, containing a large number of Scriptural passages, which according to K. Vos (ML I, 662) is of Anabaptist origin. There are known three editions of it, printed at Delft, 1533; Steenwijk, 1580; and at Rotterdam, 1619. The third edition, which is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, contains two engravings (Catalogus Amst., 97). It was much used among the Mennonites. Adriaen Carbout and Adriaen Piersen are said (1547) to have traveled on the island of South Beveland, Dutch province of Zeeland, with rucksacks, containing a few tools for the repair of old shoes, but in which were also hidden Bibles, Fonteynkens des Levens, and similar books. (Archief Zeeuwsch Gennotschap VI, 1886, 38.) vdZ.

Footwashing, also called the "washing of the saints' feet," is observed as an ordinance by most Mennonites in the world today. It is customarily based on the express command and example of Jesus, who washed His disciples' feet at the Last Supper (John 13:1-17), and on the statement by Paul (I Tim. 5:9, 10) that having washed the saints' feet was a qualification for a widow's acceptance into the church widows' group. Rarely has the Old Testament practice of washing the feet of visitors as an act of hospitality toward strangers (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; 43:24; Judg. 19:21; I Sam. 25:40, 41) been used to support the practice, except in the early days in Holland, when the practice in some groups was limited to washing the feet of visiting elders and ministers or even of laymen as a sign of affectionate recognition. The most common practice has been and still is to observe the ordinance immediately following the communion service. In the Franconia Conference (MC), where the ordinance was long out of practice, it is observed at the preparatory service on the day preceding communion. Since most congregations that observe it today celebrate the communion twice a year, in the spring and fall, footwashing also comes twice a year.

The most common mode of the observance is as follows: After the communion service is completed, one of the ministers or deacons reads and comments on John 13:1-17. Basins, usually small wooden or metal tubs, with warm water and towels have meanwhile been provided in sufficient quantity to permit a fairly rapid observance. These are placed, either in the front of the church or in the "amen" corners, and in the "ante-rooms," or in some cases in the rows between the benches. The sexes then wash (more properly rinse or lightly touch with water) feet separately in pairs, concluding with the greeting of the holy kiss and a "God bless you." In some localities towels are furnished in the form of short aprons to be tied by cords around the waist, in presumed imitation of Jesus "girding himself," though most commonly ordinary towels are used. In some congregations the practice is not pair-washing but row-washing, in which case each person washes the feet of his right-hand neighbor in turn in a continuous chain (United Missionary Church, some G.C.M. congregations). In the Church of God in Christ Mennonite group the ministers wash each other's feet first, and then wash the feet of all the brethren in turn, the ministers' wives doing the same for the sisters.

Although the interpretation of the ordinance may vary, it is always held to be symbolical of a spiritual lesson, and is never considered to have any religious value per se, or to be a "good work." The most common interpretation is that it teaches humility and equality. Often the lesson of service is included along with the other meanings. In some instances it has been and is observed as a symbol of the daily sanctification which is needed by the Christian as he comes into contact with sin and temptation.

Among the North American Mennonite groups the observance varies. The following groups practice it universally, following the communion service: Mennonite Church (MC), Conservative Mennonite Church, Old Order Amish, Evangelical Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde), Reformed Mennonites, Mennonite Brethren in Christ, United Missionary Church, Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, Church of God in Christ Mennonites. The Mennonite Brethren formerly universally observed the ordinance, but now in the United States the number is 85-90 per cent of the congregations, while in Canada only a minority do so. Among the General Conference Mennonites only a small minority of the congregations practice footwashing, depending upon the background of each congregation. A study by S. F. Pannabecker in 1929 showed that of 107 G.C.M. congregations in the United States, 23 encouraged it. Of the 23, the Western District had 10, the Northern District 8. Since then the number has decreased. An official conference study in 1943 showed that then 9 congregations made it obligatory, while 14 encouraged it. The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, who formerly practiced it universally, have almost completely dropped it. The Lower Skippack Mennonite Church (Johnson Mennonite) withdrew from the Eastern District Conference (GCM) in 1861 because it observed footwashing, while the conference refused to make it mandatory. The Evangelical Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren in Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, also practice footwashing.

It is customary in the Mennonite Church (MC) and related groups to have a collection for the alms fund or charity fund in connection with the footwashing service. Usually the contributions are placed in the collection plate by the members individually upon completion of the footwashing ceremony.

The History of the Ordinance: Pre-Reformation Times. In the time of Jesus it was customary for the host to make provision for the washing of the feet of guests (Luke 7:44-46), but without religious significance. Jesus gave the rite religious significance and told His disciples, "Ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you" (John 13:14, 15). Paul's report in I Cor. 11 concerning the observance of the communion does not mention footwashing, but this is no absolute proof that it was not practiced in Corinth. The widows' washing of "the saints' feet" (I Tim. 5:10) is clearly a rite performed only for church members, but no indication is given of when or how often it was to be done. Apparently the widows had a special office or function in the church which included this duty. The implication is that they washed the feet of others, possibly visiting brethren and sisters, rather than practicing a universal mutual ordinance.

Tertullian (145-220) of North Africa in his De Corona is the first Church Father to indicate that footwashing was practiced in his time, but he gives no clue as to by whom or how. Ambrose of Milan (340-97) states that it was not the practice of the Roman Church, but endorses it as a symbol of sanctification. Augustine mentions it as being rejected by some. Knight (p. 816) says flatly that footwashing always remained "a purely local peculiarity, introduced at an early date into some parts of the Catholic Church, but never universal." Among the monks in particular, the hospitality custom of footwashing was widely practiced, and often in the name of Christ, but not as a universal ordinance of the church. For the monks the observance was often intended to express humility. St. Benedict's Rule (A.D. 529) for the Benedictine Order prescribed hospitality footwashing in addition to a communal footwashing for humility.

The ordinance of footwashing persisted down through the Middle Ages, with varied interpretations and applications, more prevalent in the East than in the West. The Roman Church finally observed the practice only as a part of the liturgical festivities of the Holy Week (Maundy Thursday), not as a sacrament, while the Greek Church recognized it as a sacrament, but seldom practiced it. When practiced outside the monastery, it was gradually taken away from the laity and made a pompous ceremony for state officials and clergy. It was frequently observed at coronations of kings and emperors, and installation of popes and archbishops. As late as the 18th century it was a common feature of Maundy Thursday in European Courts, and there are references to it in Bavaria and Austria as late as 1912. Monastic footwashing is still practiced in both Roman and Greek churches.

The Albigenses and Waldenses, two medieval sects which arose in Southern France in the 11th and 12th centuries, apparently observed footwashing as a religious rite. The Albigenses observed it following the communion service. Among the Waldenses it was the custom to wash the feet of visiting ministers, but there is no evidence of the practice of the ordinance by the members. The Bohemian Brethren or Hussites also practiced it, at least in the 16th century. The ordinance was not introduced into the new Reformation state churches, but it was adopted by the Anabaptists.

Anabaptist-Mennonite Practice. From the beginning (1525-35) some Anabaptists practiced footwashing, but it was not universal. It was most common in Holland and the related or descendant groups in Northwest Germany, West and East Prussia, and Russia. It was not practiced by the Swiss Brethren or Hutterites, nor by the 16th-century Anabaptists in South and Central Germany, with rare exceptions. Hubmaier (d. 1528) practiced footwashing at least once in his early (1525) Anabaptist congregation at Waldshut, but does not mention the ordinance in any of his writings. Sebastian Franck in 1531 (Chronica) mentions the practice as observed among some of the Swiss Brethren. William Gay claims (in an unpublished M.A. thesis of 1947 at Columbia University), though without giving documentary proof, "Among the various Anabaptist sects which sprang up all over Western Europe early in the 16th century, . . . footwashing as a sacramental act of communal humility was practiced almost universally at one time or another. The rite fitted in well with their tendency toward communalism, their Biblical fundamentalism, and their emphasis on self-effacing equalitarianism among the members. Often the ceremony was done in connection with a 'complete' observance of the Last Supper, with the agape and the communion itself following mutual footwashing, segregated according to sex."

If the practice was prevalent at the beginning in Switzerland and South Germany (and there is no proof of this), it must have died out very soon. There is no mention of it in the Schleitheim Confession (1527) or the Peter Riedemann Hutterite confession (1545) or in any other known source except in the writings of Pilgram Marpeck (ca. 1495-1556). Marpeck's great book of ca. 1542 (Verantwortung) makes repeated mention of footwashing as a Christian ordinance on a par with other ordinances. The first edition of the Ausbund (n.p., 1564) contains a hymn of 25 stanzas (No. 42 in the 1742 first American edition, pp. 692-700) for use at the observance of the ordinance, still used by the Old Order Amish.

Wappler (Thüringen, 128) reports a case of footwashing observed among the Thuringian Anabaptists in 1535 (see also Halberstadt). The leader of a group conducted a communion service, before which he washed the feet of all the 16 participants and greeted them with a kiss. Bullinger claims there was a group called "Apostolic" Anabaptists who practiced footwashing. This is possibly the ultimate source of a statement by E. Daniel Colberg which names an "apostolic" Anabaptist sect, "also called footwashers, who had as their ancestor Matth. Servatus" (Servaes?). Colberg adds, "modern Anabaptists are almost all footwashers as Joh. Hoornbeek has shown from their writings," probably meaning the Mennonites in North Germany and Holland.

Menno Simons (1496-1561) mentions the practice twice in his Complete Writings, but only as a hospitable practice and not as a church ordinance. However, his colleague, Dirk Philips (1504-68), gives detailed teaching on footwashing as an ordinance in his Enchiridion of 1564 (English edition, Elkhart, 1910, pp. 388-90). His treatment reveals careful and serious thought and exhorts vigorously to its practice. There is nothing like this treatment in any other 16th-century Anabaptist writing. It was practiced in general by the Dutch Mennonites in the 16th and early 17th centuries.

The first direct evidence that footwashing was practiced as a general ordinance in Holland is found at the time of the division of the Danziger Old Flemish ca. 1635 from the Groningen Old Flemish. The Groningen group required the observance in connection with the communion service, while the Danzigers required it only for visiting elders who came from other districts to administer baptism and communion. For these the ordinance was to be observed in the house in which they were guests.

Out of the 19 confessions of faith produced by European Anabaptists and Mennonites from 1527 to 1874, 12 speak of the ordinance of footwashing as a Christian practice, while 9 omit it altogether. The first one to mention it (Dutch Waterlander Confession of 1577) indicates that it is to be done for visitors from a distance, particularly refugees, but is not prescribed as a church ordinance for a worship service. The same is true for the Concept of Cologne (1591), the Twisck 33 Articles of about 1615, and the George Hansen Flemish Confession of 1678 (Danzig area). All the other seven which mention it (Olive Branch of 1627 in Holland, Dordrecht 18 Articles of 1632, Jan Centsen of 1630 in Holland, the first Prussian confession of 1660, the Prussian confession of G. Wiebe of 1792, and the confession adopted in Russia in 1874 by the Mennonite Brethren) treat it as a general ordinance of the church. The Cornelis Ris' Dutch Confession of 1773 does not mention it, probably because it was already dying out in Holland. The widely used Elbing-Waldeck catechism of 1778 includes it, as does the Russian Mennonite catechism of 1870.

The Alsatian congregations which adopted the Dordrecht Confession in 1660 were probably the channel for the adoption of the same confession with its footwashing article by the Amish schismatic group which originated 1693-97 in Switzerland. The Amish have ever since been fully committed to footwashing and in fact were distinguished from the other Mennonites of Switzerland, France, the Palatinate, and South Germany by it, since the latter did not practice it. The Northwest German Mennonites, being closely related to the Dutch Mennonites, followed them both in the observance earlier and in discarding it in the 18th and 19th centuries.

The decline of the practice among the European Mennonites who had earlier practiced it had set in by the 17th century in Holland. N. van der Zijpp supplies the following account of the history of the practice in Holland.

"While in course of time the practice among the Waterlanders soon fell into decline—it is not mentioned in the ordinances of the Waterlander churches of 1581—it was maintained for some time, though not after 1640, by the Frisian, Flemish, and High German congregations. (In the Hamburg congregation under Dutch influence the question arose in 1628 whether footwashing should be maintained or not; see Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 576.) But among the conservative Old Flemish and Old Frisians in the 17th century it was again more earnestly practiced. Among them, and also among the Jan Jacobsgezinden and other Fijne Mennisten (q.v.), it became a church practice observed in connection with the Lord's Supper. So it was still in 1741, when Simon F. Rues visited several Dutch churches among the Groningen Old Flemish (Rues, 53 f.). (A pictorial illustration of footwashing as practiced in the Groningen Old Flemish congregation of Zaandam is found in Schijn's Geschiedenis of 1743.)

"In this same way footwashing was performed 'publicly in the meeting,' as Rues says, among the Old Frisians and also among the Swiss Mennonites who had immigrated to Holland about 1711. The Swiss in Holland practiced it until 1805. Most Old Frisians had abandoned it by 1770, and most Groningen Old Flemish by 1800, though in some of their congregations it was performed until 1815.

"Among the Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites (q.v.) footwashing was not practiced in the meetinghouse in connection with the Lord's Supper, but in the older hospitable form, i.e., to a visiting preacher or elder. The ceremony was performed at his arrival, or in the evening, the host washing the guest's feet in the room in which the guest lodged. It was also done to new members who had come from other places (Rues, 19). The practice was continued among this group until about 1780, when the last Danziger Old Flemish congregation died out. In the 19th century footwashing in the old form (to visiting elders) was performed only in four Dutch congregations: Giethoorn, Ameland, Aalsmeer, and Balk. Since 1854 no footwashing has been practiced in Holland."

Footwashing died out among the French and South German Mennonites of Amish background much more slowly than elsewhere. The last observance in Luxembourg was in 1939. There are still five congregations in France which practice it: Birkenhof, Diesen, Haute-Marne, Meuse, and Montbeliard.

Clarence Hiebert (S.T.B. Thesis, Biblical Seminary, 1954) comments upon the decline of footwashing in Europe as folows: "The decline of this practice was due largely to secularization and compromising influences in the church. Along with the loss of this practice European Mennonitism has gradually lost almost all beliefs that were once distinctive to them. In America, footwashing was rigidly observed by most Mennonite groups, the form and mode being more uniform than it ever was in Europe." Hiebert speculates further as to the causes for the decline, suggesting five reasons.

"1. The ridiculing of the peculiar beliefs of the Mennonites and their emphasis on the 'fringe doctrines' rather than the cardinal beliefs stimulated them to question some of their literalistic practices. Many abandoned this practice as a result of re-examination of their beliefs, in favor of the more cardinal emphases.

"2. The literal interpretation of the Johannine footwashing narrative had never been satisfactory to all. The spiritual concept came to be emphasized as being sufficient without the external act.

"3. The influence of the larger denominations upon the Mennonites played no little part in bringing about compromises in their traditional beliefs. This was especially true in Holland, where the Reformed and the Mennonite churches often united.

"4. The liberal tendencies which began in the 18th century, especially through the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam, were influential in changing the entire church.

"5. Because the more conservative element was constantly emigrating in the 19th century from Germany and France in search of religious freedom, the liberalizing tendencies gained the upper hand.

"Other reasons could be listed, but these are the cardinal factors and suggest the trend of European Mennonitism."

Russia. Here, according to P. M. Friesen (Brüderschaft, 40, 82), the Flemish group observed the ordinance in connection with the communion, while the stricter of the Frisians practiced the observance in the home of the minister when a guest minister arrived. Specifically the Gnadenfeld and Alexanderwohl congregations were among those that observed the ordinance at communion. Among Bernhard Harder's (1832-84) poems, published in 1888 at Hamburg as Geistliche Lieder, was one written to be sung at the footwashing service. Its dominant emphasis is that of cleansing from "sin which collects like dust" in men's souls. All the schismatic groups in Russia, Kleine Gemeinde (1812), Mennonite Brethren (1860), and Krimmer M.B. (1869), continued the practice. The observance was brought to North America by all these groups and the Mennonite congregations as well which had practiced it there. The Swiss-Alsatian Amish in Volhynia also brought the practice with them.

North America. The first documentary evidence of the observance of footwashing in North America is found in a document of ca. 1775 relating to the Martin Boehm case, in which the leaders of the Lancaster Conference specifically refer to the ordinance of footwashing as commanded by Christ to show humility. John Herr, the founder of the Reformed Mennonite Church in 1812, describes the Lancaster Mennonite group as having declined greatly and states, "The washing of feet, if not rejected, was at least practically omitted for many years" (Funk, 13). By contrast Funk (p. 114) quotes a letter of an aged member in 1878 who specifically recalled that Bishop Jacob Hostetler's (bishop 1831-65) charge to the bishops he ordained included the administration of footwashing. The Lancaster Conference hymnal, Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch (1804), contained one hymn (p. 117) to be used during footwashing, and the first English Mennonite hymnal, A Collection of Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs (Mountain Valley, Va., 1847), contained three (pp. 288-91). A pamphlet published in 1859 at Berlin, Ont., written by Ulrich Steiner (?), was devoted exclusively to footwashing (Fusswaschung und Deutung derselben).

The strange deviation in the Franconia Conference from this general practice of the Mennonite Church is unexplainable. The Dordrecht Confession, first printed in English in 1712 for the Germantown group, and adopted in 1725 by a conference of all the congregations in America at that time (printed at Philadelphia in 1727), has a specific and strict article on footwashing. Yet J. C. Wenger reports, "It appears that until a generation or so ago what is now the Skippack bishop district was the only one which observed Feet-Washing" (Franconia, 34). This is supported by the fact that the Franconia Conference hymnal Die Kleine Geistliche Harfe (1803), in contrast to the Lancaster hymnal, had no footwashing hymn. Only gradually did the observance spread after 1900, particularly when Henry S. Bower, a preacher, and the noted bishop Andrew Mack put his influence behind it. "As late as 1917," says Wenger (p. 105), the conference admonished the ministers "to teach the subject of footwashing more earnestly, so that it may be more generally observed." But there are some facts on the other side. The letter of Andreas Ziegler et al. to Holland in 1773, written on behalf of the Franconia Conference, inquires "whether you keep up the observance of footwashing" (Franconia, 401), thus implying the observance in Franconia at that time.

It is interesting to note that the Oberholtzer group, which broke away from the Franconia Conference in 1847, according to Hiebert, for a time after their initial organization continued the practice of footwashing in connection with the communion service. In 1851, four years later, they decided the observance should not be compulsory, and in 1853 it was made an optional practice with complete freedom in the local congregation. Finally, in 1855 it was no longer recognized as a church ceremony. A spiritual interpretation of the passage (John 13) was agreed upon at the 1859 conference. The Lower Skippack congregation, which intended to continue the observance of the ordinance, thus came into conflict with the conference. Henry G. Johnson, the bishop, was declared out of order by the conference in 1859, and formally excommunicated in 1861, taking most of the congregation with him. Lower Skippack has continued as an independent congregation to this day. J. C. Wenger (Franconia, 360) suggests that the conference may have originally adopted footwashing to meet the demands of Johnson who was a strong advocate of it, but without any connection with a general practice by the body as a whole.

Footwashing has been introduced into the foreign mission fields of the American Mennonite groups in accord with the constituency.

The following other North American denominations are among those which still observe footwashing as a standard ordinance: Church of the Brethren, Brethren Church, Grace Brethren Church, Brethren in Christ, and a number of minor Baptist bodies. The Moravian Brethren practiced it until 1818 when it was discontinued by act of the Moravian Synod.

There is no uniformity in the writing of the term "footwashing." Five other forms often used are: foot washing, foot-washing, feetwashing, feet washing, and feet-washing. The initial letters "F" and "W" are sometimes also written in captials.

Much of the material of this article has been drawn (and sometimes directly quoted) from Clarence Hiebert's thorough unpublished S.T.B. thesis of 1954 at the Biblical Seminary in New York, entitled "The History of the Ordinance of Feet-Washing in the Mennonite Churches with a Survey of the Pre-Reformation Evidences of This Practice." Daniel Graber's unpublished paper (1952) at the Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago, entitled "The History of the Ordinance of Feet-Washing as Observed by the Mennonites," was also of service. The items in the following bibliography were all (with one exception) taken from the very extensive bibliographical section of Hiebert's paper. H.S.B.

Books. P. Bergstrasser, Baptism and Feetwashing (Phila., 1896); George R. Brunk, Ready Scriptural Reasons (Scottdale, 1926); E. Daniel Colberg, Das Platonisch-Hermetische Christentum (Leipzig, 1710); A. W. Dale, The Synod of Elvira and Christian Life in the Fourth Century (London, 1882); "Foot-washing" in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature (N.Y., 1891); J. F. Funk, The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (Elkhart, 1878); William Gay, "The Origin and Historical Practice of Foot-Washing as a Religious Rite in the Christian Church" (unpublished M.A. thesis at Columbia University under the Faculty of the Union Theological Seminary in N.Y., 1947); John Horsch, Mennonites in Europe (Scottdale, 1942); Daniel Kauffman, Doctrines of the Bible (Scottdale, 1949); G. A. F. Knight, "Feetwashing," Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics V (N.Y., 1912) 814-23; D. W. Kurtz, "Washing of Feet," International Standard Bible Encyclopedia V (Chicago, 1915); A. Malvy, "Lavement des Pieds," Dictionnaire de Theologie Catholique IX (Paris, 1926) cols. 16-36; Alexander Mack, Appendix to The Refuted Anabaptist (Ephrata, 1788); S. F. Pannabecker, "The Development of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America in the American Environment" (unpublished Ph.D dissertation at Yale University, 1914); S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet (Amsterdam 1745); H. Schijn, Geschiedenis dier Christenen welke . . . Mennoniten genaamd worden I (Amsterdam, 1743); George Smoker, "Permanent Principles Implicit in the Ancient Christian Rite of Feetwashing," unpublished S.T.B. thesis at the Biblical Seminary in New York (1940); Herbert Thurston, "Washing of Feet and Hands," Catholic Encyclopedia XV (N.Y., 1913); Johann Ursinus, Historisch- und Theologischer Bericht vom Unterschied der Religionen Heutiges Tags auf Erden und Welches der Waare Allein-Seligmachende Glaube Sey (Nürnberg, 1663); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1938); C. F. Yoder, God's Means of Grace (Elgin, 1908).

Periodicals, Articles, and Pamphlets. B. W. Bacon, "The Sacrament of Footwashing," Expository Times XLIII (1931-32) 218-21; E. J. Berkey, "Is Feet-Washing a Command" (tract, Scottdale, ca. 1905); Feet-washing (tract, Scottdale, ca. 1910); S. F. Coffman, "Christian Ordinances: Feet Washing," "Christian Monitor XLIV (Scottdale, 1952) 206-7, 240-41, 245, 276-77; Walter Fleming, "The Religious and Hospitable Rite of Feet Washing," Sewanee Review (January 1908); Jacob H. Janzen, Fusswaschung und Abendmahl (Winnipeg, n.d.); U.[lrich] S.[teiner], Fusswaschung und Deutung derselben (Berlin, Ont., 1859); ML II, 22-24.

Foppe Ones, b. Oct. 22, 1626, at Ameland, an island in the Dutch province of Friesland, was baptized at Ballum in 1654 by the elder Teunis Abes, was chosen as preacher on Jan. 24, 1665, and ordained as elder on Jan. 13, 1664, by Cornelis Jansen and Teunis Abes, d. Jan. 27, 1696. His son One Foppes, b. Oct. 4, 1658, was ordained preacher of the Flemish congregation on Jan. 4, 1704. In about 1670 a group of Mennonites separated from the Jan Jacobsz wing of the Flemish in Ameland and organized the Foppe Ones congregation. The library at Amsterdam has in manuscript a "spiritual song" by Cornelis Hiddes on the subject. This division existed until the beginning of the 19th century. It was also known as the Lausoms branch and had churches in Nes and Ballum. In 1804 it had only 99 members, and decided to unite with the Jan Jacobsz group, which numbered 432 members. K.V.

J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden," in Ned. Arch. voor Kerkgesch. XI (1914) 216-18; DB 1889, 11 ff., 18 f.; 1890, 26 ff.; ML I, 662.

Foraker (Ind.) United Missionary Church originated in 1890 when revivals were conducted in the Swoveland Schoolhouse, in Union Township, by such leaders in the Indiana Conference as Daniel Brenneman and Andrew Good. A few years later, when the new village of Foraker was formed a mile and a half away with its post office and railway station, a church was built there, and a congregation organized in 1920. The total membership reported in 1952 was 73, with Jesse A. Beery serving as pastor. J. A. Hu.

Foreign Mission Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church. One of the main reasons for the organization of the General Conference in 1860 was to give opportunity for expression of the growing interest in missions. Even before the organization of this conference various groups were interested in the Dutch Mennonite missions in Java and Sumatra. At the first meeting of the conference two mission treasuries were created, and at the third meeting of the conference another was added, so that the western, central, and eastern groups each had their own treasurer.

At the fourth session of the conference in 1868, the Central Mission Society of the United Mennonites of America was created and instructed to support the work of the Dutch Mennonites in Java, but also to educate young American Mennonite men in preparation for conference mission work. At the sixth session of the General Conference, 1872, the above society was dissolved and a Foreign Mission Board composed of five members was created. In 1878 the various mission treasuries were consolidated.

In order to prepare ministers and missionaries the conference established the Wadsworth school, which opened its doors in 1868. One of the students, Samuel S. Haury, decided to enter mission service and in 1871 applied to the Mennonite Mission Society at Amsterdam. In 1872 the conference decided to support Haury while in school and asked that he put himself under the direction of the conference Mission Board. This he did, and in 1875 after completing his studies at the Barmen Mission School in Germany, he returned to America to be ordained as the first conference missionary.

The first field considered was Java and Sumatra; however, since no satisfactory basis of co-operation with the Amsterdam Society presented itself, Haury was asked to visit the churches and look for a field among the American Indians or elsewhere. Several Indian tribes were visited and Quaker missionaries among them were consulted. In 1879 Haury, accompanied by J. B. Baer, visited Alaska and conferred with Presbyterian missionaries there. After a second visit to various Indians, accompanied by three board members, Haury finally began mission work in 1880 among the Arapahoe tribe at Darlington, Indian Territory.

In 1884 work was begun among the Cheyenne tribe. In 1891 Rodolphe Petter arrived on the field and in time became an internationally recognized philologist, reducing the Cheyenne language to writing, building a dictionary, and translating the Bible and other books into Cheyenne. In 1893 work among the Hopi tribe was begun. Much of H. R. Voth's Hopi material was later published with profuse illustrations in eleven volumes by the Stanley McCormick Hopi Expedition, Field Columbian Museum, and much of his Hopi collection was placed on permanent exhibition in some 20 large cases in the Field Museum, Chicago. Nearly 90 persons have served as missionaries in some capacity among the Indians. During the first decade only about 20 converts were won. The total number baptized among the three tribes in Oklahoma, Arizona, and Montana since the beginning is about 800.

The work in India began in 1899 when David Goerz arrived with relief supplies and instructions to look for a mission field. The pioneer missionaries, P. A. Penner and J. F. Kroeker and their wives, came in 1900. The field is in the former Central Provinces, an area of about 8,000 square miles with a population of about 1,200,000. In 1950 there were 15 organized congregations in the India field with a membership of over 3,500, some 25 schools with about 1,300 pupils, 2 orphanages with a capacity of 80 each, a widows' home, 2 hospitals and 6 dispensaries with some 13,000 new and some 10,000 return patients per year, and a recognized leper asylum with a capacity of 500, in which more than 3,400 lepers have been cared for. Some 230 native workers were being employed and more than 40 missionaries had given some service on 5 stations: Champa, Janjgir, Mauhaudi, Korba, and Jagdeeshpur.

The work in China was begun by Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Brown in 1909 and taken over by the Foreign Mission Board in 1914. The field was in southern Hopei province, about 40 by 100 miles, with a population of over 2,200,000. In 1940 there were 40 preaching places, 24 congregations, 125 native workers, and a church membership of about 2,300, 2 high schools, 60 grade schools with an enrollment of over 2,300, a hospital, 2 dispensaries with over 3,500 patients and over 52,000 registered treatments per year. About 30 missionaries have given some service in this field. With the Japanese invasion and the coming of the Communists the work was seriously hindered. In 1950 Chinese Christians were carrying on as best they could while the few remaining missionaries moved to the interior to open a new field in Szechwan, where the work was just beginning. But shortly all missionaries were compelled to leave the field.

For a number of years the Foreign Mission Board has co-operated with the Congo Inland Mission (q.v.) in Africa. In 1947 work was started in Colombia, South America, mainly with untainted leper children. Eight workers are there at present.

Much credit for the high standard of work by the Foreign Mission Board belongs to J. W. Kliewer and P. H. Richert, who for many years served as president and secretary respectively of the board. Kliewer was president of the board from 1908 to 1930. In about 1916 the board published A Manual for Missionaries covering various aspects of the subject. Regarding educational qualifications it states: "It is regarded as essential that a missionary have a good college education and at least some work in a good theological seminary or other graduate school." In more recent years this standard has not been adhered to. For the fiscal year 1949-50 the budget of the board was $255,000. Over 200 missionaries have rendered service under the Mission Board and in 1950 there were about 97 active in the five fields mentioned above.

In 1950 the General Conference session merged the Foreign Mission Board and the Home Mission Board into a Board of Missions of 12 members.

E.G.K.

Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931).

Foreign Missions Committee of the Conference of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church (headquarters at Hillsboro, Kan.) was chartered on Oct. 5, 1901, as the Missionary Board of the Krimmer M.B. Church. The original charter was signed by John Esau, Cornelius Thiessen, Peter A. Wiebe, John J. Friesen, and David E. Harder. Out of this developed gradually the Foreign Missions Committee with a missions emphasis, now composed of nine members elected for three-year periods, three being elected every year. The purpose of the organization as stated in the charter is "to carry on Home and Foreign Mission work in the preaching of the Gospel and advancing education and to secure and administer the funds necessary thereto." The committee is responsible to the conference and its current annual budget is $48,000. Thirty-three missionaries are supported at present on 5 continents and in 12 countries. The first station was opened among the Negroes at Elk Park, N.C., in 1901. The same year H. C. Bartel went to the Shantung and Honan Provinces of China and soon organized the China Mennonite Mission Society (q.v.). The committee is not exclusive but sends missionaries to fields under other boards where it has no work of its own. Reports are found in the yearbooks of the K.M.B. Conference, Der Wahrheitsfreund (now extinct), and The Christian Witness, the present church organ. C.F.P.

Forestry Service (Forsteidienst), the alternative service rendered in lieu of military duty by the Russian Mennonites. In 1874 universal conscription was introduced in Russia. The proposal to pass such a measure, which was announced in 1870, was a cause of great concern to the Mennonites, who at all costs wanted to remain true to their principle of nonresistance, a privilege promised them when they immigrated. They sent deputation after deputation to St. Petersburg to secure release from military duty. When this effort seemed to be futile, the great emigration of Russian Mennonites ensued.

But the authorities, who had learned to appreciate the Mennonites as competent farmers and as an important cultural asset, did not want to lose the contributions this group was making to the cultivation of the land. The government therefore proposed to the Mennonites a system of release from military service by service (1) in the shops of the Navy Department; (2) in fire companies, or (3) in mobile companies in the Forestry Department. Service in the medical corps, which had been considered by the government committees, was rejected by the Mennonites on the grounds that in time of war the medical corps was directly involved in the war effort. The third of the proposed systems was accepted. The Mennonites now planned to keep their young men together in large groups in order to provide pastoral care for them and to keep them from foreign influence. They accordingly sent a deputation to St. Petersburg with a petition to allow them to render their alternative service in fixed forestry companies under civilian government authority, and as much as possible in the neighborhood of a Mennonite settlement.

In June 1880, after lengthy negotiations, Councillor Bark informed the Mennonite elders of the decision: Mennonite young men under military obligations would be employed in the forests of South Russia; but the Mennonites were to assume the expense of building the barracks and also provide for the food and clothing of the companies. In return the government would pay each young man in service 20 kopeks per working day. On Sept. 19, 1880, the plan became obligatory for all the Mennonites of Russia. Six barracks were to be built within three years. In the spring of 1881 the first young men were drafted into forestry service. Soon two additional barracks were built and in the course of time the "Phylloxera" company was added.

All matters of the forestry service were regulated on the Mennonite side by the "Delegate Meeting for Forestry Service Affairs." Its executive officer was called the "Forestry President" or simply "President." It was his duty to settle all questions with the government, to provide for the welfare of the men in service, and to be in charge of the economic affairs of the companies. Each company had an "Oekonom-Prediger," who was usually known as "Papa" by the men in service; he had charge of the material care of the companies and the pastoral care.

The assignment and supervision of the jobs was taken care of by government officials. Each forestry unit had a forester with the rank of captain, and an assistant, usually with the rank of lieutenant. From the ranks of the men in service an "elder" was chosen with the rank of a noncommissioned officer, and several corporals. Usually these persons were appointed by the forester after suggestion by the departing elder; but sometimes they were also elected by majority vote, and then proposed to the forester for appointment. Neither the elder nor the corporals received from the men in service any military salute or other military honor. The elder had the duty of assigning and supervising the jobs of the company and preserving discipline in the barracks. Every evening he had to give a report to the forester or his assistant on the work done; the corporals supervised the smaller subdivisions and jobs of the company.

The object of these forestry units was to plant forests on a large scale in the steppes of South Russia, to lay out nurseries, and to raise model orchards. Every year many improved trees both for fruit and for forests were given free of charge to the Russians living in the neighborhood to create in them a desire to plant orchards and woods.

The work of the Phylloxera units, which served principally in Crimea and were active only six months in the year (whereas the other companies received only a few weeks or at most three months of vacation in winter), consisted in finding and exterminating the aphid Phylloxera in the vineyards. The men in service were not called soldiers, but in the records were designated as "obligatory workers." Detailed annual reports of the forestry service were published in German and Russian, e.g., Jahresbericht des Bevollmächtigten der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland in Sachen der Unterhaltung der Forstkommandos im Jahre 1907. A.B.

In 1917 a change was made in the management of forestry service in so far as they concerned the Mennonites. During World War I about 14,000 Mennonites had been mobilized, about half of whom were engaged in forestry service. These 7,000 forestry workers were scattered into all parts of Russia, in larger and small groups.

During the Revolution and the movement for freedom that initially accompanied it there was also enthusiastic and extensive activity in organization in these groups. This circumstance, as well as the fact that providing for the men in service had been made difficult by the rise in the cost of living and the scattered state of the units, led to the appointment by the meeting of the delegates of the Mennonite congregations, together with the delegates of the men in service, held at Halbstadt in August 1917 of a committee for the management of forestry matters, with the shortened name "Iksume" (Executive committee of the delegate meeting of the Mennonite congregations). The first chairman of the committee was the former president. The committee provided for the preservation of the economic and legal interests of the men in service, which had become very difficult in the impoverished state of affairs in the throes of the revolution; it had become necessary to draft and harness all the forces on which the committee had its historical basis. A further task of the committee was to keep an account with regard to the care of clothing and traveling of the various forestry committees and the individuals still in service after demobilization in 1918.

In consequence of the unstable political conditions in 1918-19 any orderly operation of the forestry service became impossible. When business operation of the units, which was in some places quite profitable, was threatened, the Mennonites proceeded to liquidate the forestry units, without, however, wanting to give up the forestry service as such as a matter of principle. For the purpose of this liquidation committee members were now and then delegated, who succeeded, often at the danger of their life, in disposing advantageously of the stock of cattle, products, equipment, and materials; only in a few minor cases had the forestry services already been plundered by the surrounding population. Thus the forestry service was abandoned and not resumed. T.B.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; Abr. Görz, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Forstdienstes der Mennoniten in Russland (Gross-Tokmak, 1907); Jacob Sudermann, "Origin of Mennonite State Service in Russia 1870-80," MQR XVII (1943) 23-46; F. C. Peters, "Non-Combatant Service Then and Now," Menn. Life X (1955) 31-35; ML II, 663-65.

Forest Hills (Mich.) United Missionary Church had 23 members in 1953. M. J. Jones was pastor. M.G.

Forks Mennonite Church (MC), located six miles southeast of Middlebury, in Newbury Twp., Lagrange Co., Ind., is a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference. The first Amish settlers came to Elkhart and Lagrange counties in 1841-42. A group broke away from the Amish in 1854 to form the Amish Mennonite Forks Church. Christian Plank and Christian Miller were the first ministers. The first known bishop was Jonas Troyer. D. J. Johns then retained oversight until D. D. Miller was ordained bishop in 1906. Miller, who died in 1955, was ordained deacon in 1890, minister in 1891, and bishop in 1906, all three times by D. J. Johns. In 1953 Earley C. Bontrager was the bishop, Donald E. Yoder the minister, and Malvin P. Miller the deacon; the 1953 membership was 213. The first church, built in 1864, was replaced in 1893 by a larger structure, which was remodeled in 1915. In 1927 the house was destroyed by fire but was soon replaced. Missionaries from this congregation include Dr. and Mrs. W. B. Page, Ernest E. and Ruth Miller, S. Jay and Ida Hostetler, Wilbur and Velma Hostetler, and Amsa and Nona Kauffman. Forks was also the home congregation of Orie O. Miller, executive secretary of the Mennonite Central Committee. F.L.R.

A. Augsburger, "History of the Forks Congregation," MHB IV (Sept. 1943) No. 3, and (Dec. 1943) No. 4.

Formantin (Formantijn), Femundus, a Catholic priest, professor at the University of Paris, received the commission from Louis XIV of France to gather information on the Anabaptists in his newly conquered lands. Peter Valkenier, a Dutch resident of Frankfurt, Germany, gives a detailed report in his book, Das verwirrte Europa.

Formantin first went to England to investigate the life and doctrine of the Quakers. On the basis of his report they were forbidden on penalty of death and confiscation of their goods, to remain in France on account of "their unreasonable doctrine and offensive living." On July 16, 1672, he came to Emmerich (q.v.), where he inquired of the bookdealer Cornelius van Beughem whether there were Mennonites living in Emmerich, and asked him to arrange a conversation with them. On the next day he met with Hendrik van Voorst (q.v.), the Mennonite preacher, and after Formantin had expressed his astonishment at the simple dress of the Mennonite preacher, they discussed original sin, baptism, grace, the Trinity, the Incarnation, communion, power of government, marriage and divorce, punishment of heretics, prayer to the saints, the oath, etc. The professor was amazed to find an ordinary citizen who looked after his business daily, and had yet acquired so thorough a knowledge of Scripture that he could answer the learned professor on every point, citing chapter and verse. He assured van Voorst that he would give the king so favorable a report that the Mennonites would everywhere receive complete freedom of worship, and would publish his report to all the world in print; he added that he had found the life and doctrine of the Mennonites more edifying than the Catholic, and called all who had defamed them with the king slanderers.

Formantin of course did not keep this promise. Upon the bookdealer's question what the non-Catholics could expect of the king, he replied that the king would grant freedom of religion to Lutherans and Reformed, but that in less than two years the Mennonites would be subjected like all other heretics to special fees, then perhaps persecuted and their possessions confiscated unless they adopted Catholicism. Louis' reign here was too brief to carry out this plan. (DB 1868, 32; 1873, 58 ff.; ML I, 662.) NEFF.

Formula of Concord (Formula Concordiae), one of the symbolic books of the Lutheran Church, the purpose of which was to heal the schisms that had arisen in the church since Luther's death and to restore pure Lutheran doctrine. The formula of unity worked out in 1576 at a convention of theologians at Torgau by Jacob Andreae of Tübingen, Martin Chemnitz of Brunswick, David Chyträus of Rostock, Andreas Musculus of Frankfurt a.d. Oder, and several theologians of Saxony, was not found satisfactory, and was therefore revised in March 1577, at the Bergen monastery near Magdeburg. But this new version called the Formula Concordiae was not approved by all the Lutheran churches either.

The Formula of Concord comprises 12 articles. The last chapter deals with "other gangs and sects, who have never confessed themselves to the Augsburg Confession." This chapter is included to prevent the suspicion that such groups were tolerated. Among them were the Anabaptists, Schwenckfelders, Arians, and Anti-trinitarians.

Concerning the Anabaptists the Concordia states: "The Anabaptists are divided into many groups, of which one defends much error, another little; on the whole, however, they teach such doctrine as cannot be tolerated in the churches, by the police, or in temporal government," and the suspicion is aroused that all branches without distinction hold the enumerated tenets.

The articles are divided into three groups. In addition to several doctrinal points, the Anabaptist views on government and economics are condemned, in agreement with article 16 of the Augsburg Confession.

The erroneous tenets of the Anabaptists are listed as follows in the Formula of Concord:

Intolerable Articles on the Church

(1) That Christ did not receive His body and blood from the Virgin Mary, but brought it with Him from heaven.

(2) That Christ is not true God, but merely has more gifts of the Holy Spirit than other holy persons.

(3) That our justification before God does not rest alone on the merit of Christ, but on the renewal, and thus on our own piety, in which we walk. Which is in large part on one's own, peculiar, self-chosen spirituality, and is fundamentally nothing but a new monasticism.

(4) That unbaptized children are before God not sinners, but righteous and innocent, which are saved in their innocence, because they have not yet reached accountability, without baptism (which, according to their assumption, they do not need). They thus reject the entire doctrine of original sin and what is attached to it.

(5) That children should not be baptized until they come to understanding and can confess their faith themselves.

(6) That the children of Christians are holy and children of God even without baptism, for the reason that they are born of Christian parents; and for this reason they do not regard nor promote infant baptism, contrary to the express word of God's promise, which includes only those who keep His covenant and do not despise it, Gen. 17.

(7) That the church in which sinners are still found is not a true church.

(8) That one should hear no sermon or attend any temple in which Papist Mass has been held or read.

(9) That one should have nothing to do with preachers who preach the Gospel in accord with the Augsburg Confession and reprove the preaching and error of the Anabaptists; one should neither serve them nor work for them, but flee and avoid them as perverters of God's Word.

Intolerable Articles Concerning the Police

(1) That the government is not a God-pleasing position in the New Testament.

(2) That a Christian cannot with a good conscience fill or officiate in a government office.

(3) That a Christian cannot with a good conscience use a function of government in occasional matters against the wicked, nor may its subjects call upon its power received from God, for safety and protection.

(4) That a Christian cannot with good conscience swear an oath nor offer allegiance to the ruling prince by means of an oath.

Intolerable Articles on Economics

(1) That a Christian with good conscience cannot keep or own any property, but is obliged to give it to the brotherhood.

(2) That a Christian cannot with a good conscience be an innkeeper, merchant, or knifesmith.

(3) That married persons must for the sake of their faith separate from one another, and one leave the other and marry another who is of the same faith.

These articles were compiled by the provost Jakob Andreae (q.v.), who preached 33 sermons in Esslingen in 1566-67 against "Papists, Schwenckfelders, and Anabaptists," which included eight against the Anabaptists. For the most part they refer to the Hutterian Brethren (q.v.), who had no brotherhoods in Germany, but were doing successful missionary work there. From their confession of faith, Peter Riedemann's (q.v.) Rechenschaft unserer Religion, Lehre und Glaubens, he quotes entire passages and tries to refute them: infant baptism (p. 28), community of goods (p. 160), oath (p. 141), church officials (p. 75), hearing sermons in the temples (p. 51), Christian and government (p. 101), magistracy (p. 129), merchants (p. 157), knifesmiths or armorsmiths (p. 156), and inns (p. 159). These sermons were printed in 1568, in a second edition in 1575, and enlarged with six additional sermons in 1753.

The views expressed by Andreae in these sermons were concentrated in the Swabian Concordia of 1574, from which they were put almost verbatim into the Formula of Concord. Only a few sentences were added. One on Calvin at the request of the theologians of Brunswick and Wolfenbüttel in session at Riddagshausen read: "The error of Calvin, that the children of baptized Christian believers are in the covenant of grace and are saved even before they receive baptism, and that they are baptized only because baptism in them signifies and seals the salvation they have beforehand, for such error minimizes the doctrine of original sin." The others were those on the Incarnation.

The Formula of Concord was widely used. It was adopted in Saxony, Brandenburg, the Palatinate, in 20 duchies, 24 counties, and 35 imperial cities. It was rejected by Anhalt, Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, Denmark, Hesse, Holstein, Pfalz-Zweibrücken, Pomerania, Sweden, and a number of cities and counties (Bremen, Frankfurt, Magdeburg, Nürnberg, etc.). Though it failed to become a unifying formula for the Lutheran church, it formed the foundation for church doctrine from that time on in the sections that accepted it. HEGE.

Jacob Andreae, Dreyunddreissig Predigen, Von den fürnembsten Spaltungen in der Christlichen Religion, IV; Wider die Lehr der Widerteuffer (Tübingen, 1568) 1-172; Fr. H. R. Frank, Die Theologie der Concordienformel IV (Erlangen, 1865) 345-91; F. H. Heppe, Gesch. des deutschen Protestantismus III (1857); J. Loserth, Quellen und Forschungen zur Gesch. der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert (Vienna, 1929); J. T. Müller, Die symbolischen Bücher der evangelisch- lutherischen Kirche (Gütersloh, 1890) 558-60, 727 f.; Peter Riedemann, Rechenschaft unserer Religion, Lehre und Glaubens (ca. 1545); ML II, 543 f.

Formularies (German, Formularbücher, Agende): see Ministers' Manuals.

Forrer, Joh. Rud. Philipp (b. 1598), the Reformed pastor in Langnau in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, who debated with the Mennonites in 1621, soon after taking the pastorate. His notes on the colloquia were published by Emil Blösch (q.v.) in the Archiv des historischen Vereins des Kantons Bern XII (1889) 282-307. In 1629 Forrer was made dean at Aarburg, and in 1652 at Burgdorf in the Emmental. (ML I, 663.) HEGE.

Forsteidienst: see Forestry Service.

Forsterhof: see Ueberlingen.

Fort Collins (Col.) Civilian Public Service Camp Number 33 was opened in June 1942 and closed in October 1946. A soil conservation service camp operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, it was located nine miles north and two west of Fort Collins. The work consisted of emergency farm labor, construction on the Greeley dam, forest fire suppression, building irrigation ditches and outlet boxes, tile drainage, surveying, land leveling, and soil analysis. Some of the men worked in the agronomy section of the Colorado Experiment Station and others were stationed at the Buckingham permanent side camp, about 70 miles east of Fort Collins. In 1946 a cooking school to train camp cooks was held at the Fort Collins camp. Its camp paper was known as the Poudre Canon News, later changed to Rising Tide. In 1945 the men of the camp published a 64-page yearbook entitled Service for Peace. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 122.

Fort Vermilion, Alberta, a village and trading post located about 600 miles northwest of Edmonton. In 1934 a few families of Old Colony Mennonites moved from Saskatchewan to this location in search of new colonization opportunities, and in 1937 they were followed by settlers from Mexico. In 1954 the Old Colony Mennonites in the vicinity numbered about 814 souls, one third of whom were dissatisfied colonists from Mexico. Their neighbors were few and were mostly Indians and half-breeds. There were three meetinghouses: Rosenfeld, Blumenort, and Rhineland. The bishop in charge was William Wiebe. Although the growing season is extremely short and equipment is very limited, farming has been the chief means of livelihood. The settlement is extremely isolated from the main stream of society, and the inhabitants hold very tenaciously to the customs of the fathers. J.A.H.

J. A. Hostetler, "Pioneering in the Land of the Midnight Sun," Menn. Life III (April 1948); Martha B. Nafziger, "We Serve in the Land of the Midnight Sun," Youth's Christian Companion (Nov. 7 and 14, 1954).

Fort Wayne, Ind., the second-largest city (pop. 120,000) in the state, located in Allen County. "Mad Anthony" Wayne built a stockade fort here in 1795. The first permanent settlement at Fort Wayne was made in 1815. For a long time Fort Wayne was a fur-trading center.

The Mennonites (MC) opened a Sunday school in Fort Wayne in 1903, and erected a building for worship in 1905. The present church was built in 1915. The city has become the seat of the headquarters of the Missionary Church Association (q.v.) and is the location of the Fort Wayne Bible College operated by this group, as well as a strong congregation. There is also an Evangelical Mennonite church in the city. J.C.W.

Fort Wayne (Ind.) First Mennonite Church (MC) began as a mission upon the authorization of the Ohio Mennonite Conference in 1902, after the repeated requests of John B. Federspiel and wife, Mennonite residents of the city. M. S. Steiner was appointed to open the work, which began at 1921 South Hauna Street, in 1903. In 1904 the mission was moved to 2237 Oliver Street and from there to St. Mary's Avenue. Two years later a church was constructed at 1209 St. Mary's Avenue. In 1915 the present chapel was built on the adjoining lot. The following pastors have been in charge of the work at Fort Wayne: J. F. Bressler 1903-5, Ben B. King 1905-30, Frank Martin 1930-34, Newton Weber 1934-41, Allen Ebersole 1941-52, Rudy Bontrager 1952- . Others have served for shorter periods of time. In the early 1920's the Fort Wayne Mission became an organized self-governing congregation, but with limited support from the mission board, which was continued until September 1953, when the congregation became entirely independent of the mission board. The membership in 1955 was 136. M.G.

B. B. King, "Our Mission Work at Ft. Wayne, Indiana," YCC, Sept. 27, 1925, 1, 2; Esther Sevits, "History of the Fort Wayne Mission," MHB, January 1947, 1, 4.

Fortbildungsschule: see Preparatory Schools.

Fortgens, a Mennonite family, first living at Emmerich, Germany, from where a number of members migrated to Amsterdam, among them Jacob (?) Fortgens, father of the well-known Zonist preacher Michiel Fortgens (q.v.). Abraham Fortgens was a Mennonite deacon of Emmerich about 1690. His son Isack, b. 1685 at Emmerich, d. ca. 1751 at Amsterdam, moved to Amsterdam and served the Zonist congregation as a deacon 1715-20 and 1728-35; Catherina, daughter of Isack, in 1731 married Abraham Fock (q.v.), a Mennonite emigrant from Danzig. Some members of this family joined the Zonist congregation and are often found as deacons until the end of the 18th century; others joined the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. vdZ.

Fortgens, Michiel, b. Jan. 13, 1663, d. Aug. 18, 1695, became a preacher of the Zonist (q.v.) congregation in Amsterdam at the age of 20, and served until death snatched him out of an effective ministry at the age of 33. Fortgens was an ardent defender of the conservative Zonist principles. He served as secretary of meetings held in 1684 and 1685 to unite the two congregations bij 't Lam and van den Zon at Amsterdam; his report Verhael der Onderhandelingen . . . was published at Amsterdam in 1685.

On this question he also wrote Een Brief aan N. N. rakende de laatste onderhandeling . . . (Amsterdam, 1692). Especially in this last-mentioned booklet he proves himself to be an orthodox Mennonite, averse to the unlimited tolerance he found among the Lamists, and convinced that the church needs a concise confession.

He was a very good preacher; his sermons were Biblical, simple, not marred by quibbles or redundant display of learning, and spoken with persuasive power. His published sermons were much read by the Reformed also.

Hermann Schijn (q.v.) delivered the funeral sermon, which was published with the title, Zalige Nagedagtenis ter gelegentheid van het Zalig, dog voor de Gemeente ontydig ontslaapen van Michael Fortgens, veel geachten en getrouwen Leeraar der Doopsgezinden te Amsterdam, onder het zedig verklaaren, en toepassen van Davids Leeven, en Sterven uit Hand der Apost. 13 v. 36 plegtig gehouden op den 11. September 1695 (Amsterdam, 1695). His friend Pieter Beets (q.v.), minister of Hoorn, also delivered (at Hoorn) a funeral sermon: Het bereidwillig sterven, gesien in de zalige verhuisinge van wijlen Michiel Fortgens (published at Hoorn, 1695).

After Fortgens' death three collections of his sermons were published: (1) XLII Predicatien over uitgeleze Texten des Ouden en Nieuwen Testaments gedaan door Michael Fortgens, in zyn Leeven Leeraar der Weereloze en Doopsgezinde Christenen te Amsterdam. Deeze Tweede Druck vermeerderd met Drie uitgeleezene Predicatien van denzelven Auteur. Gedrukt te Hoorn 1719. The first edition was published by Schijn in 1696. (2) Tyd en Feest-Predicatien over uitgeleze Texten des Ouden en Nieuwen Testaments. De Tweede Druck vermeerderd met 7 Predicatien over Ps. XXVII (Amsterdam, 1722). The first edition is undated. (3) Predicatien over de twee eerste Capittels van den eersten Brief van Petrus, den Uijttogt van Abraham uit zyn Vaderland en de Opofferinge van zynen Eenigen Zone Isaac, beneffens de overdragt, of Vergelykinge derzelve in de Offerhande van Jesus Christus, onzen Heere. This collection, published by H. Schijn in 1711, contains 33 sermons on the first two chapters of the first epistle of Peter, three on Heb. 11:8-10, and four on Gen. 22:1-14; new editions came out in 1729 and 1738. At 16 Fortgens had published a Latin devotional poem, De pace et Tranquilitate Animi Carmen heroicum (Amsterdam, 1679). A picture of Fortgens is found in Schijn-Maatschoen.

NEFF, VDZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 83, 658-62, 668; Catalogus Amst., 132, 234, 241; Biogr. Wb. III, 96-98; ML I, 665.

Fortschritt was a four-page monthly published at Newton, Kan., and edited by David Goerz to promote the Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance of North America (q.v.: now Midland Mutual Fire Insurance). The paper contained information of interest to Mennonites in the prairie states. The first issue appeared probably in December 1886, since the only available issue, that of June 1887, is No. 6 of Vol. I, in which it is stated that it was a monthly publication. When publication was discontinued is unknown. C.K.

Fortuna, Mo., a village (pop. 200) in Moniteau County in central Missouri. Approximately 60 Mennonite families live in a settlement a few miles southeast of Fortuna. In this Mennonite community are two churches, Bethel (GCM), and Mount Zion (MC). The first Mennonite settlers came to Moniteau County in 1866. This settlement has remained almost entirely rural with only an occasional family retiring to live in a near-by town or village. The address of the Bethel Mennonite Church is Fortuna, but the address of the Mt. Zion Mennonite Church and of most of the 60 families is Versailles, and most of these are located in Morgan County. E.A.A.

Fortuyn, Symon Jansz, composed a Mennonite hymnbook entitled Geestelijck Liedtboeck genaemt de Basuyn, with 694 pages. It was published after his death by the printer Jacob Aertsz Calom at Amsterdam, with an introduction by P. J. Twisck. Apparently Fortuyn, about whom no further information was available, belonged to the Old Frisian branch. VDZ.

Foth (Voth, Voet) is a common name among the Mennonites of Prussian background. Jacob Foht (Foth) was elder of the Deutsch-Wymysle Mennonite Church, Poland, ordained in 1875 (Namens-Verzeichniss, Danzig, 1881, p. 67). Heinrich Foth was elder of the Ober-Nessau Mennonite Church of Prussia, succeeding David Dirks (Menn. Bl., 1892, p. 99, and Obernessau, ML III, 285). Johann Foth (q.v., d. 1932) was a prominent elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church at Hillsboro, Kan. Johannes Foth has been pastor since 1904 of the Friedelsheim, Palatinate, congregation near Ludwigshafen, Germany. Hans Voet (q.v.) (Foth) was a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish in Lithuania and at Schönsee, West Prussia. (See also Vogt.) C.K.

Foth, Johann, elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in West Prussia, Aug. 20, 1844. When he was a child, his parents moved to the Mennonite settlement on the Don River in Russia. Here Johann was baptized in 1872, joining the M.B. Church. He married Carolina Janzen on Jan. 6, 1871. To this union 13 children were born. A man of rare ability with the gift of leadership, Foth was soon elected to the ministry, in which he served in Russia until 1883.

In 1883 the family emigrated to America, establishing a farm home in the community of the Ebenfeld M.B. Church southeast of Hillsboro, Kan. Here he at once became active as a minister, was elected to its leadership in 1884 and ordained elder in 1885. He served in this position until 1916. During his ministry the church grew into one of the strongest congregations of the M.B. Conference.

Elder Foth was very active in the M.B. Conference, doing much itineration for many years. He served on the Foreign Mission Board for a long time. When the Conference was subdivided into district conferences in 1909, Elder Foth became the first moderator of the Southern District Conference, a position to which he was elected a number of times.

He died Dec. 11, 1932, and was interred in the Ebenfeld M.B. cemetery southeast of Hillsboro.
J.H.L.

Foundation, A, and Plain Instruction of the Saving Doctrine of Our Lord Jesus Christ; Dutch: Dat Fundament des Christelycken leers op dat alder corste geschreuen (n.p., 1539) is the most important, though not the first book of Menno Simons, comparable in significance to the Enchiridion (1564) of Dirk Philips.

After addressing himself in his preface to the "pious government and all people," he expresses the confidence that they will find his writings in accordance with the Scriptures. He treats "The Time of Grace," "True Repentance," "Concerning Faith," "The Apostolic Baptism," "The Lord's Supper," "Separation from the World," "The True Ministers," and concludes with an appeal to the government, the scholars, the common people, the heretics, and the bride of Christ. The Foundation-Book was one of the most important instruments for gathering the true, peaceful, and Biblical Dutch Anabaptists—after the Münster catastrophe—into a body of believers, a church of Christ, which soon became known as Mennonites. In simple language he presents the basic doctrines and ethical standards based on the New Testament to a bewildered, seeking group, who found in the book the guide they needed and were looking for.

Only a few copies of the first edition have survived. They can be found in the Mennonite Library of Amsterdam (two copies); the University Library of Amsterdam; Royal Library of The Hague; British Museum, London; Municipal Library, Hamburg. In 1616 a new edition of the 1539 Foundation-Book appeared under the title Dat Fundament der Christlycken leere. Door Menno Simons op dat alder correckste geschreven/ ende wtghegheven/ Anno M.D.XXXIX. Ende nu nae het alder outste exemplaer wederom herdruckt/ Anno 1616. The earlier assumption that this edition was published by the Frisian Reformed Synod is hardly tenable. It must have been published by followers of Menno Simons rather than opponents. Copies of the edition can be found in the Mennonite Library, Amsterdam; C. P. van Eeghen Jr. private library, Amsterdam; University Library of Leiden; Colgate-Rochester Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y.; Union Theological Seminary, New York; Goshen College Library; and Schwenckfelder Library, Pennsburg, Pa.

The first writing of the Foundation Book was in a dialect with an "Oosters coloring," that is, Menno adapted his Dutch to the new environment of the provinces of Groningen and East Friesland where he had found temporary shelter (see Oosters Coloring and Dialect). About 1554 an edition followed in the Oosters dialect, which was linguistically even more adapted to the environment in which Menno was now living. Menno refers to this book as the Fondament-Boeksken (Opera, 1681, p. 235). It bore the title Ein Fundament vnd klare Anwisinge, van de heylsame vnd Godtsellyghe Leere Jesu Christi, vth Godes woort mit gueder corte veruatet, und wederumme mit grooter vlyte auerghelesen vnde ghebetert. This edition was printed by B. L. around 1554, very likely in Lübeck or Wüstenfelde, where Menno had a place of refuge. Menno was probably busy preparing a larger collection of his writings when he died in 1561. In 1562 the Foundation-Book appeared in a somewhat revised Dutch edition, considerably enlarged, under the following title: Een Fondament ende clare aenwijsinghe van de salichmakende Leere Jesu Christi, wt Gods Woort int corte begrepen, ouergeset wt dat Oosters, in dese onse Nederlantsche sprake. The following books had been added: "Concerning the True Christian Faith," "Concerning Regeneration or the New Creature," "A Consolation Regarding Suffering, the Cross, and the Persecution of the Saints," "Meditation on the Twenty-Fifth Psalm," "Concerning the Spiritual Resurrection," "Concerning Excommunication, Ban, and Avoidance," ". . . How Pious Parents Should Train Their Children. . . ." It is this combined edition of the Foundation-Book, reprinted repeatedly in Dutch (1565, 1567, 1579, 1583, and 1613), which found its way into the complete works of Menno Simons (1600, 1646, and 1681), and was translated into German, appearing first in 1575. All German editions in Europe (also the von Riesen edition of Danzig) and the various American editions are based on the 1562 Dutch edition which appeared after the death of Menno Simons. Only slight variations are noticeable.

European German editions include an undated reprint of the 1575 edition and one of 1834-35, published by Peter von Riesen primarily for distribution in Russia, but printed in Danzig(?). Six American German editions appeared in 1794 (reprint of the 1575 edition), 1835, 1849, 1851, 1853, and 1876. All English editions (1835, 1863, 1869) were published for the Herrites (Reformed Mennonites), who emphasized their loyalty to Menno Simons, and contain a preface by Johann Herr.

No other Mennonite author has ever written a book which found such an immediate widespread acceptance and so specifically met a need as the Foundation-Book of Menno Simons. It was one of the most significant factors in gathering "the sheep without a shepherd" and giving a Scriptural basis and much courage to a group of believers and thus preventing their disintegration. (See also Menno Simons.) C.K.

ML II, 17, 84-86; C. Krahn, "Menno Simons' Fundament-boek of 1539-1540," MQR XIII (October 1939) 221-32; idem, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 52-55; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 272, 296.

Fox Valley Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, a rural congregation located about 100 miles northwest of Swift Current, Sask., was founded in 1913-14 and had 50-60 members. A number of members moved to Medicine Hat, Alberta, and others to Woodrow, Sask. The church was dissolved in the early 1920's. P.C.H.

Fox(e), John (1516-87), an English Protestant scholar, who was compelled to flee from England because of his faith, and after a brief stay in Antwerp, Frankfurt, and Strasbourg settled in Basel, Switzerland. Later he returned to England and died there in 1587, having lived a very active life. While he lived in Norwich (q.v.) he may have had contacts with the Anabaptist circles there. He interceded with Queen Elizabeth of England for the lives of the Anabaptists (Barclay, 25).

Fox's great Book of Martyrs, which became the model of all later martyrologies and was immensely popular with the English masses, appeared in English (Latin edition at Basel in 1559) first in 1563, then in 1570, 1576, 1583, etc., under the title Actes and Monuments of the Latter and Perillous Dayes, Touching Matters of the Church . . . from the year one thousand. . . . A good modern edition is that edited by W. B. Forbush, Fox's Book of Martyrs (Chicago, 1926). A German edition appeared at Philadelphia in 1831 under the title, Allgemeine Geschichte des Christlichen Marterthums . . . . It includes a lengthy section (pp. 748-934 out of a total of 971 pp.) on the "History and Doctrine of the Mennonites" (pp. 748-85), and one on "Persecutions of the Mennonites" (785-934). The latter is taken from the Martyrs' Mirror, but neither its editor, nor the author of the historical section is identified. It was almost certainly I. D. Rupp of Lancaster, Pa., who translated several Mennonite books into English, including the Martyrs' Mirror (Lancaster, 1837), the Works of Menno Simons (Elkhart, 1871), the Wandering Soul (Carlisle, 1833), and Menno Simons' Foundation (Lancaster, 1835). The title page of the 1837 English Martyrs' Mirror names Rupp as the author of Der Maertyrer Geschichte, which is no doubt an abbreviated title for the Fox book. Rupp used the writings of Deknatel (q.v.) and Abraham Hunsinger (q.v.), in addition to the Martyrs' Mirror, on the historical sections, which actually constitute the first treatment of the history and doctrines of the Mennonites published in America. The only original contribution is the material (not very extensive) on the American Mennonites, which has been completely overlooked. H.S.B.

R. Barclay, The Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth (London, 1877) 25; DB 1899, 113; ML I, 665-67.

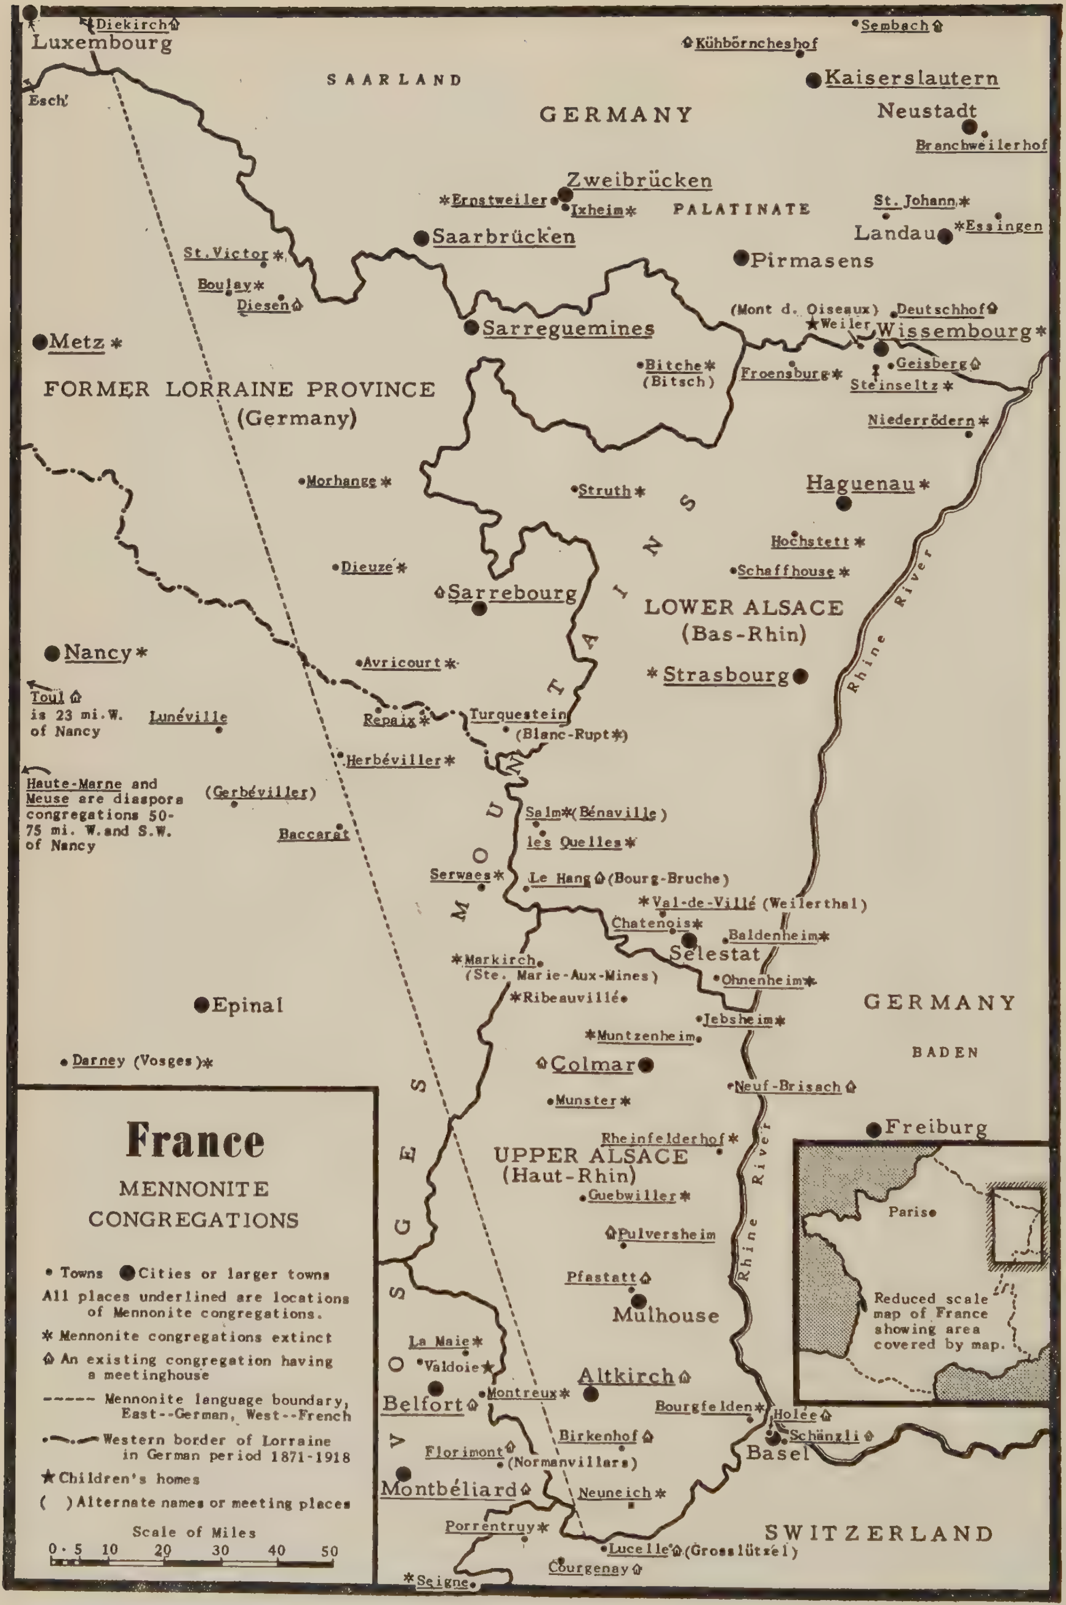
France. Throughout the late Middle Ages France was the major center of "pre-evangelical" heretical movements; these movements, parallel in certain of their aims and principles, of whose relations with one another and with Anabaptism so little is known, from Martin of Tours to the Waldenses, embodied in varying degrees the concern for Scriptural reformation which the Anabaptists were later to apply consistently. Since, however, the debate on the relation of these movements to Anabaptism has not yet been closed, their history does not fall within the scope of this article.

The greatest centralization of royal and ecclesiastical authority in France prevented any real beginning of Anabaptism in the 16th century. Protestants themselves being a persecuted minority, the issues on which focused the break between Zwingli and the Anabaptists never came to the same degree of clarity in the French-speaking Reformation. Flanders (q.v.) and Alsace (q.v.) were both centers of Anabaptism, but were at that time not part of France, and little if anything of the original 16th-century movement existed in either of these two provinces at the time of their acquisition by France.

During and after the Thirty Years' War (1618-48), at the end of which Alsace became French, the movement of Mennonites into Alsace from Switzerland became important. Some went on to the Palatinate, and others remained to reclaim lands laid waste by the wars. They settled both on the plains around Colmar, where on Feb. 4, 1660, a group of elders and ministers adopted the Dordrecht Confession of 1632, and in the valley of Sainte-Marie-aux-Mines (Markirch), where they were given citizenship and exemption from military service, against payment of a special tax. Although already in this area by 1640, they seem to have come in force especially after 1670, when a new wave of persecution broke over the Bernese Mennonites.

It is in this latter area (Markirch) that we encounter in 1696 the name of Jakob Ammann, who represented a newly arrived group of Swiss Mennonites before the Prevost of the valley with the aim of reminding the government of the privileges previously granted concerning military service. The Amish division in France seems probably to have grown from the triangular tension between the newer elements of the Markirch settlement, its parent congregations in the canton of Bern, and the older congregations of the Alsatian Rhine plain, which alone are known to have adopted the Dordrecht Confession, whose eleventh and twelfth articles do not represent Swiss Mennonite tradition. The final result of this division was that all surviving (1954) congregations in France, with the exceptions of Geisberg and Florimont, and including Binningen-Holee and Courgenay-Lucelle across the Swiss border, are of the Amish branch.

For some time Mennonites in Alsace enjoyed relative liberty, being able to avoid the requirements of military service and the oath. Gradually, however, their nonconformist position, their privileges, and their general prosperity attracted the ill will of their neighbors and of the Church, and with the tightening of France's hold in Alsace there came also, in February of 1712, the order to expel all Anabaptists from Alsace, since—so ran the argument—the Peace of Westphalia (1648) had promised religious freedom only to Calvinists and Lutherans. Migration began in all directions; east and especially north into Germany, south into the principality of Montbéliard, and west through the Vosges Mountains into Lorraine. Lorraine was at that time independent under a Polish duke, and Montbéliard belonged to Württemberg and thus to Austria. The movement into Lorraine was chiefly infiltration, profiting from the relative isolation of the mountainous headlands of the Muerthe and Sarre basins. The movement to Montbéliard was, on the other hand, massive and intentionally encouraged by Count Leopold Eberhard, who sought honest farmers to manage the lands which he had acquired from his people by oppressive means. Though the state church in Montbéliard was Lutheran, this tolerance on the part of the count was purely commercial and had no basis in his Protestantism or in any ideas of religious liberty. Mennonites had no right to meet openly for worship, to intermarry with the local Lutheran population, or to acquire new members.



France
MENNONITE CONGREGATIONS
• Towns ● Cities or larger towns
All places underlined are locations of Mennonite congregations.
✻ Mennonite congregations extinct
⌂ An existing congregation having a meetinghouse
----- Mennonite language boundary, East--German, West--French
•—•— Western border of Lorraine in German period 1871-1918
★ Children's homes
( ) Alternate names or meeting places
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 30 40 50
Diekirch
Luxembourg
Esch
SAARLAND
GERMANY
Kühbörncheshof
Sembach
Kaiserslautern
Neustadt
Branchweilerhof
Zweibrücken
Ernstweiler
Ixheim
PALATINATE
St. Johann
Essingen
Landau
Saarbrücken
Pirmasens
St. Victor
Boulay
Diesen
Sarreguemines
(Mont d. Oiseaux)
Weiler
Deutschhof
Wissembourg
Metz
Bitche (Bitsch)
Froensburg
Geisberg
Steinseltz
FORMER LORRAINE PROVINCE (Germany)
Niederrödern
Morhange
Struth
Haguenau
Hochstett
Dieuze
Schaffhouse
Sarrebourg
LOWER ALSACE (Bas-Rhin)
Rhine River
Nancy
Avricourt
Strasbourg
Toul is 23 mi. W. of Nancy
Lunéville
Repaix
Turquestein
(Blanc-Rupt)
Herbéviller
Haute-Marne and Meuse are diaspora congregations 50-75 mi. W. and S.W. of Nancy
(Gerbéviller)
Baccarat
Salm (Bénaville)
les Quelles
Serwaes
Le Hang (Bourg-Bruche)
VOSGES MOUNTAINS
Val-de-Villé (Weilerthal)
Chatenois
Baldenheim
Selestat
Markirch (Ste. Marie-Aux-Mines)
Ribeauvillé
Ohnenheim
Epinal
GERMANY
Jebsheim
Muntzenheim
BADEN
Darney (Vosges)
Colmar
Neuf-Brisach
Munster
Freiburg
Rheinfelderhof
UPPER ALSACE (Haut-Rhin)
Guebwiller
Pulversheim
Rhine River
Paris
Reduced scale map of France showing area covered by map.
Pfastatt
Mulhouse
La Maie
Valdoie
Altkirch
Belfort
Montreux
Bourgfelden
Holée
Birkenhof
Schänzli
Florimont
(Normanvillars)
Basel
Montbéliard
Neuneich
Porrentruy
SWITZERLAND
Lucelle (Grosslützel)
Courgenay
Seigne

Their status as a "foreign body" being thus underlined, and their presence in the region being a result of Leopold Eberhard's confiscation of private lands, Mennonites were naturally not popular among the natives of the principality. Whereas the count continued to invite the Mennonites, even sending representatives to Bern to ask them to come, both the neighboring provinces, such as Burgundy, and the local populations remained opposed to the "Swiss."

Only with the Revolution of 1789 ff. did Montbéliard become a part of France. The first effect of "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity" for the Mennonites was not religious liberty, but rather the opportunity given the local populations, through local revolutionary committees, to express their accumulated resentments. Both the loyalty oath and obligatory militia service became means of applying pressure. (There were even attempts in both Montbéliard and the Haut-Rhin to forbid the wearing of beards in the name of equality.) Fortunately, the higher revolutionary authorities were more understanding than the local hotheads, and the right to perform alternative service with the supply or hospital troops was generally granted, as was apparently the right to replace the oath by a pledge sealed with a handshake. Their critics raised the question whether such people could be considered as citizens. On this point the departmental government of Doubs (Montbéliard) appealed to the National Assembly, and the Comité du Salut Publique, apparently in response to this request, though not answering the question, confirmed on Aug. 19, 1793, the right to noncombatant service. Napoleon, institutionalizing the principle of military service, allowed no exceptions for reasons of belief, in spite of delegations sent by the Mennonites of Montbéliard, Alsace, and Lorraine, but apparently continued to permit assignment to noncombatant units. Also the Mennonites' objections to the oath were honored, and as early as 1810 the French supreme court (Cour de Cassation) accepted a simple promise as alternative.

Very little is known as yet of Mennonites in the entire period 1712-1870 outside of the principality of Montbéliard, except for the joint project just mentioned of sending a delegation to Napoleon (see Alsace). A few generalizations may nevertheless be hazarded. (1) Parallel to the movement to Montbéliard, a smaller group of Amish from Markirch settled in the south of the Sundgau (present congregations of Birkenhof and Holee). (2) In the latter half of the 18th century a fresh Swiss (non-Amish) settlement was formed in the wooded area of Normanvillars (present congregation of Florimont—see Gratz article, MQR, April 1952). (3) The expulsion from Alsace, ordered in 1712, was never fully carried out. The Count Palatine of Birkenfeld, on whose territory of Ribeaupierre the Ste-Marie-aux-Mines settlement was located, and who had lost 70 families and thereby a third of his income, requested from Louis XV and finally received in 1728 the authorization to tolerate those who remained, on condition that they should not increase in numbers. Those who did remain were frequently annoyed but never driven out. (4) The infiltration into Lorraine from the Vosges but also from the Palatinate continued uneventfully, reaching Nancy by 1850 and Bar-le-Duc and Chaumont by the end of the century. Widely scattered, the Mennonites of Lorraine had great difficulty in maintaining any sort of church life, and held on largely through the force of tradition, family links, and continuing relations with the stronger centers at Montbéliard and in Germany beyond Zweibrücken. Meetings were monthly or even less frequent; congregational leaders were devoted but frequently lacking in vision and occasionally even illiterate. Sermons and prayers were read or repeated by rote (see Pierre Sommer's reminiscences in Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire, 1951). (5) From all these areas migration to America continued intermittently through the entire period from 1820 to 1900, making up the major part of the Amish settlements from western Pennsylvania to Iowa. The increasing difficulty of obtaining assignment with the noncombatant service, and perhaps also a dissatisfaction even with the noncombatant privilege, was one of the continuing reasons for emigration, with the result that by the end of the 19th century there was no longer any objection raised against full military service by Mennonites remaining in France.

The annexation of Alsace and a part of Lorraine by Germany in 1871 cut off both the weak congregations of Lorraine and the strong center of Montbéliard from their brethren in German-speaking territory. The next quarter-century was the transition to the French language in both home and church, but not without difficulties which weakened the hold of traditional religion on the younger generations. In the 1890's young people who knew only French were obliged to memorize in German the 18 articles of the Dordrecht Confession, and to pronounce in German the formula, "My desire is . . . ," whose original intent was to guarantee the principle of baptism on confession of faith, but which could mean no more to them than if it had been in Latin. This language problem, coupled with the wide dispersion of Mennonite families, the end of discrimination against them, the growth of French nationalism and centralism, continuing emigration, and mixed marriages, led to the disappearance of a number of congregations between the Alsatian border and the Moselle (Blanc Rupt, Bitscherland, "Welschland," Dieuze, Morhange, Nancy, Herbéviller, Repaix, Vosges, "Lothringer"; see articles on these congregations). This evolution has continued up to the present, taking in as well most of the congregations of the Vosges (Ste-Marie-aux-Mines, Chatenois, Quelles, Bénaville, Salm, Senones, Struth, of which only the reconstituted congregation of the Hang remains). The general spiritual tone of Mennonitism in France and Alsace was at its lowest point toward the end of the 19th century.

Beginning around 1900 several factors combined to initiate a degree of renewal. (1) The Alsatian churches began to hold regular conferences and entered into contact with the Conference of South German Mennonites. After the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France (1918) the Alsatian conference united the German-speaking Mennonites in France (see Association des Eglises and Conference of Mennonites in France). (2) A new immigration of Swiss Mennonites into Upper Alsace brought fresh leadership into the Alsace-Lorraine Conference, and led to the formation of two new (chiefly Swiss) congregations (see Pfastatt and Altkirch). This brought the end of conservatism in matters of dress as well as the observance of footwashing, although the latter still survives in five French congregations. (3) Outside influences, such as the Salvation Army, and revivalists like Ruben Saillens in France, St. Chrischona, and, later, Pentecostalism in Alsace, brought both renewal of spiritual concern and a certain lack of respect for peculiarly Mennonite traditions. Surprisingly, the Pentecostal influence produced more interest in nonresistance and in a critical attitude toward nationalism than did the types of spirituality more favored by Mennonite leadership. (4) A revitalization of the Mennonite heritage, involving a renewed interest in personal spiritual life, in missions, in Mennonite history, in international Mennonite contacts, and in nonresistance, was undertaken by Pierre Sommer (q.v., minister of the Repaix congregation, later at Montbéliard) and Valentin Pelsy of Sarrebourg. Their efforts brought into being the French-language conference (q.v.) beginning in 1906, a ministers' manual, and the supported post of a traveling pastor to visit scattered families. This development expanded further after World War II to bring about the naming of a second traveling pastor (under the German-language conference), and the formation of a mission committee, a youth commission, and a charitable organization (Association Fraternelle Mennonite, q.v.), all of which serve both language groups. Christ Seul began its appearance as a monthly journal in 1907.

The Amish origin of the French Mennonites is now scarcely visible, though only a generation ago there remained a conscious conservatism in matters of dress. Only the congregations of Diesen, Haute-Marne, Meuse, Birkenhof, and Montbéliard have retained the practice of footwashing. Each congregation is autonomous, choosing its own ministers and elder (or elders—Montbéliard had four elders in 1954). The conferences have a purely consultative character. The ministers and elders of both conference groups have been meeting conjointly semiannually in Valdoie since 1951 for study and discussion, but this meeting has no administrative authority. The Dordrecht Confession is still the official expression of belief and its study (and in some cases memorization) a prerequisite to baptism, though Articles XIV, XVI, and XVII are no longer literally applied. Most congregations meet biweekly. Sunday schools (for unbaptized children) are the exception, but their importance is rapidly growing. Children of Mennonite families are generally baptized by aspersion at 14-15 years; adhesion of members of non-Mennonite ancestry is rare.

Mennonite Central Committee work in France began in February 1940 as an extension of the work in Spain, and continued under the direction of Ernest Bennett, J. N. Byler, and Henry Buller until Jan. 26, 1943, when the remaining workers, Lois Gunden and Henry Buller, were interned by the Germans. The work was first of all directed toward Spanish refugees at Cerbére on the Spanish border, and grew also to include child-feeding programs, such as the one at Lyons. The child work was carried on through the war during the absence of MCC workers by Augustin Coma, a Spanish refugee, and Roger Georges, a French citizen, partly with funds left by MCC and partly with subsidies from French government welfare agencies. Work was again begun in early 1945, both with children's homes and with more general food and clothing distributions. By the end of the year 14 MCC workers were directing at least seven children's homes besides the clothing distribution. In 1946 contact was for the first time established with the French Mennonites, and late in the same year a reconstruction unit was established in Wissembourg, Alsace. Increasing contacts with French Mennonites led to the formation of a Youth Commission in the French churches (1948), the beginning of summer Bible camps (1949), the foundation of the Association Fraternelle Mennonite (q.v., 1950), and the purchase of two properties for the continuation of the MCC's children's work in collaboration with the French at Valdoie near Belfort and at Mont des Oiseaux near Wissembourg. The Mennonite Church (MC) began a mission in Paris in 1953.

Congregations now existing in France are Altkirch, Belfort, Birkenhof, Colmar, Diesen, Florimont, Geisberg, Le Hang, Haute-Marne, Lunéville-Baccarat, Meuse, Montbéliard, Neuf-Brisach, Pfastatt, Pulversheim, Sarrebourg, and Toul. (See articles on all these congregations as well as the extinct ones listed earlier.) A monthly meeting has begun in Paris in 1954, but as yet without congregational organization. Mennonites in France are mostly engaged in agricultural pursuits, although a movement toward all levels of urban employment has been marked in the last half-century. (See Farming and Business. For more detailed local history see the provincial articles Alsace and Lorraine.) J.H.Y.

Les Soirees Helvetiennes, Alsaciennes, et Fran-Comtoises (Amsterdam and Paris, 1772); Alfred Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860); Ch. Mathiot, Recherches historiques sur les Anabaptistes de l' ancienne Principaute de Montbéliard, d' Alsace et des regions voisines (Belfort, 1922); V. Pelsy and P. Sommer, Précis d'Histoire des Eglises Mennonites (Montbéliard, 1914 and reprint 1937); ML I, 681-85.

Franchijne van der Borcht, an Anabaptist martyr: see Fransken de Vroedvrouw.

Franchois Ferijn, a Mennonite preacher who was active in Flanders, Belgium, about 1565, but about whom nothing else is known. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," Ms.)

Franchois van der Leyen, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on April 28, 1558. This martyr, by trade a dealer in old clothes, was a member of the van der Leyen family (q.v.), many of whom died as martyrs. (Verheyden, Gent, 24, No. 55.) vdZ.

Franchoys de Corte, an Anabaptist martyr, a clothmaker, b. in Brugge, Belgium, was arrested at Antwerp, and because he "persisted in his rebaptism" was sentenced to death and executed by secret drowning at the Steen castle at Antwerp on July 24, 1561. His furniture and other goods had been confiscated and publicly sold before his death on June 23, 1561. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 124, 133, 138; XIV, 30-31, No. 342.) vdZ.

Franciscans, a Roman Catholic order of begging friars (Ordo Minoritum) founded by Francis of Assisi (d. 1226). The principle of apostolic poverty was carried into the later Middle Ages with a reforming effect by the stricter party, the Observants. It was especially effective through the creation of the Tertiary order, which formed a transition to the laity, in addition to the first order and the order of St. Clara, and which supported these orders. Occasionally there was some fanaticism in connection with the prophecies of Joachim of Fiore and some opposition to the papacy.

In his "Prolegomena zu einer Geschichte des Pietismus" (Ztscht für Kirchengesch., II, 29), Albrecht Ritschl interprets the Anabaptist movement as a revival of the reformation of St. Francis, produced by jealousy toward Luther and Zwingli, proceeding from the Tertians, particularly the Observants. The supposition of a direct descent of the Anabaptists from the Tertians has been rejected by research, and even by Ritschl himself in his Geschichte des Pietismus. On the other hand, the assumption of a certain connection between the Anabaptists and the late medieval—indeed strongly Franciscan—piety has found some acceptance. E.C.

A. Ritschl, Gesch. des Pietismus I (Bonn, 1880) 30; Ztscht für Kirchengesch. II (Gotha, 1878) 29; Theologische Zeitung V (1880) Col. 311 (Weizsäcker); ibid. VIII (1883) 369 (Kolde); ML I, 686.

Franciscus von der Sach (della Sega), an Anabaptist martyr: see Sach, Franciscus von der.

Franck, Caspar (Casparus Francius Ortrandus) (1543-84), the son of strict Lutheran parents. While he was serving as chaplain at the court of Duke Ladislaus of Haag in Upper Bavaria, Germany, he experienced the first Counter Reformation decrees of Albrecht V of Bavaria, and in 1568 he entered the Catholic Church at Ingolstadt, remaining there as Professor of the Holy Scriptures at the university. His epitaph lauds him as a defender of the Catholic faith and church. Among his numerous polemics, his Catalogus Haereticorum (Ingolstadt, 1576) lists the names of all the opponents of the Catholic Church. Luther, Melanchthon, and other Protestant leaders are treated at length. Briefly but not incorrectly he names the Anabaptist leaders, Hans Denk, Balthasar Hubmaier, Ludwig Haetzer, and Melchior Hofmann. The sections on the Hutterites and Anabaptists present utter nonsense. The Batenburgers and Davidjorists are also touched. The book is of very little historical significance. (Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexikon, 1885; ML I, 668.) Neff.

Franck, Sebastian (1499-1543), the great German chronicler and popular historiographer of the 16th century, b. in 1499 in Donauwörth, Bavaria, d. in 1542 or 1543 at Basel, Switzerland, studied at the universities of Ingolstadt and Heidelberg, held a cure in the bishopric of Augsburg, in 1526 became a priest in Buchenbach near Schwabach, and in 1527 Protestant pastor in Gustenfelden near Nürnberg. Here in 1528, he translated and edited Andreas Althamer's (q.v.) Diallage, a book attacking Hans Denk and the "fanatics."

In this work Franck reveals himself as a strict Lutheran; but his complaints against the abuse of the Bible and the doctrine of grace already indicate the beginnings of his later position. This position becomes clearer in his next work, Von dem gräulichen Laster der Trunkenheit. Here he is still entirely a Lutheran; but he censures the unchristian life of the clergy and demands the introduction of the ban (q.v.). Mere preaching does not suffice. "We cannot be raised from our pillows, one preaches always to flocks of geese and blue ducks without any fruit, . . . because it yields milk, wool, and money. Alas, we are not only filled with wine, but full of the spirit of deception, error, and ignorance. Open vices should be censured, by the preachers with word and ban, by the princes with the law and the sword. For because the ban is not exercised, I know nothing to say of a Gospel or of a spiritual church" (Erbkam, 357, note; Hegler, 27).

In 1528 Franck resigned his position in Gustenfelden. He may have been compelled to do this on account of his attitude toward the Anabaptists, who were still numerous in and around Nürnberg. This is the surmise of Martin Frecht (Hegler in HRE). He went first to Nürnberg and on March 17, 1528, married Ottilie Behaim, probably the sister of the "ungodly" painters, Bartholomew and Sebald Behaim, whom Hans Denk calls his friends. It is almost certain that he came in contact with Anabaptists here, but there is no evidence for Ludwig Keller's assertion (Comeniushefte, 1900, 322) that he became a personal friend of Hans Denk.

In Nürnberg Sebastian Franck experienced a complete transformation. The theologian became an author, the Lutheran a Spiritualist, the churchman an individualist who felt at home in no religious organization but wished to establish an invisible, spiritual church. He expressed himself to that effect in the conclusion of his book Die Türkenchronik, written in Nürnberg in 1530. In this book he discussed the "10 or 12 nations or sects of Christendom," and called attention to the fact that "besides the three faiths which now have a great following, viz., the Lutheran, Zwinglian, and Anabaptist, the fourth is already arising, that seeks to clear away all outward ceremonies, the sacraments, and also the ban and to establish an invisible church, gathered in the unity of the Spirit among all peoples, and governed without external means by God's eternal invisible Word" (Hegler, HRE). These are ideas encountered in many a person of the time who was spiritually akin to the Anabaptists or in some connection with them, such as Campanus (q.v.), Bünderlin (q.v.), Schwenckfeld (q.v.), and Servetus (q.v.).

In the fall of 1529 he went to Strasbourg and there became acquainted with Schwenckfeld, Servetus, and Bünderlin, as he wrote in a letter to Campanus on Feb. 4, 1531 (Hegler, 50 ff.; Nicoladoni, 124; ML I, 320). In this letter he called Bünderlin a "learned and wonderfully pious man, dead to the world." He wrote that he desired with all his heart also to be baptized with the baptism with which Bünderlin had been baptized; faith could not be learned out of a book or from a human being, however holy he might be, but it is learned from God and implanted by Him in the school of the Lord under the cross. He admitted that he did not know whether or not Bünderlin was his brother in the faith, but was sure that Bünderlin was much more learned and God-fearing than he, "wretched man" that he was (Hegler, 52 and 264 ff.). This letter is found in Schellhorn, 114, and in Amoenitates.

In Strasbourg Franck very probably also became acquainted with Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) (Krohn, 208). Catrou's (q.v.) opinion (Histoire III, 237), which is based on Meshovius (q.v.), that Hofmann won Franck to his group, is wrong; for Franck, in his Paradoxa (145), expressly attacked Hofmann's doctrine of the Incarnation. The two men were of such opposite positions—only in their mysticism are they somewhat related—that any closer kinship is hardly thinkable, even though they shared the common lot of expulsion from Strasbourg.

Franck was expelled from Strasbourg on Dec. 30, 1531, with his family. The occasion for the ban was the publication of his Chronica, Zeytbuch and geschychtbibel (q.v.), his first major work, which he completed and published in Strasbourg in 1531, and which became a very widely read book. It was probably his most significant work, and was published in various editions. In Anabaptist circles it was also cherished and much read and used. Menno Simons took more quotations from it than from any other author (Vos, 262). He "believed in him as in an oracle" (Vos, 40). It is possible that Menno acquired his knowledge of the ancient writers chiefly from this book, as Duncanus (q.v.) charged in 1549. His idea of the imminent end of the world and return of Christ seems to have been influenced by it. It also contains valuable source material on the Anabaptists.

This book aroused everywhere a most painful excitement, because all existing religious groups felt themselves deeply wounded and criticized; all thought they had the truth, but no one, said Franck, had it. The author met with bitter hostility and entered a period of deep suffering. Erasmus (q.v.) was also offended because he had been ranked among the heretics; he lodged a complaint with the council in Strasbourg, perhaps under the influence of Bucer, and brought it about that the matter was investigated, Franck arrested, and the Chronica confiscated. Franck was then released and expelled from the city, and the sale of his books was forbidden.

From Strasbourg he went to Kehl; in the spring of 1532 he addressed a petition to the Strasbourg Council to permit his return and the publication of the Weltbuch, which was to appear as a fourth part of the Chronica; both requests were refused. From Kehl he went to Esslingen and made a poor living as a soapmaker. In the summer of 1533 he attended the weekly markets in Ulm with his wares. This aroused in him the wish to live in the city. He was given permission. He had expressly promised not to seek any church office "in these dangerous times"; he did not want to deprive others of their living. "What I have received from the Lord I want to share in writing with the people of God and not bury it."

At Ulm he entered the printery of Hans Warnier in the summer of 1534 and there published his Paradoxa (280 statements about God and the world), and his translation into German of Erasmus' Encomion Moriae, with the addition of three tracts which he named the Kronbüchlein; one of these deals with the vanity of all human arts and sciences, the second with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and the third with the praise of the foolish divine Word and the difference between the inner Word and the outer Word. Most significant are the Paradoxa, in which he developed most clearly his doctrinal system, if one may call it by this term. In 1534 also appeared his Weltbuch, a description of the countries and peoples, their customs, religions, and institutions in four parts; the last deals with the newly discovered America; the conclusion is a presentation of the various doctrinal ideas on earth.

In Ulm too Franck was severely attacked. Martin Frecht, the Protestant clergyman in Ulm, proved to be his most violent opponent. Philip of Hesse demanded his expulsion from Ulm as an "Anabaptist and revolutionary." Franck was to be expelled from the city on March 3, 1535. He protested against this since this constituted a violation of law; as a citizen of the city—he had been granted citizenship on Oct. 28, 1534—he could not be expelled without a hearing. He was not guilty of sedition, nor was he a heretic or Anabaptist, but had instead converted a number of Anabaptists. In his Deklaration he defended himself against Frecht's charges, also expressing himself on the subject of community of goods. For more than two years he was now left in peace in return for the promise not to write anything against the clergy nor to publish anything written by himself or by anyone else without censorship. In the meanwhile he had established his own print shop and bookstore. But he was able to publish in his own shop only a few smaller writings, such as the 613 Commands and Prohibitions of the Jews, and a revision of a Latin booklet by Sebastian Münster, and the satirical poem "St. Pfennings Lobgesang." The larger works he had to have printed elsewhere, since he could not secure permission to print them in Ulm. Thus on March 15, 1538, his Guldin Arch appeared in Augsburg, and in August 1538 his German chronicle Germaniae Chronicon appeared in Frankfurt a.M. In the former he discussed the principal points of the Christian faith with citations from the Bible and the church fathers as well as from heathen poets and thinkers. In the foreword he sharply accused the theologians for writing long commentaries and quarreling about sacraments, while they let practical Christian living in faith perish. For genuine pious Christians it was sufficient to know the Apostolic Confession of Faith and the Ten Commandments. By this publication his opponents were newly aroused against him; they finally had him and Schwenckfeld banished from Ulm, on Jan. 8, 1539.

On Jan. 10 Sebastian Franck with his wife and five children, aged 7 years to two months, arrived at Basel, Switzerland, where he entered the book printing business of Nikolaus Brylinger. In Basel he wrote his noted letter to the "Christians in Lower Germany" upon the request of a certain Johann von Beckenstein of Oldersum (q.v.) (Rembert, 226, who thought the letter was sent to the Bohemian Brethren in the Eifel, q.v., area). Since Menno Simons stayed there a while in 1537 (Vos, 64), it can be assumed that this letter was meant for the Anabaptist brotherhood. The letter admonishes his dear brethren, who are like sheep in the midst of wolves, to seek Christ and the kingdom of God not outwardly but within themselves, and warns them against sectarianism and separatism. "Consider as dear people all who tolerate you in your faith and conscience and are willing to admit you as God-fearing citizens beside themselves; show them so much the more kindness, in order to win them through your innocence, love, faithfulness, and upright conduct without the preaching of the Word of God, even if they preach Christ and nevertheless walk in error and seek, worship, and vainly teach God with a mistaken zeal. From open and ungodly sinners, adulterers, liars, and usurers, do not separate yourselves in any other respect than from their ungodly life; do not partake of this if Christ is dear to you. . . . In brief, seek Christ not here or there, and do not mistakenly think that He is more with us than with you. He is no respecter of persons; we are all equally dear to Him. He is equally close to every nation even if they are outwardly called heathen, Jews, Turks, or Christians. Anyone who lives right and well, let him be to you a true brother, flesh and blood in Christ. It must be thus, Christ's sheep must lie among the wolves to the end of the world, as Luke 21 clearly shows. I have written this much about this as a favor to Johann Beckenstein and also at the request of other persons, for in general I do not like to write my faith abroad. Nor do I desire to have a special sect or following in the world. Let no one believe anything out of love to me which his heart of nature does not help him to accept. For here nothing can be counted according to the blessings of other people; but if you dig you will surely find. The servant of all of you in the Lord, Sebastian Franck at Basel."

Rembert published this letter in a Low German version and Hegler mentioned the Latin original, which is located in Königsberg.

In his last years Franck produced a number of writings of varying length. In 1540 his collection of proverbs appeared at Frankfurt, from which Lessing published extracts in 1857 in his Collectanea (Comeniushefte, 1901, 193). His Kriegsbüchlein der Friedens attacks the chaplains of the princes who defend warfare; his Handbüchlein collects briefly the main points of Christian doctrine. His Verbütschiert Buch is a concordance of the Bible which especially deals with the contradictions in it. In his exposition of Psalm 64 he sharply lashes the attitude of the scribes who drive away as heretics the true followers of Christ by misusing the Scriptures. His Latin paraphrase of the Theologia Deutsch (q.v.) (a transcript made in the 16th century is found in the Mennonite Library in Amsterdam; Comeniushefte, 1902, 86) was never printed. For the sake of completeness mention should also be made of the following additional writings: Klagschrift oder Suplication der armen Dürftigen in England an den König daselbst gestellt wider die reichen, geistlichen Bettler (1529); Eine künstlich höfliche Deklamation und heftiger Wortkampf, Kant und Hader dreier Brüder vor Gericht. Nämlich eines Säufers, Hurers und Spielers. Von Philippo Beroaldo in Latein gestellt, verdeutscht von Seb. Franck (Nürnberg, 1531); Von Ankunft der Messe und der Wandelung des Brots und Weins im hochwürdigen Sakrament des Altars. Eine Disputation Seb. Francks mit Antwort Joh. Cochlei auf 88 Artikel aus der neuen Chronica (1533); Von der achtfältigen Belagerung und erschröcklichen Zerstörung der not-festen Stadt Jerusalem (Frankfurt, 1532); Wie man beten und psallieren soll (this is the first hymn in the Ausbund, q.v.); Dass Gott das einig ein und höchstes Gut sei (1534); Cornelius Aggrippas Lob des Esels. Verdeutscht von Seb. Franck; Von der Hoffnung und der Liebe Gottes; Sieben Weise in Griechenland, berühmt. Samt der hochverständigen, erleuchteten Personen, Philosophen und Gelehrten Leben. Von der Babylonischen Gefängnis der Juden bis auf Christum. Schöne nützliche Historien. He also wrote three devotional tracts: Von dem Reiche Christi; Von der Welt, des Teufels Reich; and Von der Gemeinschaft der Heiligen, which were not printed until after his death.

Franck's point of view is most significantly expressed in the song in which he rejects the four contemporary religious groups, the Catholic, the Lutheran, the Zwinglian, and the Anabaptist, which has the title, "Von der zwieträchtigen Kirche, deren jede die andere verhasset und verdammet" (Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 817). The first stanza begins with the words, "Ich will und mag nicht Bäptisch sein," stanza 2, "Ich will und mag nicht Lutherisch sein," stanza 3, "Ich will und mag nicht Zwinglisch sein," and stanza 4, "Kein Wiedertäufer will ich sein." The fourth stanza is as follows:

Kein Wiedertäufer will ich sein,
Ihr Grund is klein,
steet auf dem Wassertauffen;
Die andern Secten schreckens ab,
da kein Gotts gab,
drumb in bsonder Kirchen lauffen.
Leiden drob nott,
Welt hass unnd Todtt;
desshalb ohn spott
neher bey Gott
dan ander all drey hauffen.

Sebastian Franck was a sharp observer, an intelligent judge, a brilliant popular author, and a courageous historian animated by an unpartisan love of truth. He had at his disposal a widely inclusive knowledge. Almost every movement of his time is reflected in his writings. How well he knows how to reveal the wrongs of his time and to illuminate the weaknesses of the leading men and their doctrinal systems! He holds firmly to the Christian faith in God; but it takes on a tinge of the pantheism of ancient heathen philosophy. He has excellent statements about the value and nature of the Scriptures, about their importance and significance, but he does not accept them as a sole platform; for him the Word of God is implanted in all human beings and is effective in all believers, i.e., those who let it take effect in them. For this reason he does not really understand Biblicistic Anabaptism.

And yet Franck is very close to the Anabaptists. This has been strikingly shown by Walther Köhler in his article in RGG. Among the Anabaptists he had friends and admirers who "praise and highly value him" (Arnold, 284). Elsewhere he was attacked and rejected. Melanchthon, Bucer, and other theologians at the convention at Schmalkalden on March 5, 1540, uttered their verdict of damnation upon him because he separated from the church, despised the Bible and the office of preaching, and spread the satanic doctrine that all churches were alike. In 1545 Luther, in his foreword to the discussion on marriage, utters a very harsh judgment upon Sebastian Franck, one of the noblest and most open spirits of the time, saying, "He had not wanted to write anything about such people, because he too deeply despised him; he was a slanderer, and the devil's own and favorite mouthpiece. . . . In so far as I can judge by the smell of my nose, he is a fanatic or spiritualist who likes nothing but spirit, spirit, and who thinks nothing of Word, sacrament, and the office of preaching. . . . He has wandered through all filth and suffocated in his own filth" (Arnold, loc. cit.).

For Anabaptism Sebastian Franck is of lasting importance. This importance can be summarized in the following points: (1) he had personal connections with the movement and many of its leaders; (2) for this reason his evaluation of them which he gives in his writings has a special value and forms a principal authentic source of information for their earliest history and doctrine; (3) he is their advocate and warmest defender against false accusations; (4) by means of his writings he had considerable influence on them; (5) he was himself influenced by them and based on their teaching his world-wide free concept of a practical Christianity which is based on inner experience and which activates itself in love. "He never tires of proclaiming the right of the individual in matters of faith, on the wrongness of all force, the responsibility of the individual, which can be taken from him by no brotherhood and no tradition." These are ideas found in Anabaptism, which were not universally recognized and valued until our time. Upon his own time Franck had little influence. In Germany he was soon forgotten, but in the Netherlands and in England his writings continued to live and bear fruit. NEFF.

Concerning the extent of Sebastian Franck's influence on the Anabaptists and the Dutch Reformation movement there is difference of opinion. Karel Vos thought that "Menno Simons believed in him as an oracle" (p. 40); whereas Christian Sepp claimed that the Dutch Anabaptists considered Franck an opponent (Geschiedkundige Nasporinge I, 163 f.). There is no doubt that the Anabaptists appreciated Franck's sympathetic and objective attitude and treatment of their views, and that they had much in common with him. (Menno Simons made many quotations in his booklets from Franck's works.) On the other hand, it is obvious that they did not share his noncommittal views regarding the church and certain doctrines. Dirk Philips took occasion to write against him. It was undoubtedly due to Franck's influence that Obbe Philips (q.v.), Dirk's brother, left the Anabaptists about 1540 because they laid so much stress on a visible church, while Obbe like Franck was a spiritualist who did not believe that one church, e.g., the Anabaptist Church, was the true church of God (BRN VII, 122). Hans de Ries (q.v.), another Dutch leader, influenced by Coornhert (q.v.), who has been called the "Sebastian Franck of the Netherlands," also, at least for a while, came under the influence of Franck. In the 17th century the Lamist Mennonites and particularly their leader Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) held many of Franck's views, which were at this time common property among the Collegiants (q.v.).

The letter (see above) which Franck wrote to Johan von Bekesteyn no doubt influenced the Mennonites. Dirk Philips reported that some elders and brethren gave him this letter and also the one Franck had written to Campanus, with the request that he respond to them. This he did by writing A Response and Refutation of the Two Letters by Sebastian Franck According to the Word of God Briefly Composed by D. P. (Een verantwoordinghe ende Refutation op twee Sendtbrieven Sebastiani Franck, cortelijck uyt die heylighe Schrift vervaet D.P. [BRN X, 473]).

This, however, does not mean that the Anabaptists and particularly the Dutch did not rely heavily on Franck's writings. On the contrary, this proves that some of the leaders thought that their followers were depending too heavily on him.

The identity of Johan von Bekesteyn is also an unanswered question. Bekesteyn made it a point to visit Franck and upon his request Franck wrote the letter addressed to the "Christians in Lower Germany." This letter has been published in its original Latin form (Hegler, Beiträge) and in a Dutch-Low German translation by Rembert (p. 226), and most recently by Ohling in a modern High German translation (Ostfreesland, 1954, 114). The Dutch-Low-German edition was evidently first published in 1564, at which time Pieter de Zuttere edited the two letters of Franck to Campanus and von Bekesteyn. It was evidently this edition which was handed to Dirk Philips for a response.

Some scholars think that von Bekesteyn was an Anabaptist, although no definite record seems to confirm this. He was a refugee from the Netherlands who found shelter in Oldersum (q.v.), East Friesland, where many Dutch refugees were located. He was a friend of William Gnapheus and Entfelder. That he was a full-fledged Anabaptist is unlikely, mainly for the following reason. On his way to South Germany he was in touch with the reformers of Strasbourg, viz., Capito, Bucer, etc., and sent the two letters to Felix Rex Polyphemus, a reformer in Prussia and friend of Paul Speratus, including letters by Bullinger and Calvin. This span of friends and spiritual interests definitely goes beyond that of an average Anabaptist of the 16th century. Until there is more evidence it must be assumed that von Bekesteyn was a Dutch Sacramentist who found refuge in East Friesland and associated and sympathized with leaders and views of the Sacramentists, Reformed, and Left Wing Anabaptists. A closer check of all records should indicate the church to which he belonged in East Friesland. C.K., vdZ.

Arch. f. Gesch. d. Phil. V, 389-400; Hase, Seb. Franck von Wörd, der Schwarmgeist (Leipzig, 1869); Alfred Hegler, Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck (Freiburg, 1892); idem, "Sebastian Franck," HRE VI (1899) 142-50; idem, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mystik in der Reformationszeit (Berlin, 1906); K. Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Hermann Oncken, "Sebastian Franck als Historiker," Historische Ztscht, n.s. XLVI (1899) 385-435; J. H. Maronier, Het Inwendig Woord (Amsterdam, 1890); A. Reimann, "Sebastian Franck als Geschichtsphilosoph." (Comenius-Schriften zur Geistesgeschichte I), Geisteskultur und Volksbildung (Berlin, 1920); W. Köhler, "Sebastian Franck," RGG II (1928) cols. 649-50; Chr. Sepp, Geschiedkundige Nasporingen I (Leiden, 1872) 158 ff.; E. Seeberg, Gottfried Arnold, die Wissenschaft und die Mystik seiner Zeit (Meerane, 1923); Rufus M. Jones, Spiritual Reformers; Will-Erich Peuckert, Sebastian Franck, ein deutscher Sucher (Munich, 1943); Eberhard Teufel, "Landräumig," Sebastian Franck, ein Wanderer an Donau, Rhein und Neckar (Neustadt an der Aisch, 1954); idem, Theologische Rundschau XII (1940) 99-129; idem, Luther und Luthertum im Urteil Sebastian Francks (Tübingen, 1922); Walter Nigg, "Sebastian Franck," Das Buch der Ketzer (Zürich, 1949) 382; K. Vos, Menno Simons, 1496-1561 (Leiden, 1914); Hans Franck, Sebastian. Gottsucher-Roman (Gütersloh, 1949); Kuno Räber, Studien zur Geschichtsbibel Sebastian Francks (Basel, 1952); J. Lindeboom, Een Franc-tireur der Reformatie. Sebastian Franck (Arnhem, 1952); Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (1496-1561) (Karlsruhe, 1936); Bruno Becker, "Nederlandsche Vertalingen van Sebastiaan Franck's Geschriften," Nederlandsch Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis (1928) 149-60; Gerhard Ohling, "Aus den Anfängen der Reformation. Ein Brief des Sebastian Franck aus Donauwörth an die Oldersumer Gemeinde," Ostfreesland (1954) 111-15; De geschriften van Dirk Philipsz, BRN X (The Hague, 1914); H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 44 f., 58, 82, 134 f.; ML I, 668-74, with exhaustive bibliography.

Francois van Ludick (i.e., Liege in Belgium), also called François Bepen, an Anabaptist martyr, a former halberdier who was converted and baptized at Maastricht (q.v.), Dutch province of Limburg, by Henric Rol (q.v.). When arrested, he recanted, and was therefore executed by beheading instead of being burned at the stake. The execution took place at Maastricht on Feb. 13, 1535. His confession gives interesting information concerning the Maastricht congregation in this time. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 122.

Franconia, Pa., is a small village located in the center of Franconia Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa. It was called Franconia Square until 1849. It is in the heart of a prosperous farming community inhabited largely by Mennonites. The Mennonite Church (MC) is located one-half mile west of the village. The German settlers probably brought the name from the duchy of Franconia. Q.L.

Franconia Mennonite Aid Plan for Fire Insurance. As early as 1883 the Franconia (MC) Conference took action to encourage taking offerings to cover losses by fire. In 1896 a systematic attempt was made to organize a Mennonite aid plan, but it met with the disapproval of conference. In the meantime losses were not covered by offerings, and members held insurance in nonreligious fire insurance companies. In May 1935 the conference approved such an organization, and appointed a committee of four to study the proposal and draw up bylaws. A state charter was granted on Dec. 2, 1936. The board of directors is composed of one member from each congregation. The 1954 organization is as follows: Ezra Myers, Doylestown, president; Ernest R. Clemens, Lansdale, secretary; and Henry A. Bishop, Blooming Glen, treasurer. In 1954 the Aid Plan listed 1,200 members and $11,000,000. J.C.C.

Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The Franconia Conference (MC) decided on May 3, 1917, to organize a mission board. Members of the conference had already been serving in the Philadelphia Mission, which was started by the Lancaster Conference Sunday School Mission, now the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Joseph Bechtel served as superintendent from the beginning until his death in 1928. The conference in May 1908 had decided to aid in the purchase of the Howard Street property in Philadelphia. It was decided that each congregation should have one member on the board.

The first officers of the organized board were Allen A. Freed, president, Isaac F. Detwiler, vice-president, William D. Roth, secretary, and Garret S. Nice, treasurer. A charter was secured in July 1918. The first conference mission station was opened at Norristown on April 6, 1919, and others followed in rapid succession; by 1954 there were 17 stations in the district, and a mission in Cuba (1954). J.C.C.

J. C. Wenger, The History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937).

Franconia Mennonite Church (MC), located near Franconia, Montgomery Co., Pa., the largest congregation in the Franconia Mennonite Conference, had a membership of 800 in 1953. The earliest building, probably a log house erected before 1748, served for both school and church services. This building was replaced by a stone structure in 1833 which was enlarged in 1866 and razed in 1892. The present building, built in 1892 and enlarged in 1917, seats over 1,000 people. Since 1769 Franconia has served as the meeting place for the semiannual sessions of the Franconia Mennonite Conference.

Among the outstanding leaders of Franconia were bishops Henry Funk (d. 1760), his son Christian Funk (1731-1811), Jacob Gottschalk (1769-1845), Josiah Clemmer (1827-1905), A. G. Clemmer (1867-1939), and preachers Henry Nice (1804-83) and Michael Moyer (1836-1912). The first minister to preach in English, Menno B. Souder, ordained in 1914, was still serving the congregation in 1953.

The Franconia Almsbook (1767-) is a valuable record signed by the ordained men of Franconia and four other congregations in the Franconia Conference District. (See J. C. Wenger, "Alms Book of the Franconia Mennonite Church 1767-1836," MQR X, 1936, 161-72.)

The Sunday school at first served as a medium for teaching the German language. In 1871 or 1872 such a school was founded by Preacher Henry Nice. Sessions were held in the near-by schoolhouse during summer. By 1876 it became a Sunday afternoon school and was held in the meetinghouse. By 1918 it became an all year Sunday school.

Church services are held every two weeks Sunday mornings, and Sunday-school sessions are held in the afternoon. On the alternate Sunday when there are no services, Sunday school convenes in the morning. Evening services every four weeks were begun in 1938. The ministers in 1953 were Menno B. Sauder, E. D. Derstine, with Arthur Ruth serving as bishop from the outside. Q.L.

Franconia Mennonite Conference (MC), with the Lancaster Conference the oldest conference of the Mennonites in North America, the congregations of which are located mostly in Montgomery and Bucks counties in southeastern Pennsylvania, with scattered congregations historically in Philadelphia, Chester, Berks, Lehigh, and Northampton counties. Until 1936 it was called "Eastern Pennsylvania Conference" in the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory. The town of Souderton, 30 miles north of Philadelphia, lies close to the geographical center of the present cluster of congregations comprising the Franconia Conference. The name Franconia came to be applied to the Conference because for the last two centuries the semiannual ministers' meetings have been held in the meetinghouse of the Franconia congregation, which building is located in Franconia Twp., Montgomery Co., near the village of Franconia, about two miles southwest of Souderton. The township seems to have been named in honor of the Germantown pioneer, Francis Daniel Pastorius, who had been born at Sommerhausen near Würzburg, Lower Franconia, Germany.

The origins of the Franconia Conference are connected with the settlement of the Mennonites at Germantown (q.v.) near Philadelphia in 1683. The early Mennonite settlers of Germantown represented four distinct groups: (1) those from Crefeld who arrived in 1683 ff. and bore such names as Lensen, Op den Graeff, van Bebber, Telner, Umstat, Jansen, Neuss, Tyson, Sellen, and Hosters, William Rittenhouse (q.v.), first Mennonite minister in America, H. Kasselberg, and Jacob Godshalk (q.v.), the first American Mennonite bishop: these last three families came from the Lower Rhine; (2) a group of families from the Hamburg-Altona congregation represented by such names as Karsdorp, van Sinteren, and Klassen; and (3) a group of Palatine families named Kolb, Kassel, Bowman, and Graf; (4) a father and son named Keyser from Amsterdam. Most of the original Mennonite settlers of Germantown were therefore of Dutch ethnic origin with the exception of the Palatines who were Swiss. An early account, written by Jacob Godshalk, says that when the Palatine Mennonites arrived at Germantown in 1707 they stood aloof from the rest of the Mennonites in Germantown for a year, but as soon as the two groups merged the church chose three deacons, and shortly thereafter two preachers, one of whom was the Palatine Martin Kolb. In the long run it was Palatine Mennonites of Swiss extraction who constituted by far the bulk of the membership of the Franconia Conference. Probably 95 per cent of the present members bear such German (mostly Swiss German) names as Alderfer, Allebach, Bechtel, Bergey, Clemens, Clemmer, Derstine, Detweiler, Fretz, Funk, Gehman, Gross, Hunsberger, Hunsiker, Kolb, Landis, Lederach, Meyer and Moyer, Mininger, Overholt and Oberholtzer, Ruth, Schantz, Souder, Stauffer, Swartley, and Yoder.

The Skippack outpost of the Germantown colony was established at least by 1709 (the name may have come from Schüpbach near Signau in Switzerland), and the new daughter colony soon outgrew its mother. In rapid succession new settlements were made in Chester County, in the valley of the Schuylkill River, and on up in the Manatawny section of what is now Berks County, and at numerous points in Montgomery and Bucks counties. Log meetinghouses, usually used for school purposes as well, were quickly erected at various points beginning with Germantown in 1708. By 1840 the Franconia Conference consisted of about 22 congregations, served by 5 bishops, 40 preachers, and 25 deacons; in Montgomery County, Skippack, Towamencin, Worcester, Salford, Franconia, Plain, and Providence; in Bucks County, Rockhill, Lexington, Blooming Glen, Deep Run, Doylestown, Springfield, East Swamp, West Swamp, and Flatland; in Chester County, Vincent and Coventry; in Berks County, Boyertown and Hereford; and in Lehigh County, Saucon and Upper Milford.

No date is known for the formal organization of the conference, if indeed there ever was a formal organization. The semiannual meetings of the ministry likely began spontaneously and met irregularly at first. Christian Funk (q.v.), early Franconia bishop, wrote in 1809, when the semiannual meetings of the ministers were already well established, of similar meetings in the 1760's: it is likely that they had been started by 1750 or earlier. Down to the present generation these meetings remained strictly business sessions, led by the bishops, presided over by the senior bishop in years of service, without formal addresses except the individual messages of the bishops on the issues facing the churches. No official secretary was appointed to keep minutes until 1909, when J. C. Clemens was chosen, who served until 1950.

The Franconia Mennonites have always stood strictly for the doctrine of nonresistance, although some of their young men served in the Civil War and either united with the church for the first time after their release from the army or were reinstated as members after excommunication. It is traditional to adopt a statement at the close of each ministers' meeting that this conference "still desires to continue in the simple and nonresistant faith of Christ." In general it may be said that historically the Franconia Mennonites represented a rather tolerant type of Mennonitism: this is evident in a letter written by three Franconia bishops in 1773 in which they state, "With regard to our confession of faith, our forefathers have taken the articles adopted . . . 1632 at Dordrecht in Holland, and outside of these we have held to no human regulations, but have taught simply those of the Holy Scriptures and what may further God's honor and man's happiness." The same letter reports that the congregations were growing numerically, that they were enjoying "unlimited freedom in both civil and religious affairs," that they had never been compelled to bear arms, that they were not asked to swear oaths, that those marrying outside the brotherhood were placed under church censure until reinstatement following "expiation" (acknowledgment of error to the congregation). They said they had the writings of Menno Simons, van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, the Güldene Aepfel (Anabaptist confessions, martyrologies, prayers, and hymns), and the sermons and writings of such Mennonite leaders as Joost Hendricks, Willem Wynands, Jacob Denner, "and many others."

It appears that the Franconia Mennonites have also long been interested in good music, for on the occasion of the effort of the Franconia and Lancaster Mennonites to issue a common hymnbook soon after 1800, the project had to be abandoned because when the representatives of both groups came together for the necessary committee work, the Franconia brethren had already selected "enough hymns for a complete hymnbook," and they further wished to include "a number of Psalms and notes." The outcome was that they issued their own hymnal at Germantown, Kleine Geistliche Harfe (1803), reprinted a half-dozen times between 1811 and 1904. The Lancaster deacon in whose home the committee meeting had been held reported that "the Skippack brethren . . . have a large and strong church, as well as a large district, and are well trained in singing." At the time of the committee meeting they already had 3,000 subscriptions for the purchase of the proposed hymnal.

Like the Mennonites of Switzerland, and in contrast with the Lancaster Mennonites who on this point resembled the more conservative Dutch Mennonite groups, the Franconia Mennonites seem not to have generally observed footwashing (q.v.) as a church ceremony until the era 1875-1925, during which time it was gradually introduced, but not in connection with the Lord's Supper; it is now observed in all the congregations at the "Preparatory Service," held on the Saturday before (Sunday) communion service. The latter was always observed only annually until the present generation, again in conformity with ancient Swiss Mennonite practice, but in contrast with Lancaster where it was observed semiannually.

Prior to 1900 no "evangelistic" meetings were ever held. Catechetical instruction was given to the young people who applied for membership in the brotherhood. In recent years at least this instruction was based largely on the "Shorter Catechism" of 35 Questions and Answers, and on the Eighteen Articles of the Dordrecht Confession of Faith (q.v.). Not only were evangelistic meetings shunned as an emotional phenomenon unworthy of those who believed in a life of separation from the world and of commitment to Christ, but the giving of personal "testimonies" of the assurance of salvation and of God's dealings with the individual testifying was regarded as an evidence of spiritual pride: it seldom if ever occurred in the church life of the Franconia Mennonites for the first two and a half centuries of their life in America (from 1683).

As to costume the Franconia Mennonites resisted the following after new fashions and fads in clothing, but eventually adopted what became conventional attire with some exceptions; i.e., they resisted for a long time long trousers, shoes with laces, the wearing of coats rather than shawls by women in cold weather, etc. The exceptions relate mostly to the continued wearing of the colonial frock coat by ordained ministers, the wearing of a "plain" coat (without lapels) by some of the lay brethren (but the coat is of conventional length), the wearing of "cape" dresses by some of the women, and the adoption and maintenance of the plain Quaker bonnet by many women during the 19th and 20th centuries. In the plainer congregations of the conference, especially in Montgomery County, the bonnet was apparently universally worn since early in the 19th century. But in a number of the Bucks and Berks County congregations some of the women wore some sort of hat during much of the 19th and early 20th centuries. In a number of the Bucks County meetinghouses the women's anterooms were equipped with shelves on which small boxes were kept for the storing of the "devotional coverings" or worship veils. The women then wore their bonnet or hat to the meetinghouse, took it off, put on the veil which they kept at the meetinghouse, and entered the service. In 1905 Hartzler and Kauffman reported in their Mennonite Church History the partial nonobservance of footwashing in the Franconia congregations, and also that "in a few of the congregations . . . the sisters wear hats instead of bonnets." Mennonite leaders from Montgomery County strongly protested against the worldliness of some of the Bucks County churches, and such non-Franconia leaders as Daniel Kauffman and S. G. Shetler were imported for a strong indoctrination in essential Mennonite doctrines and practices. The result was the complete adoption of the bonnet as compulsory headdress about 1912. During the last 50 years there has been a growing emphasis on the continuous, daily wearing of the "devotional covering" by all women members of the church.

Two divisions have occurred in the Franconia Conference; the first was led by Bishop Christian Funk (q.v.) in 1778 over the issue of recognizing the American government before the issue was decided by the American winning of the War of Independence: Funk favored the American side, while the other bishops felt that nonresistant Mennonites should not recognize a rebellion. The Funkite group built four small church buildings, and worshiped in a few others, but they never prospered, and disintegrated by 1850. The division of 1847 was led by a vigorous and able minister, John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.), who favored more progressive attitudes, a milder discipline, a more tolerant and cooperative attitude toward other denominations, etc. In this division 16 ordained men withdrew, including the senior bishop who had been the conference moderator, leaving about 54 ordained men in the Franconia Conference. The new group claimed six meetinghouses (Upper Milford, Schwenksville, Skippack, East Swamp, West Swamp, and Flatland), worshiped on alternate Sundays from the Franconia Mennonites at seven other points (Saucon, Springfield, Providence, Worcester, Hereford, Boyertown, and Rockhill), and at once erected a new church building at Deep Run. Those who withdrew probably constituted a fourth of all the members of the Franconia Conference in 1847, possibly 500 members. In 1860 Oberholtzer helped to organize what is now the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v.). His 1847 group now constitutes the Eastern District (q.v.) of that body. The two conferences in 1954 were almost equal in membership: Franconia, 5,372; Eastern District, 4,525. In 1950 a small independent group withdrew to form the Calvary Mennonite Church, with 170 members in 1954.

Among the modern developments in the Franconia Conference should be mentioned the adoption of a constitution by the conference (1947); the acceptance of Sunday schools around 1900, and young people's meetings and "revival" meetings two to four decades later; a vigorous program of establishing mission stations in southeastern Pennsylvania, Long Island, and Vermont; the establishment of both primary schools (1945) and a high school (1954), the first by an association of patrons, the latter by the conference; the erection of the large home for the aged, Eastern Mennonite Home (1916); the establishment of Eastern Mennonite Convalescent Home (1942); a closer working with the Mennonite General Conference (MC) to whose General Council it sends an official delegate; and in common with many other areas of the church, considerable difficulty in attempting to take a vigorous stand against any breakdown of historic Mennonite principles, and against any cultural changes which are regarded as being a threat to a Christian simplicity and to a genuine spiritual nonconformity to the world, without falling into the danger of legalism and without occasioning new secessions from the group. The Franconia Conference has shown a stronger resistance to the entrance of Chiliasm than any other district conference (MC) and in fact forbids it. Harold S. Bender has correctly observed that "Franconia has also preserved in its customs and traditions more nearly the ancient Mennonite forms of worship, doctrine, and church government than any other American district" (Franconia History, p. vii).

The present congregations of the Franconia Conference may be divided into two categories: about 17 established and historic Mennonite congregations with a total membership of over 4,500, and a larger number of mission stations with a total membership of close to 800. There are 9 bishops serving in 4 districts, about 60 ministers, and about 30 deacons. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); W. Hunsberger, The Franconia Mennonites and War (1951); Doctrinal Statement, Constitution and Discipline of the Franconia Mennonite Conference, 1725-1947 (Franconia, 1947).

Franconia Mennonite Historical Society, originally called the Historical Society of the Franconia Conference District (MC), was organized in October 1930 at the Plain Mennonite Church, Lansdale, Pa., with John D. Souder as president and Samuel R. Swartley as secretary. In 1952 the officers were Quintus Leatherman, president, David K. Allebach, vice-president, Herbert Derstine, secretary, and Ernest R. Clemens, treasurer. The Franconia Mennonite Historical Library, established in 1950 and located in Souderton, contains the archives, books, and papers of the society.

The meetings of the society are held annually in the various churches of the conference district. Programs consist of addresses on local history of the churches and general Mennonite church history. The purpose of the society is to stimulate interest in the study of the historical background of the Mennonite Church and its bearing upon our church life today.

In 1935, through the inspiration of the president of the society, John D. Souder, the collection of sources for a Franconia conference church history was begun. John C. Wenger was selected as the writer, and by 1937 the work, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference, was completed and was published by the society. Q.L.

Francyntgen, an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake with her niece Grietgen and Maeyken Doornaerts in 1556 at Belle (Bailleul) in Flanders. At the stake Maeyken said, "This is the hour for which I have greatly longed." (Mart. Mir. D 166, E 553; ML I, 674.) NEFF.

Francyntgen (Francyntgen Meulenaers, wife of Andries Viblarre, or Andries de Molenaar), an Anabaptist martyr who was arrested with many other Mennonites in Brugge, Belgium, on Nov. 10, 1561, while they were attending a meeting outside the town. They all remained steadfast and were burned at the stake at Brugge. Five of them were executed on Dec. 10, 1561, among them Andries, the husband of Francyntgen, and on the next day Francyntgen with the five others was put to death. Their martyrdom is celebrated in a hymn, "Genade ende Vrede moet godvresende sijn," found in the old Dutch songbook, Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569, and in Wackernagel, Lieder. The records of van Braght (Mart. Mir.) are somewhat inexact as to these martyrs. (Mart. Mir. D 288; E 655; Wackernagel, Lieder, 130; Verheyden, Brugge, 50, No. 41.) vdZ.

Franeker, an old town in the Dutch province of Friesland, about 10 miles west of the Frisian capital Leeuwarden, pop. (1947) 9,050, 211 Mennonites, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which has had a varied and interesting history. Of its oldest history there are only a few bits of information from direct sources; of the rich archives of the Franeker congregations not much has been saved; the membership list begins with 1722; the children's book dates a few years later; the earliest minutes of the church board date only to 1800.

There must have been Anabaptists here from the earliest times: an edict of March 9, 1535, orders that owners of land and houses are forbidden to lease them to Anabaptists, and if this had happened those Anabaptists should be driven out; and in a second edict of July 7, 1537, the magistrate of Franeker is charged to exercise close supervision on "Lutherans, Sacramentists (q.v.) and Anabaptists." But the city government seems to have been rather tolerant, for there are no martyrs from this town.

In the second half of the 16th century, when the Mennonites were organized into a congregation, they must have been very numerous. For the year 1560 they are estimated at about 620 members (1,300 souls). The number of members had largely increased, especially by the activity of Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who baptized at Franeker 16 persons in 1551-54; 45 in 1554-56; 37 in 1557-61; 381 in 1563-65; and 360 in 1568-82; total, 839. But in this period Franeker played a not very admirable, though important role in Mennonite history. First of all in 1555 or 1556 a group of more progressive members, who were averse to strict banning and shunning and disappointed by the fact that Menno Simons at a conference in near-by Harlingen agreed with Leenaert Bouwens and the stricter wing of Mennonites, separated from the main body. Their leader was Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.), and their adherents in other congregations were at first called Franekeraars; later on they were usually called Waterlanders (q.v.).

After ten years it was again in Franeker that a new quarrel arose. From Flanders many Mennonites had fled to the Netherlands and a number of them had settled in Franeker; in the Mennonite congregation, the Flemish at first were accorded a brotherly welcome, but soon both Flemish and native Frisians mutually considered one another as much deviated from the old Mennonite plain style of living, the Frisians looking upon the less plain dress and manners of the Flemish as worldly, and the Flemish regarding the care the Frisians bestowed upon their houses and furniture as a great evil. In the congregation the Frisians outnumbered the Flemish. (In 1566 there were only 30 brethren from Flanders.) Then it happened that Leenaert Bouwens, because of a fault he had committed, was suspended from his service of elder (1565), and Ebbe Pietersz, elder at Harlingen, was also unable to travel about the churches. So the Franeker congregation decided to choose a preacher. The Flemish succeeded in having Jeroen Tinnegieter, a Flemish immigrant, chosen as a preacher. But he was not accepted by the Frisians. This was the origin of the Flemish-Frisian schism, which divided (1567) the Mennonites throughout the Netherlands, and even in West Prussia (see Flemish Mennonites).

Twenty years later, in 1586, Franeker was the scene of a new schism. Thomas Byntgens (q.v.), elder of the Flemish congregation, bought a house intended for a meetinghouse, but when it became clear that the deal had not been above reproach, a quarrel arose in the congregation. By this Huiskooper (q.v.) dispute the Flemish church was divided into Huiskoopers or Old Flemish Mennonites and Contra-Huiskoopers or (Mild) Flemish. The leader of the Huiskoopers was Thomas Byntgens, and leader of the other party was the deacon Jacob Keest (q.v.). This conflict too was not limited to Franeker only; nearly all the Flemish congregations were divided.

So after the Huiskooper dispute there were at Franeker at least four congregations: (a) Waterlanders, (b) Frisians, (c) Huiskoopers (Old Flemish), (d) Flemish. At the beginning of the 17th century there must have existed here at least three more congregations: (e) Jan Jacobsgezinden (q.v.), (f) a congregation of unknown type, presumably a separated Frisian church, maybe of Pieter-Jeltjesvolk (q.v.). Finally mention is made of the existence of (g) a High German congregation in 1614, which still existed in 1640, in which year it was involved in a quarrel.

But little is known of these congregations because of lack of documents. Of the Jan-Jacobsgezinden we know that Elder Joris Jacobsz baptized 29 persons here in 1640-44. Soon the membership decreased. In the 18th century it had strong contacts with the Jan-Jacobsgezinden at neighboring Menaldum (q.v.). Wybe Jans (d. 1778) was its last preacher, from 1729 on. In 1762 it merged with the only other then existing congregation; it then numbered 13 brethren, the number of sisters being unknown. About most of the other Franeker congregations there is still less information. The Waterlanders (a) sent a representative to the Waterlander conference held at Amsterdam in 1647. About 1670 this congregation must have united with one of the other churches. The Huiskoopers or Old Flemish (b), of whom Jelle Daniel Keest was a preacher in 1640 and Agge Classen in 1648, had their meetinghouse, called "het Valkje," in the Schoolsteeg.

In 1663 there were three Mennonite congregations in Franeker, one, of which Jouke Wybes was a preacher (membership 30), a second, of which Watse Watses was a preacher (membership 50), and a third, of which Isbrant Japiks (or Jacobs) was a preacher (membership 41). The membership of those three churches had in one century decreased from 620 to 121. (In a census of the town of Franeker of 1667 there are found, however, 107 Mennonite family names; names of non-taxpayers—wives, minors, and poor people not being included in this number. If the total number of Mennonites of the census list is true, the membership must have been much more than the 121 mentioned in 1663.) These three churches, which are said to have met in het Valkje, in the Eerste Noord, and in the Tweede Noord, are not easy to identify; the one meeting in het Valkje was that of the Huiskoopers (c), of which either Isbrant Japiks or Watse Watses was the preacher. Jouke Wybes was preacher of the Waterlanders (a), for he was in 1647 in Amsterdam as a representative. The third congregation must have been that of Jan Jacobsgezinden (c).

In 1695 at the founding of the Conference of Mennonite Churches in the province of Friesland (see Friese Sociëteit), there were only two congregations at Franeker, one called Old Flemish (the Jan-Jacobsgezinden) and the other called the United Flemish-Frisian-Waterlander and High German congregation, later usually called Flemish and Waterlander church, or simply United congregation. This united church, whose membership numbered 216 in 1695 (this number must be a mistake; it must have been lower), joined the Conference of Mennonite congregations in Friesland. Paulus Tiesma and Tiepke Abbema, both members of it, were members of the first board of the conference. From now the information is more frequent and clearer. In 1711 the United congregation, which held its meetings in the old church on the Tweede Noord, requested permission to rebuild the meetinghouse, but the States of Friesland refused. Preachers of this congregation were Melle Takema 1721-ca. 50, and Ate Sierds of Poppingewier (d. Aug. 20, 1770) 1720-65. In 1760 the meetinghouse was enlarged and on July 22, 1762, the Jan-Jacobsgezinden merged with this congregation. Shortly before, on July 1, 1766, the congregation of near-by Tjummarum had also united with it. Until this time the congregations had been served by untrained ministers. In 1765 Franeker wished to call an educated minister, for whom the church board obtained a yearly subsidy from the Lamist congregation at Amsterdam, and on July 29, 1765, Jan Lippens, a ministerial candidate who had finished his study at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary, preached his induction sermon at Franeker. He stayed here only one year, receiving a call to the Amsterdam congregation in December 1766. Wopko Molenaar, his successor, served here 1767-70, then moved to Crefeld. Pieter Stinstra (b. 1743 at Franeker), nephew of Joannes Stinstra) (q.v.), minister of Harlingen, served his native church 1770-1800. Whether Wepke Tyssen Feenstra (d. 1779), who in the Naamlijst of 1775 is listed as having been a preacher at Franeker since 1773, but who is not mentioned in the following Naamlijsten, served this church as a minister or not, cannot be determined. Stinstra was followed by Bern. Cremer 1801-11, Klaas J. Overbeek 1812-47, Matthys E. van Delden 1848-72, H. Boetje 1873-79, C. J. Bakker 1879-99, M. Honigh 1900-32, G. J. W. den Herder 1933-39, C. C. de Maar 1940-46, A. J. de Kam 1947-50, and G. Kater since 1951.

On May 29, 1863, a new church on the Voorstraat was dedicated; the old characteristic meetinghouse, which is now used by the Baptists, was then sold. The Voorstraat church of 1863 is still in use; the organ was renovated in 1899.

In 1899 Miss Sytske Stinstra, a member of the congregation, bequeathed her stately house to the church (now parsonage) and willed in addition a considerable amount of money, which is managed by the church board as the Stinstra Fund.

During the last quarter of the 19th and the first part of the 20th centuries (preachers Boetje, Bakker, and Honigh) the congregation turned to a rather radical modernism (theological liberalism). Even the Lord's Supper was not observed here from 1915 to 1934.

The membership, which is said to have been 212 in 1695, was about 90 in 1796, 49 in 1812, 95 in 1838, 114 in 1861, 128 in 1900, and 140 in 1953, of whom 90 live in the city of Franeker and 50 in neighboring towns and on farms in the neighborhood. Church activities are a Sunday school for children, youth group called "Hendrik Naeldeman," ladies' circle, choir.

The city of Franeker was the seat of a university from 1585 to 1842. At first there was no contact between the Mennonites and the university, the Mennonites having lay preachers (untrained ministers) and being averse to scholarly theology, and the professors of the university, who were all Calvinists, regarding the Mennonites more or less as heretics, like Prof. Henricus Antonides (q.v.), who in 1585 orated against the Mennonites and their "false doctrines." But in the 18th century many Mennonites studied at the Franeker University, especially medicine. From about 1730, 25 young men attended the theological lectures of this university before finishing their study at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, among whom were a number of outstanding Mennonite ministers, such as Klaas de Vries, Heere Oosterbaan, Hoito Tichelaar, Pieter Stinstra, Pieter Feenstra, and Jan ter Borg. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 477, 479, 557, 558-III; II, Nos. 1721-35; DB 1864, 163; 1879, 2, 89; 1893, 1-90 (passim); 1900, 225; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 67, 88, 91, 104, 133, 157, 169, 188, 191, 220, 224, 246, 247, 254; Kühler, Geschiedenis I and II, passim; M. E. van Delden, Leerrede, uitgesproken bij gelegenheid der laatste godsdienstoefening in het oude kerkgebouw (Franeker, n.d., 1863); ML I, 674 f.

Franekeraars (or Franekers), the name of a group of Dutch Mennonites who about 1556 followed Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.) of Franeker, also called Scheedemakers (q.v.). They were a progressive group among the Dutch Mennonites and soon merged with the Waterlanders (q.v.). (BRN VII, 55; DB 1876, 21.) vdZ.

Franke, Ottilie, an Anabaptist martyr who was drowned with nine others in the Unstrut near Mühlhausen in Thüringia, Germany, Nov. 8, 1537. Neff.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913) 162; ML I, 675.

Franke, Peter, an Anabaptist leader and preacher in Flanders and England, burned at the stake with his wife and Jan Mathijsz van Middelburg in Smithfield (London) on Nov. 29, 1538. He is probably identical with Pieter de Bontwerkere (Peter the Furrier), who led Pauwels Vermaete (q.v.), a Flemish preacher and martyr, to the Anabaptist faith.

Franke is included with the English Reformers in a Catholic satirical poem, "A Genealogye of Heresye," written by John Huntington about 1540:

> Next after him (i.e., John Lambert)
> Came in a limb
> Of Antichrist
> An Anabaptist
> One Peter Franke
> Which said full rank
> That Christ and God
> Take not manhood
> Of Mary the Virgin
> Which was without sin.

John Bale in A Mysterye of Inyquyte (1542), which is a refutation of Huntington's verses, declares that Franke's life was pious, for his death was "godly and perfect." His "patient suffering" was instrumental in converting some at Colchester from "papism into true repentance, whereas nothing before could convert them." "For in his death confessed he the Lord Jesus Christ to be his only saviour and redeemer, which is the true seal of the servant of God." Although the Melchiorite view of the Incarnation was prevalent among Anabaptists in England, Bale claims Franke "died in no such wicked opinion as many have credibly reported" (fols. 53^{r}—57^{r}). I.B.H.

Chronicon ab anno 1189 ad 1556 in the Monumenta Franciscanae, The Rolls Series (1858) 202; John Bale, A Mysterye of Inyquyte (1542) fols. 53 recto—57 recto. Verheyden, Brugge, 45; Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic of the Reign of Henry VIII, Vol. XIII/2, p. 374.

Franken (Francken, Vranken), a Mennonite family, originally from Burgsteinfurt, Germany. (1) Everwijn Franken migrated about 1620 from Burgsteinfurt to Enschede, Dutch province of Overijssel. (2) Jan Franken, b. at Burgsteinfurt 1659, d. Enschede in 1764 at the age of nearly 105 years. He was precentor (chorister) of the Enschede congregation, and in 1684 married Hendrikje Willink. They had no children. (3) Everwijn Francken, grandson of (1) Everwijn, dates of birth and death unknown, was married to Anneken van Lochem of Enschede. He was a Mennonite preacher at Zutphen about 1690 until his death (DB 1881, 46 ff.). (4) Isaäk Franken, son of the foregoing (3) Everwijn, b. about 1680 at Zutphen, d. 1738 at Utrecht, was trained 1699-1705 by Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) of Amsterdam and served the congregation of Cleve 1707-13 and Utrecht 1713-38. While at Cleve he was active on behalf of a number of Swiss Brethren who were being transported to America in 1710, and who were released in Nijmegen, Holland, and traveled to the Palatinate via Cleve (Huizinga, 26; Müller, 272 f.). (5) Jan Franken, youngest son of (3) Everwijn, years of birth and death unknown and of whom it is not clear whether he was trained by his father (see Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2396 ff.), or studied at the Remonstrant Seminary at Amsterdam, succeeded his father as a preacher in Zutphen, where he served (year of beginning unknown) until 1731. In this year he was suspended because of misconduct. By the intercession of the church board of Amsterdam he was again admitted to the pulpit but suspended anew in 1734. In 1735 he received a call to the small congregation of Nieuwvliet in Cadzandt (q.v.), where he served until 1753. (DB 1881, 48; 1889, 114-15; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2400-10; 1662-74.) (6) Jan Franken, b. Oct. 23, 1726, at Leiden, d. there (year unknown). He was a son of Matthijs Franken, a beer brewer, who served the Mennonite congregation between 1684 and 1722, eight periods as a deacon; his sons Matthijs and Pieter were also deacons. Jan Franken studied at the University of Leiden and 1748-51 at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Then he served as minister at Zwolle (1751-56) and Harlingen (1756-63). Evidently he was a man of troublesome character, quick-tempered, and resentful. Disharmony arose on an unimportant matter between him on one side and the church board of Harlingen and his copreacher Johannes Stinstra (q.v.) on the other; he moved to Leiden and devoted himself to his father's brewery. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2460 f.; DB 1868, 70, 77.) vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890); Müller, Berner Täufer; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd II (Amsterdam, 1861); L. G. le Poole, Bijdr. tot . . . het kerk. Leven van de Doopsgez. te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) see Index.

Frankenthal Disputation. This disputation held in Frankenthal, Palatinate, Germany, in 1571 is the most important of the disputations of the 16th century arranged by representatives of the state churches with South German Anabaptists. In the range of subjects discussed and the duration of the dispute it exceeds all others. The published report records all the details.

The initial instigation came from the Palatine elector Frederick III (q.v.). He was the first German prince to embrace Calvinism and he tried to lead his people into the same fold. In general the change from the Lutheran and Catholic creeds to the Reformed was accomplished in a short time under government pressure. On the other hand, all attempts to win the numerous Anabaptists scattered over the land met with failure, on account of Anabaptist insistence on founding their faith solely on the Bible and rejection of government regulation of matters of faith. Economic pressure was equally unavailing, for they preferred prison and exile to disloyalty to their faith.

To Frederick III it was a matter of importance to win the pious Anabaptists to his creed, that they might have a reviving influence on the state church. When severity failed to bring about the desired union, he tried to achieve it by peaceful negotiation. Like his predecessor Otto Heinrich, who had the leading Lutheran theologians of South Germany debate with the Anabaptists at Pfeddersheim in 1557, Frederick decided to have the questions at issue publicly debated, assuming that the Anabaptist preachers would accept the proofs offered by his theologians. He therefore arranged for the public disputation on May 28, 1571, in Frankenthal, at which all Anabaptist preachers would be permitted to express themselves freely. He promised them safe conduct 14 days before and after the dispute, and free board and lodging for its duration. Foreigners were invited and prisoners could take part on condition that they refrained from preaching and baptizing.

In spite of the assurance that no risk of life and liberty was involved, very few came to take part, for they knew that any Anabaptist who openly stated his faith would be subject to new oppression at the expiration of the stated period. This fear was justified, for the elector, who on April 10 issued the proclamation for the debate, signed the death sentence of Sylvan in Heidelberg for religious nonconformity. Participants from other countries where the Anabaptists were not tolerated would by attending the debate draw the attention of the authorities, thus running a grave risk.

From the Anabaptist congregations 15 participants arrived, including preachers from Moravia and the South German imperial cities. Most of them were Swiss; two of them, Peter Walpot and Leonhard Summer, were Hutterian delegates. Dutch Mennonites were also reputedly present, but they did not announce themselves as such. The Hutterian Brethren took little part in the discussions. The Palatine representatives were also very reserved. The chief speaker was Diebold Winter from the imperial city of Weissenburg in Alsace, who had attended the Pfeddersheim disputation and after the opening at Frankenthal made a speech in the name of his brethren, expressing thanks for the privilege of talking from the Word of God with the theologians of the Palatinate; they were willing to change their views if convinced of error; they were concerned only with the glory of God and their salvation. In addition Hans Büchel (q.v.) of Mur, a noted writer of hymns, took an active part in the discussions. Rauff Bisch (q.v.) was chosen to represent the Palatine preachers. Others present from the Palatinate were Claus Simmerer of Siebeldingen near Landau, Hans Rannich of Dossenheim near Heidelberg, Hans Greiker of Heppenheim auf der Wiese near Worms, Peter Hutt of Kleinbockenheim near Frankenthal, and Anstadt Habermann of Heinsheim. In addition there were Jost Meyer of Rauensperg, Felix Frederer of Hofheim, Hans Sattler of Andernach, Philipp Jösslin of Heilbronn, and Peter Walter of Schlettstadt.

Rannich and Simmerer were brought from prison to Frankenthal. They were cross-examined repeatedly beforehand in order to use their statements at the public discussion, where somewhat different interpretations might be given by their brethren. They were, for instance, questioned on their conception of the nature of the human body after the resurrection, which question was also presented by the theologians at the public debate. The Anabaptist preachers were not learned, but they knew the Bible well. They were therefore convinced of the Scripturalness of their doctrine and were not confused by the clever sophistical arguments of their eloquent opponents. Rauff Bisch expressed his surprise to Dathenus, the chaplain, at the captious questions.

For 19 days, from May 28 to June 19, 1571, the disputation continued. On every day except Sunday two sessions were held, which began at six in the morning and two in the afternoon. The elector attended the opening session and kept himself informed on the progress of the discussions.

The following 13 points were presented to the Anabaptists:

(1) Concerning the Holy Scriptures. Whether the Old Testament is as valid to the Christian as the New; i.e., whether the principal doctrines of faith and life can and must be proved from the Old Testament as well as the New.

(2) Concerning God. Whether the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are a single divine Being, yet in three distinct Persons.

(3) Concerning Christ. Whether Christ received the nature of His flesh from the substance of the flesh of the Virgin Mary or elsewhere.

(4) Concerning original sin. Whether children are conceived and born in sin and are therefore by nature the children of wrath, worthy of eternal death.

(5) Concerning the churches. Whether believers in the Old Testament are with the believers in the New Testament a single church and people of God.

(6) Concerning justification. Whether the perfect obedience of Christ accepted in true faith is the one and only sufficient atonement for our sins and the reason for our eternal salvation, or whether we are saved partly through faith in Christ and partly through bearing the cross and good works.

(7) Concerning the resurrection of the body. Whether the essence of this body will rise on the last day, or whether another will be created by God.

(8) Concerning marriage. Whether the ban and unbelief dissolve a marriage.

(9) Concerning community of goods. Whether Christians may buy and own property without transgressing against Christian love.

(10) Concerning government. Whether a Christian may be a ruler and punish the wicked with the sword.

(11) Concerning the oath. Whether Christians may render a proper oath in the name of God, i.e., to call on God as a witness to the truth.

(12) Concerning baptism. Whether the children of Christians should be baptized.

(13) Concerning communion. Whether the communion is merely an empty symbol and an admonition to patience and love, or also a powerful seal of the blessed fellowship which all believers have with Christ unto eternal life.

The answers of the Anabaptist preachers to these questions are briefly stated in the article Disputations. For the most part they were the same doctrinal points which Martin Bucer (q.v.) discussed with the Hessian Anabaptists. But in addition questions were asked which cannot be unambiguously answered from the Scriptures; Rauff Bisch finally remarked, "It almost seems to us that you are asking questions that are over our heads; for we know nothing else to say about them than what the texts simply say." What these men, versed in the Bible, could not grasp they did not try to fathom; they did not deviate from this principle. They therefore withheld their opinion when Dathenus expounded his views on the most mysterious matters.

Although there was agreement on a number of questions, nevertheless the captious argumentation of the chaplain on unfathomable matters roused the objection of the simple Biblicist Anabaptists. Thus Frederick III failed in 37 discussions to secure what Philip of Hesse had obtained 33 years earlier in two days through Bucer's attitude of moderation. "We do not want," said Rauff Bisch in his concluding speech, "to burden our consciences with several articles which we cannot believe with a good conscience, but only as we hope to answer to God, and as we do not know any better way, to remain on this position."

In a report that the chairman read aloud at the end of the disputation, the elector's disappointment was expressed in the failure of his "gracious and paternal benevolent intentions." But he still did not give up the hope that the Anabaptists might be won to the church, and promised, if they did so, that he would protect and help them, and restore anything that had been taken from them.

But even these promises could not change them. Only one of their leaders, presumably one of the prisoners, showed an inclination to agree with the State Church, except on the question of baptism. It is not stated whether he did so. The others were not moved from their opinion and finally said that even if they agreed in doctrine, the wicked living of those who called themselves orthodox would not agree with theirs.

The elector then forbade the Anabaptists to teach in his realm, "in order not to confuse our subjects." The preachers were regarded as insurrectionists and violators of electoral commands, and after another attempt to convert them, were banished.

The protocol was published three months after the disputation closed in a 710-page book, and reprinted in 1573, both times at Heidelberg. In 1571 a Dutch translation was also published, arranged by Caspar Heidanus, the Reformed preacher at Frankenthal. The Palatine clergy used the book as a basis for attempts at conversion. Copies of all three editions are in the Goshen College Library. Hege.

Protocoll, Das ist Alle handlung des gesprechs zu Franckenthal inn der Churfürstlichen Pfaltz, mit denen so man Widertäuffer nennet (Heidelberg, 1571); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Monatschrift des Frankentaler Altertums-Vereins, May 1903, 18; "Religions-Gespräch zu Frankental mit den Wiedertäufern 1571," in Thesaurus Picturarum der Grossherzoglichen Hofbibliothek in Darmstadt, 96-102 (describes the disputation. The elector at first presided in person. Names of other chairmen follow, with the names of the Reformed and Anabaptist debaters. The 13 articles are stated, and the threatened severe measures); Ztscht für die Gesch. des Ober-Rheins LXIX, n.F. 29, 1914; Menn. Bl., 1882, 75; A. W. Bronsfeld, Gespreek met de Doopsgezinden te Frankendal 1571 (Harderwijk, 1871); ML I, 675-77.

Frankfort, Hutterite Bruderhof of the Dariusleut group (1904-18), now abandoned, located on the James River, nine miles south of the town of Frankfort, S.D., a daughter of the original Wolf Creek colony. The site was purchased by members of the Wolf Creek Bruderhof in 1904. By 1918 the settlement consisted of 20 families. The participation of the United States in World War I created some difficulties for them with respect to their nonresistant position, and they decided to migrate to Canada, where their young men would be excused from military service. On May 20, 1918, they purchased 4,000 acres 18 miles southeast of Macleod, Alberta, and established the Stand-Off Colony. Other Hutterites in South Dakota followed their example and acquired land near Stand-Off, so that by 1923 nine Bruderhofs were established in a radius of 40 miles. Thus the Frankfort colony led the emigration and was the pioneer Hutterite colony in Canada. The Frankfort colony initiated the publication of the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914), a collection of hymns hitherto found only in manuscript form, copied from originals now preserved in various archives of Austria and Hungary. In this Bruderhof was also found the original manuscript of the great Hutterite Geschicht-Buch, which was generally believed to have been lost, and which was then used by Prof. Wolkan (q.v.) in editing the Geschicht-Buch (published in the Stand-Off Colony in 1923), and which was published in a letter-perfect edition by Prof. Zieglschmid in 1943. Elias Walter (q.v.) was the elder of the Wolf Creek-Frankfort-Stand-Off Bruderhof from 1903 to 1928, and the outstanding leader of the entire Hutterite brotherhood in North America. (ML I, 677 f.) E.Wa.

Frankfurt Land Company, a German land company composed of Lutheran Pietists who hoped to locate in Pennsylvania, whose agent, Francis Daniel Pastorius, arrived in Philadelphia Aug. 20, 1683, and who was helpful to the Crefeld party which arrived at Philadelphia on Oct. 6 of that year. On Oct. 25 the 13 family heads of the Crefeld group met in the dugout home of Pastorius and drew lots for their respective parcels of land. Practically none of the Frankfurt Land Company ever settled in Pennsylvania. The Company is remembered principally because of the good services of Pastorius, their agent, in behalf of the Crefelders, some of whom became the charter members of the first permanent Mennonite settlement and congregation in America. J.C.W.

Frankfurt am Main, a city (1950 pop. 523,923) in the Prussian province of Hessen-Nassau, Germany, until 1866 a free city, one of the few cities of South Germany in which the Anabaptist movement did not take root, though it seems to have found brief entry in the person of Dr. Westerburg, who was influential in bringing the Reformation into the city, and who at that time was in sympathy with the Anabaptist movement, later being for a short time a member. Shortly before his arrival in Frankfurt in early October 1524, he sought to make contacts with the "Brethren" in Zürich, who three months later, Jan. 25, 1525, performed the first adult baptism. The Swiss Brethren, however, grew distrustful when they learned that he was maintaining connections with the revolutionary masses, and thus their ways parted (Rembert, 39).

The Protestant movement in Frankfurt, having lost the support of the defeated imperial knights, was threatened with collapse. Westerburg saved the cause, and helped to give it permanence in the city (Steitz, 95). But because the council considered him the leader of the revolt in Frankfurt he was banished May 17, 1525.

The position of the Lutheran preachers was now so secure that the council was entirely on their side and suppressed any religious groups they did not like. Especially the Anabaptists felt their power. Available facts on the subject are few. A day laborer who had preached Anabaptist doctrine in Bornheim was expelled (Dechent, 125). There is evidence that the Anabaptist movement had reached some proportions, for at the instigation of the preachers Bernhard Algesheimer (Johann von Hohenstein) and Dionysius Melander the council issued an edict on March 23, 1528, forbidding the citizens to lodge

Anabaptists (Jung, 116). This measure effectively suppressed the movement here; the law passed by the Diet of Speyer on April 23, 1529 (see Punishment), actively supported the measures of the council.

This imperial law which imposed the death penalty on rebaptism also occupied the Reichstag at Frankfurt in 1531. The ruthlessness which resulted from this law shocked the citizenry; hence Brandenburg and Nürnberg on June 6, 1531, proposed changes in the law. But the majority favored the retention of the law as it was (Winkelmann II, 49 f.). The estates hoped to subdue the general excitement by admitting in a decree in 1531 that the edict of Speyer had been passed "somewhat too quickly," and by giving the deed another name, explaining that "such persons are punished not for their faith, but for their offense." Milder punishments should be applied only in exceptional cases, when the interpretation of the regulations was not clear. In such cases the council could request the opinion of learned theologians and other honorable persons and perhaps render a more lenient verdict (Neudecker, 188). The law itself was not altered. It was still in force at the opening of the Thirty Years' War (q.v.).

In 1704, when Mennonites expelled from Switzerland wanted to settle in Frankfurt, they were refused after giving a statement of their faith. At Frankfurt the plan for the settling of Germantown (q.v.) was originated, which was carried out by Crefeld Mennonites. (See Frankfurt Land Company.)

The census reports state that in 1858 there were two Mennonites in Frankfurt; in 1880, eight; in 1885, twenty-nine; in 1890, seventeen; in 1895, twenty-four; in 1900, twenty-three; in 1905, thirty; and in 1925, twenty-five.

On May 16, 1897, the traveling preacher (Reiseprediger) G. van der Smissen conducted the first services of the Mennonite congregation in the city. Since 1913 the ministers of the South German Conference have been serving here. Services are now (1956) held every two weeks in the MCC center, Eysseneckstrasse 54. In 1952 the number of baptized members was 125. The congregation was organized in 1948, and though it is independent of conference affiliation, Richard Wagner, an elder in the Badischer Verband (q.v.), serves as elder and pastor.

Frankfurt has been the seat of the MCC administrative headquarters since 1950, and since 1952 for all Europe. HEGE.

H. Dechent, Kirchengesch. von Frankfurt a.M. seit der Ref. (Leipzig and Frankfurt, 1913); R. Jung, Frankfurter Chroniken und annalistische Aufzeichnungen der Ref.-Zeit (Frankfurt, 1888); C. G. Neudecker, Urkunden aus der Ref.-Zeit (Kassel, 1836); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; G. E. Steitz, "Dr. Gerhard Westerburg," in Arch. für Frankfurts Gesch. und Kunst, n.S., 1872; Otto Winkelmann, Politische Korrespondenz der Stadt Strassburg im Zeitalter der Reformation (1887); ML I, 678.

Frankfurt Parliament, the German constitutional assembly which met at Frankfurt a.M., Germany, on May 18, 1848, to May 30, 1849, is of interest to Mennonites because two Mennonites, Isaak Brons (q.v.) of Emden and Hermann von Beckerath (q.v.) of Crefeld, were elected members of the parliament. Brons took no part in the public debates, although he served on two committees (Navy and Economics), but von Beckerath, an able and experienced statesman, took a leading part in the debates and on Aug. 4, 1848, accepted the cabinet post of Minister of Finance. Von Beckerath was a firm monarchist and a strongly patriotic Prussian.

Of particular interest is von Beckerath's strange opposition to the proposal for exemption of conscientious objectors from military service, which he as a Mennonite might well have made himself, but which was actually introduced by a non-Mennonite though intended specifically to serve the Mennonites as the only religious conscientious objector group in Germany. The following extract from this address on this subject not only indicates clearly that von Beckerath had surrendered the historic Mennonite nonresistant position, but that he was fully committed to the typical Prussian military point of view. "I do not deny that the proposals issue from a well-intentioned human point of view; but, Gentlemen, they are based on political concepts which no longer exist. It must be remembered that since no universal military duty existed in Prussia at the time when the Mennonites received the right to withdraw from military service and as a compensation had to accept certain restrictions on their citizenship rights, the Mennonite privilege did not constitute an infraction of the right of other citizens. But when in 1808 in Prussia every able-bodied man was obligated to military service the Mennonite exemption constituted an abnormality, and now that a free state is to be established whose strength rests upon the equality of its citizens in rights and duties, such a special privilege becomes utterly untenable. As the previous speaker, Mr. Martens, has stated, the Mennonites in Rhenish Prussia with few exceptions render military service without question, and refusal of military service is in no sense considered as an integral part of Mennonite doctrine. It is certain that in other parts of Germany the heightened appreciation of the state will result in the performance there [by Mennonites] of this first duty of the citizen. But even if here and there this should not be the case, and individual conscientious objectors might arise, this would be a condition which it would be impossible to take into account in the establishment of the basic constitutional provisions. . . . I declare that it is contrary to the welfare of the Fatherland to provide for any exception in the fulfillment of citizenship duties, no matter on what ground."

This did not settle the question of Mennonite exemption from military service. On Sept. 14, 1848, the West Prussian Mennonite congregations submitted a petition to the Parliament on which they protested against the views expressed by von Beckerath, without, however, achieving any positive results for their position in the final formulation of the constitutional provisions. However, the Mennonite privileges were maintained in Prussia even after the adoption of the new constitution. It was not until the federal law of Nov. 9, 1867, was passed that the exemption was lost. Even then the Order-in-Cabinet (Kabinettsordre) of March 3, 1868, granted the Mennonites the privilege of noncombatant service.

It is interesting to note that the historian C. A. Cornelius, who was also a member of the Frankfurt Parliament, decided during the sessions to write his Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs.

R. Sch., H.S.B.

Franz Wigard, Stenographische Berichte der Verhandlungen der deutschen konstituierenden Nationalversammlung (Frankfurt a.M., 1848, 1849); Richard Schwemer, Geschichte der Freien Stadt Frankfurt a.M. III, 1 (Frankfurt, 1915); Heinrich Laube, Das erste deutsche Parlament, rev. ed. (Leipzig, 1910); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Berlin, 1863); ML I, 678-84.

Franklin Center, Iowa, now known as Franklin, is a village in Lee County, southeastern Iowa, near which the first Mennonite settlers in Iowa lived. The first Mennonite congregation in Iowa (now extinct) was located east of the present village; its church was dedicated in 1850. In 1868 it was replaced by a church built in the village by the Mennonite immigrants from Bavaria and the Palatinate who lived near by. M.G.

Franklin County, Ohio, organized in 1803, was the home of two Mennonite (MC) congregations during the middle and later years of the 19th century, the Jacob Bowman Church (q.v.) near Canal Winchester and the Stemen Church (q.v.) near Pickerington on the border between Fairfield and Franklin counties. The burial ground of both congregations was near Canal Winchester. The founders had moved from near-by Fairfield and Perry counties to improve their economic status after the opening of the canal from Portsmouth to Cleveland. John M. Brenneman, a miller, moved near Canal Winchester from Fairfield in 1848 and was ordained bishop here in 1849 but moved again to Allen County in 1855. The stress of the Civil War period further reduced the membership. In the later years poorly qualified leadership, protracted retention of the German worship service, and the lure of the more spirited religious activities in the U.B. and M.E. churches drew the Mennonite young people away from the simple faith and worship of their fathers. Some became prosperous farmers and businessmen. In a final effort to perpetuate the Mennonite faith Benoni Stemen, a wealthy Mennonite farmer and stock raiser, built for himself and the families of his four sons and three daughters a Mennonite meetinghouse near Pickerington, but could not stem the decline. When the church building fell into disuse after his death, the benches were moved to the Turkey Run Church in Perry County south of Bremen. J.S.U.

Franklin County, Pa., is located near the center of Pennsylvania's southern border. Its shape is roughly triangular with its base resting on the famous Mason and Dixon's line. The Mennonites (M.C. and Reformed Mennonites) have never been grouped in a close colony, but are scattered among the Scotch-Irish throughout much of the area. The membership of the Reformed Mennonites is small; in 1954 the M.C. group had 821 members organized into 8 congregations. They are members of the Washington Co., Md.-Franklin Co., Pa., Mennonite Conference. The Reformed branch has one bishop, one minister, and one deacon.

According to an article on the Mennonites by John B. Kauffman in a history of Franklin County published in 1887 a few Mennonites found their way to the county as early as 1735. The largest influx occurred in 1790-1800. The first church was erected in 1810. The congregations were never large, and in 1878 one bishop and five ministers served five small congregations. (ML I, 681.) J.I.L.

Franklin Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, was built in the village of Franklin Center, Iowa, by Mennonites from Lee Co., Iowa, in 1868. They had previously worshiped in the near-by Zion and West Point churches. The members were German immigrants and the congregation early became a member of the General Conference. John S. Hirschler served as elder 1872-84. Services were discontinued perhaps in the late eighties, after most of the members had moved to Kansas and other places. M.G.

Franklin (Neb.) United Missionary Church had 27 members in 1949 with Kenneth Baker serving as pastor. M.G.

Frans van Bolsweert (Bolsward), an Anabaptist martyr: see Frans Dammasz.

Frans Claesz, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Hallum, Dutch province of Friesland, was beheaded at the Frisian capital Leeuwarden on Feb. 8, 1539, with four others, because he had been rebaptized, and had "a bad opinion of the Holy Sacrament and the constitution of the Holy (Roman Catholic) Church." (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; DB 1910, 123 f.; ML I, 359.) vdZ.

Frans de Cuyper (Frans Kuiper, Frans Reines) was an elder of the Dutch Anabaptists, ordained by Menno Simons in 1542; but in 1554 he recanted and returned to the Roman Catholic Church. He had preached and taught especially in the Dutch province of Friesland. vdZ.

BRN VII, 3, 50 f., 86; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 91 ff. et passim.

Frans Dammasz (Frans van Bolsward, or Francis of Bolsweert), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake, March 28, 1545, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, having been seized because of his refusal to give an oath. In prison he wrote the song, "Wel hem die in Gods vreeze staat" (Blessed the man, who is God-fearing), which is included in the Dutch hymnbook Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569 and many other Dutch songbooks, and Wackernagel, Lieder, 97. This song, translated into German, "Wol dem der in Gottes Forchten steht," is also found in the old Anabaptist German hymnbook, Ein schön Gesängbüchlein Geistlicher Lieder (q.v.). At his execution his flesh had miraculously refused to burn, according to the song, "Verhuecht u Gods kinder alletijt," in Het Offer des Heeren.

K.V., vdZ.

Offer, 505-9; Mart. Mir. D 71, E 472; Wolkan, Lieder, 60, 79, 98; ML I, 244.

Frans Dirksz Quintijn (Frans of Wormer), a revolutionary Anabaptist, who at a meeting at Wormer in the Dutch province of North Holland had unfolded the plan to take the city of Alkmaar (q.v.) by force of arms; but when he arrived at Alkmaar to prepare the attack, he was taken prisoner on Jan. 24, 1535, together with his wife Brechte Adams and four others. On Feb. 1 he was burned at the stake. In the sentence no mention is made of the planned attack. Frans was sentenced to death because he had been rebaptized and had also rebaptized others. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 159; DB 1909, 17-20.) vdZ.

Frans (Franchoys) van Elstland(t) (Frans van Meenen), an Anabaptist martyr of Belgium, a mason, was baptized on the confession of his faith, was seized Oct. 9, 1561, and burned at the stake on Oct. 21 of that year at "Arien in Walschvlaenderen" (van Braght), thought to be Aire, Belgium. (Mart. Mir. D 286, E 654; ML I, 563.) Neff, vdZ.

Frans Frederycxzoon in de Trompe, a native of Arnhem, Dutch province of Gelderland, living in Amsterdam, who by order of Hendrik Goedbeleid (q.v.) slyly obtained possession of the key of the Amsterdam town hall and so partook in the Anabaptist assault at Amsterdam May 10-11, 1535. Being arrested after the attack had miscarried, he was tried several times and after torture sentenced to death on June 1 and beheaded.

His revelations are very valuable in reconstructing the views and intentions of the revolutionary Anabaptists. That Frans had been rebaptized himself is not evident from the records. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 76-83; Mellink, Wederdopers, 131, 137-39, 145.) vdZ.

Frans Jansz, a sheriff of the North Holland town of Alkmaar from about 1528, was a Sacramentist (q.v.). By trade he was a glazier. In 1533 he is found among the Anabaptists, attending Anabaptist meetings at Limmen, near Alkmaar, where Geeryt mitten baerde and Aeffgen Lystyncx (q.v.) preached; he also held meetings in his own house at Alkmaar, where the question was discussed, whether they should go to Münster (q.v.) (DB 1909, 7, 11, 12, 14).

At the same time, there was another Anabaptist Frans Jansz living at Alkmaar, who was a ship's carpenter, and who must be distinguished from the above. This Frans Jansz the carpenter, who had previously lived at Krommeniedijk, took part in the journey to Münster in March 1534, was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.), brought to Haarlem, renounced his faith, and was set free on Sept. 18, 1534, upon payment of a fine (DB 1909, 14-15).

He may have been identical with Frans Jansz the locksmith, born at Alkmaar, who was a follower of the Anabaptist revolutionary leader Jan van Batenburg. If this is the case, he must have changed his trade after his imprisonment at Haarlem and rejoined the Anabaptists of the Batenburg group. Frans Jansz the locksmith was arrested at Utrecht in 1541. He had been rebaptized about 1534 and was charged with having broken into the prison of Leiden and liberating some Anabaptist prisoners, and also robbing some Catholic churches. He was sentenced to death together with his wife Aeff Peters (q.v.) and hanged at Utrecht on April 2, 1541 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 283; DB 1909, 21-22, 25).

Another person of this name, Frans Jansz Mickers, also living at Alkmaar, who presumably was also a follower of Batenburg, was put to death at Alkmaar on April 16, 1540, together with his mother Stijntgen, Jan Mickers' widow, and his sister Geertje (or Guertje) Jansdochter (DB 1909, 21, 24). vdZ.

Frans (Franchoys) Jorissen, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on July 17, 1553. He was born at Geertsberge in Flanders and was a journeyman-bricklayer by trade. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 421, 423; XIV, 20-21, No. 224.) vdZ.

Frans (Francoys) van Leuvene, an Anabaptist martyr, b. at Gent, Belgium, a weaver, was put to death at Gent with three others, "not on account of any misdeed, but only because they, according to the command of the eternal God, had separated from this corrupt world, which lies in inhuman wickedness, and sought, according to their weak ability, to follow Christ in the regeneration." Frans had been baptized at Gent in 1569, and was executed on July 28, 1573, on the Vrijdagsmarkt, together with Jacob van der Wege, Hendrick Bauwens, and Calleken Meere. During the execution the sympathy of the spectators for the four victims, who were prevented by gags from speaking to them, was so great that incidents could not be prevented. (DB 1899, 67; Mart. Mir. D 647 f., E 968; Verheyden, Gent, 63, No. 225; ML II, 643.) Neff, vdZ.

Frans Pieters of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death by fire on May 11, 1534 (executed at Amsterdam ?). He had taken part in the journey to Münster in March 1534, and had been arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744, 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 142.) vdZ.

Frans Pietersz, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr of Groningen, a joiner, was beheaded at Delft, province of South Holland, with 10 others, because of having been rebaptized. He was likely a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 160-67.) vdZ.

Frans Reines Kuiper: see Frans de Cuyper.

Frans Reynertszoon of Birdaard, Dutch province of Friesland, an Anabaptist martyr, who was sentenced to death at Leeuwarden, Friesland, on April 10, 1535, because he had been (re)baptized. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 228.) vdZ.

Frans Snyder (Clothmaker), an Anabaptist martyr of Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, was beheaded there on Feb. 8, 1539, with 10 others. Particulars are lacking. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren Kerkherv. in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Frans (Francoys) de Swarte, an Anabaptist martyr of Belle (Bailleul), French Flanders, was burned at the stake at Hondschote, Flanders, Belgium, on March 23, 1562. He obviously belonged to the Anabaptist de Swarte (q.v.) family, many members of which were executed about the same time. (Mart. Mir. D 298, E 663.) vdZ.

Frans Swertveger (Sweerdtveger), a cloth shearer, whose official name was Frans Deens or Doos, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death in Antwerp on Aug. 27, 1555, with three brethren, Hans Borduerwercker, Jan Drooghscheerder, and Pieter with the lame foot, after a valiant confession of his faith. Their names are celebrated in the song, "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), which is found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1563) No. 16. Frans's property was confiscated. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 161, E 550; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 426, 428, 468; XIV, 20 f., No. 227; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Frans Tibau (Thybault), an Anabaptist martyr, originally from Ieper, Flanders, was beheaded at Antwerp, Belgium, on July 7, 1558. The secret execution took place during the night in the Steen prison. Frans had been baptized only one year before. His name is also found in a song, "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1563) No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 565; Mart. Mir. D 201, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 447, 464; XIV, 24-25, No. 258; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Frans Willemsz, one of the first Anabaptists in the Netherlands, who was executed at The Hague on Dec. 5, 1531, with 8 or 9 others, one of whom was Jan Volkertsz Trijpmaker (q.v.). All of them recanted and for this reason were not listed in the martyrbooks. K. Vos, who studied the sentence pronounced on these victims, did not find Frans Willemsz, who is, however, listed by Grosheide. The answer to this puzzle is that Frans Willemsz and Vranck Wimsz (Willemsz), both mentioned by Grosheide, are probably the same person. (DB 1917, 159; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 50, 302.) vdZ.

Frans van Wormer, an Anabaptist martyr: see Frans Dirksz Quintijn.

Fransken de Vroedvrouw (midwife), an Anabaptist martyr, whose official name was Franchyne van der Borcht. She was born at Lier, Belgium, and put to death because she had been (re)baptized, and refused to recant. She frankly confessed her faith and baptism and "did not respect her infant baptism." The execution took place secretly by drowning in a tub within the Steen castle at Antwerp, on March 19, 1559, together with Pleuntgen van der Goes and Naentken Leerverkoopster. Her name is found in a hymn, "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (Hymn 16, No. 43). vdZ.

BRN II, 566; Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 460, 472; XIV, 26-27, No. 282; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Fransoois (Fransoys) de Timmerman (in van Braght, Mart. Mir., called François), an Anabaptist martyr living at Meenen (Menin) in Flanders and arrested there with five others, who were all sentenced to death and executed by being burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, on April 30, 1569. Fransoois had been (re)baptized in 1562 or 1563. The other five were Jan Wattier, Pieter den Ouden (or Oudeghodt), Jan van Raes, Wouter Denijs, and Kalleken, the widow of the martyr Anpleunis vanden Berghe (q.v.). They all remained loyal to their faith. Their goods were confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 408, E 759; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 39, No. 24.) vdZ.

Frantz, Gabriel, a preacher of the Frisian (also called Waterlander) congregation of the Culmsche Niederung (or Schönsee), Poland, in 1725-50, wrote a number of letters to the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam, asking their financial help in obtaining from the Catholic bishop of Culm the permission to live in peace and freedom in his territory. In reply, the Dutch Mennonites repeatedly sent him money. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1088, 1597, 1600 f., 1604, 1641 f.; II, 2, No. 780.) vdZ.

Franz (Frantz, Franzen, Fransen, Franssen, Frantzon), a Mennonite family name in West Prussia, mainly appearing in Frisian congregations. The name was first mentioned 1578 at Montau, 1595 at Scharfenberg. The majority, those living in the Vistula Valley and their descendants, adopted the forms Franz and Frantz. Members of the family moved to Poland, Russia (Molotschna), and subsequently to America. Gysbert Franssen was an elder of the Danzig Flemish congregation 1588-1602. Heinrich Franz (q.v.) was a prominent teacher. In 1954 the name was represented by four Mennonite Brethren ministers in Kansas and five General Conference Mennonite ministers in Alberta, Ontario, Oregon, and Kansas. The Franz Farm Shop on the Bethel College campus was named in honor of Julius Franz. In Civilian Public Service, those named Franz or Frantz numbered 22. Rufus Franz served as a CPS camp director. L. J. Franz is president of Tabor College. G.R.

Franz, Heinrich, an outstanding teacher among the Mennonites of Russia, and with Tobias Voth and Heinrich Heese a cofounder of their school system. He was born Oct. 6, 1812, in West Prussia, died May 27, 1889, at Neu-Halbstadt, Taurida. For three years he attended the Vereinsschule headed by F. W. Lange (q.v.) at Rodlofferhufen, near Marienburg; in 1832 he passed the Prussian teachers' examinations, became a tutor in his home town, then a teacher at the Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) school. After his emigration to Russia in 1832 he was for a short time a private teacher at Felsental, and 1835-44 he taught in the Gnadenfeld village school. His abundant determination is attested by the fact that in order to learn the Russian language he served for two years as supervisor in the boarding-school of the Ekaterinoslav Gymnasium. As a teacher in the Chortitza Zentralschule 1846-58 his influence was felt throughout the settlements in his teaching, in his influence on their school system, in the statutes he worked out for the Chortitza Mennonite schools and the schools in general. His deficient knowledge of Russian made him less effective in this field than his predecessor Heinrich Heese; but in German and arithmetic (including elementary algebra and geometry) he did outstanding work. With his "150 tables" in arithmetic and their key Franz dominated the instruction in arithmetic for a half century, as he dominated religious music in the home, school, and church with his Choralbuch of 1860 with notes.

Franz's most lasting influence lay in the strength of his personality and his Draconian severity in school. These traits also brought him into conflict with influential persons and with the Chortitza authorities, and he was consequently obliged to resign in 1858. He, of course, had enthusiastic supporters, but also outspoken opponents among his pupils. He again turned to private instruction in Gnadenfeld and on the Rosenhof at Brodsky, owned by Jacob Dick. In 1880 he resigned, having devoted 50 years to teaching. He settled in Neu-Halbstadt, where he gave a few hours' instruction in religion in the secondary school for girls, and in 1888 he edited and published the poems of Bernhard Harder, the popular preacher of the Russian Mennonite brotherhood. His memory survives today, and he is spoken of simply as "der alte Franz." (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 584 ff.; ML I, 685 f.)
B.H.U.

Franz, Johann Friedrich, Reformed clergyman at Lichtenberg in the canton of St. Gall, Switzerland, in 1824 at Mogelsberg in the same canton, author of the book, Die schwärmerischen Greuelszenen der St. Galler Wiedertäufer zu Anfang der Reformation . . . aus den Original-Handschriften Joh. Kesslers (Ebnat, 1824). Franz was induced by libertinistic movements to produce this book, which follows Kessler closely, and which has been superseded by recent research. The material he presents apart from Kessler is inferior; as his sources he mentions Vadian, Zwingli, Ottius, etc. In support of his anti-Anabaptist prejudice he adds "Blicke auf das Leben einiger Widertäufer," and in conclusion he reprints the "Abschid der Stette Zürich, Bern und St. Gallen von wegen der Wiedergetauften," of Sept. 7, 1527. (ML I, 686.) NEFF.

Franz Weber, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist leader, who is said in 1550 to have baptized in Dremmen, district of Heinsberg in the duchy of Jülich.
vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 306; Otto R. Redlich: Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik (Publikationen der Gesellschaft für rheinische Geschichtskunde XXVIII), II, 1 (Bonn, 1911) 312 f.

Franzfeld (Varvarovka) was a village of the Yazekovo Mennonite settlement (q.v.) near Chortitza, Russia, established in 1869. In 1918 the village had a hundred farms and 5,500 acres of land. After the collectivization the village had 3,436 acres of land. In 1914 the population was 466 and in 1941, 630. Eleven persons were murdered in 1919 and 85 were exiled in 1929-41. During the German invasion 36 persons were evacuated eastward. When the Germans retreated the village population was taken along. Some were later repatriated by the Red army and others found their way to America. C.K.

K. Stumpp, Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza (Berlin, 1943).

Franztal in der Neumark, Germany, where there were Mennonites from 1765 to 1834 who formed the Brenkenhoffswalde-Franztal congregation (see Brenkenhoffswalde).

Fraser Valley, B.C., directly north of the Canadian border and almost parallel to it, since 1928 has attracted approximately 12,000 Mennonites from the Prairie provinces. From Rosedale to Vancouver, an important Pacific ocean port, a distance of 74 miles, the valley is up to six miles wide. The fertile soil, an abundant rainfall, and the mild climate, as well as the opportunity to settle in close-knit communities, have been the chief causes of the westward migration of the Mennonites, most of whom had come to Canada from Russia during the 1920's. The chief Mennonite population centers from east to west are Chilliwack, Sardis-Greendale, Yarrow, Abbotsford-Clearbrook, and the Greater Vancouver area. Scattered through the valley are 24 churches; 12 M.B., with 76 ministers and 4,129 baptized members; 10 G.C.M., with 31 ministers and 1,736 members, and one church each of the E.M.B. and C.G.C.

While an increasingly large number of Mennonites in the valley go into small business, most of them are engaged in dairying, poultry, or small fruit raising, particularly raspberries and strawberries. Yarrow, the oldest settlement, an unincorporated village of 2,000, has 27 Mennonite business establishments, such as berry processing plants (4), grocery stores (3), dry goods (3), box factory, sawmill. The Abbotsford-Clearbrook area on both sides of the trans-Canada highway is rapidly developing into a Mennonite shopping district. Mennonite co-operatives organized during the depression in Yarrow, Sardis, and Abbotsford provided much of the needed credit to the early settlers. Inexperienced management and better transportation facilities to near-by larger shopping centers have all but killed the co-operative movement. With the exception of a cold storage plant at Greendale, the remaining four co-operatives are berry processing plants. Jacob C. Krause of Yarrow, A. A. Rempel and Jacob Schroeder of Greendale, and John J. Rempel of Abbotsford, were among the outstanding early leaders in the co-operative movement. A postwar slump in the berry market, together with the devastating flood during the summer of 1948, which inundated the Greendale Mission settlements, produced a major economic crisis. Only one Mennonite, however, lost his life when the dikes of the Fraser River broke, covering the settlements with up to eight feet of water. Total bankruptcy of hundreds of Mennonite farmers was prevented by the generous and far-reaching assistance given by the Canadian government and the Red Cross.

The concentration of the Mennonite population in a relatively small area has been conducive to the development of parochial schools. General interest in education is shown by the fact that during 1953 a total of 828 young people from M.B. churches attended high schools, Bible schools, colleges, and universities. Interest in retaining the German language is attested by the attendance of 617 children from M.B. homes at German classes conducted on Saturdays. Two Mennonite high schools in 1953-54 had a total enrollment of 476 students, while the four Bible schools enrolled 137 students. The oldest and most successful of the high schools, the Mennonite Educational Institute at Abbotsford, was founded in 1944, and is supported by six M.B. (and one G.C.M.) churches. Under the leadership of I. J. Dyck as principal the enrollment has grown from 43 to 385 students. The Sharon Mennonite High School at Yarrow, founded in 1951, is supported by the parents of the local M.B. church and has an enrollment of 91 students. Because of economic difficulties and disunity among the four M.B. churches operating it, an earlier Mennonite high school, founded at Yarrow in 1945, had to close its doors four years later. The local public school authorities have acquired its elaborate school plant, which is now used as a junior high school. For similar reasons the Mennonite high school at Greendale, supported by General Conference churches, had to close in 1948, having operated only two years.

There are two old people's homes in the valley, one privately owned in Yarrow, and one operated by G.C.M. churches in Abbotsford. Although there are no Mennonite hospitals, for many years a Mennonite hospital insurance society has assisted its members in defraying their medical and hospital expenses. Thirteen Mennonite physicians and dentists, and numerous Mennonite graduate nurses, provide medical services.

Politically, Fraser Valley Mennonites became conscious of their combined voting power when in 1940 the Mennonite block of votes elected a Liberal member of Parliament for the first time in many years. Thirteen years later, in 1953, this same member of the federal house was defeated by the same Mennonites who in the intervening years had been affected by the socialistic theories of the C.C.F. (Canadian Commonwealth Federation) and the Social Credit Party, and elected socialistic representatives to both the provincial and the federal legislatures. In Vancouver a Mennonite (Regehr) was elected on the C.C.F. party ticket to the Federal House of Commons at Ottawa, although no generally recognized Mennonite political leader has as yet arisen.

The strongest bond, and practically the only one, uniting all branches of Mennonites in the Fraser Valley in a common program is the Provincial Mennonite Relief Committee of British Columbia, which under various names has functioned since 1928. It has become the official spokesman in matters of immigration of displaced persons, citizenship, settlement of landless families, care of mental patients and the indigent. Since 1945, more than $961,000 has passed through its treasury, and 3,000 persons have been assisted to migrate to Canada. A. A. Wiens of Yarrow has been secretary-treasurer of the committee since 1945.

The very tense feeling between Mennonites and other Fraser Valley residents, which reached its climax during World War II, and which was based on social and economic factors, has subsided. The press, local and provincial government officials, as well as the general public, have learned to appreciate Mennonite industry and integrity. I.G.N.

Frazer Mennonite Church (MC) of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference is an outgrowth of Diamond Rock in an early Amish settlement two miles north of Malvern, Chester Co., Pa. The Weaverland Missions Committee in 1908-9 revived this work, and in 1917-18 a frame church was built along the Lincoln Highway, west of Malvern. The 1955 membership, many of non-Mennonite extraction, was 115; Mahlon Witmer had the bishop oversight, Marcus Swanenberg, Milton G. Brackbill, and C. Ralph Malin were the ministers, and Irvin J. King the deacon. I.D.L.

Freckenhorst, near Warendorf, Westphalia, Germany, was a Stift (ecclesiastical territory) in which the Reformation was introduced by Agnes, Countess of Limburg-Styrum in 1527. Niesert publishes sources which indicate that the countess at least harbored strong Anabaptist leanings. She offered persecuted Anabaptists a refuge and protected them. Dirick Schomeker stated during this trial in 1546 (Niesert, 343 f.) that among her servants were the Fischer, Schluter, Koch families and others who were followers of David Joris and that Agnes would employ only members of this group.

During the church inspection program of the Counter Reformation there were still some Anabaptists found in Freckenhorst (1612). In a complaint of 1625 the Vicar General of Münster stated that there were still some Anabaptists living in the Stift of Freckenhorst. He named Jörgen Danielsz and Jobst Nickel and asked the government to have them removed (Niesert, 410). C.K.

Fr. Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953) 41-122; J. Niessert, Münsterische Urkundensammlung I (Coesfeld, 1826).

Frederick, the name of several princes of the house of Oldenburg, which reigned in Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein (now Germany). Those of interest here are the following:

Frederick I (b. 1471), the second son of Christian I of Denmark, in 1490 duke of half the duchies, in 1523 after the overthrow of his nephew Christian II sole duke and at the same time king of Denmark. Even though at his coronation he had to promise to preserve the old church, he soon issued an edict of tolerance (presumably in 1524), probably under the influence of his son Christian, who had attended the 1521 Diet of Worms, and in 1527 appointed Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) as chaplain in Kiel. But Hofmann's fantastic apocalyptic writings, his sermons, and his sharp attacks upon his opponents as well as the Wittenberg group caused grave offense; thereupon Frederick gave his consent to the great colloquium in Flensburg, April 8, 1529. Although Hofmann's ideas had not actually been refuted, he was expelled from the country; but he was permitted to choose the time most favorable to him, and was assured of the safety of his person and property. Frederick did not oppose the spread of the Reformation in his realm.

Frederick II, the grandson of Frederick I, king of Denmark 1559-88. Dutch emigrants, including Mennonites, Davidjorists, and Sacramentists, repeatedly came to Holstein, Schleswig, and Denmark. At the urging of the clergy the king took steps to prevent their growth; in 1558 against Johann Knijpmark and his companions in Krempe, and Sept. 20, 1569, by an edict of 25 articles which were to be signed by foreigners before they were given permission to settle to prevent perversion of doctrine and schism. In 1574 Frederick ordered the provost Johann Vorstius at Itzehoe to examine all the Dutch residents of the Wilstermarsch, as they were suspected of Davidjorism. A preacher Andreas had to surrender his books and promised to reform, and was therefore permitted to keep his property.

Frederick II, Duke of Gottorp 1586-87, son of Duke Adolf, grandson of Frederick I. The region of Eiderstedt (principal town Tönning), where many Dutch had settled and become prosperous, belonged to his realm. Among these were many Mennonites and Davidjorists. On Feb. 21, 1587, Frederick issued an order that the Dutch immigrants must present a statement of their religious views before being admitted, and that the clergy from the pulpits warn the people to "beware of false prophets," and enjoin upon them not to sell land to suspicious persons.

Frederick III, Duke of Gottorp 1616-59, continued the moderate toleration his father Johann Adolf had shown the Mennonites. Dutch immigrants founded the city of Friedrichstadt at the conjunction of the Treene and the Eider in 1621; Remonstrants were among the leaders of the undertaking, and it is owing to them that the Mennonites in the city were also granted complete religious liberty. Those living in other towns were permitted to come to Friedrichstadt to worship, but were to avoid private conventicles. He was less tolerant toward the Davidjorists in Eiderstedt. At the request of the Lutheran provost Johannes Moldenit at Tönning he ordered the search of homes for Davidjorist books in 1635. He supported Moldenit in the long-drawn-out trial against the Davidjorists. Though he was not as severe as their accusers wished, he nevertheless demanded that they sign a confession renouncing their heresies; a quantity of Davidjorist books were publicly burned, the defense of their doctrine and possession of Davidjorist books strictly forbidden. But all hostility toward those who had "purified" themselves by confession was also forbidden.

Frederick III, King of Denmark 1648-70, in 1664 elevated Altona to the rank of a city. He granted the Mennonites the privileges they had formerly enjoyed under the counts of Schauenburg, as his father had also done. R.H.

R. Hansen, "Der David-Joristen-Prozess in Tönning 1642," in Schriften des Vereins für schleswig-holsteinische Kirchengesch. I, No. 5 (Kiel, 1900) 31-115, 175-237, 344-99; also "Wiedertäufer in Eiderstedt," op. cit., II; ML I, 713.

Frederick I, King of Prussia 1701-13, who in 1688 as Frederick III, Elector of Brandenburg and Duke of Prussia, took the side of the Mennonites in the matter of admitting the severely persecuted Swiss Mennonites. Frederick offered these exiles refuge in his East Prussian realm, especially in the Lithuanian marshes near Tilsit, with a promise of complete freedom from military service and toleration of their principles. He co-operated fully with the Dutch government, which was also deeply interested in these victims of persecution.

On May 3, 1710, Frederick instructed his ambassador in Bern to work for greater toleration of the Mennonites. If this should not be agreeable to the canton, he was determined to "establish them in his realm." He also communicated with the Mennonite churches in The Hague, Amsterdam, and Hamburg-Altona, which were also in active sympathy with the oppressed Swiss.

On Sept. 26, 1710, the Swiss government granted the following concessions: (1) The Mennonites were to be permitted to withdraw without hindrance and to dispose of their property upon payment of a 10 per cent emigration fee and with loss of citizenship (the provision also contained a threat of the execution by sword of any who returned). (2) Bern would expedite them to its border at its own expense and feed and lodge the poor as far as Frankfurt. (3) A delegation to the king was not feasible. Only after all the Mennonites had left the country would they be permitted to deal with the king.

Then with the aid of the Mennonites of Amsterdam, Hamburg, and Danzig, a number of the exiles were settled in Lithuania. The king naturally expected a larger number of settlers than actually came, for he had personally secured for all the refugees the necessary passes through the intervening countries. But most of the exiles went to Holland, and a few families went to Pennsylvania.

The Mennonites who settled in Lithuania in 1711, after three delegates had previously looked over the land and found it very fertile, were received there by General von Dönhof and by the Königsberg legal councilor von Reuter in the name of the king. These men were commissioned to promote the settlement in every way possible.

From Polish territory, especially around Elbing and Culm, the king drew a number of Mennonite families to Lithuania with the guarantee of complete military freedom. But he died before the negotiations were completed, Feb. 25, 1713. H.G.M.

E. Randt, Die Mennoniten in Ostpreussen und Litauen bis 1772 (Königsberg, 1912); ML II, 1.

Frederick II (known as Frederick the Great), King of Prussia 1740-86. This enlightened and farsighted monarch established the principle that participation in civil rights and privileges should not depend on religious creed. He thereby laid the foundation for a toleration of the small Mennonite groups in his realm which was very different from that based on the arbitrary whims of an individual ruler; from this time on they were no longer to be dependent on the mercy of the king, but were expressly permitted to live in Prussia.

On May 31, 1740, he ascended the throne, and on Aug. 14 he rescinded a harsh order which his predecessor, Frederick William I (q.v.), had passed against the Mennonites Feb. 22, 1732, and declared that all Mennonites who wished to settle in Prussia should again be received and be tolerated in the cities and in the country like any other self-supporting citizens if they paid the usual fees and conducted themselves properly. Through his ambassadors he had this declaration read in Polish Prussia (West Prussia) and even in the Netherlands and invited Mennonites from both places to settle in any part of his domain. To the Mennonites living in Königsberg he granted citizenship in 1744; and in 1745, when East Friesland became a part of his realm he confirmed all their former privileges and rights to the Mennonites in that area.

When the large West Prussian congregations with their strong peasant population came under his rule in 1772 after the first partition of Poland, he also took a friendly attitude toward them. In the Elbing district, which had been leased by Prussia since 1698, General von Gesler, who had been appointed by Frederick William I, tried in 1746 to compel young Mennonites to take military service. The Mennonites presented a complaint to the king, who then commanded the general to desist (Mannhardt, Gem.-Kal. 1902).

On Sept. 13, 1772, Frederick took possession of West Prussia and thus became the ruler of the Mennonites, who until this time had been subjects of the King of Poland. On Sept. 27, on the occasion of the homage at Marienburg, representatives of the 13,000 Mennonites in West Prussia presented a petition to the king requesting the continuance of their privileges. In reply Frederick issued a resolution to the Ministry of War and Crown Lands in Marienwerder, Oct. 6, 1772, that the Mennonites under his protection were not to be discriminated against. For release from military service they were to pay a fee of 5,000 talers, which was to be raised annually by the Mennonites of East and West Prussia for the support of the military school at Culm. The order states explicitly that this sum was not to be considered a payment for religious freedom, but a sum for recruiting, in return for release from military duty.

To be sure, in the following years the king felt it necessary to restrict the acquisition of land by the Mennonites, "lest the cantons suffer too severely therefrom"; but he decided on each case individually, and was so lenient that the Mennonites acquired 296 new parcels of land 1781-83.

To assure the Mennonites a firm basis for their future rights and privileges he issued on March 27, 1780, the Gnadenprivilegium, guaranteeing them permanent freedom from military service, as well as the unmolested enjoyment of religious freedom and protection in the practice of their trades in accord with the laws of the country. H.G.M.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); H. G. Mannhardt, "Die Mennoniten unter den preussischen Königen," Gem.-Kal. 1902; ML II, 1 f.

Frederick, Duke of Württemberg, Germany, 1593-1608, a son of the half brother of Duke Ulrich (q.v.), a gifted and competent ruler, who, however, was always like a stranger among the Swabians. He freed Württemberg from Austria, and worked toward a union of Protestant rulers even at the risk of conflicts with Catholic rulers. He sought to improve the welfare of his subjects, and settled Lutheran exiles from Styria for whom he founded Freudenstadt.

By creed Frederick was strictly Lutheran, opposed to both Calvinism and Catholicism. But he lacked moral and religious seriousness. The numerous Anabaptists in his country interested him only in connection with the practice of confiscating their land for the benefit of his coffers. He was in perpetual need of funds. In 1594-95 there was complaint in the Diet concerning the curtailment of the inheritance of the children and other heirs of the Anabaptists because of the confiscation of their property. In 1600 and 1606 Frederick demanded official reports on the number of Anabaptists emigrating to Moravia. The measures against them became increasingly severe, since his councilor Enzlin persuaded him that the royal coffers were being seriously injured by the previous handling of Anabaptist property and its extremely low selling price. Then the land procurator Esslinger was commissioned to examine the matter and see to the rapid sale of these lands (officially still treated as orphans' property). Payment for the land, which had hitherto been done little by little, was now to be made as soon as possible; this created difficulties in years of poor crops, and threatened to estrange still further the people from the duke and the church. When in 1608 Frederick died, the complaint concerning the handling of Anabaptist properties ceased altogether, which from now on came under separate management. But when the Austrian government occupied the country (after the Battle of Nördlingen), all these funds from Anabaptist properties were confiscated again. G.Bos.

C. F. Sattler, Gesch. des Herzogtums Württemberg unter d. Regierung d. Herzogen V (Ulm, 1772); Paul F. Stälin, "Das Rechtsverhältnis der religiösen Gemeinschaften und der fremden Religionsverwandten in Württemberg nach seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung," in Württembergische Jahrbücher, 1868, 151-312; ML II, 2 f.

Frederick, the name of a number of Electors Palatine and lords of the Upper Palatinate, of the Palatine branch of the Wittelsbach family who in the 16th and 17th centuries influenced the course of Mennonite development: Frederick II, 1544-56; Frederick III, 1559-76; Frederick IV, 1583-1610; Frederick V, 1610-23 (d. 1632).

Frederick II, after a frivolous youth, assumed the reign rather late in life and until his death remained an easygoing man of the world. He was as little able to come to a decision on the great questions of the day as to establish himself politically. He found the more or less excitable citizens of the Palatinate, made up of various elements, in ferment; besides the faithful adherents of the old church there were Lutherans, Zwinglians, and also Anabaptists, especially around Neustadt and Kirrweiler, in the district of Lauterburg and around Stromberg. Jobst Kinthis of Freinsheim, with his Christliches und trosthaftiges Gesprächbüchlein (q.v.), so mit etlichen der Wiedertäuffer öbristen Rabonen oder Vorsteher gehalten (1553), sought to convince his ruler from the Lutheran point of view, that the Anabaptist doctrines, especially adult baptism, were unscriptural. Among the "Anabaptists" he includes men that have not the least connection with them. "Most of them speak disparagingly of the government and show it no honor. All pretend to be the elect and the just. The Michael Sattlers are the most pious." Just how much this booklet influenced Frederick is not known. At any rate, many lost their goods and were expelled. But this was mild treatment compared with the ruthless edict of the Diet of Speyer in 1529, passed unanimously by the Catholic and Protestant estates against the Anabaptists. At the Diet of Augsburg in 1555 the Catholic majority, in disregard of the emperor and the pope, granted equal rights to Lutheranism. The elector had vainly demanded freedom of worship for all classes and freedom of conscience for all subjects. His nephew Ottheinrich (q.v.) established the Lutheran Reformation in the Palatinate, on the whole considerate of the Catholics, the Zwinglians, and also, in spite of severe mandates, of the Anabaptists. The Heidelberg line expired with him.

From the rough Hunsrück Frederick III of the Simmern line came to the throne. He was a serious person, not always free of harsh traits and not always entirely honest; in conducting a state this may be difficult or impossible. In opposition to his father he had embraced Lutheranism; then, in opposition to nearly all his subjects, repelled by some degeneration in Lutheranism, he had come to the conclusion that Calvin had penetrated most deeply into the thought of the Holy Scriptures. Heidelberg now became the German stronghold of the Reformed Church; the Heidelberg Catechism became the most popular expression of Reformed doctrine. With the determination peculiar to Calvinism the elector took action against other faiths. Like so many genuinely pious Catholic and Protestant rulers of that time he felt responsible to God for the orthodoxy and salvation of his subjects. Many Palatines remained true to the old church, and were not molested as long as they did not carry out its worship. Many Lutheran pastors gave up their positions, refusing to renounce their faith. As Calvin had Servetus (q.v.) taken to the stakes for denial of the Trinity, so also the Inspector Silvanus of Ladenburg was executed on the public market place in Heidelberg for the same error. On April 11, 1571, the elector signed the death sentence, and on April 10 he had invited the Anabaptists to a disputation in Frankenthal (q.v.). He had hitherto been unwilling to enforce the stern imperial laws against them, for he thought them only poor, simple, good, but misled people. Now their elders and preachers were to express themselves openly, have safe conduct for two weeks before and after the disputation, and free lodging. In every city and village the invitation was publicly posted and twice read from the pulpits. Only 15 participants appeared. Nevertheless Frederick appeared at the opening in person and had the daily report brought to him in Heidelberg. When he saw his well-intended attempt to win them to the state church and bring about a unity of faith in his realm end in failure in spite of his efforts, he was conceivably wrought up. Bitterly he complained about the "bad fellows." He forbade them to preach or baptize and threatened severe penalties. At a synod in 1573 they were classed with magicians and sorcerers. In his will he again emphatically said, "Our children shall not be permitted to become eight, nine, or ten years old . . . and then be baptized." But he did not expel the Anabaptists. The Elector had wished to enforce the severe church discipline of Geneva on his lighthearted, wine-loving subjects, and had met in part active resistance, and in part dull apathy. Perhaps he did not, after all, overlook the fact that the Anabaptists, in spite of their false doctrines, lived more in accord with his demands of Christian living than many a Reformed congregation.

His oldest son and successor, Ludwig, became a Lutheran; the state religion also again became Lutheran. Many preachers, refusing to make the change, were dismissed. Under Ludwig's brother Johann Kasimir and Ludwig's son Frederick IV the Reformed Church was reinstated, and the Lutheran preachers and teachers experienced the same fate as the Reformed had previously met. But the people for the most part accepted the change apathetically, as they did a change in the weather (a Heidelberg poet's observation). But does spiritual violence of this type not leave its traces on the character of a people? Most of the populace remained Lutheran in mind (as did the Catholics) in spite of the Reformed order of service, says M. Ritter.

Frederick IV was a good-natured, indolent, insignificant prince, but had capable advisers. In 1608 they brought about a union of the Protestant imperial estates against the growing Catholic party, which with the aid of other nations, principally France, aimed to break the might of the Catholic imperial house. On both sides preparations were made for a war which was to determine whether Catholicism or Protestantism was to predominate in Germany, a concern which had long since ceased to be a purely religious one, but involved matters of money and temporal power. In the Palatinate conscription was begun. Very likely the Anabaptists refused to take any part in military drills. Is this perhaps the reason for the sterner attitude now taken against them? Until then there had been hesitation. The emperor and the Diet wanted Anabaptism completely eradicated. But the increasing and spreading dissolution of the empire was of benefit to the Anabaptists as to the Protestants in general. Many princes and imperial cities simply ignored the imperial edicts and the resolutions of the Diet, refusing to expel persons who were useful to their realms for their industry and skill, and who often won the sympathy of their fellow men and even of the minor officials through their honesty. The Palatinate was interspersed with the territory of other temporal and spiritual rulers, with whom exiled Anabaptists frequently found hospitable reception. Was the Palatinate to drive industrious, obedient citizens into the realm of the counts of Leiningen, Falkenstein, and Nassau, or the bishops of Worms and Speyer? It seems at times that the rulers had no intention of enforcing the severe edicts they passed at the insistence of their chaplains and church councilors. Many officials simply did not carry them out. When the officer of Bretten was to expel an Anabaptist in 1576 on the basis of an earlier regulation of Frederick III, he stated that he was unable to find the regulation.

But the sterner measures now undertaken in the Palatinate were perhaps passed for the same reason as those in the canton of Bern several decades later, when Bern, threatened by Louis XIV, increased its military strength and would not tolerate the steady increase in the number of its nonresistant citizens. It may thus have been not so much a concern for the spiritual welfare of the subjects and the religious unity of the state, as a concern for the security of the government that compelled so many of the quietest and most industrious citizens to choose between abandoning faith or home. Yet there are no records in the archives to confirm this assumption. Parsons and church councils merely report that the Anabaptists mocked at the citizens who presented themselves for military drill. The reported utterances of the Anabaptists indicate that they had taken on many of the characteristics of their neighbors. They sound very different from those 50 years before. According to the records of the inspector Titus Wittich in Dirmstein their leaders declared, "We have our own preachers who are much better than you. We are surprised that you are so greatly and so vainly concerned with us and incite the government against us, which would otherwise not take any steps against us, and has no right or authority to do so. We are a group in ourselves and in short, here we are, here is body and life. We do not wish to be advanced, much less to dispute, and least of all to make converts." The Anabaptists of Grosskarlbach, Weisenheim am Sand, and Hessheim assured him that all talking would be in vain, even if 12,000 dozen theologians would try to persuade them to enter the state church. At any rate the number of Anabaptists in the Palatinate was greatly reduced, owing in part to emigration to Moravia and in part to the dying out of some families.

Frederick V, son of Frederick IV, married Elizabeth, the niece of the unfortunate Mary Stuart. This connection with England was intended to strengthen the Protestant cause in Germany. She was received in the Palatinate with great pomp and grand display and exuberant merrymaking, while the clouds gathered in the southeast of the empire, from which the terrible storm of the Thirty Years' War of religion was discharged, and in which the "Winter King" lost his crown and his domains. In this war, which brought incomparable suffering upon the German people, especially those in the Palatinate, the last remnants of the Anabaptists in the Palatinate were nearly or perhaps entirely wiped out. E.G.

(For bibliography, see end of article in ML I, 714-17.)

Frederick (Pa.) Mennonite Home for the Aged: see Mennonite Home for the Aged, Frederick, Pa.

Frederick William I (known as the Soldier King), King of Prussia 1713-40. What Prussia owes this economical and stern ruler lives on in history. Toward the Mennonites he was at first benevolent, but later became rather ungracious. Like his fathers he had promised them freedom of worship, their own church buildings, release from conscription even for their servants, and even in 1721 he again issued an invitation to the Mennonite families living in Polish Prussia along the Vistula to settle in his domain. But his partiality toward the "Potsdam guards," for which he needed tall men, led him into injustice. His recruiting agents, who did not hesitate to use force when they saw strong young men six feet in height, also came to East Prussia, and during the night of Sept. 14, 1723, they dragged a number of young Mennonites off to Königsberg, and tried to make them consent to accept military service by starving them. The Mennonite congregation complained to the king, and the perpetrators of the violent deed were punished. Yet the king was not willing to release all these tall men. He had the six stateliest brought to Potsdam and put under severe discipline. But when all threats and mistreatment failed to weaken the young men in their refusal to take service, he dismissed them, but kept a personal grudge against the Mennonites, who had told him they would emigrate if their freedom from conscription was not granted.

In his first flush of anger he ordered all the Mennonites to leave the country, and some families actually returned to Polish Prussia (see Dannenberg). Only in Königsberg and near Tilsit did some Mennonites remain, protected by the civil authorities for their capability. Again on Feb. 22, 1732, the king issued an order that all Mennonites leave the country within three months. However, the Royal Ministry of War and Crown Lands declared that the tax funds would be appreciably lowered by this measure, for the Mennonites contributed to the royal treasury both as industrialists and as farmers. In addition, these people had been lured into the country precisely by the promise of freedom from military service, and their numbers were so small that their refusal to do this service could not injure the state in any way. Frederick William rescinded his order of banishment on the condition that they establish weaving mills.

In another part of his realm, at Crefeld, Frederick William I throughout his reign showed the same kind attitude toward the Mennonites. In 1721 he granted them a Privilegium permitting the practice of nonresistance in return for a fee, and in 1738 he even paid them a rather cordial visit.

H.G.M.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) appendix, p. LXX; ML II, 3; Beiträge zur Geschichte der rheinischen Mennoniten (Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins, No. 2, Weierhof, 1939) 38-45, 56 f.

Frederick William II, King of Prussia 1786-97, the successor of Frederick II (q.v.), was as benevolent toward the Mennonites as his great-uncle. He recognized the significance of the work which these economical, sober, and industrious people accomplished in the crafts and in agriculture, and was therefore not opposed to their spread in West Prussia. But he was at the same time unable to evade the fear of his officials that if too much land passed into Mennonite hands there might be difficulty in raising replacements for the army. In the Marienburg region the complaint was also made that the rapid increase in Mennonite ownership of land jeopardized the Lutheran Church. The king therefore decided to regulate matters concerning the Mennonites by a specific law. Thus the "Edict concerning future regulation of Mennonite life in all the royal provinces with the exception of Silesia" came into being July 30, 1789. It consists of 14 paragraphs; it confirms their liberty of conscience including nonresistance, but it also restricts their acquisition of land, sets a fee to be paid to the Lutheran Church by Mennonite landowners, and specifies the official attitude toward persons of other creeds who join the Mennonites. Because this edict made it difficult for young Mennonites to acquire new land, the emigration of West Prussian Mennonites to the steppes of South Russia began in 1789. During his reign the Danzig Mennonites came under Prussian rule. H.G.M.

Reiswitz and Wadzek, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennonitengemeinden (Berlin, 1821); H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde, ihre Entstehung und ihre Geschichte von 1569-1919 (Danzig, 1919); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); ML II, 3 f.

Frederick William III, King of Prussia 1797-1840, was one of the most peaceable of the rulers of Prussia, and for that reason friendly toward the Mennonites. But under his reign Prussia became involved in the most serious wars. Hence the Mennonites of Prussia not only shared the suffering of the entire country, but also had to struggle to preserve their nonresistance. More than once when this principle was threatened the king personally defended them. Nor did he overlook their voluntary offer of money and provisions to the utmost of their capacity, as well as their service in nursing care. In 1827 he issued the special law of March 11, legally freeing the Mennonites from the obligation to swear an oath. H.G.M.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); ML II, 4.

Frederick William IV, King of Prussia 1840-61, at his ascension to the throne assured the Mennonites that he would continue the protection they had enjoyed under his predecessors. But after 1848, when a constitution was passed, he could no longer decide these matters alone. It was a basic idea in the new constitution that as far as possible differences in creed should neither limit civil rights nor carry exemption from civil duties. The release of the Mennonites from military duty could not be permanently retained in a state that required universal military service. Frederick William and his cabinet were, however, able to guarantee this freedom once more in 1852, but only by assuring the house of representatives that a law governing Mennonite affairs would soon be presented. But this did not take place under his reign. Fifteen years of uncertainty and unrest passed for the Mennonites, until under William I (q.v.) their former freedom from military duty was rescinded by the Reichstag in 1867. (ML II, 4.) H.G.M.

Frederik Maartens (Frederick Maertsz), an Anabaptist martyr, residing at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland. He had taken part in the journey from Amsterdam to Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster in March 1534. Because he refused to recant he was beheaded (place unknown, but likely Amsterdam) on May 11, 1534. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744, 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 165.) vdZ.

Fredeshiem (House of Peace), a Dutch Mennonite brotherhood home (Broederschapshuis) in a lovely wooded spot about three miles east of Steenwijk (q.v.), province of Overijssel. It was built in 1929 and is used as a recreation center, convalescent home, and a quiet place for all who want rest. Sometimes conferences are also held here, e.g., by the Dutch Mennonite Peace Group. It is open throughout the year and has a capacity of about one hundred guests. It is managed by a committee of five members. vdZ.

Free Will, Anabaptist Position. The question of freedom of will is concerned with the relationship between God's sovereignty and the exercise of will by men. In particular it raises the question whether or not men have sufficient freedom to affect the course of history or to do that which will bear upon their ultimate salvation or damnation. This issue, which had come to a head early in the fifth century in the Augustinian-Pelagian controversy, was revived in the 16th century when the Protestant reformers espoused the Augustinian viewpoint. Erasmus of Rotterdam, Sebastian Franck, the Anabaptists, and certain other dissenters generally rejected the Augustinian position, but they did not go to the opposite extreme of asserting complete human freedom. They recognized that God controls the possibilities within which the events of history take place and the ultimate goal toward which history is moving. These men held that within certain limits God had granted free will, and that each person may at least either accept or reject divine grace offered to all. Anabaptists and those closely associated with them, however, held varying opinions as to the precise degree of freedom enjoyed by men. Nor did the Anabaptists agree entirely with the position of Erasmus.

Among the earliest Anabaptists to be concerned with the problem was Balthasar Hubmaier, who wrote two small pamphlets on the subject (Von der Freyhait des Willens, and Das ander Biechlen von der Freywilligkeit des Menschens, both published at Nikolsburg in 1527). He distinguished between God's "secret will" (plenary power) and His "revealed will," by which He has mercy on men. According to Hubmaier, God's "revealed will" is composed of an "attracting will" which offers grace and mercy to all, and a "repelling will," or will of judgment and punishment, by which He leaves in blindness and evil those who refuse His grace. With respect to the nature of man, Hubmaier held that originally Adam had been completely free to choose good or evil and that through disobedience Adam had lost this freedom for himself and his descendants. The body became corrupt and sinful; the soul lost its freedom of choice; and the spirit became the helpless prisoner of the body. Through God's grace, however, if the soul receives it, man's freedom is imperfectly restored. Hubmaier understood God's grace to mean that God awakens the soul by His Word, leads it by His Son, and enlightens it by the Holy Ghost. Hubmaier made it clear, however, that such freedom as man possesses in no way conflicts with the sovereignty of God over history. Man may propose, but his will is effective in actual events only to the extent that God wills or permits.

Hubmaier's contemporary, Hans Denk (q.v.), held a similar point of view. Denk also recognized the omnipotence of God and believed that a divine plan of salvation, coexistent with human freedom, would be fulfilled. Denk thought that man was created primarily to fulfill God's desire for voluntary obedience as opposed to the blind obedience of "a log or a stone." God forces no one. "For the sake of human free will, He must permit sin." Like Hubmaier, Denk believed that only the flesh was corrupted by Adam's fall and that the spirit was made the prisoner of the flesh. Sin, according to Denk, is a kind of sickness. If a man would recover, he must surrender himself to God; only then can the spirit within him dominate the unwilling flesh. Only then is man able to keep the law of love in obedience to God. Thus Denk found the highest fulfillment of human free will in self-surrender to God (see Gelassenheit).

Although the Swiss Brethren were more concerned with practical Christianity than dogmatic theology, the idea of human free will appears now and then in the hymns in the Ausbund (1564, 1583, and later). Rewards and punishments are genuine, the result of voluntary obedience or disobedience. The hymn "Merket auf ihr Menschenkinder" states that God has no pleasure in the destruction of sinners and that He desires repentance; yet He will not leave unpunished the sins of those who refuse to serve Him. The same thought is contained in the hymn "Gross Unbill thut mich zwingen," in which the Biblical examples of the punishment of evil serve as a warning to the "ungodly." In the Last Judgment, "what one sows now, the same shall he reap, be it evil or good."

The South German Anabaptist view of free will is probably best represented by Pilgram Marpeck, who, unlike Hubmaier and Denk, accepted the Augustinian premise of the total depravity of man.

Marpeck therefore stressed the atonement of Christ to a greater extent than did Hubmaier, but at the same time he accepted in substance Hubmaier's doctrine of God's attracting and repelling will. Marpeck's Biblical literalism, however, would not permit him to ignore such passages as Romans 8 and 9. He found a solution by subjecting God's foreordination to His prescience, not the reverse. Marpeck also pointed out that God's eternal condemnation must not be confused with manifestations of His wrath in this world, where innocent and guilty may suffer alike. Thus the ultimate destiny of each is still determined by his free choice, even though God may know in advance what that choice will be.

In many respects the Hutterite elder Peter Riedemann was in agreement with Marpeck. With respect to the total depravity of man, the necessity of God's intervention in Jesus Christ, and the consequences of resisting the proffered grace, the views of the two men appear essentially the same. Riedemann, however, placed greater emphasis upon the sovereignty of God over history, and stressed the view that disobedience to God does not establish human independence, but makes the culprit a slave of Satan. Riedemann also stressed the necessity of surrendering oneself completely to God in order that God's grace may operate. Man's actual deeds are immediately determined by the master he serves. Thus Riedemann reduced the scope of human freedom to the choice between obedience to God and the service of Satan, but the responsibility for this choice rests squarely upon man.

In the Netherlands, Menno Simons and his followers continually stressed the responsibility which men and nations must bear for their own misdeeds. Although Menno saw a cosmic struggle between the attempts of Satan to lead men astray on the one hand and God's redeeming love and mercy on the other, he believed that each person might choose whether to follow the enticements of Satan or to obey the commands of God. The course of history is fixed, but the will of the individual is free. Menno's writings are filled with examples of the punishment of those who permitted themselves to be beguiled by Satan and refused to heed the warnings and promises of God.

In the debate with Reformed preachers at Emden in 1578, two Mennonite representatives, Peter of Cologne and Brixius Gerritts, claimed that God's promise of salvation extends to all men who have not forfeited it by their own direct and actual sins, that is, by willful disobedience. In support of their position Peter and Brixius cited Gen. 4:7 and 6:3. These arguments were repeated in substance in the debate at Leeuwarden in 1596; and the Mennonite confessions of faith of 1600 and 1630 take the same position. This must not be confused, however, with a Pelagian denial of the corruption of human nature. Only because of God's pardon and through divine grace, not from any human merit, are men permitted to exercise free will. But this grace can be rejected; hence men are responsible for their own destruction. Mennonite confessions of 1627 and 1632 imply such limited freedom, although they do not deal directly with the question.

The author of the confession of 1600, like Marpeck, used the semi-Pelagian device of ascribing divine predestination to divine prescience in order to reconcile God's foreordination with human free will.

The erstwhile Anabaptist David Joris attributed even greater importance to the freedom of the human will. Joris recognized no independent existence to the freedom of the human will. Joris recognized no independent existence of Satan; the devil is simply the sinful flesh, the temporal corrupt being, which, when it dominates the human will, introduces evil into the world. Thus the betrayal of man was self-betrayal. But God, through the example and power of Christ, has broken the power of the flesh. For salvation to be effective, however, man must take the initiative. He must first repent in order to be renewed through God's grace. Joris reconciled human freedom with God's sovereignty by recognizing that the consequences of man's disobedience spring from God's law, and that God withholds His hands for the time being.

The revolutionary branch of Anabaptism, on the other hand, follows more closely the familiar interpretations. Melchior Hofmann, like Marpeck, declared that man had completely fallen and could be saved only by God's grace. Yet grace, according to Hofmann, makes salvation possible; God does not force one to receive it. Like Denk, Hofmann emphasized God's desire for a "voluntary sacrifice," a "willing bride" for His Son Jesus Christ.

Bernhard Rothmann of Münster pictured the history of the world as a continual abuse of free will by human beings. God created man for righteousness; He gave him a knowledge of right and wrong; but man chooses whether or not he will obey. The way of obedience is open to all, for God wishes all men to be saved; but each man chooses the way he shall go. The emphasis upon human responsibility for the failure to obey God is increased in Rothmann's later works by attributing disobedience to human wisdom, reason, and levity instead of the enticements of the devil. Rothmann, as other Anbaptists, retained the sovereignty of God by placing human freedom within limits set by God. Like Hubmaier, he distinguishes between the will and the deed. With respect to predestination, Rothmann at one point based God's foreordination on His foreknowledge. At another point Rothmann reverted to the Lutheran device of the paradox beyond human wisdom to unravel. At another time he fell back, in substance, upon Hubmaier's explanation of God's will. In any case, Rothmann and his coreligionists at Münster called men to "repentance" and preached the imminent doom of those who refused the last chance which God would offer them.

Two Mennonite discussions of free will in the 17th century deserve to be mentioned. Jan de Buyser's Christelijck Huis-boeck of 1643 contains a long chapter on this subject by Vincent de Hondt. Georg Hansen, a noted elder in Danzig (d. 1703), also discussed it in his book of 1671, Ein Glaubens-Bericht (Friedmann, Mennonite Piety, 131 f.).

In general, Anabaptist concern with the problem of free will appears to have been motivated by three considerations. In the first place, God is righteous; therefore, He can in no way be responsible for evil. Secondly, without free will there can be no real repentance, which for Anabaptists was an indispensable element in entering the Christian life. Thirdly, without free will there can be no real commitment to discipleship. F.J.W.

F. J. Wray, "History in the Eyes of the Sixteenth Century Anabaptists" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, 1953); W. O. Lewis and G. D. Davidson, "The Writings of Balthasar Hubmaier" (typed ms., Library of William Jewell College, Liberty, Mo.); L. Keller, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1882); G. Haake, Hans Denck (Norden, 1897); J. Heberle, "Johann Denck und sein Büchlein vom Gesetz," Theologische Studien und Kritiken XXIV (1851) 121-94; J. C. Wenger, "The Theology of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII (1938) 137 ff.; (Marpeck), Vermanung (n.p., 1542); P. Rideman, Account of Our Religion, Doctrine and Faith (London, 1950); Complete Writings of Menno Simons (Scottdale, 1955); van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror; David Joris, 'T Wonder-Boeck (n.p., 1542); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885); Carl Sachsse, Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949).

Freedom of Conscience: see Religious Liberty.

Freeland Seminary, located near Collegeville, Pa., 27 miles northwest of Philadelphia, was established in 1848 by Abraham Hunsicker (1793-1872), who had been ordained as a minister of the Skippack Mennonite Church in January 1847. In October 1847 he with John Oberholtzer left the Mennonite Church (MC, Franconia Conference) to organize the Eastern Conference of Mennonites. When Abraham Hunsicker was elected as minister "he felt more than ever before the need of a provision for more and better knowledge and resolved before God to found a school that should afford to others means of obtaining that of which he was deprived." Therefore in 1848 he purchased 10 acres of land, erected a building, and established Freeland Seminary. The school opened Nov. 7, 1848, with an enrollment of three, which grew to 79 during the year. The curriculum included the first two years of college. Henry A. Hunsicker, his son, who was the principal, stated, "The school flourished beyond expectation, though it received small patronage from the Mennonites whom it hoped to benefit." Among those who attended the school were John F. Funk (q.v.) and Warren Bean, later a bishop in the Franconia Conference. On Jan. 1, 1850, Henry A. Hunsicker was ordained as minister by the Eastern Conference of Mennonites (GCM).

The Hunsickers and some of their followers pursued a more liberal policy than the Eastern Conference. The differences became so great that by 1851 Abraham Hunsicker, his son Henry A., and others were expelled from the group. In 1854 they established the Trinity Christian Society (q.v.), an undenominational congregation. Gradually this group disintegrated, which ultimately affected Freeland Seminary.

After 17 years Freeland Seminary was leased to A. H. Fetterolf, and in 1869 a group of men organized a corporation and purchased the school, which then became known as Ursinus College. This corporation primarily served the Reformed Church. During the first 20 years of the existence of Freeland Seminary more than 3,000 young men received their education here.

Abraham Hunsicker was also the founder of "the Pennsylvania Female College." C.K.

Henry A. Hunsicker, A Genealogical History of the Hunsicker Family (Philadelphia, 1911); M. S. Harder, "The Origin, Philosophy, and Development of Education Among the Mennonites" (Dissertation, University of Southern California, 1949) 274; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1937); J. E. Hartzler, Education Among the Mennonites of America (Danvers, 1925) 128-29.

Freeman, S.D., a town (pop. 1,000) located in the southeastern part of the state, in Hutchinson County. The town itself is not solidly Mennonite, nor was the site originally platted by a Mennonite. However, the Mennonite influence is by now a predominant one. The population of the Mennonite churches within the immediate shopping district of Freeman approaches 2,000. Perhaps around one fifth of these live in town.

Five General Conference Mennonite churches lie within and to the east (Swiss) and west (Hutterite) of the town. A Mennonite Brethren and an Evangelical Mennonite Brethren church are located north and northeast of Freeman in a predominantly Low German district; the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren have a church northwest of town. These latter three, along with two other General Conference churches, lie at least partly within the shopping area of Marion (15 miles from Freeman). The earliest Mennonite settlement in the Freeman area dates back to 1873-74.

The Mennonite constituency of Freeman supports and controls a home for the aged, a junior college, and an academy. It also gives considerable support and patronage to a community hospital.

The Freeman community is perhaps unique in the fact that four different Mennonite conferences co-operate in maintaining institutions and commuity activities which are distinctively Mennonite in character. H.H.G.

Freeman Junior College, a Mennonite school in Freeman, S.D., had its inception in the "South Dakota Mennonite College" which came into being in response to a feeling among the Russian Mennonite settlers in Dakota in the 1870's that the German language should be maintained and that there should be some Biblical instruction. This feeling came with particular force to Frederick C. Ortman during the winter of 1894-95 while he was visiting the various Mennonite communities in Kansas, where he noted the good influence of Bethel College, particularly in training Mennonites to teach in the elementary schools.

Ortman took his burden of a Mennonite school to Elder Christian Kaufman in the winter of 1899-1900. Out of this meeting followed a series of meetings to which representatives came from the various Mennonite churches in the community. The idea of a Mennonite school became more popular with each meeting. At the fourth general meeting it was decided that since Freeman was very nearly in the center of the community the school should be built there. At the fifth meeting, held on Dec. 10, 1900, a board of directors was elected and on the 14th of the same month a charter was obtained from the State of South Dakota.

The task of raising money was then begun. Construction on the first building, a frame structure costing $7,000, was begun in 1902. It was completed in time for school to begin in the fall of 1903. The dedication services were held on Oct. 25, 1903. This building served for all instructional purposes until the completion of the new administration building in 1926 at a cost of more than $60,000. In the meantime two dormitories had been erected, one in 1906 at a cost of $6,000 and a second in 1915, costing $4,500. In 1923 the auditorium-gymnasium was erected at a cost of approximately $7,500. After the erection of the new administration building in 1926, two additional buildings were placed on the nine-acre campus. One was a men's dormitory built out of army barracks, with two apartments for faculty members. The other was the imposing new auditorium-gymnasium completed in 1950 at an estimated value of $125,000. It was named Pioneer Hall in honor of the settlers who first came to Dakota in 1874 from southern Russia. The men's dormitory was valued at $16,000. In addition to the nine-acre campus with its seven buildings the college in 1950 had two farms and a small endowment fund. Total fixed assets as per annual statement of July 31, 1953, were listed at $334,547.01.

When the school opened in 1903 the course of study did not comprise much more than the common school subjects, except for German. Even beginners were admitted during the first year. However, new courses were added as the school developed. In 1911 the Teacher Training Course was recognized by the State Department of Public Instruction. In 1922 the Academy was fully accredited. The following year the first year of college work was offered. By 1927 the University of South Dakota accredited the full Junior College course. In 1950 the school offered (1) a Junior College course; (2) a One- and Two-Year Teacher Training course; (3) an Academy course; (4) Bible courses; (5) special courses in Agriculture, Commerce, Farm Shop, and Home Making; (6) and work by correspondence. The Associate in Arts degree was being conferred in Bible, Teacher Training, Commerce, and Liberal Arts. In the earlier years all of the Bible classes and many of the other subjects were conducted in German. But as the use of German declined in the homes, it was gradually less used as a language of instruction, so that by 1914 only some of the Bible courses were given in German. Since that time German has been only an elective modern language course.

The institution is not under the direct management of the Mennonite Church but operates under a board of trustees of nine members elected from a corporation consisting largely of members of the various Mennonite churches of South Dakota and surrounding states. Anyone who contributes $25 to the school becomes a member of the corporation, and each $100 contribution constitutes a vote; no one, however, can ever cast more than 10 votes at a corporation meeting—five of his own and five by proxy. The name of the school has changed twice since it was incorporated—to Freeman College, and since 1939, to Freeman Junior College.

While established primarily for the benefit of the young people of the Mennonite faith, emphasizing the simple life, industry, the sanctity of the home, freedom of conscience, and Christian love as the guiding principle in all situations of life, the benefits and privileges of the college have been heartily extended to young people of other denominations. The Board of Trustees has adopted the Statement of Doctrine of the General Conference Mennonites.

Hundreds of young people who have graduated from the various courses through the years have become active workers in the community life of Freeman as well as in other communities. In its first 50 years the leadership of the school changed quite frequently. The following have served as president or acting president: H. A. Bachman 1903-4, 1908-12; John R. Thierstein 1904-8; Benjamin J. Kaufman 1912-13; Eddison Mosiman 1913-17; A. J. Regier 1917-21, 1922-27; P. F. Quiring 1921-22, 1927-28; P. R. Schroeder 1928-31; John D. Unruh 1931-35, 1936-38, 1939-48; B. P. Waltner 1935-36, 1938-39; Edmund J. Miller 1948-51; and Ronald von Riesen 1951- . The total enrollment in 1954-55 was 158, of which 46 were in college and 112 in high school. (ML I, 694 f.) J.D.U.

Freeman Junior College Bulletin has been published (bimonthly at first) since 1914, by Freeman Junior College and Academy. Each (monthly) issue now contains eight pages, 6 by 8½ in. Its purpose is to inform the constituency and alumni of the aspirations, needs, and accomplishments of the school. It was published in German until 1924, but is now published in English, edited by Marie J. Waldner. It has a circulation of about 5,500. H.H.G.

Freeport Mennonite Church (MC), located about 7½ miles northeast of Freeport, Stephenson Co., Ill., is a member of the Illinois Conference, and in 1954 had a membership of 170. It was organized about 1845 by Mennonite settlers from Ontario. The first building was constructed about 1863, and to meet the increasing membership was enlarged about 1888, and again in 1912 and in 1943. The first Sunday school was organized in 1878, the young people's meetings in 1890, and the sewing circle in 1910. The congregation through its history has ordained three deacons, ten ministers, and three bishops. In 1954 Richard Yordy was pastor and bishop. H.J.Z.

Freeriks (Freerks), Jakob, a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, who together with his copreacher Ebbe Pieters (q.v.) was the leader of the Frisian group at Harlingen in the Flemish-Frisian controversy of 1566. Jacob Freerks' attempt to restore peace (September 1566) was not successful. Particulars about Jacob Freerks' life were not available. (DB 1893, 22, 26-34, 36.) vdZ.

Freiburg, Anna von, an Anabaptist martyr, who was drowned at Freiburg (most likely in Switzerland) in 1529. The Martyrs' Mirror prints a prayer by her.

The Ausbund prints a hymn attributed to her (No. 36), "Ewiger Vater vom Himmelreich, Ich ruf zu dir gar inniglich," which is also found in Wackernagel's Kirchenlied (III, 487), but which actually, according to Hutterite sources, was written by Ursula Helriglin, who was imprisoned at St. Petersberg in Tirol 1538-43. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 157; Wolkan, Lieder, 178; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 194; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 487; Mart. Mir. D 26, E 434; ML I, 696.

Freie Zeuge, the temporary (1918-21) name of the Zionspilger (q.v.), the weekly periodical published by the Emmental Mennonite Church since 1882. Because of the financial difficulties experienced by the paper during World War I, and after the "Freie Gemeinde," to which many of the subscribers to the Zionspilger belonged, was considering establishing its own weekly journal, a joint publication by the two groups was undertaken. Beginning with the issue of Jan. 6, 1918, and ceasing with the issue of June 27, 1921, the name of the paper became Der Freie Zeuge, vormals Zionspilger, Ein Wochenblatt für christliche Gemeinschaften und Familien. No change in content was to be made. Editors were Johann Kipfer for the Mennonites, for the Freie Gemeinde W. Mili of Bern. Beginning with the number for July 3, 1921, the name was changed back to Zionspilger, although the paper continued for a time longer as a joint publication with the same two editors. Until May 12, 1940, there were always two editors, one for the Freie Gemeinde. With that number only Johann Kipfer appeared as editor. H.S.B.

Freisleben, Christoph and Leonhard: see Eleutherobios.

Freischütz, a Hutterite Bruderhof: see Sobotiste.

Freistadt, a city in Upper Austria. Concerning the Anabaptist congregation in this city we have relatively more information than about many other places of Austria, mainly because of its well-kept city archives with the many Anabaptist records. The origin of the congregation is not known but it seems unlikely that it was founded by Hans Hut (q.v.), even though this Anabaptist apostle was temporarily active also in Freistadt in June 1527, baptizing several citizens there. It is more likely that the congregation goes back to Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), who in 1526 was staying in the near-by castle of Weinberg, which then belonged to the Baron of Zelking. An indication of Schlaffer's influence is the tract Am anfang ains cristlichen lebens, which upon the personal command of King Ferdinand was deposited together with the confessions of six Anabaptists who had been imprisoned in Freistadt Aug. 12, 1527. This tract is divided into two parts: the first part is an enlargement of the earlier tract by Hans Schlaffer, Bericht und leer eines recht christlichen lebens (Müller, 94 ff.), which in turn is dependent on Hans Hut's pamphlet, Vom geheimnus der tauff (Müller, 12 ff.). The second part is an independent new piece. This tract, as found in the archives of Freistadt, was signed by six Anabaptists, Jörg Schoferl, Heinrich Panreiter, Hans Egkhart, Hans Tischler, Paul Goldschmid, and Wolfgang Pirchenfelder (Tuchscherer; see Nicoladoni, 250 ff.). These six men confessed in their statement that they had received the "sign" (of rebirth), baptism, but they denied having heard teachings concerning baptism from any human being, neither from Hans Hut, nor from Luther nor from Zwingli, as the imperial mandate asserted. They rather claimed to have depended alone on the testimony of the Scriptures. King Ferdinand agreed on Oct. 25, 1527, that Master Wolfgang Künigl, who at that time was occupied with the cross-examination of Anabaptists in the city of Steyr (also in Upper Austria), should function as prosecutor also in Freistadt. Thus Künigl went to this city in the middle of November, and the examination was set for Nov. 27, 1527. Jörg Schoferl apparently recanted at once. When the "punishment of Horb and Rottenburg" (see ML II, 347) was imposed upon him, he asked for moderation of this severe stipulation; there is no record, however, that this request was granted. The trial was then interrupted, but resumed in February 1528. It ended with the recantation of all the imprisoned Anabaptists, who now had to make a public "church penitence" on a certain Sunday.

In addition to these six men there were other Anabaptists in the city at that time. We hear of meetings and also of a "terrible, offensive, and revolutionary booklet" of these Anabaptists (Nicoladoni, 269). The magistrate arrested three more men and two women in May 1528, while other Anabaptists fled to some other places. Apparently no death sentence was pronounced at that time. All the records indicate that the sympathies of the council were on the side of the accused. An inner revulsion against imposing the severe penalties decreed by the authorities in Vienna is noticeable in the writings of the mayor of Freistadt. The willingness of the council to protect its fellow citizens is also shown by the trial (dragged out over several years) of the imperial "gate-keeper" Gilg Kurtz, to whom King Ferdinand had assigned as a gift the house and fortune of the Anabaptist Thomas Tanzer, who had fled from Freistadt. By 1530 the Anabaptist movement in Freistadt seems to have been extinguished; the city later became almost entirely Lutheran. LOSERTH, G.M.

While the city archives apparently show no records whatever concerning death sentences against Anabaptists, the chronicles of the Hutterites quite definitely state that martyrdom was by no means unknown in or around this city. The great "Catalogue of Martyrs" (Beck, 280; Wolkan, 182; Zieglschmid, 232), inserted in the Geschicht-Buch at the year 1542, lists for "Freynstat" not less than ten victims of ruthless persecution. Likewise the Codex "Kremser" (in Beck listed as codex "N"), formerly of Bratislava, expressly mentions three martyrs at this place: Hans Weinberger from Freistadt, Madlen Frelich from the city of Enns, and another Madlen from Steyr (all in Upper Austria). No execution date is given. R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin (Berlin, 1893); L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938); ML I, 699 f.

Freitäufer, a designation for those persons in the era of the Reformation who neither championed nor rejected infant baptism, asserting that the Holy Scriptures neither forbade nor commanded the baptism of infants. The name was first used by Bishop Aug. Marius of Brod to refer to Oecolampadius, the local reformer, who at first did not take a clear position on the question. The term was not widely used in the literature of the 16th century. HEGE.

U. Heberle, "Johann Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre," in Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1855, 885; ML I, 700 f.

French Revolution, the designation of the movement which after a long process of preparation, both political and philosophical, broke out on the night of Aug. 4, 1789, with the removal of all feudal privileges by the National Convention in Paris. The results of this Revolution are ineradicable.

Occasionally in the history of ideas connections are assumed between the intellectual forerunners of the French Revolution, especially Voltaire (q.v.) and Rousseau, and Anabaptists, or between some political phenomena and former Anabaptist demands. The "Declaration of Human and Civil Rights" (1789) expresses the fundamental principle of religious freedom, which is undisputably of Anabaptist origin, and which by remarkable routes, including the Anglo-American constitutional concept, finally achieved universal significance. But these are usually somewhat violent interpretations, and aside from the contradiction to fundamental Anabaptist faith which the excesses of the Revolution revealed, are based on exaggerated and ill-considered comparisons. Even the concept of a direct connection between the French Revolution and the ideas of the sword-bearing revolutionary Anabaptist movement (Münster) is untenable, unless all revolutionary activism is to be forced into one historical line.

But the effects of the French Revolution on the Mennonites were very real, and not only on those under French jurisdiction but everywhere else in Europe, in the Netherlands, Germany, and Switzerland. Although on the eastern border of France (Alsace, q.v.) even revolutionaries like Robespierre protected the Mennonite principle of nonresistance, soon afterward the Napoleonic wars led to the abrogation of this protection. Thus the Mennonite confession was suppressed in one of its most essential aspects. In conspicuous contrast to this was the granting of substantial legal privileges as a result of the Revolution to the Mennonites of the German Rhine region. This latter implied an increasing recognition of the Mennonite faith (with the exception of nonresistance) and concerned their private rights (see Ius retractus), especially the regulation of their marriages (see Marriage). The process of equalization instigated by the Revolution finally removed the last traces of the old heresy laws, and had an emancipating effect within the Mennonite congregations themselves.

In Switzerland toleration for the Mennonites, which finally came in 1815, was also the result primarily of the French Revolution. The "Helvetic Revolution" of 1798 in Switzerland, which changed the Swiss confederation (Eidgenossenschaft) into a federal republic, was the result largely of the diplomatic-military action of France together with the Swiss revolutionary party. In 1799 the New Helvetic Republic passed an act of toleration granting religious liberty to every faith, and permitting those who had been banished on religious grounds to return. This act ended active persecution but did not give the Mennonites full equality with the state church, particularly in matters of baptism and marriage. Finally in 1815 the Bernese Mennonites were granted complete religious toleration with full rights of citizenship.

Another consequence of the Revolution was the end of the rule of the Prince Bishop of Basel in the Jura territory. This was initiated with the invasion of the French troops in 1798, and completed with the action of the Congress of Vienna in 1815, incorporating the Basel Bishopric with the Canton of Bern. E.H.C.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML I, 686.

Netherlands. Under the influence of the principles of the French Revolution the dominant position and the rights of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands were abrogated; since 1796 there has been no state church in this country, and all citizens have equal rights. The dissenters (Mennonites, Remonstrants, Roman Catholics, Jews) were thereafter permitted to hold civil offices, and marriage by civil authorities became compulsory, the church ceremony being permitted only after the civil ceremony had been performed in the town halls. Most Dutch Mennonites were much pleased by the improvement in their social and political status, the more so since the principle of nonresistance was not attacked; it was now possible to avoid compulsory military service by engaging a substitute. In the Netherlands a number of Mennonites eagerly watched developments after 1789. Most of them, but not all, were enthusiastic about the "human and civil rights," for which they had been prepared during the last quarter of the 18th century by a growing liberalism in their congregations, a tendency toward natural religion, and the readings of French and especially English philosophical writings. Besides this, the fact that in this country they were still only tolerated often drove them into the arms of the Patriots (q.v.) against the oligarchy of the Reformed governors of the country. Hence they were among the first to dance around the "trees of liberty" enthusiastically erected when the French army came to the Netherlands; among them were those Mennonites who in former wars had left the country as "Patriots" to save their lives. vdZ.

N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 188-90.

French-Speaking Mennonites. Very early there were French-speaking Anabaptists. In the south of Flanders and in South Brabant there were in the first half of the 16th century many Anabaptist congregations. Severe persecution drove a mass of refugees north; some fled eastward where their traces are found in Metz, Strasbourg, and Geneva.

Among the martyrs many French names are found, such as Jacques d'Auchy, Adriaen Olieux, Charlo de Walle, Claudine le Vettre, Daniel Calvaert, and Guillaume of Rebais (Roubaix). Many French Mennonites came shortly after 1600 as refugees to the Netherlands, with such family names as de la Faille, de Fremery, Hennebo, de Neufville. In Hamburg there was a Francois Noe. In Leiden (q.v.), Dutch province of South Holland, there seems to have been a congregation of Walloons in the early 17th century; in Haarlem (q.v.) sermons were also preached in the French language (DJ 1840, 65).

The Flemish who fled to Strasbourg, not feeling quite at home with their German-speaking brethren, lost some of their number to Calvin's French congregation. Among them was Calvin's wife, Idelette van Buren (q.v.), the widow of the Anabaptist Jean Stordeur.

In later periods, chiefly 1700-50, the German-speaking Swiss Mennonites in their flight-like migrations frequently came in touch with French language and people. Many Swiss refugees settled in the French-speaking parts of Switzerland (Jura) and Alsace-Lorraine and with varying success maintained their German. In the Jura (q.v.) German-language schools have helped to maintain the German, and only in the towns has French come in.

At the present time the French congregations of Hang and (half of) Saarburg, and the Swiss of Pruntrut, Courgenay, Kleintal, Sonnenberg, Cortébert, Chaux d' Abel, and Les Bulles, and Le Locle-Brussels, though located in the French-speaking regions, have retained the German, although Les Bulles is rapidly becoming French. In former Alsace-Lorraine German has been maintained, but in Montbéliard and in inner France (q.v.) the Mennonites have become exclusively French-speaking in the last 50 years.

New French-speaking congregations have been established at Brussels (1953) and Paris (1955) through the work of American Mennonite (MC) missionaries.

Maintaining the German language in a French environment is less difficult for the Mennonites in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, for the cantonal government favors the German; they were able to set up their own schools and appoint their own teachers. In the canton of Neuchâtel, on the other hand, French influence was stronger; here the cantonal government did not support the Mennonite use of German.

The originally German-speaking congregations in France were in a very difficult position. They were too weak and scattered to maintain their own schools. They tried faithfully to teach their children German, though they themselves were unable to read or write it properly; the teachers they found were not much better qualified. Teaching materials were also lacking. Often the old family Froschauer Bible (q.v.) with its antiquated text, served as the only reader. More fortunate children were sent to Alsatian relatives. The Franco-Prussian War (1870 f.) was the turning point in the use of the French language. Those parts of the French-speaking churches that became politically German received German schools; but those who remained French found it difficult to maintain connections with those in Alsace. By the end of the century they were using the French exclusively. In the meantime, however, great damage had been done by their tenacious clinging to the German language. Many members no longer understood the German sermons, and many learned their Dordrecht Confession in German by memory without understanding a word of it. In consequence many young people lost interest and became worldly. The language difference finally led also to a division of the congregations in France into (1) the Conference of French-speaking Mennonites (q.v.) and (2) the Conference of Mennonites of Alsace (q.v.). In recent years the French-speaking Mennonites have gone far toward overcoming the ill effects of the language transition.

German family names have in many cases been adapted to the French. Some were simply translated; Kaufmann became Marchand, and Schweitzer, Suisse; but most changed their spelling to approximate the original; Bächer became Bacher or Pécheur; von Känel became Fonkennel or Kennel; von Gunten became Fongond; Schrag became Gérard; Balzer, Pelsy; Krähenbühl, Krépille; Luginbühl, Lugbull, etc.

The French Mennonite writings are not numerous. There are several translations of the Dordrecht Confession, and one of the Zweibrücken Catechism, to which a collection of prayers and several hymns was appended. This booklet was called Confession de foi chrétienne des Chrétiens sans défense and was published in 1771 (without name of place), Nancy 1862, Baccarat 1898, and Montbéliard 1922; to the last a brief Mennonite history was added. The first edition of the Dordrecht Confession and the translations by Virgile de Las are very rare. From 1907 to 1914 a monthly church paper, Christ Seul, was published, which printed a Formulaire pour les différentes cérémonies du culte (1922) and Précis d' histoire des Eglises mennonites (1914), and then published them separately, the latter being reprinted in 1937. It was resumed 1927-41, and 1945- .

A number of classic Mennonite writings by Menno Simons and Dirk Philips have been translated into French; in 1626 (n.p.) a translation of Dirk Philips Enchiridion by Virgile had appeared, followed by some tracts by Menno Simons: Enchiridion ou Manuel de la Religion Christienne, avec plusieurs autres traitez touchant la doctrine Euangelique faites par Menno Simonis et autres Autheurs. It also contains the story of the martyrdom of Jacques d'Auchy and three writings of Matthias Jurien (Thijs Jorriaensz), Henri Alevin (Hendrik Alewijnsz), and Jaques le Chandelier (Jacob Keersgieter). A French translation of Obbe Philips' booklet Bekentennisse was published under the title Obbe Philippe Recognaissance . . . (Leyden, 1595). In 1711 a French book appeared, Confession de foi Christienne (q.v.), containing the Dordrecht Confession, translated from the German into the French, a number of hymns and prayers, and a sermon. There was also a French edition of the Jan Cents Confession of 1630, Brieve Confession de Foy (q.v., 1684, n.p.); of Galenus Abrahamsz' Apologie there is a French edition Apologie pour les Protestants qui croyent qu' on ne doit baptizer que ceux qui sont venus a un age de raison, followed by (same author) Articles contenant les fondements de la Doctrine des Protestants, qui croyent . . . (Amsterdam, 1704). A separate edition (Leiden, 1685) of the Jan Luyken etchings used in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, with French captions, was likely not intended for French-speaking Mennonites, but for the art-loving public in France and elsewhere. It carried the title, Theatre des Martyrs. P.So., vdZ.

The most important French works on the Mennonites are the following: Guy de Bres, La racine, Source et fondement des Anabaptistes ou Rebaptisez de nostre temps (1645); Histoire des Anabaptistes (Paris, 1695); Histoire des Anabaptistes (Amsterdam, 1699); Catrou, Histoire des Anabaptistes (Paris, 1706); Beck, "Les Mennonites" (Dissertation, Strasbourg, 1835); Brumder, "Sur les causes qui ont adouci les moeurs des Anabaptistes" (Dissertation, Strasbourg, 1836); G. E. Röhrich, Essai sur la vie, les écrits et la doctrine de l'Anabaptiste Jean Denk (Strasbourg, 1853); M. Th. de Bussierre, Les Anabaptistes (Paris, 1853); F. Bastian, Essai sur la vie et les écrits de Menno Simons (Dissertation, Strasbourg, 1857); L. Hauth, Les Anabaptistes à Strasbourg au temps de la Reformation (Dissertation, Strasbourg, 1860); A. Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860); Ph. A. Grandidier, "Les Anabaptistes d' Alsace," in Revue d' Alsace, 1867; A. Weill, Histoire de la guerre des Anabaptistes (Paris, 1874); C. A. Ramseier, Histoire des Baptistes (Paris, 1897); Ch. Mathiot, Recherches historiques sur les Anabaptistes de l'ancienne principauté de Montbéliard (Belfort, 1922); there are in addition many articles in magazines, yearbooks, and encyclopedias, one of which is Annuaire statistique du department du Mont tonnerre pour l'an 1810; Christ Seul, 1910, Nos. 4, 5, and 6; also Gem.-Kal. 1916, 122-26; Almanach du Cinquantenaire (Montbéliard, 1950); recent issues of Christ Seul, especially the December numbers, 1951-55; ML I, 687 f.

Frensburg (Elsassfrensburg), about 12 miles from Wissembourg in Alsace, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation of Swiss descent. About 1760 Christian Naftziger was the elder, and Peter Güngerich and Michael Schantz preachers. After the death of Naftziger (about 1782) Michael Schantz became elder, who was still serving in 1802. vdZ.

Frerichs, Geert Elias, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, b. Nov. 24, 1836, at Rake, East Friesland, Germany, d. Dec. 22, 1906, at Helpman, near Groningen in the Netherlands, was at first a sailor. At the age of 14 he intended to go into mission work, but afterwards decided on the ministry. He was trained by Jan Pol, Mennonite minister of Norden, East Friesland, and at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary. Becoming a ministerial candidate in 1861, he served the following Dutch congregations: Hoorn on the island of Texel 1861-63, Warns 1863-78, Nes on the island of Ameland 1878-84, Oudebildtzijl 1884-90, and Borne 1890-1901, in which year he resigned. He was well versed in Mennonite history and published a number of papers; in DB 1874 the history of the congregation of Warns, in DB 1905 a paper on "Menno's taal" (the language Menno Simons used), and in DB 1906 on Menno Simons' residence in the first years after he had left the Roman Catholic Church. Frerichs' manual for catechetical instruction, entitled De godsdienst in het menschenhart en in de menschenwereld, was formerly much used (1st ed., St-Anna-Parochie, 1890; 2d ed., 1899). The 3d edition of this manual was published 1905 in four separate booklets: (1) Waarom zijn wij godsdienstig? (2) Waarom zijn wij Christen? (3) Waarom zijn wij Protestant? (4) Waarom zijn wij Doopsgezind?

Other publications apart from a large number of articles in the Dutch Mennonite weekly De Zondagsbode, were: Leer van den Christelijken Godsdienst (St-Anna-Parochie, 1885); Vragen ter voorbereiding van het Lidmaatschap in de Doopsgezinde gemeente (St-Anna-Parochie, 1886, repr. 1888, 1891, 1901; Vroege Vroomheid (St-Anna-Parochie, 1886, repr. 1888, 1893); De beteekenis van Menno Simons voor onze Broederschap (Amsterdam, 1893).

Pastor Frerichs introduced the use of private communion cups instead of the general cup in Borne in 1896.

His son J. G. Frerichs, b. 1880 at Nes, Ameland, was the Mennonite minister at Ternaard 1906-14, Staveren-Molkwerum 1914-21, Aardenburg 1921-27, Zaandam-Oost 1927-32, and Haarlem 1932-46. In 1946 he retired. K.V., vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 129-30; DB 1907, 186-88; DJ 1908, 21-30 with portrait of Geert Elias Frerichs; ML I, 701.

Frericks (Frederiksen), Jan, a member of the Flemish congregation of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, who was much interested in the troubles which the Swiss Brethren had in their country. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library contains a letter by him, dated Jan. 6, 1708, and addressed to Herman Schijn at Amsterdam (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1254a), in which he gives details about the situation and troubles of the Mennonites in Bern. In March 1710, when a number of Swiss Brethren, who had been expelled and were on their enforced transport to America, were to pass through the Netherlands, Frericks contacted the Dutch States-General and the ambassadors of Switzerland and England in The Hague, and undoubtedly it was largely due to Frericks that the Swiss Mennonites were set free on April 6, when their ship arrived at Nijmegen (q.v.), Holland. Information about Frericks' intervention is found in "Aanteekeningen over de vervolgingen in Zwitserland," by Hendrik Toren, a manuscript in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1009; see also I, Nos. 1329, 1870, 1904). Of Jan Frericks himself no further information was available. He was well versed in the French, German, and English languages. He was unmarried and evidently a merchant. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter and Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 23, 24, 40, 69.

Freriks (Freerks), Sicke, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr: see Sicke Freerks.

Fresenburg, an estate in Holstein near Oldesloe between Hamburg and Lübeck, Germany, which was in the possession of the van Ahlefeldt family in 1526-1641. Bartholomäus van Ahlefeldt (q.v.), who had learned to know the persecuted Anabaptists, granted them refuge on his Fresenburg estate from 1543 on. In 1554 an Anabaptist printer from Lübeck was examined in Oldesloe where he had planned to continue his trade. From here he proceeded to the Fresenburg estate where van Ahlefeldt had a house built for him to be used as print shop. It is likely that it was at this time that Menno Simons left Wismar and proceeded to Fresenburg, which increasingly became a refuge for Anabaptists. Although King Christian III of Denmark did his utmost to have van Ahlefeldt remove the Anabaptist refugees from his estate, he remained their protector. Here the books of Menno Simons were printed from that time on.

In the days of Menno Simons and after there was very likely a large settlement and congregation here. Gerrit Roosen, whose grandmother knew Menno Simons, reports about conditions at that time. Anabaptists from surrounding communities such as Oldesloe came here to worship. Although mandates against the Anabaptists were issued by King Christian III in 1555 and by his brother in 1557, the group was protected by their benefactor. There is a story that Menno Simons' printer was taken prisoner and was freed by van Ahlefeldt by force. During the Thirty Years' War the settlement was destroyed and many of the Mennonites moved to Altona (q.v.) and Glückstadt (q.v.). In 1656 King Frederick III and also Duke Frederick III (each of whom ruled a part of the district) issued a mandate against the few remaining families, who were finally granted permission to stay. This was the last mention of Mennonites in the Fresenburg area.

In 1902 a monument was erected by the German Mennonites on the place where, according to popular tradition, Menno Simons was buried in 1561 on the Mennoberg. A bronze plate shows Menno holding the Bible in his hands. Not far from this site, the house in which Menno Simons' writings supposedly were printed and the linden tree which he is supposed to have planted in front of it still stand. After World War II the monument was moved near the linden tree and house. C.K.

R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930) 129-32; G. Roosen, Unschuld und Gegen-Bericht (Hamburg, 1702); E. F. Goverts, "Das adelige Gut Fresenburg und die Mennoniten," Ztscht der Zentralstelle für Niedersächsische Familiengesch. (Hamburg, 1925) Heft 3-5; H.v.d. Smissen, Mennostein und Mennolinde zu Fresenburg (1922); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 80, 85-88; ML I, 701.

Fresno, a city (pop. 100,000) in the San Joaquin Valley, Fresno County, central California. Fresno is in the raisin industry area and is surrounded by rich farm lands producing not only a variety of fruits but also cotton, grain, and dairy products. Almost 5,000 Mennonites live in the area extending from Fresno south through Reedley and Dinuba. In 1940 the Mennonite Brethren organized a church in Fresno, in 1944 the Pacific Bible Institute (q.v.), and in 1955 the M.B. Biblical Seminary. The Mennonite Community Church (GCM) was organized in Fresno in 1953. G.W.P.

A. R. Shelly, "Fresno in the Heart of Raisin Country," MWR, May 13, 1954.

Fresno County, Cal., in the geographical center of the state, lies in the center of California's great interior San Joaquin Valley. It contains 5,950 square miles and has a population of 300,000. The raisin center of the world, it is the nation's largest grower of grapes, figs, and cotton. It also produces citrus fruits, grain, alfalfa, dairy products, livestock, melons, vegetables, poultry, petroleum, and lumber. The first Mennonite settlers arrived in the county in 1904. Approximately 2,300 adult Mennonites now (1954) live in the south central part of the county, 70 per cent of whom are Mennonite Brethren, 28 per cent General Conference Mennonites, and the remainder Evangelical Mennonite Brethren and Krimmer Mennonite Brethren. Five churches serve these groups. The Pacific Bible Institute (q.v.), operated by the Mennonite Brethren, is located in the city of Fresno. The Mennonite Home for the Aged (q.v.), located within the county in Reedley, is owned by the Mennonite Brethren. Jo.H.E.

Fresno Mennonite Brethren Church, also known as the Bethany Mennonite Brethren Church, located at the corner of Orchard and Olive streets, Fresno, Cal., had its beginning in 1920 when several M.B. families began to hold services. The church was organized in June 1942 with 34 members.

After renting a hall for services a number of years, the congregation purchased a building site in 1946 and erected a spacious church building which was greatly enlarged in 1954. Since the M.B. Pacific District Conference opened a Bible Institute in Fresno in 1944, this congregation has grown rapidly. The congregation has provided a church home for students and has in turn also greatly benefited through the services rendered by instructors and students of the Institute. The 1955 membership was 402, with Dan Friesen as pastor. Others who have served as pastors or assistants are J. D. Hofer, Sam Wiens, S. W. Goossen, Henry G. Wiens, Arthur Willems, and A. P. Koop. J.H.L.

Fresno (Cal.) Mennonite Community Church (GCM) began as a General Conference Mennonite Church Fellowship in May 1953 with a group of 40. Peter Ediger became the pastor of the church in 1954. A church has been built a short distance beyond the eastern boundary of the city. A.R.S.

Fretz (Frätz, Fraetz), the name of a Mennonite family in the Palatinate, Germany, in the 18th century, likely of Swiss origin. A Markus Frätz was a deacon at Ziehmerhof in the Upper Palatinate in 1731. Three years later a Christian Fraetz arrived in America. Most of the families bearing the Fretz name in the Mennonite Church today live in the Franconia Conference area and in Ontario, and are largely descended from two brothers, John and Christian Fretz, who immigrated from near Mannheim in the Palatinate to Deep Run in Bucks Co., Pa., between 1710 and 1720. The former's son John Fretz (1730-1826) removed to Ontario in 1800, where he was ordained a deacon in the Moyer congregation at Vineland in 1801. A number of ministers and deacons named Fretz have served in the Franconia and Ontario conferences (MC). Perhaps the most influential and vigorous minister bearing the name was the Eastern District (GCM) minister, Allen M. Fretz (1853-1943), ordained as preacher at Deep Run in 1883, and elder in 1892. Clarence Y. Fretz of the Franconia area served for a number of years as minister of the Norris Square Mennonite Church in Philadelphia, and is currently a missionary in Luxembourg, serving under the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). A. J. Fretz has written at least ten family histories of Mennonite families such as Fretz, Funck, Kratz, Meyer, Nash, Oberholtzer, Rosenberger, Swartley, Stauffer, and Wismer. J. Winfield Fretz has for some time been a professor at Bethel College. J. Herbert Fretz is a pastor (GCM) at Freeman, S.D. J. C. Fretz (d. 1956), of Kitchener, Ont., was a historian of the Ontario Mennonites. J.C.W.

Fretz, Allen M. (1853-1943), a Mennonite (GCM) minister of Pennsylvania, was born in Tinicum Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., the oldest of the eight children of Ely and Mary Meyers Fretz, and the sixth generation from the immigrant John Fretz, who settled in Bedminster Township about 1720. He grew up on the old Fretz homestead at Bedminster, and early showed an intense interest in books besides the work on the farm. His father therefore sent him to the new Mennonite school at Wadsworth, Ohio, when he reached the age of 16. In 1871 he attended normal schools in Pennsylvania, and at the age of 19 began his career of teaching. In 1880 he married Sarah Leatherman, who died in 1882. In 1885 he married Anna Rittenhouse of Campden, Ont. They were the parents of six children, two of whom are deacons—Jacob R. Fretz at the Lansdale Mennonite Church (GCM), and Ely R. Fretz at the Deep Run Mennonite Church (GCM). Anna died in 1923, and in 1925 Allen M. Fretz married Amanda Fretz.

On Oct. 13, 1883, Fretz was ordained to the ministry, in which office he served for nearly 60 years. In addition to his home congregation he served as follows: Souderton 1893-1910, Allentown 1910-12, Pottstown 1909-10, Bowmansville 1917-27, Springfield 1913-38, Perkasie 1918-42, and Lansdale 1928-29. He was secretary of the Eastern District Conference 1913-27, and one of the founders of the Mennonite (q.v.), and was active on various Eastern District and General Conference committees. He died on April 26, 1943. "He was the embodiment of Christian humility, the personification of love in action. Throughout his life he demonstrated the beauty of simplicity in word, in deed, and in thought. Many lives were enriched, many hearts warmed by his gracious teaching and preaching ministry" (J. Winfield Fretz). J.H.F.

"Allen M. Fretz," 1938 Yearbook of the General Conference (Berne, 1938); J. W. Fretz, "A Memorial," 1944 Yearbook of the General Conference (Newton, 1944).

Frey (Frei, Fry), a Swiss Mennonite family apparently originating in the lower Aargau of the canton of Bern. In the latter 17th century the name was represented among the Anabaptists of the Oberland area of the canton. A 1717 Palatinate census list of Mennonite families of Bernese origins names a Hans Martin Frey and a Johannes Frey. In 1731 Hans Frei was a member of the Streigenberg congregation of the Upper Palatinate. By 1759 the name was found among the Mennonites of the Montbéliard area. A list of Mennonite families in South Germany published in 1940 named one Frei of the Sinsheim congregation.

In 1717 a Johannes Frey landed in America. In the colonial period the Frey family was represented not only in the Skippack community of eastern Pennsylvania, but was also found in the Mennonite settlement in Virginia at least as early as 1730. Later the family was represented in Ontario, Franklin Co., Pa., Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Jacob Frey, who migrated from France to America in 1839, settled in Fulton Co., Ohio, where numerous descendants live. Eli L. Frey (q.v.), Amish Mennonite bishop, and J. C. Frey, Amish Mennonite deacon, both of Fulton County, were prominent church leaders who were descendants of Jacob Frey. P. L. Frey, son of E. L. Frey, and Bishop E. B. Frey, son of J. C. Frey, are Mennonite ministers in Fulton County. Frey also appears among the Prusso-Russian Mennonites. Gustav Frey was an active educator and pastor (GCM) in Kansas and California. M.G.

Frey, Claus, a fanatical Anabaptist of Rottenburg, Württemberg, Germany, a furrier by trade, who in 1525 fled to Windsheim, a town of Bavaria, to avoid the persecution which had set in at Rottenburg. His wife and eight children, who refused to follow him, he deserted in utter poverty, and with pious words persuaded Elsbeth Pfersfelder (q.v.) to accompany him. The Anabaptist congregation excommunicated him for his conduct. Upon arrival at Strasbourg, Alsace, the pair were also refused admittance into Melchior Hofmann's congregation (Gerbert, 154). The Strasbourg council condemned him to death by drowning on the charge of adultery. But Thudichum (Reformation, 620) has shown that this execution was a legal error, for his wife's refusal to follow was in Protestant lands a ground for divorce. Furthermore, death was by no means the general penalty for adultery. The Strasbourg council inflicted it because Frey was inconvenient to them, and because he was reported to be an Anabaptist, though both he and the Anabaptists denied this claim. Capito (Ein wunderbar Geschicht und ernste warnung Gottes . . ., 1534) relates the affair, trying to show the consequence of depreciating the clergy (appointed by the council), and adds the remarkable sentence, "That the Anabaptists are so willing to die for their faith is simply the work of the devil"—the exact opposite of his words of 1528.

It is possible that the reason for the council's rejection of Elsbeth Pfersfelder's request to be likewise punished by death was a vague disquiet as to the justice of Claus Frey's execution. Thudichum, as a professor of jurisprudence, was in a position to judge impartially on the evidence. The council used this case against the Anabaptists. E.T., NEFF.

E. F. H. Medicus, Gesch. der evangelischen Kirche in Bayern (Erlangen, 1863) 52; Ztscht für d. hist. Theol., 1860, 66 ff.; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885) 315 ff.; Fr. Thudichum, Gesch. der deutschen Ref. 1525-1537 (Leipzig, 1909) 620; C. Gerbert, Gesch. der Strassburger Sektenbewegung (Strasbourg, 1889); ML I, 702; III, 359.

Frey, Elias (Eli) L. (1856-1942), a leading Ohio Mennonite (MC) bishop in the first half of the 19th century, bishop of the Fulton County Amish Mennonite district under the Ohio and Eastern A.M.

Conference 1908-42, descended from an old Montbéliard (France) family, his father having immigrated from there in 1839, settling in Fulton County near Pettisville in 1844. He was baptized in 1880, ordained deacon in 1884. He married Anna Short, was the father of 11 children, one of whom, Philemon, is now a minister in his father's congregation. He was an able speaker and administrator, a rare combination of conservative and progressive attitudes, served as moderator of the Eastern A.M. Conference several times and as moderator of the Mennonite General Conference 1917-19, was a member of the Peace Problems Committee 1919-37 and its chairman 1925-35, and a member and officer of the Mennonite Relief Commission. H.S.B.

Freyberg, Helene von, a baroness, one of the few members of the Tyrolean lesser nobility of the 16th century who turned Anabaptist. She was born at the castle of Münichau near Kitzbühel (q.v.), Tirol (q.v.), Austria, and was married to Onufrius von Freyberg, Lord of Hohenaschau in Bavaria. She had three sons. About 1528 she came into contact with Anabaptists; the town of Kitzbühel was well known as a strong center of that movement. Apparently Helene was then also baptized into the new faith. As she had inherited the castle of Münichau, she gave asylum there to numberless Anabaptists who fled the harsh measures of the provincial government in Innsbruck (see Tirol). Both King Ferdinand (q.v.) and Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria (q.v.) soon learned of the activities of this noble lady, and Ferdinand ordered expressly that "if she does not recant she has to be brought before the judges." About 1530, when the situation became very critical, she decided to flee, bequeathing her castle to her sons. Apparently she went to Constance on Lake Constance (q.v.), another well-known place in Anabaptist history. Early in 1532, Ambrosius Blaurer (q.v.) warned his brother Thomas (q.v.) that Helene was in town and was known as a great admirer of Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.). In November of the same year she was finally expelled from this city and her possessions were confiscated. Thomas Blaurer in a letter to his brother expressed great satisfaction about this fact. It is claimed that in 1534 she agreed to recant, but the details are uncertain. In any case the contact with the Brethren continued and her life did not become much easier.

Next we hear of Helene in Augsburg (q.v.), again a big rallying point of the Brethren. (It is said that at that time the brotherhood in that city numbered about 1,100 members.) But Helene did not find rest in this city either. In April 1535, she was arrested, laid in chains overnight, cross-examined and finally banished. It appears that she then returned to Tirol. Of her married life nothing further is recorded; the husband died in 1538, and the sons supported the mother. In 1539 her sons petitioned the city council of Augsburg to permit her to reside in that city, and to it she now returned.

A letter Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.) wrote to Helene on May 27, 1543, gives the information that through her brother-in-law Jörg Ludwig von Freyberg she had given Schwenckfeld a copy of Pilgram Marpeck's printed Vermahnung (q.v.), for which Schwenckfeld thanked her now. He said that he had made a short summary of the book for casual readers, and he sent her a copy that she might forward it to Pilgram. He regretted that Pilgram could not come himself to his present place (home of Jörg von Freyberg) that they could have a full and free discussion of their problem. This letter is the last record. Her end is not known. R.F.

W. Wiswedel, "Freifrau Helene von Freyberg, eine adelige Täuferin," Ztscht f. Bayrische Kirchengesch., 1941, 46 ff.; M. Krebs, Badische Täuferakten (1951) with further reference to the Blaurer correspondence; Fr. Roth, Augsburger Ref.-Gesch. II (1904) 410, 426-28; Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VIII (1927) 616-18 (with brief biography; erroneously the "book" is here named Verantwortung, Marpeck's polemical work against Schwenckfeld, to which Schwenckfeld would not have answered so mildly; only the Vermahnung was printed), ML II, 502-4.

Frick, Georg, an Anabaptist martyr of Wirtsburg in Tirol, Austria, a tailor, was seized in 1529 in Fill (q.v.) near Neumarkt in the Adige Valley, Blaurock's last field of labor. His confession of faith made Nov. 16, 1529, before the court states that he was baptized by the former lay priest Benedikt of Bruneck, and that he was unwilling to renounce his faith. He was therefore executed with seven other Anabaptists—three men and four women. Hege.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 89; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Mart. Mir. D (not found), E 435; ML I, 702.

Frick (Fricken), Heinrich, a well-to-do and notable citizen of Zürich, Switzerland, who had been converted and become a Mennonite, in 1625 refused to serve as the military standard-bearer because it was contrary to his conscience. This refusal caused a new persecution at Zürich. Frick was imprisoned (1641) and so severely treated that he consented to attend the Reformed Church, and was released. But soon he repented, and "went back to Zürich, . . . to be confined, . . . which was done." In the meantime his two large farms and a considerable amount of money were confiscated. Then he was released, "but again apprehended, out of which bonds he escaped," and "wandered about in misery and poverty." Later Frick was allowed to emigrate to the Palatinate, Germany. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. E 1119; this information is not found in Mart. Mir. D; it is inserted in the German edition of 1780, p. 804.

Frick (Frijk), Leonhard, an Anabaptist martyr concerning whom nothing is known except the little that is given in the records of the capture and death of his companion Hans Schlaffer (q.v.). They were seized Dec. 5 or 6, 1527, by the Schwaz-Freundsberg magistrate Sigmund Kapeller. It is not known whether he, like Schlaffer, was subjected to torture; it is merely known that at his trial he declared that he would not renounce his faith nor betray his brethren. Sentence was passed on both, Jan. 20, 1528, to be carried out on Feb. 10. They were executed by the sword at Schwaz, Tirol, Austria. Loserth.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher 60-73; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I (Vienna, 1892) 35 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 45; Mart. Mir. D 14, E 425; ML I, 703.

Fricke, Fredrick C. (1867-1947), an elder and editor of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, was born April 14, 1867, near Hannover, Germany, the eldest son of Fredrick and Wilhelmina Fricke. When he was two years old the family immigrated to America and settled near Lansburg, Mich., where he grew up. He was brought up in the Lutheran faith. At the age of 15 he felt that he was a lost sinner; after much prayer and searching the Scriptures, he received light that he must be born again. He was baptized upon confession in June 1882, by Elder John Holdeman into the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. He married Leah B. Litwiller on Dec. 10, 1890. Five sons and five daughters were born to them. Two of their sons, Harvey and Sam, were ordained to the ministry.

Fredrick Fricke was ordained to the ministry on Oct. 31, 1893, by Elder Holdeman, serving in this office for nearly 54 years. He traveled extensively as an evangelist and as an elder for many years. He was a faithful witness and a wise counselor, whose advice was sought by young and old. By his efforts Sunday schools were introduced into many congregations. He served as moderator of the conference for many years. His editorial articles in the Messenger of Truth (q.v.), which he edited for 36 years, and other doctrinal writings were permeated with Scripture. He was one of the early and most successful evangelists of the church. He died at the age of 80 years, and was buried in the Greenwood cemetery near Middleton, Mich. His home address was Ithaca, Mich. E.J.F.

Fridli ab Iberg, a native of Schwyz, Switzerland, who had joined the Anabaptist movement and moved to Zürich in 1525. Here he baptized Wilhelm of Wallis and was in prison with Manz, Grebel, and Ockenfusz. Especially Hans Ockenfusz had a great influence upon him. Fridli was released from prison on April 4, 1526, but banished from the territory of Zürich. Concerning further activity nothing is known. On Nov. 27, 1526, his relatives in Schwyz addressed a remarkable letter to the magistrate of Zürich, writing that he "no longer would give any evidence of his former Anabaptist views," and asking permission for him to live in the city and canton of Zürich. He had thus apparently given up the Anabaptist faith. vdZ.

Von Muralt-Schmid, Quellen zur Gesch. der Täufer in der Schweiz (Zürich, 1952) 177-79, 193, 211-12.

Friedelsheim, a village near Bad Durkheim in the Palatinate, Germany, the seat of a Mennonite congregation since the earliest period. Its beginning is closely connected with the Friedelsheim castle, which was built in 1418. In the Thirty Years' War it was conquered and burned with the village Friedelsheim, and the remains were completely burned in 1689. Elector John William leased the village with the estate belonging to it in 1698 to his chancellor Francis Melchior von Wieser, who began to rebuild the castle. His son Francis Joseph completed the building and used it as his residence. During the French Revolution the castle was burned by the French on May 4, 1794. In 1800 Duke Francis Joseph, the son of Count Frederick, had a new residence built, which is now the parsonage; together with the chapel close by, it is popularly called "die Burg."

When the Mennonites came to Friedelsheim cannot be definitely ascertained. The first certain information concerning their presence is found in a rental contract of 1682, in which Elector Charles Louis leased his Friedelsheim estate, about 1,000 acres, together with the dwelling houses and farm buildings of the Mönchhof, now called the "Mennonitenhof," to Christian Herschi, Ulrich Weydmann, Jose Erbsal, and Hans Burgholder. But it is probably safe to assume that Mennonites had been living here before 1682 and that they had likewise been renters of the electoral estate; for the contract states: "As the same has been held by the renters before them." Very likely soon after the Thirty Years' War some of the refugee emigrants from Switzerland who came to the Palatinate settled in Friedelsheim. Religiously they were tolerated. "They shall have no public or secret meetings or conventicles attended by others than those living on the estate, . . . much less draw or mislead our other subjects and people to them." According to this it may be assumed that a congregation had already been formed, especially since in addition to these four families, the Mennonites Ulrich Wilemi and Christian Hummel are named around 1685.

In 1698 the castle and estate passed into the possession of the Baron von Wieser. In 1715 he issued a new rental contract. Of the original lessees only Christian Herschi was still here. In addition the document was signed by Hans Rüsser, Benz Ebersohl, Christ Ehlenberger, Hans Schneider, and Hans Schanz. Even though the clause concerning religious meetings was inserted in the new contract, it seems not to have been enforced. By 1732 the villages of Gönnheim, Erpolzheim, and Wachenheim were already a part of this congregation, which at that time numbered 40 families. The preachers were Hans Schanz of Gönnheim and Hans Jakob Schneider (of Friedelsheim?); the deacons were Christian Herschi and Hans Berber, the former for Friedelsheim, the latter for Erpolzheim (q.v.). (Details concerning these renters may be found in ML I, 704, footnote.)

Some information concerning members living outside is found in the reports which the electoral government required from time to time on the numbers, names, and financial circumstances of the Anabaptists. Not more than 200 families were to be admitted to the Palatinate and each family was to pay its protection fee of 6 florins, and these lists were to serve as checks. But they are not always complete.

In 1749 there was again a change in the contract. The document states: "Since all of my lessees have in part died, and in part emigrated, I have found it necessary to take other renters, having the names Daniel Brennemann, Johannes Risser (Hans Rüsser), Abraham Risser (Rüsser), Johannes Strohm, Jakob Lichty (Lichte), Johannes Leysi (Lysy), and Ulrich Wittmer." Religious freedom for the renters had been somewhat extended; they were permitted to hold meetings together with the foreigners in the neighborhood quietly on the condition that one of those living there should annually contribute a pound of wax to his chapel, and their funerals were to be conducted without music or the use of the church bells. The Mennonites had indeed acquired "a little spot for hereditary burial" (Gem.-Kal. 1909, 55 ff.). How long this little cemetery was used is not known, but it may have been discontinued after the French Revolution, which brought to the Mennonites social and religious liberty.

The Mennonites had their own meetinghouse very early; in 1779 a new one was built, because, as a document says, "the meetinghouse is quite dilapidated." Outwardly it had to look like an ordinary peasant home with a chimney. Indeed, the date and the inscription which had been carved in the stone over the entry had to be completely covered with mortar. During this time the Wieser property was sold to citizens of Friedelsheim. Most of it was acquired by former Mennonite renters. In 1803 the castle estate with gardens, buildings, and remains of walls was sold to several Mennonites, who occupied it together until 1808, and then divided it among themselves. Abram Leisy took over the "Burg." His son Abraham sold the property in 1820; the congregation bought it in 1836, for a sum of 4,000 florins, to be used for a church and parsonage. At considerable cost a building still extant, with a cellar under it, was rebuilt into a spacious chapel, which was dedicated Oct. 4, 1848. The expenses for the purchase and building were largely covered by substantial assistance from other congregations; also Protestant citizens made considerable contributions.

The Mennonites of Friedelsheim kept up their own school, very likely from the very early time. About 1814 the teacher was a certain Stübner. In 1824-27 the Mennonite children attended the village school, but in 1827 the congregation called Jacob Ellenberger (q.v.); in 1829 the school received public recognition. After this it was subject with the village school to inspection by the state and by the Protestant Church. In 1869 Ellenberger was compelled to resign because of old age, and since that time the Mennonite children have been attending the village school, though they receive their religious instruction from their own pastor.

In 1830 Ellenberger was also chosen as preacher and thereby the change was made in this congregation from a lay ministry to a professional ministry. Another preacher, who served with and before Ellenberger, 1825-32, was Johannes Risser, a zealous and gifted man who also held missionary meetings. In 1832 he emigrated to America. He was preceded in the ministry by Abraham Ellenberger, Sr., 1765-99 (Erpolzheim), Abraham Ellenberger, Jr., 1765-82 (probably Gönnheim), Johannes Strohm 1765-82 (Friedelsheim), Heinrich Wissler 1765-93 (Erpolzheim), Peter Becker 1765-93 (Erpolzheim), Peter Weber about 1769 (Seebach), Heinrich Krämer 1786-89 (Seebach), Heinrich Pletscher 1790-1816 (Friedelsheim), Jakob Neff 1791-1811 (Hardenburg), Heinrich Ellenberger 1812-24 (Friedelsheim), who moved to Eppstein and served as minister of that congregation until he emigrated to America in 1850.

The Erpolzheim congregation was very closely associated with the Friedelsheim congregation, so that the two actually formed a single congregation. Among its members were also the Mennonites of the surrounding villages—in addition to Gönnheim and Wachenheim, also Dürkheim (q.v.), Seebach, Hausen, Hardenburg, Grethen, Ungstein-Pfeffingen, Leistadt, Herxheim, and Freinsheim. In 1843 the Mennonites living in Dackenheim also united with this congregation. According to Frey there were in the area in 1834 a total of 198 Mennonites, 99 of them living in Friedelsheim. Between 1803 and 1824 the congregation of Assenheim (q.v.) also merged with this congregation. It is not known when the Gronau or Alsheim Mennonites joined this congregation, but it was probably at the beginning of the 19th century. Mennonites had been living there since very early times (for particulars see ML I, 705, footnotes).

In 1833 the Kohlhof (q.v.) congregation near Schifferstadt merged with the Friedelsheim congregation, though it has kept its identity to a certain extent and takes part only in matters pertaining to the pastorate. In 1861 a closer union was made financially through the establishment of a "Menno Fund" in commemoration of the quadricentennial of Menno Simons' death, to provide for their common needs, in which the Mennonites of Kohlhof and Friedelsheim both took an active part. This foundation has rendered a good service to weak congregations and had grown to 30,000 marks before the inflation of 1923. With 1857 the Branchweilerhof congregation (q.v.) was also served once a month. But this connection was only a personal one with the minister Jacob Ellenberger. In 1879 Jacob Ellenberger died after a very active life as a minister and teacher. His nephew Jacob Ellenberger II (q.v.), who succeeded him in office in 1881, wrote his obituary under the title, Jakob Ellenberger, Lehrer und Prediger der Mennonitengemeinde Friedelsheim. Ein Lebensbild, dargestellt auf Grund seines handschriftlichen Nachlasses. Mit einem Anhang einiger seiner Gedichte (Frankfurt, 1879). As a poet he is also represented in the hymnal of the South German Mennonites by hymn No. 226.

Jacob Ellenberger II served the congregation from 1881 until his death in 1901. His successor, Gustav Stauffer, died in May 1903, after having taken over responsibility for the congregation only in November 1902. In 1904 Johannes Foth became the minister of the congregation. He was still serving in 1954, when he observed his 50th anniversary as pastor.

In 1881 the congregation established a library, which in 1924 contained 241 volumes. The congregation belongs to the Vereinigung (q.v.), the Mennonite Hilfskasse (q.v.), and to the Conference of the South German Mennonites (q.v.).

The conference met in Friedelsheim on May 7, 1826, and Sept. 12, 1826, and also the Palatine-Hessian ministers' conference on May 28, 1874; May 24, 1884; May 30, 1894; May 11, 1905; May 6, 1914. The conference of 1874 was important in that the first attempt was made here to unite with the Vereinigung, although the results were negative.

Since 1891 the congregation has been incorporated. It was once quite numerous, but in the course and urgency of the times it has lost many members. The families which were especially strong in the earlier periods saw too little chance for making a living here and emigrated to America. This was chiefly the case in 1824-55, when about 160 persons from the congregation emigrated. Many of the Leisys, Schowalters, Rissers, and other families now living in Kansas, Oklahoma, and other states came originally from Friedelsheim. In 1952 the membership (without Kohlhof with 65 souls) was 135 (including unbaptized children), who were living rather widely scattered in 16 villages and towns. Some Mennonites from the Danzig area have joined the communities and congregations. J.F.

F. Braun, "Nineteenth Century Emigrants from the Mennonite Congregation of Friedelsheim in the Palatinate," MQR XXX (1956) 133-54; Müller, Berner Täufer, 211; ML I, 703-6.

Friedenreich, Lorenz (1718-94), came from Switzerland to Neuwied, Germany, in 1743, became minister of the Mennonite congregation there in 1755, elder from 1758 until his death, did much to improve the lot of his brethren in Switzerland and the Palatinate. He was the intermediary in establishing connections with Holland, Danzig, and Hamburg-Altona through an extensive correspondence, and repeatedly visited the directors of the Amsterdam Committee on Foreign Needs on behalf of his Swiss and Palatine brethren. This remarkable man, who during the summer of 1774 received Goethe, Lavater, and Basedow in his home, must have had considerable education. By trade he was a Gürtler, i.e., he made shoe buckles and other objects of brass. His son Heinrich (1747-97) was also a preacher in the same congregation 1788-97, and his grandson Abraham (1785-1864) was a Vorsteher, as was also Abraham's son Theodor (1822-1909). NEFF, VDZ.

Müller, Berner Täufer, 47; W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) 54; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1543, 1544; Beiträge zur Gesch. rheinischer Mennoniten (No. 2 in Schriftenreihe des Menn. Geschichtsvereins, Weierhof, 1939) 145 f., 149; Goethe's Rheinreise mit Lavater und Basedow im Sommer 1774 (Zürich, 1923) 119; Menn. Bl. LXXVII, 107 f.; ML I, 706.

Friedensau Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, was located in Noble Co., Okla., six miles southeast of Perry. In 1911 it had 23 members with C. E. Hirschler and P. Perry serving as ministers. M.G.

Friedensberg Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Northern District Conference, is located 65 miles southwest of Freeman, S.D., in Bon Homme County, and 8 miles southwest of Avon. The ancestors of the present membership left Prussia in 1798 under the leadership of Peter (Hans) Schmidt, and settled in Waldheim, a Mennonite village in Russian Poland, in 1838; in 1848 they organized Heinrichsdorf, Volhynia. In August 1874 the greater part left for New York, proceeding in September to Yankton, S.D. Seven families homesteaded late in 1874 and the remaining 35 families followed early in 1875. A new church was dedicated early in 1878. On Sept. 5, 1878, Benjamin P. Schmidt was ordained as elder by S. F. Sprunger. Later the church was under the leadership of D. A. Schultz assisted by Henry U. Schmidt. Beginning in 1941, the church has been under the leadership of Edward Duerksen. In 1953 the church had 91 members with Emil Krahn serving as pastor. Many members have been called into the ministry and foreign missions. J.A.B.

Friedensfeld (Miropol), a Mennonite village with 5,400 acres of land in the province and district of Ekaterinoslav in South Russia, 30 miles from Nikopol, was founded by 1867 by members of the Kleine Gemeinde of the Molotschna settlement. Three families of settlers were Mennonite Brethren. In 1869 two other Mennonite Brethren families moved in; since the Kleine Gemeinde congregation was in the process of dissolution, all the remaining inhabitants of the village joined the Mennonite Brethren. Friedensfeld was at first a subsidiary of the Molotschna M.B. Church, but in 1875 it was organized as an independent congregation with 45 members. Friedensfeld from the beginning gave much thought to its school system, and especially to clubs devoted to youth welfare, to music, and to singing. Several Baptist families were admitted into the village. Its fate since the Revolution and World War II is no doubt similar to that of other Molotschna (q.v.) villages. (ML I, 713.) A.B.

Friedensfeld Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Western District Conference, is located four miles north and four miles east of Turpin, Okla. In 1903 Mennonite families began to settle in Beaver County, where free land was offered to homesteaders. By 1907 a number of families had moved to the Turpin community. The Home Mission Committee of the Western District Conference took an interest in the group, and in 1907 under the leadership of H. R. Voth organized a church with 19 charter members. The first meetinghouse was built in 1908, which was replaced in 1940 by a larger church. The membership in 1953 was approximately 100; the pastor was Levi H. Koehn. L.H.K.

Friedensheim Mennonite Brethren Church, located 16 miles north of Main Centre, Sask., was organized as a congregation of the Mennonite Brethren Conference in 1929. The community began in 1925 when five families established their homes at Beechy, Sask. The membership rose to 75, but in the thirties it decreased. John Wiens was the organizer and the leader of the group for 18 years, until he moved to Herbert, Sask. His successor was Jacob Wiens. Other preachers were John D. Hiebert and Jacob Schellenberg. The deacons were Abr. H. Dück and Friedrich Mielke. In 1944 a new church was completed four miles southeast of Beechy, which was moved into Beechy in 1953. The membership in 1953 was 26, with Jacob Wiens as leader. J.R.

Friedensstimme, a German-language periodical, the organ of the Mennonite Brethren in Russia, founded in 1903 by Jakob and Abraham Kröker, who at that time lived in Spat (Crimea). Because there seemed to be no prospect of obtaining permission to publish the paper in the neighborhood, they had it printed the first three years in Berlin. Under these circumstances the paper could not thrive. In January 1906 permission was obtained to publish it under censorship in Halbstadt, province of Taurida; the editors had moved there in 1904. At first the paper appeared semimonthly, then 1906-8 weekly, and after 1908 twice a week. In March 1913 the subscription list reached its highest point, 5,800. The printers were the book concern Raduga (q.v.) in Halbstadt. Its program included inspiration, edification, exegesis, home and foreign missions, education at home and in school (for many years it was the organ of the Molotschna Mennonite teachers' association), politics, news from the Mennonite settlements; discussions of local questions, general welfare (housekeeping, farming, hygiene, etc.), entertainment, and advertising. At the outbreak of World War I it was discontinued. (ML I, 713.)

Friedenstal Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Tampa, Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in September 1899 with 33 charter members, immigrants from Poland. Until 1902 it was known as the North Lehigh Mennonite Church. The first church building was built and dedicated in 1907 and remodeled in 1944. Ministers who have served the congregation are Daniel Schmidt, Andrew Ewert, Johann Gerbrandt, Peter Balzer, Wilhelm Ewert, Henry Schmidt, John H. Epp, Walter H. Regier, and Harvey Jantz. Two missionaries have gone out from this congregation, namely, Mable (Wedel) Suderman to Arizona and Selma Unruh to Africa. The congregation has always practiced footwashing with the Lord's Supper. In 1955 the membership was 123. FR.S.

Friedensthal Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located at Gotebo, Harrison Co., Okla., was organized in 1903 by J. J. Kliewer and in 1911 attained its largest membership with 75 members. In 1912 John J. Kliewer and some 44 members of the congregation went to Carlsbad, N.M. In 1913-20 P. R. Voth served as elder of the Friedensthal group. In 1921 the congregation seems to have dissolved, with the remaining members joining the Ebenezer Mennonite Church at Gotebo. It was an active congregation having regular Sunday services, Christian Endeavor, prayer meetings, and other activities. J.F.S.

Friedrichsen, Karl, was born in the Crimea, graduated from a Zentralschule and the Bible school of St. Chrischona near Basel, Switzerland, was principal of the Karassan Zentralschule, Crimea, and member of the Busau Mennonite Church, where he also served as a minister after 1905. He was ordained May 31, 1911. In 1913-22 he was instructor of religion at the Davlekanovo Zentralschule at Ufa. After his resignation he founded the Davlekanovo Bible School (q.v.), which, however, had to be closed soon because of religious persecution. The last years of his life he spent at Zaporozhe, Ukraine, with his daughter. Occasionally he served the Mennonites of Einlage as minister (1935-36). When his daughter Marianne was exiled in 1941, he had already passed away after a long illness. C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer (Abbotsford, 1949) 164 f.

Friedrichsen, Peter, b. July 10, 1866, at Tashchenak, Ukraine, baptized June 3, 1884, Saribash, Crimea, married Sarah Martins April 25, 1891, was ordained as minister of the Busau Mennonite Church (q.v.), Crimea, by Elder Heinrich Martins on May 15, 1903, was ordained elder of this same congregation May 7, 1906, by Elder Abr. Friesen of the Karassan Mennonite Church. After the death of his first wife, he married the widow Maria Fast on Aug. 23, 1920.

In addition to his work as a minister and elder, Friedrichsen was also a farmer and held other public positions. He lived in the village Busau-Aktachi, Crimea. Friedrichsen was a fearless preacher of the Gospel, free of legalism. He preached a total of 2,015 sermons. He died July 16, 1926 (see Unser Blatt II, 148-49). C.K.

Friedrichsgraben, a district in the Lubianer Niederung, West Prussia, Germany, where Mennonites lived about 1740. They soon left this region because of repeated floods, which made living and farming there impossible. Of their activity the "Mennonitendamm" still bears evidence. vdZ.

Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 44.

Friedrichstadt, a city (pop. 3,600) on the Eider River in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, founded in 1619 by Dutch Remonstrants with the consent of Duke Frederick III (q.v.) of Gottorp, and laid out in the Dutch pattern. By its grant of religious liberty it became an asylum for all who were persecuted for their faith. The Mennonites received a charter on Feb. 13, 1623, which permitted them to settle there and carry on their trades; but at the same time it required them to live quietly and not to cause offense either "privately or publicly" to annoy anyone in religious matters. All the Mennonites living in Friedrichstadt and in the Eiderstedt (q.v.) area were freed from the oath and from military duty.

This far-reaching charter was confirmed on Feb. 17, 1657, again on Nov. 25, 1695, and by all the succeeding dukes and kings, finally by Christian VIII. In no other part of Germany did the Mennonites enjoy such extensive rights and privileges. The congregation had the rights of incorporation; their preachers enjoyed state recognition, freedom from communal taxation (which was not rescinded until April 14, 1869), and permission to wear their special garb.

In the earliest period there were in Friedrichstadt three Mennonite congregations: (1) the High German (merged in 1653 with the Flemish); (2) the Flemish; (3) the Frisian. On May 12, 1639, a short-lived union was formed between the churches at Hamburg, Glückstadt, and Friedrichstadt. Though the union did not last, there was always a friendly relationship and close connection between these three churches.

The Flemish and Frisian congregations merged on April 16, 1698; the Frisian congregation then had 70 members. It held its services in the rear of the "Alte Münze" which one of their members had purchased in 1652. Neither group was now willing to forsake its place of meeting. The lot decided in favor of the Frisians; but because their building was not very suitable, the congregation in 1708 bought the "Alte Münze" (picture in Menn. Bl., 1904, 46). On May 29, 1708, the first service was held in the remodeled building, which still serves the congregation. In 1839 a thorough remodeling was begun which was completed in 1884. In 1850 it suffered extensive damage in the bombardment of the city; the organ purchased in 1847 was also struck.

The Friedrichstadt congregation in 1703 had 178 communicant members. One hundred years later it had only 36. An attempt made by South German Mennonite families to settle in the city apparently failed. On Oct. 13, 1693, 12 families came from the Upper Palatinate; but on April 9, 1698, most of them returned to South Germany and the rest emigrated to America. Only two families remained in the city, one named Strickler from Ibersheim, and one Egly, probably also from there. Neither exists at present.

The great decline in the congregation is explained in part by the ruling brought about by the Lutheran clergy after the death of Duke Frederick III, that no Lutheran was permitted to join the Mennonites; if the latter permitted it, they would be deprived of all their privileges. No Mennonite could marry a Lutheran without a dispensation and the payment of a fee, and then only on the condition that the children be christened as Lutherans. (In 1823 Preacher Jakob van der Smissen succeeded in having this law abrogated in the city; therefore the rural Mennonites saw to it that their children were born in the city in order to be able to claim this privilege for them.) Again, the ruling that Mennonite services could be held only in the city had a deterrent effect on the development of the congregation, for many rural members were unable to attend the city services for long periods. Still worse was the fact that the services were conducted in the Dutch language, which was used only rarely in the country. The "black death" in 1713 snatched away 52 members. Visits of Dutch and Hamburg preachers like Bastian von Weenigem, Gerrit Roosen, P. Beets, and especially Jakob Denner aided in sustaining church life. When they no longer came the congregation declined perceptibly.

The church had a capital of 100,000 marks, which was managed by two elders, of whom one had charge of the ministerial fund, the other of the poor fund. Later the two funds were united into one. The church record was begun in 1763. The church was always interested in the common welfare of the brotherhood, and assisted wherever there was need among the members. The Swiss, Palatine, and Polish Prussian Mennonites were aided by them. In 1850, when the city and vicinity were badly damaged by a flood, the congregation was aided by the Dutch Mennonites. Menso Draaisma was the first trained preacher. He studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served in Friedrichstadt 1746-84. He was followed by Sybrand Martens 1784-1816, Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.) 1828-36, J. C. van der Smissen (q.v.) 1838-68, H. Neufeld (q.v.) 1869-99, and Samuel Blickensdörfer 1899-1920. Besides them, outstanding service was given by Deacon Jan Jelle Schütt (leader 1805-55) and his son Jelle Jansen Schütt (b. 1802, deacon 1836-86); and Christian Grosskreutz (deacon-treasurer 30 years, d. Jan. 19, 1899). The membership in 1898 was 34, with only two catechumens; in 1919 it was about 45, with 25 children; and in 1952, 29, with 13 children. The congregation was served in 1953 by Albert Goertz of Grünhorst, who had pastoral charge of a number of Mennonite congregations in the area.

NEFF.

R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); Menn. Bl., 1854, 48; 1856, 11; 1858, 35 ff.; DB 1891, 93; Comeniushefte, 1901, 34 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 578, 1003, 1180; II, 2754-68, 2789; ML II, 4 f.

Friedt, Heinrich, d. 1761, from about 1710 a preacher of the congregation of Obersülzen (q.v.), Germany, who had some contacts with the Amsterdam Committee of Foreign Needs. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1258, 1491, 1522, 1525, 1527.) vdZ.

Friend of Truth, a 16-page monthly, was published at 1216 Diversey Parkway, Chicago, Ill., by Joseph W. Tschetter (KMB), editor, sole publisher and printer of the paper. It was begun in September 1934, and discontinued in April 1939. It appeared in 8½ x 11½ inch size and reached a circulation of approximately 1,200. The paper contained articles on missions, reports, a children's page, sermon suggestions, and other items of general interest. It was an English counterpart of the Wahrheitsfreund, which Tschetter had previously published in cooperation with D. M. Hofer. C.F.P.

Fries, Abraham Jacobs (years of birth and death unknown), a son of Jacob Fries (de Vries) and Maria van Heyningen, was a member of the Lamist Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam and belonged to a family of which many members served the Amsterdam church as deacons. Fries was four times a deacon (1677-82, 1687-92, 1697-1702, 1707-12). He is of special interest as a member of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs, serving from 1680 to 1714 as its secretary. He wrote and received a number of letters which are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives and which not only bear witness of his activity, but are of great importance to the history of Mennonites in the Palatinate, Switzerland, Poland, and Prussia. vdZ.

Fries(ch) Studiefonds, a fund of the Friesche Sociëteit (Conference of Friesland), founded in 1859 after the Sociëteit had resolved not to appoint any more ministerial candidates, but to support young Frisian Mennonites studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, or preparing for the Seminary by studying in a secondary school. During the first 60 years of the existence more than 30 ministerial students received assistance. (ML II, 9.) vdZ.

Friesche Doopsgezinde Predikanten Vereeniging (Mennonite Ministers' Conference in Friesland).

From 1847 to 1926 the Mennonite ministers in the Dutch province of Friesland held their (unofficial) meetings twice a year, in the spring at Leeuwarden and in the fall at Sneek, discussing problems of special Mennonite interest and hearing scholarly theological addresses given by one of the ministers. The Friesche Vereeniging was dissolved in 1926, when a general Dutch Ministers' Conference was founded (see A.N.D.P.V.). vdZ.

Fries(ch)e Sociëteit: see Friesland, Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in.

Friesche Sociëteit in Noord-Holland: see Noordhollandsche Sociëteit.

Friese Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond (Mennonite Youth Association in Friesland). After World War I there was a spiritual revival among the Dutch Mennonites, especially among the young people. They wanted to judge and discuss the problems of Christianity in their own way, critical of former times, enthusiastic as to the future. In the Dutch province of Friesland this revival was rather strong: in 1921 youth groups had been founded in the Frisian congregations of St-Anna-Parochie, Bolsward, Heerenveen, Leeuwarden, and Veenwouden. The first Jongerendag (youth meeting, age 18-35) was held at Veenwouden on Sept. 21, 1921. Since then youth meetings have been held annually in the province. They have a large attendance, sometimes more than 300 young Mennonites being present.

On Feb. 4, 1924, the Friese Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond was founded at Leeuwarden. It acts as the top organization of all youth groups; gradually the number of associated groups rose to 40. The total membership of affiliated circles numbered 180 in 1924, 430 in 1934, 360 in 1953.

At the outset a large number of church boards and ministers stood rather skeptical or even negative toward this movement, but other ministers promoted it from the very beginning: C. Nijdam, W. H. toe Water, P. Vis, J. IJntema. The relation to the general Dutch Mennonite Youth Association, founded in 1928 (see Doopsgezinde Jongerenbond), was at first somewhat troubled and co-operation was somewhat difficult, but in 1932 the difficulties were entirely cleared away, and there is now a feeling of unity. Besides the yearly youth meetings, the F.D.J.B. organized instructional meetings (kaderbijeenkomsten), mostly held at Fredeshiem (q.v.) and Samen Een at Giethoorn (q.v.). The F.D.J.B. has a bondslied (group song) written and set to music by Pastor L. Bonga of Leeuwarden. Many particulars about the founding and the early history of the F.D.J.B. are found in the program of the 13th youth meeting, jubilee meeting 1924-34 held at Grouw on May 27, 1934. vdZ.

Friesen, German for Frisian Mennonites (q.v.).

Friesen (Friese, Friessen, Fresen), a Mennonite family name in West Prussia, appearing in the rural Flemish congregations and in the Frisian congregations of the Vistula delta. Evidently in the 19th century, it was sometimes contracted from the family name "van Riesen." It was first mentioned in 1547 at Reichenberg. Fifty-nine families of this name were counted in 1776, 140 persons in 1910, and 121 persons in 1935 (without Elbing.) Abraham Friesen, a brother of Peter von Riesen, was an elder of the Kleine Gemeinde; Abraham Friesen was a missionary to India; Johann Friesen was an elder of the Kleine Gemeinde; P. M. Friesen (q.v.) was an outstanding Mennonite historian.

Friesen families came to America in the migration from Russia in the 1870's and also after World Wars I and II. In 1953 there were 39 Mennonite ordained Friesens in Canada, 12 in the United States, 13 in Latin America, and 3 in Africa and India. Manitoba had the largest number with a total of 24, and among the Mennonite branches the General Conference Mennonites had the largest number, with at least 19. No less than 10 Mennonite groups were represented in this list of 67 ministers. The Morris, Man., telephone directory listed 29 Friesens in 1949; Mountain Lake, Minn., 12; Hillsboro, Kan., 16; Inman, Kan., 21; and Reedley, Cal., 22. The family was scattered through South Dakota, Nebraska, Oklahoma, as well as in the above states. In the United States 41 Friesens served in Civilian Public Service (q.v.) during World War I. Peter A. Friesen was for many years a missionary in India (MC). Who's Who (Menn.) lists 16 Friesens. G.R.

Friesen, Abraham, an elder of the Kleine Gemeinde, of Ohrloff, Molotschna, who was elected to succeed Klaas Reimer as elder on April 3, 1838. Bernhard Fast of the Ohrloff Mennonite Church, having been requested to ordain him, discussed the matter with his coelders, Peter Wedel, Wilhelm Lange, Benjamin Ratzlaff, and Abraham Friesen. Since Friesen was not willing to agree to certain conditions—such as not accepting members from other congregations without a church letter—for his ordination as elder, he assumed the elder's functions without the usual ordination. When the elders were reluctant to recognize Abraham Friesen as an elder of the Kleine Gemeinde, Johann Cornies had him decreed an elder in 1843 by the Board of Guardians (Fürsorgeamt) at Odessa. Abraham Friesen must have been a better educated leader than his predecessor, Klaas Reimer (q.v.). Numerous (handwritten) writings by him have been preserved and can be found in homes of the members of the Kleine Gemeinde and in the Bethel College Historical Library. The booklet, Eine einfache Erklärung über einige Glaubenssätze der sogenannten Kleinen Gemeine (Danzig, 1845), written by a "Faithful servant," has under the conclusion the initials "A. F.," which very likely stand for Abraham Friesen. This booklet also contains the correspondence with Elder Bernhard Fast. Friesen died July 1, 1849. (ML II, 5.) C.K.

Friesen, Abraham, a cominister of Elder Johann Friesen of the Kleine Gemeinde in Russia, was excommunicated by Friesen in 1868 because of differences of opinion. On May 4, 1869, his following elected him as their elder. He was ordained by Johann Harder, the elder of the Blumstein Mennonite Church. In the immigration to America in 1874, the Abraham Friesen group settled in Jansen, Neb., while the other group under the leadership of Elder Peter Toews, elected to the ministry in 1869, went to Manitoba (Menn. Life VI, July 1951, 18). C.K.

Friesen, Abraham (1859-1919), a Mennonite Brethren missionary, was born May 15, 1859, at Niederchortitza, South Russia, the second son of Johann and Margaret Wieler Friesen. He grew up and attended school in the village of Einlage. Abraham was converted at an early age and became a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Einlage. His abilities soon became evident and he was his father's right-hand man in his large flour mill and farm machinery factory. In his early twenties he married Mary Martens. No children were born to this union.

In 1885 Abraham and Mary Friesen volunteered for service in a foreign field. That same autumn found the Friesens in Hamburg, Germany, at the German Baptist Seminary, where Friesen studied for four years. Due to regulations of the Russian government an independent mission of the Mennonite Brethren Church was an impossibility and therefore Friesen worked out a co-operative basis with the American Baptist Mission Union and he himself opened the first mission of the Mennonite Brethren Church to the Telugus of South India.

He and his wife arrived in Secunderabad on Dec. 5, and stayed with the Baptist missionaries to study the Telugu language. Finally on Oct. 25, 1890, they were ready to open the work at the Nalgonda mission station. Nalgonda comprises the southeastern section of the former Hyderabad Native State.

Friesen's ministry proved successful from the very beginning, and on Jan. 4, 1891, he organized the first church with 129 members. Some evangelistic work had been done in this section prior to the Friesens' coming to Nalgonda. Due to the rapid growth of membership, the Nalgonda church was subdivided and in June 1891 three independent churches were established. From the very beginning the missionary established the principle of self-support and the dependence of the pastor upon the native church.

During his furlough in 1898-99 he visited the Mennonite Brethren churches in the United States and Canada with several workers, and also visited the headquarters of the Baptist Mission Union at Boston, Mass. (now at New York), to strengthen the bond of co-operation. Finally in August 1904 Friesen met with Dr. Barbour of the Baptist Union in Stockholm, Sweden, to lay down definite rules to guide in the association of the American Baptist Mission Union and the Mennonite Brethren Church of Russia.

After a most effective ministry of almost 20 years the Friesens returned to Russia in 1908 and settled in Rückenau, Molotschna. He became the guiding spirit in the foreign mission enterprise of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Russia. In 1914 Friesen went to India once more to help in the great work, returning to Russia in 1915 to experience all the tragedies of World War I and the Revolution. He died in 1919.

Friesen was the author of two books: Kardu, das Hindumädchen, and Morgenstern auf finstrer Nacht. He also served as editor of the mission periodical, Das Erntefeld, published in Russia in the German language. G.W.P.

G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1952); ML II, 5.

Friesen, Abram A. (1885-1948), was a prominent member of a study commission of four men sent to America by the South Russian Mennonites in 1920 to investigate immigration prospects in either North or South America and also to obtain assistance from American Mennonites for the oppressed Mennonites in Russia. When the other members of this commission returned to Europe, Friesen stayed at Rosthern, Sask., since Elder David Toews (q.v.) was located here. Friesen then helped to prepare for the great immigration movement, and in particular was instrumental in eliminating the restrictions in Ottawa against the immigration of Mennonites into Canada. He was for some years (1922-26) business manager of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization in Rosthern. In 1926 he withdrew to follow his private activities.

A. A. Friesen was born in 1885 in the village of Schönau in the Molotschna settlement of South Russia. He attended the Zentralschule in Halbstadt, taking also the special course in pedagogy, then went on to the Gymnasium in Ekaterinoslav and the University of Odessa. He then took a position as instructor in the then newly established School of Commerce in Halbstadt. For ten years he worked fruitfully in the position, until he came to America. In 1948 he died at Rabbit Lake, Sask. J.G.R.

J. H. Janzen, "Erinnerungen an A. A. Friesen und David Toews," in Menn. Jahrbuch, 1950.

Friesen, David, the leader or Oberschulze of the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, South Russia, in 1848-65, the time of the struggle of the landless Mennonites of the settlement for recognition of their demands and for acquisition of land. Through their organization (see Landlosen-Kommission) and the support of the government they finally achieved their aim. David Friesen was a strong supporter of the landholding class, opposing the distribution of the surplus land among the landless. C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950) 110-18; Franz Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908) 27-87.

Friesen (Ladenmacher), Georg, an Anabaptist martyr, a cabinetmaker by trade, was arrested in 1562 at Cologne, Germany, with Wilhelm von Keppel (q.v.), a former priest, now an Anabaptist preacher. An attempt was made to convince them of the rightness of infant baptism. The magistrate of Cologne offered Friesen money and his maid as a wife if he would recant. But he replied, "Your servant maid, riches, or money cannot take me to God; but I have chosen something better, for which I hope to strive." Favorable offers were also made to Wilhelm, but in vain. Both were taken on the Rhine by boat, and they bade each other farewell with "a holy kiss of love." After Friesen was drowned the executioner told Wilhelm he wanted to take him to the shore to behead him. Wilhelm then indicated he was willing to recant. So when they reached the shore he was released, and banished from the city and region. Van Braght records a brief letter written by Friesen in prison during the night before his execution. It contains earnest fraternal admonitions to faithfulness and endurance. Their capture and the execution of Friesen was commemorated in the song beginning "Zu singen will ich heben an," written by Wilhelm von Keppel, which is correct only in so far as it refers to Friesen. Georg Friesen is also the author of a song that begins, "Ich verkündt euch niewe Mare." (Mart. Mir. D 295, E 661; Ausbund, 22; Wolkan, Lieder, 101; ML II, 6.) NEFF.

Friesen, Isaac P. (1873-1952), Mennonite (GCM) evangelist, minister, and poet, came as a two-year-old boy with his parents from Russia to Canada, and spent most of his life in Rosthern, Sask., the center of the large Rosenort Mennonite congregation. With the revivalistic character of his preaching he led most of the ministers of this large congregation, and in fact those far beyond his own church, in this type of work. With his fluent speech and the dominant emotionalism in his sermons, he held and inspired his audiences. His poems, two volumes entitled Im Dienste des Meisters (In the Service of the Master), were and are extensively read. When in the fall of 1910 Isaac P. Friesen made a journey to Palestine, a dream of his life became a reality. His account of this journey is found in Meine Reise nach Palästina (My Journey to Palestine) (Winnipeg, n.d.). Before he entered the ministry Isaac P. Friesen had been a well-to-do businessman in the town of Rosthern, and during his ministry he liberally supported various Mennonite missionary undertakings, such as the Old Folks' Home in Rosthern, the Children's Home on the Mennonite Youth Farm near Rosthern, and other missionary and welfare projects. J.G.R.

Friesen, Johann Isaak (1860-1941), born Jan. 15, 1860, in the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, the oldest of the six children of Abram Friesen. In 1874 the family came to America and settled in Manitoba. Through a serious accident he was led to conversion at the age of 19, and was baptized as a member of the Kleine Gemeinde on Aug. 3, 1879. In 1880 he married Helena Penner. They lived in the village of Blumenort, and had eight children. In 1892 they moved to Steinbach, Man., where he became a partner in a milling business, remaining in the business for 26 years. He was known to be very punctual in his office work or any other obligation. After the death of his first wife in 1917 he married Mrs. Abram K. Friesen (d. 1939) at Meade, Kan., and lived there until 1940, when he returned to Steinbach. He died here on Jan. 22, 1941, at the age of 81 years. He was interested in Mennonite history and was very gifted in tracing back various relationships, for over a century. He traced his own ancestry back to Abraham von Riesen (1756-1810), who emigrated from Prussia to Russia, where the name was changed to Friesen. A.R.

Friesen, Johann J., an elder in the Old Colony Mennonite Church of Manitoba. He served in the village of Neuenburg, but later migrated to Mexico in 1923 with his people and died there. H.H.H.

Friesen, Peter Martin (1849-1914), minister, educator, and Mennonite historian of South Russia, was born at Sparrau, Ukraine, died in 1914. After graduating from the Zentralschule in Halbstadt he studied in Switzerland and later in Odessa and Moscow, where he mastered Russian. At the age of 16 he joined the young Mennonite Brethren Church (1866). As a young man he lost his faith under the influences of rationalism, but by God's grace returned to his faith in Christ, and remained faithful to the end. In 1884 he was ordained as an M.B. minister. In 1902 he wrote the Confession of Faith of the M.B. Church. He had acquired a good theological education.

In 1873-86 Friesen served in the Zentralschule in Halbstadt, enjoying great popularity as teacher and 1880-86 as principal. Thanks to his efforts, the first teacher training institute among the Mennonites of Russia was opened there in 1878. After leaving the teaching profession in 1886 he spent most of his time in non-Mennonite communities in the Kuban (1886-88), Odessa, and Moscow. After a serious illness and long convalescence he moved to Sevastopol, where for 13 years he served a Russian evangelical church; and his home was the meeting place for Mennonite students. He served here also as a private tutor. Friesen, however, never lost his love and loyalty to his people. On a number of occasions, because of his command of Russian, he acted as their representative before the Russian Government, fearlessly defending their civil as well as their religious interests. The results of his work on this problem he published in a pamphlet entitled Konfession oder Sekte? Friesen became widely known as a philanthropist and defender of the weak and oppressed, especially during the pogroms against the Jews, and the persecution of the Russian Stundists. His greatest lifework, however, on which he spent 25 years, is the Die Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Brüderschaft in Russland (1789-1910) im Rahmen der mennonitischen Gesamtgeschichte (Halbstadt, Taurida, 1911) (q.v.). It contains a valuable collection of documents which serves as a source book for much historical research. Friesen finally went to Moscow, where his home became a center for the young Mennonites studying there. His last years he spent in Tiege on the Molotschna; they were saddened by almost total blindness.

He was a gifted and fiery speaker, but not a popular one; his sermons often went over the heads of most of the people. In castigating evil he could be very sharp; he was in general courageous and unafraid. At conferences too he occasionally spoke with vigor. As a preacher he sought to reduce the tensions and bring about co-operation between the Mennonites and Mennonite Brethren, who were sharply opposed to each other in the second half of the century.

As a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church Friesen was disappointed, and with him others, in the course which his church followed. Raising the question whether the promising beginning had been fulfilled, particularly regarding John 17:21, he concluded that the concept of the fellowship of the saints was too closely identified with being a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church. Although basically in agreement with the Mennonite Brethren principles, he strongly advocated an Allianz, i.e., a fellowship of all children of God, particularly within the Mennonite brotherhood, in daily life and also around the Lord's table. The segregation type of Allianz as promoted by the Darbystic Bible School of Berlin (later Wiedenest) was too narrow for him. He strongly promoted an inter-Mennonite fellowship, simultaneously stressing Mennonite principles and tradition and the evangelical warmth of Pietism. Contrary to Mennonite Brethren practices he went so far as to recognize baptism by sprinkling or pouring (156 ff.) and stated that the Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden "have found a way out for those who do not wish to be rebaptized and at the same time are not satisfied with the practices of the Mennonite Church [in Russia]. The Mennonite Brethren Church [justly] lost the monopoly in the realm of being the 'church of believers'" (footnote 723).† H.P.T., C.K.

P. Braun, "Peter Martinovitch Friesen," Menn. Life III, October 1948, 8; F. C. Thiessen, "My Recollections of P. M. Friesen," loc. cit., 9 f.; ML II, 6.

Friesenheim, formerly a village in the Palatinate, Germany, now incorporated into Ludwigshafen, has since the beginning of the 18th century been the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which is today called the Ludwigshafen-Friesenheim congregation. At first the Mennonites living in the adjacent villages of Ruchheim, Oppau, Hemshof, Gräfenau, Petersau, Scharrau belonged to this congregation.

The membership has remained constant in spite of several emigrations to America: in 1820 there were 103 members; in 1825, 109; 1834, 120; 1923, 130. In 1784 the congregation suffered severely in a flood; the same fate (Heimatsblätter für Ludwigshafen a. Rh., 1915, No. 5) befell them in 1824 and 1882-83 because of a broken dam (Heimatsblätter, 1915, Nos. 6 and 7; also Menn. Bl., 1883, 8 and 15).

Originally Hemshof and Gräfenau belonged to the Mannheim congregation (q.v.). It is not known when they joined Friesenheim. It was perhaps the work of Heinrich Ellenberger, who was the first minister to serve the Eppstein and Friesenheim congregations for a salary. These two churches seem to have long been united (Müller, Berner Täufer, 211). The Ibersheim resolutions of 1803 are signed by Johannes Möllinger, minister of Ruchheim, for the "Ruchheim (q.v.) and Friesenheim congregation." At first meetings were held in private homes. On June 21, 1807, the Friesenheim Mennonites acquired the right to share the Protestant church building in the village for the sum of 400 guilders. The document was signed for the Mennonites by Johannes Möllinger of Ruchheim and Christian Schowalter of Hemshof. When the building was remodeled in 1902, this contract, unique in German Mennonite history, was dissolved for the payment of a nominal sum. The Ludwigshafen-Friesenheim congregation, which was incorporated in 1891 under this name, built a small church on Kurze Strasse 12 in Ludwigshafen, which was dedicated Sept. 6, 1903. Here the conference of the South German Mennonites meets whenever a session is held in Ludwigshafen. Ulrich Hirschler was elder of the Friesenheim-Eppstein congregation 1738-68; Johannes Möllinger, preacher 1754, elder 1768 to at least 1793. Other ministers in the 18th century (found in Naamlijst) were Christian Stauffer, Christian Gebel, Heinrich Plätscher, Christian Schmutz from 1762, Johannes Krehbiel from 1771, Johannes Deutsch from 1774, and Jacob Hackmann from 1774.

The first salaried minister of the congregation was Heinrich Ellenberger (see Eppstein). From 1850 to 1854 Johannes Risser (q.v.) of Sembach preached for the orphaned congregation. Then Christian Krehbiel of Wartenberg, who had studied at Erlangen, was made preacher. After his emigration the Frisenheim congregation together with Eppstein joined Ibersheim, whose preacher, Heinrich Neufeld, preached for the united congregation. Neufeld served until 1869; J. Ellenberger II 1869-71; H. van der Smissen 1872-82; Thomas Löwenberg 1883-1917; Emil Händiges 1917-23; Erich Göttner 1923-27; A. Braun 1928- . NEFF.

Naamlijsten van de Professoren en Predikanten . . . 1766 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1541; ML II, 6.

Friesenov, a Mennonite settlement in West Siberia, which embraced about 5,400 acres, was situated 18 miles from Petropavlovsk and 4 miles from Tokushi, the railroad station. This estate was settled in 1901 by eleven families; it was laid out in individual farms rather than in the customary village pattern. The villa of the former owner was rebuilt into a school, which was also used for church services. (ML II, 7.) A.B.

Friesenov and Gorkoye Mennonite Brethren Churches. Many Mennonite settlements arose along the great Siberian railway at the beginning of the 20th century. One of the earliest of these was that at Tchunayevka, west of the Irtish River, near Omsk, which was founded in 1899. In 1901 the village Friesenov (q.v.) near Petropavlovsk was settled. Among the first to settle here were Peter Friesen of Rückenau, and Heinrich Reimer of Margenau of the Molotschna settlement, whose farewell service was held in the Mennonite Brethren Church in Rückenau on March 18, 1901. In the new settlement, which was situated north of the stations of Tokushi and Assanovo and east of the town of Petropavlovsk, the Mennonite Brethren united into a congregation, whose leader was Isaak Braun. When Braun moved to Barnaul as that settlement was founded, David Janzen was chosen to lead the congregation and held that position until his death, Jan. 18, 1922. There were also other ministers, some of the later ones being Johann Barkmann, Johann Abr. Janzen, and Jakob Franz.

In 1903 two new villages were established near Gorkoye. These were Margenau and Putchkovo.

They were made on leased land, which was, however, later purchased. Here the Mennonite Brethren organized a congregation under the leadership of Jakob Friesen of Margenau. On June 19, 1907, Jakob Fr. Hübert of Margenau and Peter Fast of Putchkovo were ordained as ministers and Heinrich Martens of Putchkovo as deacon. Officiating at this service were the elders Jakob G. Wiens of Tchunayevka, Hermann A. Neufeld of Ignatyevka, and Jakob Janz of Friedensfeld, of South Russia. Thereupon Jakob Fr. Hübert had charge of the congregation. In that year a meetinghouse was built and dedicated on Oct. 7, 1907.

When Elder Jakob G. Wiens of Tchunayevka faced the question of moving to the Pavlodar settlement, Jakob Fr. Hübert was ordained elder by Jakob G. Wiens on June 4, 1913 (Old Calendar) in the presence of missionary Cornelius Unruh. Until 1929 Jakob Fr. Hübert then served all the Mennonite Brethren congregations along the Siberian railway. In that year he was among the refugees before the gates of Moscow, and succeeded in escaping with his family (with the exception of a son) to Germany and then to Brazil. There too he served as a Mennonite Brethren elder as long as his health permitted, and is now living near Curitiba in retirement. The remaining members at Margenau continued to hold their meetings, but it is not known how long.

After 1903 the following villages were settled in the region of Gorkoye: Nikolaifeld, Ivanovka, Alexanderkron (Mirolyubovka), Alexandrovka (where the Mennonites built a church); and near the Kuyan-Bar station the village of Korneyevka was settled. All the Mennonite Brethren in these villages belonged to the Margenau congregation. In 1907 a settlement consisting of several villages was made north of the town of Issil Kul; in Friedensruh a Mennonite Brethren church was dedicated on Sept. 26, 1910, as a subsidiary of Margenau. Its ministers were Heinrich Barg (leader) and Abraham Hildebrandt, and later also Aron Warkentin and Johann Sperling. Hildebrandt was arrested by the Communists during the Revolution in 1920. He died of typhus in the prison at Omsk on May 1, 1920. Heinrich Barg died in April 1915. (ML II, 7.)

H.J.Wie.

Friesland, a province in the North of the Netherlands (area 1,431 sq. miles, 1949 pop. 464,450; 13,328 Mennonites or nearly 3 per cent). In Friesland there are no big cities; the largest are the capital, Leeuwarden (pop. 77,000) and Sneek (pop. 19,000). There is not much industry in Friesland, farming being its principal means of support. The center of the province is below sea level, protected from the water and divided into polders by dikes; in this part there are still a number of lakes. In the summer Sneek and Grouw are centers of aquatic sports. The southeast part of the province is the less fertile. Very few Mennonites live here. In the north agriculture predominates (potatoes, especially seed potatoes for export, wheat, flax; intensive gardening in the Bildt district). The west and southwest part is excusively used for dairy farming and cattle breeding. Cattle breeding is at a high level; most cows, of the black-and-white Frisian breed, are registered. Cows and bulls are exported to all parts of the world. The Leeuwarden Friday cattle market is one of the largest of Europe (highest sale 10,000 head). Of great importance is the production of milk (770,000 tons per annum); hence there is a considerable export of butter. There are 98 dairy processing plants, most of them large; 78 of them are co-operative enterprises. Since 1932, when the Zuiderzee (now IJsselmeer) was closed in by a dike, the fishing industry, formerly of importance at Staveren, Makkum, and other seacoast towns, has largely declined. To the province of Friesland also belong the North Sea islands of Schiermonnikoog, Ameland, and Terschelling.

Friesland has its own language, quite different from the Dutch and closely related to Old English. The Frisian language is still the common language in Friesland, at least in the country. In church services, however, the Dutch language is generally used, but services in the Frisian language are occasionally held. There is a Frisian translation of the Bible.

Mennonites in Friesland. There are (1954) 46 Mennonite congregations in Friesland and 9 fellowship groups (Kring) in towns where there is no organized Mennonite church. All congregations are organized into one conference, the Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland. The youth groups of the several congregations are organized in the Friese Doopsgezinde Jongerenbond (F.D.J.B., q.v.) and the Ladies' Circles also in a general confederation, meeting regularly at Leeuwarden. For the practical purpose of assisting each other in cases of pulpit vacancy, the congregations are organized into three groups of district conferences called Ring (q.v.), viz., Dantumawoude, Akkrum, and Bolsward.

History. As to Anabaptism and Mennonitism Friesland occupies a prominent place among the Dutch provinces. Anabaptism was found here as early as 1530 and nowhere in the Netherlands was Mennonitism as deeply rooted in the population as here. About 1530 a circle of peaceful Melchiorites arose at Leeuwarden, probably through the preaching of Melchior Hofmann. In 1531 Sicke Freerks (q.v.), a tailor, was beheaded in Leeuwarden. It was this martyrdom that caused Menno Simons, who was a priest at Witmarsum, a village near Leeuwarden, to become interested in a study of the question of infant baptism, which doctrine he consequently rejected as un-Biblical. Here, too, Münsterite Anabaptism caused some confusion; Jan van Geelen distributed the noted booklet Van der Wraeke, and as a result a group of revolutionary Anabaptists in the spring of 1535 seized the Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward. A week later it was retaken by the Stadholder of Friesland. In this disturbance a brother of Menno Simons lost his life. About 50 prisoners were taken and executed at Leeuwarden.

Menno then wrote his booklet Against the Blasphemy of Jan van Leiden, and in January 1536 withdrew from the Catholic Church. The leader of the Anabaptists at that time was Obbe Philips in Leeuwarden. Early in 1537 he ordained Menno, who was then living in a quiet village in Groningen, as elder. Menno for some time traveled about Friesland, preaching and baptizing, but fled to Germany with Obbe Philips when the authorities put a price upon his head. Another preacher, Frans de Kuiper, was arrested at Leeuwarden, but was released upon recanting and betraying a number of his brethren. By 1575 about 50 Anabaptists had been seized and executed, of the many who lived here. Soon after 1550 the influx of Anabaptist refugees from Flanders, where severe persecution had set in, to the Netherlands began. Some of these refugees settled in Friesland. Most of these new members were baptized by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who fearlessly made repeated journeys through Friesland. It was about this time, after Menno Simons had sided with the strict party of Dirk Philips and Leenaert Bouwens at the conference in Harlingen in 1555, that the four important congregations, Leeuwarden, Dokkum, Sneek, and Harlingen, formed a union, and chose Ebbe Pieters of Harlingen as their elder. Pieters was, however, unable to travel over the province to administer baptism, and since Menno Simons had died and Leenaert Bouwens had been suspended from his office as elder, baptism was for a while not performed. Thereupon the Flemish in 1565 chose Jeroen Tinnegiteter as their preacher.

This led to great disunity, because Ebbe was so ambitious to secure this election, and the brotherhood throughout the country was divided into two parties, the Flemish (q.v.) and the Frisians (q.v.). About 1588 a new conflict arose among the Flemish over the purchase of a house that was to serve as a church, causing a division into Huiskopers (q.v.) or Old

Flemish, and Contra-Huiskopers (q.v.). The Frisians also divided into the "Hard" and "Soft" Frisians. Besides these divisions, further schisms resulted in the groups known as the Waterlanders, Jan-Jacobsgezinden, Pieter-Jeltjesvolk, and others. The consequence was that in the small villages there were usually two or more congregations side by side. But most of these groups were reunited in the course of the 17th century. The last union took place at Oldeboorn in the 19th century.

After the period of persecution was past, the Mennonites of Friesland, as indeed in all of the Netherlands, were scarcely tolerated. Nevertheless with few exceptions the situation of the Mennonites in Friesland was generally satisfactory, especially after the close of the 17th century. In return for a contribution (compulsory, to be sure) of 1,032,943 guilders in 1672-76 for the equipment of the Frisian navy flotilla, they were officially released from the oath and military service. For the benefit of their orphanages and their care of the poor they were excused from taxes on flour, meat, beer, and peat. By 1673 the Mennonites of Friesland had been given certain political rights, such as joining with the Reformed citizens in electing the representatives in the regional Frisian government, and were called "Lovers of the true Reformed Religion." Nevertheless there was not yet real toleration; even in the following century the edict (placaat) against the Socinians, Quakers, and Dompelaars (1662) was still in force, and in the first decades of the 18th century the Mennonites were often opposed on the basis of this regulation. In 1683 the preacher Foecke Floris (q.v.) was expelled from the province; in 1719 Jan Thomas (q.v.), a preacher at Heerenveen, was suspended from his ministry by the government of Friesland, and upon the request of the Reformed Synod in 1722 the government passed an edict compelling all Mennonite preachers to sign a formulary of faith prescribed by the Reformed Church. Since all of the 150 Mennonite preachers of the time with the exception of one (Meint Cuyper of Grouw) refused to sign, all the Mennonite churches were closed; and a month later the requirement was withdrawn. In 1738 two Mennonite preachers of Heerenveen were dismissed from their office (see Pieke Tjommes), and Joannes Stinstra (q.v.), preacher at Harlingen and chairman of the Frisian Sociëteit, was forbidden to preach 1742-57. Not until 1795 were the Mennonites given equal rights with the Reformed.

The violent quarrels at the end of the 16th century resulted in a large number of Mennonites uniting with the Reformed Church. The War of Liberation against the Spanish also contributed to this transfer of membership. Most of the Mennonites, with the exception of the cities in the north and west, were living along the seacoast and the canals. In the southeast the congregations were less numerous. The institution of the lay (untrained) ministry in the congregations also had an adverse effect on the numerical growth.

In the second half of the 17th century the Dutch Mennonites were split into the Zonists (q.v.) and the Lamists (q.v.) through the influence of the liberal Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and the more liberal Socinians. But this division was less serious in Friesland, where a provincial conference was organized in 1695, the Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland, which was a great blessing throughout the 18th century—the age of decline, in which Friesland lost no fewer than 22 congregations—in its striving to hold the church together as much as possible and to aid the poorer congregations in supporting a preacher. The Sociëteit organized a fund for the support of ministers, a fund for retired ministers, and a fund for the support of widows of ministers, to which all the congregations of Friesland belong. A fund for the increase of ministerial salaries was founded in 1865, and a fund (Studiefonds) for the education of ministers in 1857.

A new "golden age" came when after the French occupation the A.D.S. was established and gradually led to the employment of trained ministers in all the congregations. In the second half of this century nearly all the congregations acquired modernist preachers. Not until recent decades was this situation changed to some extent, a number of congregations in Friesland now having called young, more orthodox ministers. Bovenknijpe (q.v.) in Friesland was the first Dutch congregation to engage a woman as minister: in 1911 Miss Annie Mankes, now Mrs. A. Mankes-Zernika, accepted this office. The congregation at Dokkum (q.v.) has for 150 years been united with the Remonstrant congregation, but it is nevertheless a member of the Mennonite Ring.

The membership of the Mennonite congregations in Friesland has dropped appreciably since the 17th century, particularly in relation to the population increase. In 1666 there were 4,856 baptized male members, indicating a probable total of 20,000 souls, or 22 per cent of the total population. In 1838 there were 12,870 souls, or about 5 per cent, and in 1949, 13,328, or 3 per cent.

In the 19th century a number of new congregations arose: Appelscha, which was soon dissolved, and the following congregations which are still in existence; St-Anna-Parochie, Koudum, Ternaard, Tjalleberd, and Wolvega. In the 20th century Zwaagwesteinde was added, as well as the fellowship groups (Kring): Bergum, Giekerk, Kollum-Buitenpost, Langweer, Oosterwolde, Oranjewoud, Stiens, Twijzel-Eestrum, and Vrouwenparochie.

The following list gives a survey of the distribution of the baptized members in the various congregations in Friesland:

	1883	1885	1923	1956
Akkrum	321	408	370	181
Ameland[1]	320	290	225	197
Anna-Parochie, Sint	—	65	170	133
Baard	86	115	90	51
Balk	35	91	72	85
Berlikum	12	72	89	151
Bolsward	157	216	208	120
Bovenknijpe	123	231	145	94
Dantumawoude	207	263	305	244
Drachten-Ureterp	183	278	220	212
Franeker	95	116[2]	175	120
Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen	118	195	150	155
Grouw	275	433	345	206

Hallum	20	40	125	155
Harlingen	272	514	400	351
Heerenveen	144	286	229	209
Hindeloopen	57	32	65	48
Holwerd-Blija	165	268	140	92
IJlst	135	104	75	84
Irnsum	87	112	135	102
Itens	65	112	100	98
Joure	200	358	350	230
Koudum	----	35	40	26
Leeuwarden	270	782	1350	1020
Makkum	90	97	78	48
Molkwerum[3]	20	29	47	----
Oldeboorn[4]	288	521	338	182
Oude Bildtzijl	34	71	125	143
Poppingawier	----	80	65	45
Rottevalle-Witween	72	112	128	142
Sneek	310	444	460	465
Staveren	25	47	68	56
Surhuisterveen	68	70	105	134
Terhorne	119	135	100	85
Ternaard	----	66	80	101
Terschelling	131[5]	154[6]	140[7]	144
Tjalleberd	104	132	115	103
Veenwouden	36	83	155	195
Warga	159	192	166	91
Warns	108	131	106	110
Witmarsum-Pingjum	50	85	70	54
Wolvega	----	61	80	101
Workum	74	81	105	94
Woudsend	34	32	38	34
Zwaagwesteinde	3	?	75	88
	5072	8039	8217	6779

[1] The congregations of Ballum, Hollum, and Nes.
[2] In 1895.
[3] Merged with Warns in 19—.
[4] Divided into two congregations in 1838.
[5] In 1847.
[6] In 1897.
[7] Until 1942 Terschelling belonged to the province of North Holland. K.V., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1837); H. J. Busé, De verdwenen Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland (reprint from De Frije Fries XXII); F. H. Pasma, De Friese Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in de laatste halve eeuw (n.p., n.d., 1947); Kühler, Geschiedenis I and II, passim; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) passim; ML II, 9-12; detailed information is found in the articles on individual congregations.

Friesland Agricultural Co-operative (Cooperativa Agricola de Friesland), located in the Friesland settlement in Alto Paraguay, near the port of Rosario, was organized July 5, 1941, with 38 members, in order to provide for adequate and economical purchase of necessities and profitable sale of colony produce; to establish basic industries to provide for the needs of the settlers; to prevent the settlers from purchasing their requirements outside the colony, thereby weakening its financial stability. Its original capital was 200,000 pesos, and in 1950, 62,540 guaranies. Shares are valued at 20 guaranies, since 1947 payable in cash and obligatory for each colony member, the shares of the Cooperativa being automatically sold with the land at any time. David Wieler, leader (Oberschulze) of the colony, is also president of the Cooperativa, which is under the direct supervision of the colony administration. Special difficulties are encountered because of poor transportation facilities, lack of reliable markets, and the instability of the Paraguayan guarani. Its 1949 turnover was 185,000 guaranies, and in 1950, 458,000 guaranies, the increase being due in part to inflated prices and devaluation of the guarani, but also to increased co-operation of all colony members. H.J.

Friesland Colony, Paraguay, was founded in 1937 by dissatisfied settlers from the Fernheim Colony in the Paraguayan Chaco, when 144 families with 748 men, women, and children left the Chaco, thinking to improve their economic lot, a hope which was not realized.

Friesland is located on the east bank of the Paraguay River, approximately 70 miles northeast of Asuncion, from where it is reached by river boat and horse- or ox-drawn carriages or by use of small planes, since they maintain a good though small air strip. It contains 19,250 acres of land, of which 38 per cent consists of dense forests, 7 per cent of "high-camp" fit for cultivation, 38 per cent of "low-camp" good for grazing, and 7 per cent swampland on which some rice has been grown. The average annual rainfall is 60 inches, compared to 28-30 inches in the Chaco. Cleared forest land is preferred for farming and yields as a rule two crops annually.

Having the same privileges granted by the Paraguayan government to the Chaco colonies, Friesland enjoys complete freedom from military service, has its own schools, and virtually governs itself by a system of one delegate representing every ten citizens of each village under a village mayor, who in turn is responsible to the colony mayor. In 1953 there were nine villages with 202 families, or 1,046 souls.

The dwellings are made of adobe, the Zentralschule and the two churches of burned brick, all three buildings having been built with funds coming from friends in North America. The building housing the Cooperativa Agricola, which takes care of the colony's trade, imports, and exports, is of wood construction.

After the first group of immigrants coming from Europe after World War II had been temporarily housed in Friesland in 1947 because the revolution in Paraguay made transportation to the Chaco impossible, the MCC also began to take an interest in Friesland and has since assisted the colony in a number of ways, such as building and developing a lumber industry, and building roads and the hospital. The latter, built in 1949, had by September 1953 admitted 2,560 patients, 1,037 of whom required surgery; the rest were for the most part maternity cases. An additional 3,300 patients have been cared for with ailments ranging from smaller infections to snake bites and the very prevalent discomforts caused by various types of tropical worms. Only about 20 per cent of the patients come from the colony itself; the other 80 per cent are native Paraguayans.

In 1938 two schools were built. At present there are five schools with a Zentralschule in the central village for those who successfully complete the six-year course offered by the five village schools.

Denominationally Friesland's people are divided between the Mennonite Brethren with 224 members and the General Conference Mennonites with 220 members (in 1953). Problems common to both groups are referred to the KfK (Commission for Church Matters).

Friesland is largely an agricultural colony. Seven acres of forest land and five of "high-camp" make up a farmstead (Wirtschaft). The average yield on cleared forest land is as follows: maize and kafir corn 7-10 tons per acre, manioc, if harvested the first year after planting, 50 tons, and cotton 3½-5 tons per acre. The livestock industry, as in the rest of Paraguay, is probably the most profitable, but for lack of grazing land cannot expand in Friesland. There were in 1953 about 4,600 head of cattle, 600 horses, 480 hogs, and about 6,000 fowl. Fruit growing is also successful. The 1953 census shows 5,000 citrus fruit trees (oranges, lemons, limes, grapefruit, and tangerines), 4,000 mango, papayo, and peach trees, 4,000 banana plants, and 1,150 grapevines.

The present development of Friesland like that of the other Mennonite colonies in Paraguay has been made possible only through the generous assistance from North America. In spite of this the standard of living, as in the rest of Paraguay, is extremely low. Educational and cultural facilities are hardly offered in Paraguay. For those reasons there is a constant emigration to Brazil, the Argentine, and if at all possible to Canada. The men responsible for the welfare of the colony are of the opinion that if the colony is to succeed friends in North America must assist it in stabilizing its economy. This could perhaps be done by building and developing sugar mills to utilize the best-yielding product of the colony, and then to assist the colony in marketing as well as in imports.

Under the influence of Nazi propaganda, a considerable number of Mennonite young people returned to Germany just before World War II, together with some entire families. A.Fa.

J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953).

Friesland Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Colony Friesland, near Puerto Rosario in Alto Paraguay, is a member of the South American District Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church and since 1948 also a member of the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America. It was founded on Oct. 3, 1937, under the leadership of Kornelius Voth, assisted by Heinrich Braun, by members that had left the older Chaco settlements to establish a new colony in east Paraguay. Its members are largely farmers. The original membership was 153, increased by 1953 to 234. The church is served by six ministers and three deacons. Services are held regularly every Sunday in the village schools; however, construction has been begun on a new brick church in the village of Grossweide, with a planned seating capacity of 400. The first Sunday of each month is set aside for a special meeting of church members only. Saturday evening meetings as well as ladies' aid work and other phases of church life are carried on conjointly with the Mennonite Church. The congregation, however, has its own youth and choir work program. Footwashing is practiced. The leader is still the founder, Kornelius Voth, Grossweide, Friesland; since 1947 he has also been the leader of the Friesland Mennonite Brethren Church in Colony Volendam. J.F.

Friesland Mennonite Church, located in Colony Friesland near Puerto Rosario in Alto Paraguay, is a member of the South American Mennonite District Conference (since 1949) and also a member of the General Conference Mennonite Church. The church was organized on Oct. 10, 1937, with 30 members under the leadership of Abram Penner, assisted by Heinrich Wiens and Isaak Goerzen, adopting the motto, "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 3:11). Its members are a part of the total colony group that migrated from the Chaco to East Paraguay in 1937 and founded Colony Friesland. Leaders have been Abram Penner (to 1945), Abram Harder, and Johann Federau (present); the membership is 220, served by five ministers and two deacons. Worship services are held every Sunday in co-operation with the Mennonite Brethren Church, except the first Sunday of each month when only members meet, at first in the five village schools, and after 1951 in the brick church built in Central, seating capacity 400. Sunday schools are held as well as daily vacation Bible school. Weekly young people's meetings and choir work are carried on separately as a church program. Communion services are held two or three times a year. A.A.H.

Friesland, Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in (Conference of Mennonite Congregations in the Dutch Province of Friesland), usually called Friese Sociëteit (F.D.S.). This conference was founded in 1695 after other conferences had been founded in North Holland (the Frisian Conference and Waterlander or Rijper Conference) and in South Holland. A tour of Friesland by Jan van Ranst (q.v.) of Rotterdam seems to have contributed much to the foundation of the Friese Sociëteit (DB 1872, 64). The first meeting of the Friese Sociëteit was held on May 16, 1695. The aims of this conference were from its beginning to maintain love and peace among the congregations, to take care of poor congregations, and especially to subsidize the congregations which were unable to pay the salaries of their ministers. In later times new tasks were undertaken; pensioning of aged and ill ministers, of the widows and orphans of ministers (Weduwenfonds 1804), and a study fund (Friesch Studiefonds 1859, q.v.).

Initially the F.D.S. was subdivided into four Klassen (groups)—Harlingen, Franeker, Dokkum, and Sneek; but this division was soon abandoned, only a number of congregations in the southwest part of the province forming a special group, the Zuiderklasse (q.v.). In 1706-72 this Zuiderklasse acted as an independent conference. From the beginning the F.D.S. met annually at Leeuwarden, 1695-1710 on the first Wednesday after Pentecost, 1710-1804 on the first Friday after Pentecost, from then on the first Thursday after Pentecost. The conference has a board, first of 8 representatives of the congregations, now of 10.

In 1695, 47 of the congregations of the province of Friesland joined the conference. In course of time another nine congregations joined, those of Balk and Ameland not before 1855. Since then some congregations have died out or merged. Now all 44 congregations in the province of Friesland are members of the F.D.S. From 1695 until about 1800 also two congregations in the province of Groningen, i.e., Groningen, United Flemish and Waterlander congregation, and the Flemish congregation at Sappemeer, were members of the F.D.S. The work of this conference has proved to be of great importance. Though it could not prevent the dissolution of a number of churches, it has contributed much to the solidity and harmony of the congregations in Friesland. It generously supported the relief work in behalf of the Swiss and Prussian Mennonites in the first decades of the 18th century. A special meeting of the conference was held when in 1739 two Mennonite ministers of Friesland were suspended by the government (see Wytze Jeens and Pieke Tjommes). Then the F.D.S. sent a petition to the States of Friesland. After Johannes Stinstra (q.v.), Mennonite minister of Harlingen and president of the Friese Sociëteit, was suspended by the States of Friesland in 1742 another special meeting was held and a petition sent to the States of Friesland, which, however, was unsuccessful.

In 1797 the board of the F.D.S. declined an invitation of the government of Friesland to appoint at their own cost a theological professor to the University of Franeker, because the board was of opinion that the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary was adequate to supply the needs of training their ministers. Until 1859 the F.D.S. sometimes also appointed proponenten (ministerial candidates) after they had been examined by a committee. After 1859 no candidates were appointed any more, the conference of Friesland leaving this matter to the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference). The oration delivered on June 6, 1895, by P. W. Feenstra, on the occasion of the bicentenary of the F.D.S., was published in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1895. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 952-58; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 183-91, 193, 195, 197 f., 199 f., 202-5, 209-11, 213, 220 f.; DB 1895, 1-33.

Friezen: see Frisian Mennonites.

Frisch, Hans, an Anabaptist of Horb, Württemberg, Germany, where he had been baptized by Wilhelm Reublin. From the fall of 1529 he lived in Strasbourg, Alsace. Here he was seized and subjected to cross-examination (Nov. 23, 1534) in which he made some noteworthy statements about the Anabaptists of the city: there were three branches, with the views of Hofmann, Kautz, and Reublin respectively. Frisch himself was a deacon of the Reublin congregation; and it was his duty to announce the meetings which were held in the homes of the members of the church. He had also visited the Brethren in the vicinity of the city to collect money from them. Many foreign artisans, especially from Holland, had been with them and carried on a profitable business. Neff, vdZ.

A. Hulshof, Gesch. van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg . . . (Amsterdam, 1905) 154; Ztscht f. d. hist. Theol., 1860, 79; ML II, 12.

Frischau, a village and county in Moravia, about 15 miles east of Znaim. In the 16th century it changed owners a number of times. In 1581 Peter of the Tschertorej family settled the Hutterian Brethren on his estate, who built their Bruderhof "on the open field." As in Frischau, Hutterian Brethren were also found in the village of Maskowitz (q.v.). With a short interruption (1597-98) the Brethren remained in Frischau until the beginning of the Thirty Years' War; July 30, 1619, the house was plundered by the troops of Ferdinand II, and Aug. 2 burned down. Loserth.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher 276, 300, 324, and 326; Wolny, Topographie von Mähren (2nd edition) III, 207; ML II, 12.

Frischlin, Nikodemus (1547-90), classical philologist and Latin poet of Württemberg, Germany. In 1568 he was a professor at the University of Tübingen, and later the court poet of Duke Ludwig. In consequence of quarrels with other professors and the nobility he went to Laibach to become the head of a school in 1582. In 1584 he returned, but left again in two years to evade his enemies. After an eventful life in Prag, Wittenberg, Brunswick, and elsewhere, he was arrested in 1590 because of a challenging open letter he had addressed to the Württemberg government, and died in an attempt to escape from prison.

Among his poetic works his comedies are most important. One of them, presented in 1580 in Tübingen before princes and lords, printed several times between 1592 and 1619, twice in German translation (in 1606 by Johannes Bertesius and in 1613 by Arnold Glaser), is Phasma, Comœdia posthuma, nova et sacra de variis hæresibus et hæresiarchis, in Latin with German additions. An Anabaptist, Melibœus by name, an adherent of Carlstadt and Müntzer, stands in the center of the first and second acts. To his wife he defends in a rude tone of voice communism of possessions and of women, and in an argument with Luther he rejects infant baptism, oath, and government; he has sold his possessions and is going to Moravia. In the two following acts the Catholics are presented, as well as Zwingli, Karlstadt, and Schwenckfeld, while Brenz, the reformer of Württemberg, associates with Luther. In the last act Frischlin, although he occasionally has more liberal religious ideas, has all non-Lutherans, including our Anabaptist, condemned to hell by Christ, who is accompanied by Peter and Paul. Of the choruses between the acts, one is directed against heretics, and another contains requests to the government against the Anabaptists. E.C.

D. F. Strauss, Leben und Schriften des Dichters und Philologen Nicodemus Frischlin (Frankfurt, 1856) especially pp. 125-30; the translation of the first acts of the Phasma by Immanuel Hoch (Stuttgart, 1839) under the title, Die Religionsschwärmer oder Mucker; als da sind: Wiedertäufer, Nachtmahlsschwärmer und Schwenckfelder; K. Goedeke, Grundriss zur Geschichte der deutschen Dichtung II 2, ed. 2 (Dresden, 1886) 140 and 386; ML II, 12 f.

Frisian Islands (Dutch). To the Dutch province of Friesland belong three islands, Ameland, Schiermonnikoog, and Terschelling. Ameland (q.v.) had a population of 2,258 in 1947, of whom 311 were Mennonites. There are three congregations: Ballum, Hollum, and Nes. Schiermonnikoog had (1947) a population of 767, including 12 Mennonites. Terschelling (q.v.) had a population (1947) of 3,544, of whom 264 were Mennonites. It has one congregation with a meetinghouse at West-Terschelling. In the 17th century there was a small congregation here, belonging to the Jan Jakobsz group. Jacob Claassen, an elder 1612-38, baptized five new members here at one time. Further records do not exist. (ML II, 8.) K.V.

Frisian Mennonites (Dutch, Vriezen, Friezen; German, Friesen), a branch of the Dutch Mennonites in the past, which originated in 1566 in opposition to the Flemish group and was also transplanted to West Prussia. After a number of Mennonites had moved from Belgium to the Netherlands, differences arose at Franeker (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, between the newly arrived Belgian (Flemish) brethren and the local Frisian Mennonites. The Frisians took offense at the dress and manners of the Flemish, which they thought too worldly and too sumptuous, whereas to the mind of the Flemish the Frisians were not sober enough as to the furnishing of their houses. Other circumstances as well as personalities made the schism inevitable, especially since Dirk Philips (q.v.) was on the side of the Flemish, and Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) on the side of the Frisians. In June 1567 the parties separated and banned each other. All over the Netherlands, indeed, from Flanders to West Prussia, the Mennonites were divided into Frisians and Flemish, these names indicating not so much geographic descent, but rather becoming merely party names of two different Mennonite branches. Attempts made in 1568, 1574, 1582, and 1589 to bring about peace and union between the two bodies completely failed. (For a detailed account on the origin and development of the schism, as well as of the attempts at reconciliation, see the article Flemish Mennonites, and also DB 1893, 1-90, and Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 395-435.)

Neither the Flemish nor the Frisians remained one united body. As long as Jan Willemsz (q.v.), an outstanding Frisian leader, who had been very active in trying to reconcile the Flemish and Frisian groups, was alive, a split among the Frisians was averted, but soon after his death the Frisians divided. For many years great differences had been apparent in the Frisian group: some leaders like Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) and Thijs Gerritsz (q.v.) were austere and very conservative; they maintained that the (Frisian) Mennonite Church was the only real Christian church, stressed a strict practice of banning and shunning, and vindicated the old doctrine of Incarnation as taught by Menno Simons. Other leaders like Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) were moderate, did not seriously oppose marriage outside of the congregation, and admitted that the true church could also be found in other groups. These two wings of the Frisians divided. In 1589 Lubbert Gerritsz and his followers were banned by Thijs Gerritsz, Jan Jacobsz, and Joost Eeuwouts at Harlingen, because they had neglected to practice shunning of the banned spouse in marriage. From then there were two Frisian wings: one conservative, called Harde Vriezen (Strict Frisians), or sometimes known as Oude Vriezen (Old Frisians), and one more progressive, called Jonge Vriezen (Young Frisians), or Zachte (Slappe, or Tere) Vriezen (Moderate, Weak Frisians).

Among the Old Frisians several schisms followed soon after their separation from the Young Frisians, and this group was splintered into many subdivisions, e.g., Jan Jacobsgezinden, Thijs-Gerritszvolk, Pieter-Jeltjesvolk, etc. Most of their small congregations soon died out or merged with other Mennonites; the Jan-Jacobsgezinden (q.v.) maintained themselves on the island of Ameland until 1855.

An outstanding leader of the Old Frisians, who were very numerous in the province of North Holland, was Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.), an elder of the congregation of Hoorn in the first decades of the 17th century. Outstanding leaders among the Young Frisians were Pieter Willemsz Bogaert (q.v.), Hoyte Renix (q.v.), and Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.).

In 1591 and the following years most Young Frisians united with the High German Mennonites on the basis of the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). Some of them too merged with the Waterlanders. Lubbert Gerritsz too joined the Waterlanders and became their preacher in Amsterdam.

Mention should also be made of the Bekommerde Vriezen (q.v., Concerned Frisians), a group which was found in Harlingen and also in Danzig and other towns, who, deploring the schisms among the Mennonites and disapproving the mutual banning, but being too conservative to merge with High Germans and Waterlanders, united with the Flemish. At Harlingen this happened about 1610.

The old Frisian branch founded a sociëteit (conference) of Frisian congregations about 1630 in the province of North Holland, which existed until 1841 and then merged with the Rijper (Waterlander) Conference. Outside the Netherlands there were found a few Frisians in Antwerp, and among the Mennonites in Prussia.

The split lasted longest in Prussia and among the emigrants to Russia. Variant practices in the observance of communion and baptism could still be noticed at the beginning of the 20th century. In the Flemish congregations (Heubuden, Fürstenwerder Ladekopp, Tiegenhagen, Rosenort, and Elbing-Ellerwald) the preachers read their sermons while seated (Menn. Bl., 1912, 5), whereas in the Frisian congregations the sermons were not read (Thiensdorf, Markushof, Montau-Gruppe, Schönsee, Tragheimerweide, and Obernessau). In the Flemish group the baptismal candidate had to name two character witnesses, whose names were read from the pulpit; they baptized by pouring, and the Frisians by sprinkling. In the communion ceremony the Flemish elder distributed the bread to the members, who remained seated; in the Frisian congregations the members filed past the elder, who put the bread on the handkerchief of the member. In Friedrichstadt the unification occurred in 1698, in Danzig not until 1808 (Mannhardt, 89, 104). In West Prussia the ministers and elders of the two groups held annual conferences together beginning in 1772. The first instance of reception into the other group without rebaptism occurred in 1768. After the great Flemish conference at Petershagen on Feb. 9, 1778, where the question was discussed, but blocked by the Flemish, intermarriage between the two groups was quietly accepted.

In Russia, in accordance with an old Flemish regulation, only the elders, not the preachers, were ordained by the laying on of hands; this practice continued in some Flemish congregations until 1900. At the time of the original settlement in Russia (1789) the opposition between the two groups was still so sharp that the Flemish organized themselves into the Chortitza congregation and the Frisians into the Kronsweide congregation, and maintained strict separation between the two. The Dutch Mennonites made a futile appeal in a letter dated May 10, 1788, to the new settlers to unify: not until decades later did this happen, and then only gradually. (See Flemish Mennonites.) NEFF, vDZ.

DB 1912, 60-73; Ned. Archief voor Kerkgesch. XI (The Hague, 1914, issue 3) 185-240; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 431-34, 458-60; II, 71, 191-92; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 480, 482, 486-88, 522, 524, 528, 532 f., 546, 557, 558I, 568, 570, 572, 601, 605 f., II, Nos. 1406-12; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 44; ML II, 8 f.

Frock Coat. In Colonial America the dress coat of men was a long-tailed coat, with split tails for horseback riding; having no lapels it buttoned up to the top in front. There were no outside pockets. By the end of the 18th century the collar had risen as high as it could on the back and had turned over to make the modern lapel, which lapel still carries the buttonhole and notched corners of the old frock coat. During the 19th century the frock coat slowly passed out of general use in American society. In a general way the Mennonites (MC) tended to follow the changes in convention but only after their general adoption. Sometime during the 19th century Mennonite bishops began to accept baptismal candidates who wore coats with lapels. In the Franconia, Lancaster, and Washington-Franklin Mennonite conferences (MC) the ministers are still expected to wear the Colonial frock coat, while some of the laity wear a modern coat with lapels, and others wear a modern sack coat but without lapels, retaining the straight collar of the Colonial coat. Elsewhere Mennonite ministers (MC) generally wear the "plain" coat which has the short tail of the modern sack coat but the plain collar of the Colonial coat. Thus Mennonite ministers outside eastern Pennsylvania are indistinguishable from that portion of the laity which wear the "plain" coat. Fifty years ago there were a few Mennonite ministers who did not wear the "plain" coat: Bishop Martin Rutt (1840-1905), who wore a cutaway coat which had lapels, and Christian Brackbill and Frank M. Herr, both of whom preached over a decade in the Lancaster Conference before adopting the plain coat about 1911. John H. Oberholtzer's (q.v.) initial refusal to adopt the required coat was one of the factors leading to the division of 1847 in the Franconia Conference, although he ultimately did wear it. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, Historical and Biblical Position of the Mennonite Church on Attire (Scottdale, 1944); idem, Separated unto God (Scottdale, 1951) 81-86.

Froh Brothers Homestead, a Mennonite (MC) home for the aged, located about three miles east of Sturgis, Mich., on U.S. route 112, is operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind. The home is licensed by the State of Michigan as a nonprofit home for the aged and a convalescent home.

The institution was formerly a county home for the aged but was sold by the county to Clifford and Alfred Froh, who own the surrounding farm land, and named "Froh Brothers Homestead." In August 1952 the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities purchased the home and 80 acres of land. The Homestead was remodeled throughout to provide care for about 31 guests in addition to living quarters for the staff. Dedication services were held on Nov. 8, 1953.

A staff of about twelve serve at the Homestead under the direction of Ben and Laura Yoder, superintendent and matron. The Homestead is administered by a Board of Directors appointed annually by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Guests cared for in the home come from Mennonite churches and from the surrounding community. H.E.B.

Fröhlich, Samuel Heinrich (1803-57), founder of the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.) or Neutäufer, was born on July 4, 1803, at Brugg, canton of Aargau, Switzerland. He stemmed from a French Huguenot family named De Joyeux who fled from their homeland when Louis XIV revoked the Edict of Nantes, and settled in Switzerland where they translated their name to Fröhlich.

Fröhlich studied theology at Basel and Zürich universities. He was ordained in the Reformed Church and served the congregations at Wagenhausen, canton of Thurgau, and Leutwil, canton of Aargau. Wherever he preached he caused a spiritual revival. In 1830 a catechism was put into use in the Reformed Church that he felt reflected a naturalistic or rationalistic religion to which he could not subscribe. The following year he was dismissed from the Reformed Church ministry. During this time he was in contact with the Continental Society of London who had missionaries in Geneva. In 1832 he was baptized by sprinkling by a missionary of this society. In 1831-32 he made four missionary journeys through Switzerland. The first one was in Aargau. He preached to his former church at Leutwil as well as to others whom he could interest. The second journey was through the Bernese Oberland and the city of Bern, in July and August 1832. His third missionary journey during August and September 1832 centered in the Emmental, where he preached to the Mennonite congregation. He found fertile ground for his teachings in the ministers Christen Gerber and Christen Baumgartner and some 61 other members of the congregation who felt that the spiritual life of their church was very low. During the following years they formed a new congregation. Fröhlich's contacts with the Mennonites also had an influence on him. He accepted their teaching on nonresistance. In October and November 1832 his fourth missionary journey took him to Zürich and eastern Switzerland. Here he met Susette Brunschwiler of Hauptwil, canton of Thurgau, whom he married in 1836. In January 1833, upon the invitation of the Continental Society of London, he went to England for a stay of five months. He then returned to the cantons of Aargau and Zürich where he preached and taught in the face of growing persecution from the state church authorities. In March 1843 he was expelled from Zürich as a sectarian. His marriage was never recognized by the Swiss authorities because it was not performed by a minister of the state church. Fröhlich moved to Strasbourg in June 1844 where he continued his activities of directing the work in Switzerland by letter and also by infrequent visits. He suffered much from sickness. He died on Jan. 15, 1857. He held up to 450 meetings per year. Though he was often so weak that he had to be led to the pulpit, his strength always returned as soon as he began to preach. He wrote annually between 200 and 300 letters in duplicate besides keeping a diary. The grave of Samuel H. Fröhlich is marked to this day by a plain gravestone in the St. Helena Cemetery in Strasbourg. D.L.G.

Herman Ruegger, Apostolic Christian Church History (1949) 36-72; idem, Aufzeichnungen über Entstehung und Bekenntnis der Gemeinschaft Evangelisch Taufgesinnter (Zürich, 1948); U.S. Bureau of the Census, Religious Bodies, 1936; ML II, 13.

Frölich, A., a pastor in Hürtigheim, Alsace, France, author of the book, Sectentum und Separatismus im jetzigen kirchlichen Leben der evangelischen Bevölkerung Elsass-Lothringens (Strasbourg, 1889), which discusses the Mennonites (pp. 14-23). In the introduction he calls them "the peaceful descendants of the once wild and rude Anabaptist mobs," of whom he presents a completely false caricature. He explains that these Anabaptists found Alsace-Lorraine "probably because here there were still some remnants of older sects, and also because people were more tolerant here. This was particularly true of Strasbourg, where the synod of 1533 sought to prevent sectarianism. Through Menno Simons the movement was led into quieter channels." Then an attempt is made to describe their prosperity in Alsace-Lorraine and their experiences under pressure and persecution, in addition to their doctrines; but nothing new is presented. Of interest are the accounts of contemporary Mennonitism in Alsace-Lorraine, which are quoted in the article Alsace. (ML II, 13.) Neff.

Frölich, Georg, "known as Letus from the Lömnitz, native of Vogtland," born in Egerland, Bohemia, on the Bohemian border not far from Lomnitz, probably in 1500, was city recorder first in Nürnberg (1524), and then in Augsburg (1536), where with a few interruptions he was still living in 1554, the publisher of a book, Das fürtreffenlich buoch Isocratis, vom Reich zu Nicocli dem Künig in Cypern geschriben (Isokrates, de Regno) . . . yetzt erstmals treülich verteutscht. Allen Oberkeiten nützbarlich onnd notwendig zu wissen (Augspurg, 1548). According to Calvary, Mitteilungen aus dem Antiquariate (Berlin, 1870, Verzeichnis V and VI, p. 49), the author opposes persecution of the sects and offers noteworthy data on the status of the Anabaptists in the Swabian regions. A copy of the book is in the British Museum. (ML II, 13.) Neff.

Frölichin (Zieglerin), Dorothea, a member of the Anabaptist congregation of Augsburg (q.v.), Germany, a widow, was branded on both cheeks and banished from the city on April 21, 1528, because she was baptized and had lodged Anabaptists in her house. Hege.

Fr. Roth, Ztscht des hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVII (1900) 30; ML II, 13.

Froschauer Bibles and Testaments. This term is used for the German Bibles and Testaments published by Christoph Froschauer (q.v.). They were very popular because of the clear type, pictorial decoration, and popular language. The following Froschauer Bibles are known: 1524 to 1529 fol., 1527-1529 in 16 (in these two editions the separate parts appeared at intervals), 1530 in 8, 1531 fol., 1534 in 8, 1536 fol., 1538 in 8, 1540 fol., 1542 in 8, 1545 fol., 1545 in 8, 1550 in 8, 1552 in 8, 1553 fol., 1556 fol., 1560 in 8, 1561 in 8, 1565 fol., 1570 in 8, 1571 fol., 1580 fol., 1586 fol., 1589 in 4. Froschauer New Testaments appeared as follows: 1524 in 8, 1524 fol., 1525 in 8, undated in 16 (1528?), 1533 in 16, 1534 in 16 (?), 1535 Latin and German in 8, 1542 in 16, 1557 in 8, 1565 in 8, 1570 in 8, 1574 in 8, 1581 in 4.

The Froschauer Bibles and Testaments were originally reprints of Luther's translation, altered in word order and vocabulary, more rarely in the text itself. Until 1525 they have Swiss vocalization; e.g., Rom. 12:20, So wirstu führige kolen vff sin houpt samlen. In 1527 the New High German diphthongs, au, ei, and eu were adopted. Since the Prophets were still lacking in Luther's translation, the Zürich preachers in 1529 issued this part of the Old Testament in a special translation, based on the translation of Ludwig Haetzer and Hans Denk, which had been published in Worms in 1527, and which the Zürich preachers considered a faithful translation from the Hebrew. Thus it came about that in 1529 a complete translation of the entire Bible was printed by Froschauer, several years before Luther's complete Bible appeared. From the continual revision of this combined Bible rose the actual "Zürich Bible," whose text deviated more and more from Luther's, without, however, losing all traces of its original dependence.

Among the people, especially the Anabaptists, the first editions of the Froschauer Bibles and Testaments were greatly loved. Thus the remarkable thing happened that in the course of the centuries those old editions were several times reprinted word for word. The oldest of these reprints known to us is "Das gantz Neuw Testament grundtlich vnnd wol verteutschet . . . . Gedruckt zu Basel durch Leonhart Ostein 1588," the basis of which was the (16 mo) edition of 1533. A further edition is said to have been published in 1647, also at Basel. In 1687 it was again reprinted by Hans Jacob Werenfels in the print shop of the bookbinder Jerome Schwarz, in an edition of 1,000 in octavo. Of the next reprint by the Basel printer Johann Jacob Genath for the bookbinder Caspar Suter in Zofingen in an edition of 1,500 printed in 6 mo in 1702, only the title is known: "Das gantze neüwe Testament unseres Herren und Heylands Jesu Christi."

Very likely the undated reprint with the title, "Das gantz nüw Testament Vnsers Herrn Jesu Christi, Recht grundtlich vertütscht," was also printed in Basel, in 1729. Its basis was the Froschauer New Testament of 1525. All of these reprints were forbidden in Bernese territory as Anabaptist Testaments, and wherever found they were confiscated. Repeatedly the Bern council appealed to the Basel authorities to punish the publishers and printers of these Testaments. The following reprints bear the same antique title, including the former symbol of the printer Niklaus Brylinger (three lions with an hourglass), also found on the Basel reprints of 1588 and 1687; instead of the place of printing is found "Frankfurt und Leipzig anno 1737" (1790 and 1825). The last are known as the Täufer-Testamente, which were likewise doubtless printed in Basel. In 1744 a reprint of the entire Bible, i.e., the folio edition of 1536 was issued. The book was printed in Strasbourg "bey Simon Kürssner, Cantzley-Buchdrucker." In the foreword the reason for the reprint is stated; namely, that the edition of 1536 was in great demand for its faithful translation and had now become very rare. In 1787 the Froschauer New Testament was reprinted at Ephrata, Pa., by the Cloister Press, for the Pennsylvania Mennonites.† A.Fl.

J. J. Mezger, Geschichte der deutschen Bibelübersetzung in der schweizerischen reformierten Kirche (Basel, 1876); Ad. Fluri, Luthers Uebersetzung des Neuen Testaments und ihre Nachdrucke in Basel und Zürich 1522-1531 (Schweizerisches Evangelisches Schulblatt, 1922, Nos. 35 ff.); Ad. Fluri, Bern und die Froschauerbibel mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der sogenannten Täufer-Testamente (supplement of Bernische Geschichte, 1922), and Das Täufertestament von 1687 (supplement of Bernische Geschichte, 1923); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); J. Gasser, Vierhundert Jahre Zwingli-Bibel 1524-1924 (Zürich, 1924); ML II, 14.

Froschauer, Christoph, renowned publisher of Zürich, Switzerland, born in Neuburg near Oettingen (Bavaria), acquired Zürich citizenship Nov. 9, 1519, as a gift "for his art." His earliest dated books bear the date 1521. He early attached himself to the Reformation; in 1522 he was one of the chief transgressors against the fasting laws. He published principally writings of Zwingli, Bullinger, Leo Jud, Rudolph Gwalter, Theodor Bibliander, Conrad Pellican. He won great renown for his numerous beautifully executed Bibles. "What Lufft was in Wittenberg, Froschauer was in Zürich." Most of the Bernese Reformation writings were also printed by him, since there was no printer in Bern until 1537.

Froschauer had no children. He therefore took his brother Eustachius and his nephews Eustachius and Christoph into the business, which he enlarged in 1532 by the purchase of a paper mill. He died April 1, 1564. His nephew Christoph took over the printing business, Eustachius the paper mill. Christoph Froschauer II likewise had no children. After his death, Feb. 2, 1585, the heirs carried on the business until 1590 and labeled their products "Gedruckt in der Froschow." A.Fl.

S. Voegelin, Christoph Froschauer (Zürich, 1840); idem, "Die Holzschneidekunst in Zürich im 16. Jahrhundert," in Neujahrsblätter der Zürcher Stadtbibliothek 1879-82; E. C. Rudolphi, Die Buchdrucker-Familie Froschauer in Zürich (1869); P. Heitz, Die Zürcher Büchermarken (1895); Ulrich Zwingli, Festschrift zur Gedächtnis der Zürcher Reformation (Zürich, 1919); A. Fluri, Die Beziehungen Berns zu den Buchdruckern in Basel, Zürich und Genf (Bern, 1913); P. Leeman, Die Offizin Froschauer (Zürich, 1940); ML II, 13f.

Fröse (Froese, Frös, Froes, Froesen, Frese, Vreesz, Fresz, Friese), a Mennonite family name in West Prussia, appearing in rural Frisian congregations and at Danzig. It was first mentioned 1655. In the earlier forms this family name cannot clearly be distinguished from the name Friesen; possibly both names developed from the same root. In 1776, 59 families of this name were counted in West Prussia (without Danzig), 254 persons in 1910, 195 persons in 1935. Peter Fröse (q.v.) of West Prussia was a Mennonite writer and elder.

At least 11 Froese Mennonite ministers were serving churches in 1953. Six of these were in Manitoba, two in Brazil, one in British Columbia, one in Saskatchewan, and one in Ontario. In the United States, at least 17 Froese families were living in the Buhler-Inman, Kan., area in 1949. G.R.

Fröse, Peter (d. 1853), elder of the Mennonite congregation of Orlofferfelde, West Prussia, Germany, author of the booklet, Liebreiche Erinnerung an die mennonitischen Glaubensgenossen in Hinsicht des Artikels von der Wehrlosigkeit. In Einfalt, aber aus Liebe und guter Absicht mitgeteilt (Tiegerweide near Tiegenhof, West Prussia, 1850).

The foreword of the 38-page booklet is signed by the ministers of the Mennonite church at Orlofferfelde in May 1861. In addition to a detailed Biblical foundation for nonresistance it presents from Gottfried Arnold's Wahre Abbildung der ersten Christen testimonies of the Church Fathers Tertullian, Irenaeus, Hilary, Origen, and Chrysostomus, as also the ideas of the Waldenses and Menno Simons' views on nonresistance from Hermann Schijn's history of the Mennonites. Fröse closes with an ardent appeal to Mennonite elders and preachers to hold fast to this important doctrine. (ML II, 15.) Neff.

Fuchsberger (Fuchsperger), Ortolf, a lawyer and imperial councilor, who lived in Bavaria and Austria during the Reformation. He was a native of Tittmoning, studied at the University of Ingolstadt, and after a brief residence in Altötting he became court judge and secretary in the Mondsee (or Manse, Mänse) monastery. His first publication was a small text for the study of Latin, his last, Teutscher Jura regulae. The first book on logic in German and the first German translation of the Institutiones of Emperor Justinian were written by him. On Jan. 17, 1528, he published in Landshut a Kurtze schlossrede wider den jrsall der neügerottenn Tauffer. It was addressed to Ernst Wolfgang Schwartzdorffer at Straubing, Bavarian treasurer, in order to show him with what arguments the abbot had brought some Anabaptists back into the Catholic Church. He concludes that since baptism takes the place of circumcision, baptism must like circumcision be performed in infancy, and proves his contention with references to the Bible, Origines, Augustine, Raimundus Lullus, and the imperial law. He tries to prove that baptism does not assume express faith on the part of the infant, and to weaken the objection that circumcision cannot be used as an argument because it concerned only boys, whereas baptism concerns all children. (ADB VIII, 174 f.; ML II, 15.) E.C.

Fulda. In the government district of Fulda, Germany, which once included 18 towns and 20 districts around the old cathedral city Fulda, Anabaptism found entry in its earliest period. It was propagated from the south and west of Germany and from Thuringia by migrating preachers. Especially Jörg or Georg of Staffelstein (q.v.), and Nikolaus Schreiber, a former Protestant preacher at Hünfeld, were prominent. They succeeded in establishing a large Anabaptist congregation in Grossenbach, a village near Hünfeld, in 1529. They lived a quiet retired life. Their religious services they held in the homes in the evening. Usually they met in the house of the brothers Hans and Heinz Meister, and here they observed communion. The record states that Georg broke several bites of bread, dipped them in the wine, blessed them, and gave them to others. Baptism was performed either by making the sign of the cross(?) on the forehead of the baptismal candidate (presumably with water) or by pouring water three times over his head. All that pertained to the world was forbidden, such as wedding celebrations and attendance at the state church. Simplicity of dress, moderation in eating and drinking, penitence and peaceable living, mutual love and benevolence were their characteristics. Their greeting was, "The peace of the Lord be with you!"

Soon bloody persecution broke upon the Fulda Anabaptists. In 1529 ten members of the congregation at Grossenbach were seized and on Dec. 7 cross-examined. This was repeated a week before Christmas on the rack. Four others were arrested. It was learned that a large part of the village adhered to the Anabaptists. After the third trial, on Jan. 4, 1530, the prisoners recanted. The following names are known: Velten Romeisen, Hans Lober, Adam Meister, Hans Knoth, and Matthias Werner.

Later in the same year, 1530, 19 Anabaptists of Grossenbach were arrested, five of whom had recanted the year before. They were probably executed. The Henneberg chronicle records that Abbot Johannes of Henneberg had ordered several Anabaptists at Fulda to be beheaded in 1530. In other villages Anabaptists were also arrested, as in Biberstein, Rimels, Treichfeld, Soisdorf, Gersdorf, Schlitz, and Mues.

After 1532, according to the report of J. Kartels, seditious tendencies were noted in the Anabaptists of Fulda. Their leaders were reported to be Hans of Fulda and Peter the Anabaptist. Although men like Hans of Kaiserslautern, Hans of Kreuznach, and Hans Beck of Büdingen are named, there were not likely any Münsterite Anabaptists among them, for in these places there were apparently only quiet Anabaptists. Robbers and arsonists like Hans Krug and Hans Schott were criminals who used Anabaptism as a shield for their evil deeds.

On March 25, 1532, at Spahl in the Rockenstuhl district about 40 persons, some of them Anabaptists, some of them curious spectators, were surprised at a meeting, overpowered, and taken to Fulda, where they are reported to have conducted themselves very fanatically. Those who did not recant were executed (Wappler, 82 ff.).

Eberhard Arnold (q.v.) established a modern Hutterite Bruderhof in the Rhön district near Fulda in 1923, called the Rhönbruderhof (q.v.), which continued until it was dissolved by the Hitler government in 1937. NEFF.

J. Kartels, "Die Wiedertäuferbewegung im ehemaligen Hochstift Fulda," in Fuldaer Geschichtsblätter I (1902) 3-20. As sources he names Schannat, Historia Fuldensis (Frankfurt, 1720), the literature in the Fulda library, and the Anabaptists' trial records of the Marburg state archives; P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526 bis 1584 (Jena, 1913); ML II, 15 f.

Fulton County, Ohio, is in the northwestern part of the state, bordered by Henry County on the south and by Michigan on the north. The Mennonite settlement of this region, consisting in 1955 of more than 2,600 baptized members, centers at Archbold in German Township, in the southwest corner of the county. From German Township it extends westward into Williams County, south into Henry County, north into Franklin and Dover townships, and east to Wauseon, the county seat. Archbold is 40 miles west of Toledo and 26 miles east of the Indiana state line.

The early settlers were French and Alsatian Amish Mennonites from the region of Montbéliard and Mulhouse, the first of whom arrived in 1834. By 1850 many families had arrived, including such names as Beck, Frey, Lauber, Rufenacht, Rupp, Stuckey and Wyse. The main body of the settlement eventually affiliated with what came to be the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Joint Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC). The first meetinghouse was the Central Amish Mennonite Church, erected in 1870, two and three-fourths miles northeast of Archbold. In 1908 two new meetinghouses were added: West Clinton, six miles southeast of Central; and Lockport, six miles west, in Williams County. In 1956 there were eleven meetinghouses, representing seven independent congregations and four mission stations, extending from suburban Toledo to Hicksville near the Indiana border, with a total of ca. 1963 members in the Ohio and Eastern Conference. The first minister was Christian Beck who had been ordained in Switzerland. Well-known

Fulton County bishops in the later period were Christian Stuckey (1841-1907) and Elias L. Frey (1856-1942).

In 1956 the Fulton County settlement also included one small congregation of the Reformed Mennonite Church; one of the Church of God in Christ Mennonites with 33 members; and two congregations of the Conference of Evangelical Mennonites (formerly Defenseless Mennonites), one in Archbold and the other in Wauseon, with a combined membership of 621 (1955 statistics). All three of these groups were originally formed in the 1860's.

In 1956 the Fulton County Mennonites had representatives on the foreign mission field in Africa, India, and Japan. The local mission congregation was serving the needs of the Mexican farm laborers who reside in the community. In 1956 the secretary-treasurer of the Congo Inland Mission was Harvey A. Driver of Wauseon, of the Conference of Evangelical Mennonites.

Fulton County leadership was largely responsible for the founding of Little Eden camp at Onekama, Mich., in 1945. From an economic point of view the Fulton County settlement is unique because of its large number of small community industries, such as woodworking, meat packing, and the manufacture of farm machinery. G.F.H.

Funck, Heinrich (d. 1760), a European Mennonite settler who located along the Indian Creek in what is now Franconia Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., about 30 miles north of Philadelphia. He married Anne, daughter of immigrant Christian Meyer and they became the parents of ten children, including Preacher Henry Funck and Bishop Christian Funck (1721-1811), the latter being the founder of the Funkites (q.v.), who withdrew from the Franconia Conference in 1778 because they favored recognizing the independence of the American Colonies before the end of the Revolutionary War. Funck was a farmer, miller, and bishop. He wrote two books, Ein Spiegel der Tauffe (Mirror of Baptism) in 1744, and Eine Restitution, Oder eine Erklaerung einiger Haupt-puncten des Gesetzes (Restitution, or an Explanation of Several Principal Points of the Law), the latter being left as an unpublished manuscript at his death in 1760; his children arranged for its publication in 1763. Funck collaborated in sponsoring the publication of the 1748 German Martyrs' Mirror, and he and Dielman Kolb read the proofs page by page as they came off the Ephrata presses. Funck was the most important writer among the Mennonites in Colonial America. His grave is lost, but it is known that he was intimately associated with both the Salford and Franconia congregations of the Franconia Conference. (ML II, 17.) J.C.W.

Fundament, Dat, des Christelycken leers, by Menno Simons, or Fundamentboeck: see Foundation.

Fundamentalism, a movement in conservative American Protestantism in the first half of the 20th century of reaction against the growth of theological liberalism and modernism, derived its name largely from two sources: (1) the publication in 1909 of a series of 12 small volumes in defense of conservative theology called The Fundamentals, of which almost 3,000,000 copies were circulated (2,000,000 in America and 1,000,000 in the wider English-speaking world), and (2) the World Christian Fundamentals Association, which was organized at Philadelphia in 1919 and continued in existence until its merger in 1950 with the Slavic Missionary Society. At its organizing meeting the W.C.F.A. adopted the following statement of Christian fundamentals as standards of evangelical orthodoxy:

I. We believe in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as verbally inspired of God, and inerrant in the original writings, and that they are supreme and final authority in faith and life.
II. We believe in one God, eternally existing in three persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.
III. We believe that Jesus Christ was begotten by the Holy Spirit, and was born of the Virgin Mary, and is true God and true man.
IV. We believe that man was created in the image of God, that he sinned and thereby incurred not only physical death but also that spiritual death which is separation from God, and that all human beings are born with a sinful nature, and, in case of those who reach moral responsibility, become sinners in thought, word, and deed.
V. We believe that the Lord Jesus Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures as a representative and substitutionary sacrifice; and that all that believe in Him are justified on the ground of His shed blood.
VI. We believe in the resurrection of the crucified body of our Lord, in His ascension into heaven, and in His present life there for us, as High Priest and Advocate.
VII. We believe in "that blessed hope," the personal, premillennial, and imminent return of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.
VIII. We believe that all who receive by faith the Lord Jesus Christ are born again of the Holy Spirit and thereby become children of God.
IX. We believe in the bodily resurrection of the just and the unjust, the everlasting blessing of the saved and the everlasting conscious punishment of the lost.

The evangelical movement of protest against the inroads of modernism began long before the W.C.F.A., and was far more widespread than this organization, but the W.C.F.A. focused the movement and for a time gave it greatly increased vigor and influence. It had its earlier roots in interdenominational Bible conferences and Prophetic conferences, and it found organized expression in several of the larger Protestant denominations, particularly, Baptist, Methodist, Disciples, and Presbyterian. Numerous other interdenominational conservative organizations and institutions, such as the widespread Bible institutes and numerous local and regional Bible conferences as well as a considerable amount of periodical and pamphlet literature, contributed to the strength of Fundamentalism. A number of smaller orthodox denominations joined the movement en masse. The outstanding Fundamentalist leader was W. B. Riley of Minneapolis, president of the W.C.F.A. throughout its history, and militant advocate of its cause, founder and long-time president of the Northwestern Bible Institute.

The movement reached its height during the period of 1925-30, after which it declined rapidly in volume and strength. Part of the loss in strength was due to excessive polemicism and a certain hyper-fundamentalism which proved unattractive to the masses and quite unsatisfactory to moderate conservatives. The strong emphasis on nondenominationalism alienated others. In the large denominations the Fundamentalists failed in their intent to capture the organizational machinery, and consequently many Fundamentalists withdrew from the denominations to form independent fundamentalist churches and affiliations. Furthermore, the growing tide of Neo-orthodoxy in the second quarter of the century displaced much of outright modernism in the denominations. By 1955 only a small remnant of organized Fundamentalism remained, its most polemic and vocal wing, represented chiefly by the rather small American Council of Christian Churches. The smaller evangelical denominations, which had sympathized largely with Fundamentalism, organized the National Association of Evangelicals in 1942, which has several times the constituency membership of the A.C.C.C.

American Mennonites, historically fully evangelical and orthodox, and deeply loyal to the Bible, were not unaffected by the organized Fundamentalist movement. Here and there individual Mennonite pastors joined the local or regional and national Fundamentalist organizations, and occasionally served as leaders in them. Most Mennonites sympathized warmly with the struggle against modernism, although modernism had had only small success in infiltrating the several Mennonite denominational bodies. Some Mennonite colleges were for a time under considerable suspicion, criticism, and attack for liberal tendencies. By and large, however, the Mennonite groups did not formally join the Fundamentalist ranks, although they almost without exception held to the fundamentals and considered themselves to be fundamentalists in a descriptive sense. When the N.A.E. was organized the only Mennonite body to join it was the Mennonite Brethren Church. Grace Bible Institute, an inter-Mennonite educational institution, founded at Omaha, Neb., in 1945, undoubtedly owes its existence in a large part to the Fundamentalist spirit in several Mennonite bodies. The more conservative Mennonite bodies were aided in their resistance to Fundamentalist influences by their traditional objection to outside influences and contacts, and by their strong insistence upon nonresistance, which the Fundamentalists usually sharply rejected (many Fundamentalists manifested a strongly militaristic spirit). In a few cases, however, schisms occurred in local Mennonite congregations over fundamentalist-type issues, some as late as 1954-56, the withdrawing groups at times dropping the name Mennonite altogether.

Considerable Fundamentalist influence has been exercised upon some Mennonite bodies through attendance of their young people at Fundamentalist Bible institutes. The close union of Premillennialism and Dispensationalism with Fundamentalism has contributed to the considerable growth of these systems of thought in some Mennonite bodies, again often through the Bible institutes. The polemic spirit of Fundamentalism has also at times infected Mennonites and contributed to tension and contention. That certain Calvinistic doctrines such as eternal security have been adopted by some Mennonites is due almost entirely to Fundamentalist influence, Fundamentalists being largely Calvinistic in theology.

From the vantage point of 1956, with a considerably faded Fundamentalism and a generally subsiding Fundamentalist influence, Mennonites, though generally continuing to insist upon a conservative evangelical theology and resisting Modernism in any form, see more clearly than before that they belong neither in the Modernist nor Fundamentalist camps, but have a satisfactory Biblicism and evangelicalism of their own with its unique Anabaptist heritage.

H.S.B.

S. G. Cole, The History of Fundamentalism (N.Y., 1931); Daniel Kauffman, The Mennonite Church and Current Issues (Scottdale, 1923), Chap. III; John Horsch, Modern Religious Liberalism (Scottdale, 1920); idem, Is the Mennonite Church Free from Modernism? (Scottdale, 1926); J. L. Stauffer, "Fundamentalism and Fundamentalists," Sword and Trumpet, April 1933, 16-20; idem, "Faulty Fundamentalists," ibid., October 1931, 13; Gerald Studer, "The Influence of Fundamentalism on the American Mennonite Church" (unpublished thesis Goshen College Biblical Seminary, 1949); idem, "Is Fundamentalism Enough?" Gospel Herald XLI (1948) 486 f.; H. S. Bender, "Outside Influences on Mennonite Thought," Menn. Life X (1955) 45-48.

Funeral Customs of the Mennonites throughout the centuries have not yet been studied. The following are some observations pertaining to the Mennonites of Prusso-Russian background. In the days of persecution and martyrdom the experiences, faith, steadfastness, and suffering of the Anabaptists were recorded in the form of poems which found their way into early hymnals. To what extent this practice is connected with that of recording the life work and faith of outstanding leaders in a poem written at the close of a life and sung as a hymn at the funeral, has not been established. However, this was an early practice among the Dutch and Prussian Mennonites. A biographical sketch of Giesbrecht Franssen was narrated in a song at the close of his life and was printed in the Jacob Jacobsz Liedeboek in 1604.

H. G. Mannhardt made some relevant observations on the funeral customs of the Mennonites of Prussia and Danzig. He believes that they did not use their churches for funeral services, but met in homes; and that funeral sermons were not preached before the beginning of the 19th century, the service consisting rather in singing a song composed for the occasion by a friend or relative. The Danzig Mennonite Church had a number of Dutch and German songs written for such occasions in the 18th century. Thus at Elder Dirk Jantzen's death Gergen Berentz wrote "Een Lied over het afsterven van den lieven Oudsten Dirk Jantzen" consisting of 28 stanzas, the singing of which could have consumed as much time as a funeral sermon. Hans van Steen, Jr., wrote a funeral song of 14 stanzas for Elder Hans von Allmonde, who died 1753. For Hans von Steen's funeral Jan Lambertz wrote a song of 16 stanzas. At the death of Elder Hans von Steen in 1781, one of the first funeral songs in the German language was used, written by Hans Momber and consisting of 24 stanzas.

This tradition continued in modified form among the Prussian Mennonites up to World War II. Well-known hymns were printed especially for the occasion. Numerous copies have been preserved. The congregations also printed smaller song books for special occasions, such as Sammlung Christlicher Verlobungs-, Trauungs-, Jubiläums- und Begräbnis-Gesänge (Ebing, 1908) and Christliche Trauungs- und Begräbniss-Gesänge . . . , the fourth edition of which appeared at Danzig in 1858. Judging by the fact that non-Mennonite prayer books and liturgical aids have been preserved in Mennonite homes, it may be assumed that they were used occasionally in times of bereavement.

The modified form in which the practice of composing a hymn or poem at the time of death continued among the Prussian Mennonites up to recent times was known as Grabschrift and consisted of a poem. Mannhardt presents some of them in his book Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (p. 116). The Prussian Mennonites had a special church office for the purpose of announcing and inviting relatives and friends for funerals, weddings, etc., and the person in charge of this office was called the Umbitter (q.v.). This office gradually disappeared during the 19th century. The various editions of the Mennonite ministers' manuals in Germany, Holland, and America make provision for the use of certain forms in conducting a funeral service. (See Burial and Cemeteries.) C.K.

Kanselboek ten Dienste van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Nederland; The Minister's Manual (Newton, 1950); Handbuch zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen zunächst für die Aeltesten und Prediger der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Nord-Amerika (Berne, 1921); R. C. Kauffman, "Our 'Christian' Funerals," Menn. Life III (July 1947); H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919).

Funk (Funck), name of a Swiss Mennonite family, native to the canton of Zürich, probably in the Kronau district, found in the Palatinate in the 17th and 18th centuries. Henry Funk, a preacher of the canton of Bern, was scourged and expelled from Bern about 1671. Mennonite Funks appear in the records in the vicinity of Heidelberg as follows: Michelfeld 1662, Schaffhausen 1685, Richen 1717, Reihen 1724, Rohrbach 1752, and later in Eppingen 1778, where families of Funcks are listed from that time on until recent times. In every generation there have been preachers and elders among them. In 1710 Hans Funk was one of the original settlers in what is now Lancaster (q.v.) County, Pa. Pioneer Henry Funck (q.v., d. 1760) located in what is now Franconia (q.v.) Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., in 1719. A Jacob Funck was living in the Palatinate in 1753. The name Funk is fairly common among South German Mennonites today; Christine Funck of near Heilbronn in Württemberg married the church historian John Horsch (q.v., 1867-1941). In America Henry Funck of Franconia served long as bishop in the Franconia Conference, and was the author of two books, Spiegel der Tauffe (1744) and a posthumous work, Eine Restitution (1763). His son Christian Funk (q.v., 1731-1811) was a Mennonite minister in the Franconia Conference (1756-?) until the Funk schism, when he was excommunicated with his uncle Christian; he later served as a minister in the Virginia Conference (MC), having moved to Virginia in 1786. The latter's son Joseph (q.v., 1778-1862) became "the father of song in northern Virginia" (among the Mennonites), establishing his music publishing house at Singers Glen in Rockingham County in 1847, which firm ultimately became Ruebush, Kieffer and Co. But by far the most distinguished descendant of Pioneer Henry Funck was John F. Funk (q.v., 1835-1930), born in Bucks Co., Pa., but who did his lifework in Elkhart Co., Ind. Launching the Herald of Truth and its companion Herold der Wahrheit in 1864, Funk was soon a powerful influence in the Mennonite Church (MC). He was ordained a preacher in 1865 and a bishop in 1892. He organized the Mennonite Publishing Co., Elkhart, Ind., in 1875. The Mennonite Publication Board bought Funk's publications in 1908 and the Herald of Truth was merged with the new Gospel Witness (q.v.) to form the organ of the denomination (MC), the Gospel Herald. There have been numerous other ministers named Funk among the American Mennonites. Mention should also be made of Isaac Kauffman Funk (1839-1912), of Funk, Wagnalls, and Co., who was of Mennonite descent. The founder of the noted Funk Hybrid Corn Company of Bloomington, Ill., was a son of a Mennonite formerly in Baden-Württemberg.

The name Funk (Funck) was also found in West Prussia, appearing in all Frisian as well as in the Old Flemish congregations. At Danzig it has been mentioned since 1674. In 1776, 15 families of this name were counted (without Danzig); in 1935, 35 persons (including Elbing). Stephan Funk (q.v.) was a prominent 18th-century Prussian Mennonite minister. In 1953 seven Funks were serving as Mennonite ministers in Canada, five in the United States, and seven in Paraguay. A principal center of the Funk family is Hillsboro, Kan., where 37 were listed in the 1949 telephone directory.

The relation to the Swiss Mennonite Funk family has not been clarified, but it seems probable that immigrants from Switzerland, South Germany, or Moravia carried the name to Danzig, since the name is otherwise not found in Holland or North Germany. One theory holds that the West Prussian Funks derive from Hutterite immigrants from Moravia. The name appears in the Thorn area in 1700. Another theory holds that they derive from Swiss Mennonite immigrants to Lithuania. The Waterlander (also called Frisian) congregation of the Kleine Werder near Elbing, which was formed directly of immigrants from Lithuania in 1732, had several Funck preachers: Peter Funck, after 1755, and Adam Funck after 1751. (See the Naamlijst of 1757 and 1766.) J.C.W.

A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of Bishop Henry Funck . . . and a . . . Family Register (Elkhart, 1898); ML II, 16.

Funk, Christian (1731-1811), b. in Franconia Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., the son of Bishop Henry Funk. He married Barbara, daughter of Preacher Julius Cassel, in 1751. Nine children were born to this union. His father ordained him to the ministry for the Franconia circuit about 1756. He was confirmed as bishop in 1769. According to the letter of 1773 addressed to the Mennonites of Holland, which was probably written by Christian Funk, the bishop district included the congregations of Franconia, Plain, Salford, Rockhill, and Line Lexington.

Christian Funk was an able leader with very decided views, which finally led to the first schism among the American Mennonites. The American Revolution with its problems for nonresistant Mennonites formed the background for this division. Most of the Mennonite leaders strenuously opposed the oath of allegiance required by all Pennsylvania inhabitants by an Act of the Assembly, June 13, 1777, on grounds of Scriptural principle, as well as their loyalty to the king, to whom they had promised allegiance. They also opposed the payment of a special war tax of two pounds, ten shillings, levied in 1777. They considered Congress a government in rebellion. Christian Funk agreed with his fellow ministers that "as a defenseless people, the Mennonites could neither institute nor destroy any government." But after Funk read a copy of the Pennsylvania Constitution, and noted its guarantees of freedom of worship and freedom of conscience on the matter of bearing arms and oath taking, he began to express his conviction that Congress should not be denounced as rebellious. He also urged the payment of the special war tax, and took no stand against the oath of allegiance. These views brought Funk into direct conflict with his fellow bishops and ministers. He was deposed from his office as bishop, silenced as a minister, and excommunicated. After the war ended a reconciliation was attempted, but was unsuccessful, as Funk refused to be admitted as a transgressor.

Funk and several followers continued to worship as a separate group, which organized at least four congregations. Various factors, such as poor leadership, the Herrite influence, and the Oberholtzer schism, led to the final disintegration of the "Funkite" group by 1855. In that year the meetinghouse near Harleysville was torn down and rebuilt at the Delp's burial ground. Tradition holds that Funk lies buried in this cemetery, though no marker has been found. He died in 1811.

Our principal source for the history of the "Funkite" controversy is Christian Funk's own treatise, Ein Spiegel für Alle Menschen . . . (published at Reading, 1813 and in English, A Mirror for all Mankind . . . , Norristown, 1814). It is admittedly a strong polemic in defense of Funk's position in the issues involved. It is also an invaluable contemporary source for our knowledge of Mennonite church life and practices of the late colonial period. (See Funkites.) (ML II, 18.) Q.L.

Funk, Heinrich H., was born Dec. 28, 1880, in the village of Neuenburg, province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, Russia, the son of Heinrich A. Funk and Katharina Friesen. He attended the Chortitz Zentralschule for four years. Having been granted a scholarship provided by the churches he studied at the Theological Seminary (Predigerschule) in Basel, Switzerland. After graduating he accepted the position of teacher of religion and German literature at the Zentralschule of New York, one of the villages of the Ignatyevo settlement in the province of Ekaterinoslav. Here in 1908, he married Susanna Rempel; he had four children, two daughters and two sons.

He taught in New York for nearly 20 years. He was elected minister and later elder of the New York Mennonite Church. Since the latter appointment was made during the communist regime it necessitated his withdrawal from teaching in school. In 1929, on the eve of his intended emigration to America with his family, he was arrested and exiled to the Far North. In 1937 he was allowed to return to the South, and since his wife had died and his children scattered during his absence, he resided for some time at Karaganda, in the Kazakhstan region of Asiatic Russia, where his youngest daughter taught at a high school which Funk served as secretary. In 1940 he was banished to the North a second time and since 1941 has not been heard from.

Funk was known for his inspiring work as a teacher and for his effectiveness as a minister and elder of the church. His considerable influence came from his attractive personality which combined a natural, polished manner and warm Christian solicitude for those in his charge and all others he met. Wherever he went, even in his exile, he was appointed to important work. Thus, during the first period of his banishment he was attached for some time to an American geological mission studying in Russia. He is reputed to have greatly influenced his many students to love the noble and the good. H.D.D.

Funk, John Fretz (1835-1930), probably the outstanding leader of the Mennonite Church (MC) in the 19th century, great-grandson of immigrant Bishop Heinrich Funck (d. 1763), son of Jacob Funk and Salome Fretz, was born April 6, 1835, on the family homestead in Hilltown Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., where he spent the first 22 years of his life. His only higher education, two terms at Freeland Seminary (now Ursinus College), prepared him for a career of public school teaching in his home community, but after two years in that profession, he entered the lumber business in Chicago (arriving April 11, 1857) with his brother-in-law Jacob Beidler (later in partnership with John F. Rittenhouse), in which he continued successfully for ten years. On April 6, 1867, he moved to Elkhart, Ind., with the printing and publishing business he had established in Chicago Jan. 1, 1864. Here he spent the rest of his long and active life, dying Jan. 8, 1930. He is buried in the Prairie Street cemetery. He was married to Salome Kratz Jan. 19, 1864. One of his two daughters, Phebe, married A. B. Kolb.

The ten years in Chicago were decisive in Funk's life. Here in 1858 he was converted in a Presbyterian revival, here he met and associated intimately with D. L. Moody (1861-67), to whom he attributed much of the influence which moved him into active Christian service with progressive ideas in Sunday school, evangelism, and religious publication, far in advance of the lethargic mid-century Mennonite (MC) Church of his fathers. His decision to cast his lot with this church (he returned to Bucks County for baptism in 1860, and was ordained as a minister for the struggling Cullom, Ill., congregation some 50 miles south of Chicago in May 1865) and assume aggressive leadership was an event of major significance for the North American Mennonitism far beyond the bounds of his own brotherhood, for besides being a pioneer Mennonite publisher, he played a major role in the immigration and colonization of the Russian Mennonites in the United States and Canada 1873-80, and in effect became the publisher for the Manitoba Mennonites. He did not become a bishop until June 6, 1892 (rendered inactive Jan. 31, 1902, when his active career as a church leader came to an end), but he was by all odds the most influential leader for 30 years (1870-1900), shaping the course of the Mennonite Church.

His base of operation was his publishing house, established at Elkhart as John F. Funk and Brother 1867-75, then incorporated as the Mennonite Publishing Co., 1875-1925, with widely held stock ownership. (Unfortunately a bank failure in 1903, which cost him a personal loss of $40,000, and a fire in 1906 caused the company to become bankrupt in 1906, a blow from which he never recovered, although he continued in business selling book stocks and doing some publishing of reprints of older titles until the age of 90 in 1925.) His great influence through the church paper Herald of Truth (German edition, Herold der Wahrheit 1864-1902) was supplemented by his wide traveling and speaking, conference work, and personal influence. He gathered a group of progressive younger men around him and made Elkhart the strong center of church leadership and growth. He brought J. S. Coffman, the noted evangelist, to Elkhart as an editor in 1879; John Horsch, a writer and historian, in 1887; G. L. Bender, a mission leader, in 1890. H. A. Mumaw, the ultimate founder of the Elkhart Institute-Goshen College (1894), was attracted. In Elkhart the mission headquarters of the Mennonite Church was established (1892); here the Mennonite Aid Plan was founded (1882); from here the first foreign missionaries were sent out to India (1898) at a meeting presided over by Funk. Here the first relief agency was organized (1897). In the church which Funk founded and of which he was the pastor (1871-1902) the first young people's meeting was established (1890?), and one of the first Sunday schools (1870). In 1872 Funk, with Daniel Brenneman, conducted the first evangelistic services (Masontown, Pa., in 1872) in the Mennonite Church (MC). He wrote the first Sunday-school helps (1880), published the first Sunday-school magazine. In all these good forward steps Funk was a leading figure, if not the actual innovator, moving cautiously, often with great courage, against much opposition, using the columns of the Herald in vigorous promotion.

One of Funk's great contributions was his creative combination of conservatism and progress. He had a deep historical sense and anchored the church firmer in its great historic heritage. He published Menno Simons' Complete Works in English (1871) and German (1876) early in his career and the Martyrs' Mirror likewise in German (1870) and in English (1886), in addition to a vast amount of historical articles on the Anabaptists and Mennonites (largely by John Horsch), and built up an excellent Mennonite historical library (the core of the Goshen College M.H.L.). He himself wrote The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (Elkhart, 1878), a defense against the attacks of the Reformed Mennonite writer Musser against the Mennonite Church. He stood firmly against the Methodistic type of more emotionalized piety (Brenneman and M.B.C., 1875) and equally vigorously resisted the reactionary type (Wisler, 1871). He guided the church in gradual change down the middle of the road, and is more responsible than any other one man (teamed with J. S. Coffman) for the general character of the Mennonite Church (MC) in the 20th century in its middle-of-the-road position between tradition on the one hand and undirected progress on the other. He also played a wise and good role in preparing the reunion of the Mennonite and Amish bodies, which came to full fruition 1915-25.

Funk's contribution as a publisher is remarkable. His major periodical publications include Herald of Truth (1864 until its merger with Gospel Witness to form the Gospel Herald in 1908), Mennonitische Rundschau (1878-1908), Mennonite Sunday School Quarterly (1890-1908, several levels). He published in repeated editions the prayer books, hymnbooks, catechisms, and confessions which became the household books of Mennonites (including the Russian Mennonites and the Amish) in the second half of the 19th century.

Funk's role in the great Russian immigration was outstanding. Peter Jansen wrote, "My Father, Cornelius Jansen, always said you were more responsible than any other man." His home in Elkhart was the first stopping place, not only of the 12 delegates from Russia in 1873, but of hundreds of immigrants in 1874 ff., who stayed at his home or were quartered in the Prairie Street Church. He was the channel of contact with U.S. senators and the great railroads. He personally conducted the delegates on their tours to Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. He helped to organize the great aid agency, Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.), of which he served as treasurer for many years. He negotiated reduced rates for transportation by steamship companies and railroads, and raised both loan funds and relief donations for the needy settlers in their first hard pioneer years. His name was a household word among the Mennonites of Manitoba, who had read his Rundschau for two generations, and for whom he published their confession, catechism, and hymnbooks for 50 years.

Fortunately Funk's great work was done by 1902, when through unwise methods of working as a bishop, and through mismanagement of his publisher-church relations he was forced into an unworthy retirement at the age of 67 (1902-8). Fortunately also his publishing work was salvaged by the organization of a conference (MC) Publication Board (1908) and Publishing House; the school which he had first encouraged (then opposed), Goshen College, stepped into the place of progressive leadership, and the General Conference (MC) which he long and vigorously advocated (though later failed to support) became the unifying factor in his church.† H.S.B.

A. C. Kolb, "John Fretz Funk, 1835-1930: An Appreciation," MQR VI (1932) 44-55, 250-63; K. Schnell, "John F. Funk, 1835-1930, and the Mennonite Migration of 1873-75," MQR XXIV (1950) 199-229; idem, "John F. Funk's Land Inspection Trips as Recorded in His Diaries," MQR XXIV (1950) 295-311; ML II, 19.

Funk, John F., & Brother, "Booksellers, Publishers and Bookbinders," 157 Main St., Elkhart, Ind., the name of the Funk publishing agency 1869-74. It had previously (1864-69) been known as John F. Funk, and was afterward (1875-1925) called the Mennonite Publishing Co., Inc. The brother was Abram K. Funk. It was this firm which published the German Martyrs' Mirror in 1870, the English Complete Works of Menno Simons in 1871, Dirk Philips' Enchiridion in German in 1872, began the Mennonite Family Almanac and Familien-Kalender in 1870, and published many Mennonite hymnbooks, prayer books, and catechisms. A total of 27 titles published by the firm are listed in Bender's Two Centuries, 34-40, all of which are to be found in the Goshen College Library. H.S.B.

Funk, Joseph (1778-1862), of Singers Glen, Va., a pioneer Mennonite publisher and music teacher in America, established the first Mennonite printing house in the United States in 1847 (see Joseph Funk Press). He was the son of Henry Funk and Barbara Showalter, born April 6, 1778, in Berks Co., Pa., and a grandson of Bishop Henry Funk, who came to America in 1719 and became the founder of a long line of Funks. Early in his boyhood the family, 13 children, moved to Rockingham Co., Va., where Joseph spent his lifetime. He married Elizabeth Rhodes, Dec. 25, 1804, and raised five children. His second wife was Rachel Britton; they raised nine children. In 1847 Joseph Funk established a hand printing press in his log springhouse at Mountain Valley (Singers Glen), Va., which has the distinction of being the first Mennonite printing house in the United States. Funk had unusual ability in collecting songbooks, revising sacred melodies, and conducting singing schools. He and his sons organized singing schools by the dozens in at least eleven counties in Virginia.

The writings and compilations of Joseph Funk as far as known include the following seven books and periodicals: (1) Choral Music (Harrisonburg, 1816), pp. 88, a collection of German hymns. (2) A Compilation of Genuine Church Music (Winchester, 1832), pp. 208. After the fourth edition the name was changed to Harmonia Sacra. This was Funk's most popular and famous songbook. Over 20 editions have been printed, the last edition in 1951. (3) The Confession of Faith (Winchester, 1837), pp. 461, containing also Peter Burkholder's "Nine Reflections," translated by Joseph Funk. (4) A Collection of Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs (Winchester, 1847), pp. 364. Reprints: Singers Glen, 1851, 1855, 1859, 1868, 1872; Lancaster, 1862, 1864, 1869. This book was compiled by a committee of Virginia Mennonites and has the distinction of being the first hymnbook to be published on a Mennonite press in America and the first English hymnbook used by American Mennonites. It is sometimes called the English Mennonite Hymnbook. (5) The Reviewer Reviewed (Mountain Valley, 1857), pp. 309, a theological discussion defending his grandfather Henry Funk's A Mirror of Baptism against the review of the same by Elder John Kline, a leader in the (Dunkard) Church of the Brethren. (6) The Southern Musical Advocate and Singer's Friend (Mountain Valley), a 16-page monthly periodical produced and published by Joseph Funk & Sons; 21 issues appeared altogether, the first in July 1859, and the last in March 1861. (7) J. and D. Brenneman, Hymns, pp. 10. The authors are the noted John M. and Daniel Brenneman (q.v.).

Joseph Funk died Dec. 24, 1862. He was a faithful member of the Mennonite Church (probably the Weaver congregation) and was in his day cherished by thousands for his contribution to sacred song. He has left a lasting imprint on the Mennonites of the Shenandoah Valley. J.A.H.

J. W. Wayland, Joseph Funk, Father of Song in Northern Virginia (Dayton, Va., n.d., 1908, reprint from the Pennsylvania German); G. P. Jackson, White Spirituals in the Southern Uplands (University of North Carolina Press, 1933); J. A. Hostetler, "Joseph Funk: Founder of Mennonite Publication Work, 1847," Gospel Herald XL (Dec. 23, 1947); ML II, 19.

Funk, Joseph, Press (1847-62), of Singers Glen (formerly called Mountain Valley), Va., established the first Mennonite press in the United States. The press was installed in the top story of a springhouse in 1847. The fourth edition (1847) of Harmonia Sacra (q.v.) and four other editions (1851, 1854, 1856, 1860) were printed on this press. The second outstanding songbook printed here was A Collection of Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs (q.v., 47 and three more editions: 1851, 1855, 1859). Other books published were A Mirror of Baptism (1851), a translation of Spiegel der Taufe (1744) (Bender, Two Centuries, 23); Joseph Funk, Reviewer Reviewed (1857) (op. cit., 26); and J. and D. Brenneman, Hymns (1859). A periodical, The Southern Musical Advocate and Singer's Friend (op. cit., 27), was printed 1859-61. After the death of Joseph Funk, his sons continued the business under the name "Joseph Funk Sons." (The sons were not Mennonites.) In 1878 Ruebush-Kieffer purchased the press, and the Mennonite interests were taken over by J. F. Funk, Elkhart, Ind. The original Funk printery, now in Dayton, Va., continues as Joseph K. Ruebush Co. An imprint of the Harmonia Sacra of 1847 lists Solomon Funk as "printer." (For bibliography, see Funk, Joseph.) J.A.H.

Funk, Stephan, a preacher of the Mennonite congregation near Thorn, West Prussia, presumably an immigrant from Moravia, became known through his contact with King Charles XII of Sweden in connection with the siege of Thorn in 1703. When the king heard of Funk and learned that the Mennonites rejected warfare, he ordered Funk to preach a sermon in the camp in his presence and prove his principle of nonresistance from the Bible. Funk complied. After the sermon the king inquired whether all wars were unconditionally condemned in the Scriptures. Funk answered, "If anything could be allowed in the Holy Scriptures, it must be that a king who is attacked in his own realm might defend himself; but that a king march into another realm to conquer and devastate it, for that there is no freedom in the Scriptures; on the contrary, it is absolutely opposed to Christ's teaching." This is recorded by W. Mannhardt on the basis of the church record kept by Heinrich Donner (q.v.) at Orlofferfelde. HEGE.

A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1912) 312; W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) 43 f.; ML II, 19.

Funkites, the name given the followers of Bishop Christian Funk (1731-1811), who withdrew from the Franconia (q.v.) Conference in 1778 because of his sympathies with the seceding American colonies, while the Conference favored continued loyalty to the British Crown in view of their previous promise (oath) of loyalty. Funk was the son of Bishop Henry Funk (d. 1760) and father of a large Funk (q.v.) family in America. He was ordained as a minister in 1756 and as a bishop in 1769.

All went well between Funk and his fellow ministers and bishops until the issue of American independence arose. At first he also was of one mind with them on that issue: nonresistants ought not support a rebellion. But when he read the Pennsylvania constitution, and saw to his great joy that it gave full religious liberty, and even promised not to compel nonresistants to take up arms or to swear an oath, Funk began to look at the matter differently. There were, said he, "already four republics, and perhaps America would be another." He also favored paying a (war) tax to the American government which the other ministers opposed. The climax came in 1778, when Funk was deposed from office by the other bishops of the conference. Funk's relatives and some other supporters persuaded him to become their minister. At first the schismatic "Funkites" held their services in the Franconia meetinghouse on alternate Sundays when it had not been used, but soon they were locked out. In the course of time Funk ordained his brother John as a minister, and his son-in-law, John Detweiler, as a deacon. His older brother Henry, a minister from 1768, also stood with him.

Between 1804 and 1806 the leaders of the Franconia Conference sought to restore Funk to full fellowship in the church, but they refused to recognize the offices of John Funk and John Detweiler. The bishops also wanted to receive Christian Funk as a transgressor, a demand which he was unwilling to comply with. After Funk's death in 1811, the "Funkites" erected four or five church buildings in Montgomery Co., Pa., between 1812 and 1815. But lacking a real leader, the group became progressively weaker and smaller. Funk's brother Henry moved to Virginia, and another Funkite minister, Jacob Detweiler, settled in Ontario, where he served in his office in the Ontario Conference. Two of the Funk meetinghouses were torn down, one was rebuilt and is now used for occasional funerals in the community, and one or two came into the possession of the Church of the Brethren. By the middle of the 19th century the group had disintegrated. Some of the Funkites eventually united with the Church of the Brethren, some with the "Herrites" (Reformed Mennonites, q.v.), and a few families found their way back into the Franconia Conference. Apparently some members of these families joined the Oberholtzer group in his secession of 1847 from the Franconia Conference.

From the incomplete records of the Funkite division it appears that Funk was a vigorous and intelligent leader with foresight and ability, but somewhat lacking in humility and patience. On the other hand, history has vindicated Funk's judgment that the American colonies might well become "one more republic"; i.e., that they would win the war with Great Britain for their independence. Between 1778 and 1806 ten Franconia Conference bishops died, and six new ones were ordained; the young bishops who had not been involved in excommunicating Funk were unable to win him back into their fellowship, perhaps partly because of Funk's tendency toward self-justification. J.C.W.

Christian Funk, Spiegel für alle Menschen (Reading, 1813); English edition, A Mirror for all Mankind (Norristown, 1814); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 260, 261, 345-51; ML II, 19-21.

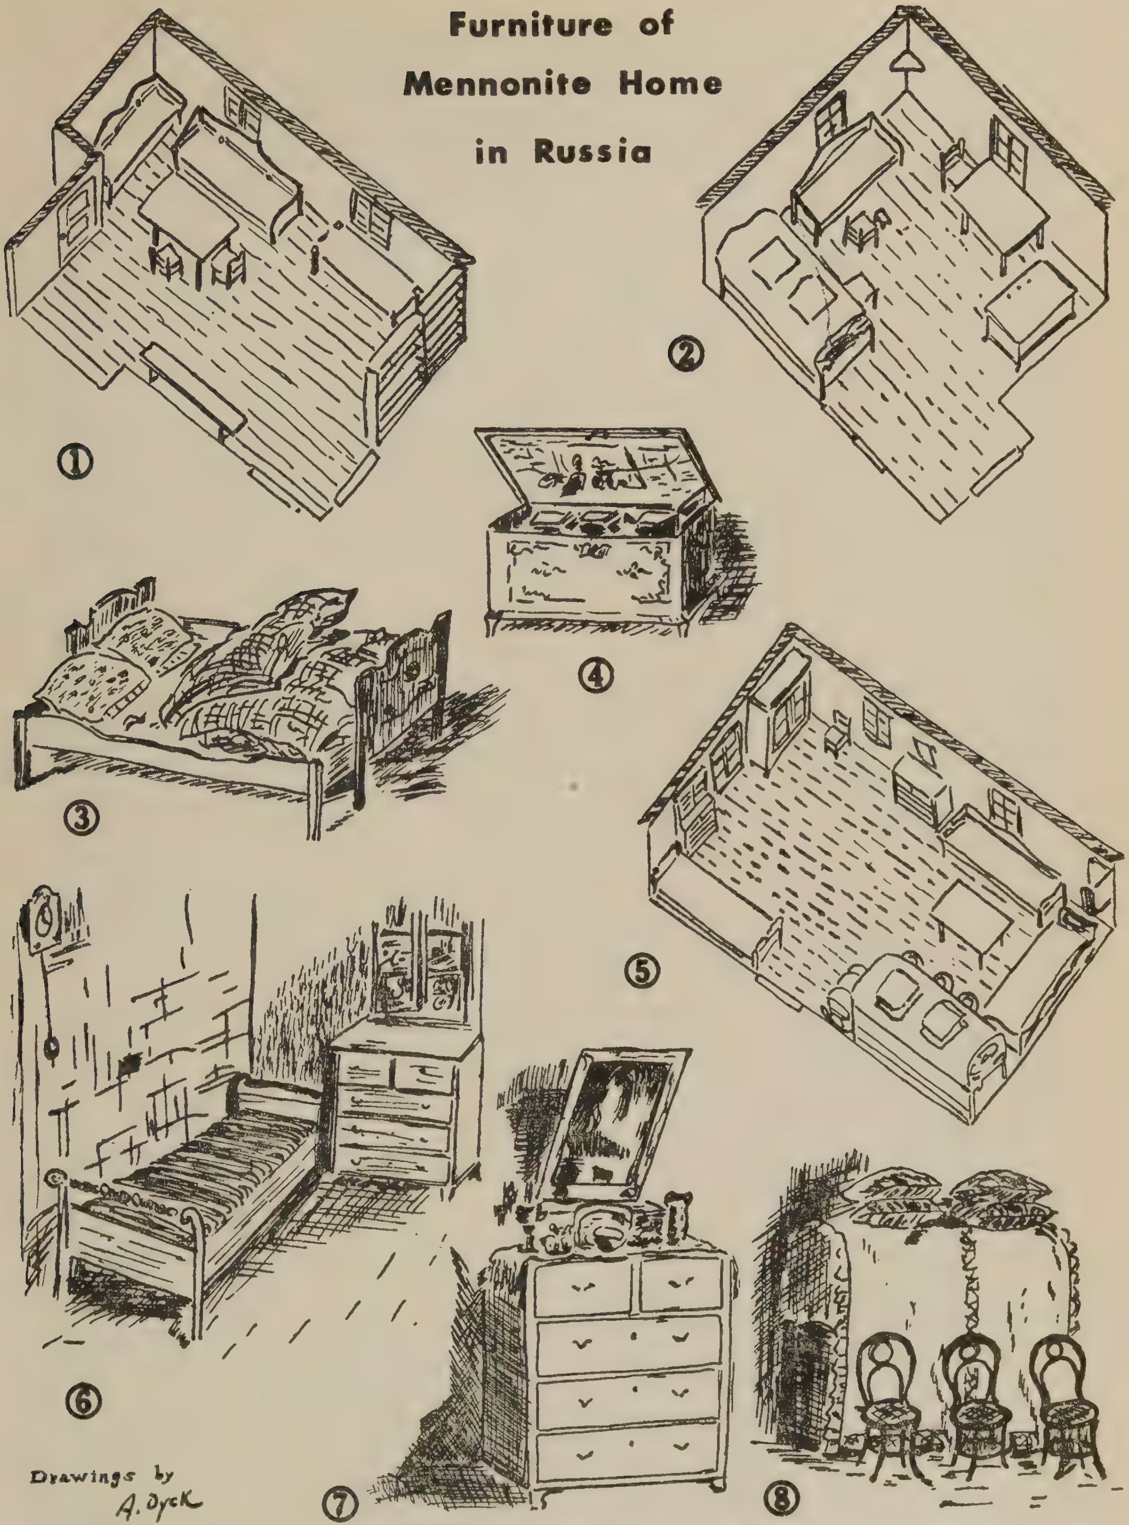
Furniture. Mennonites as a rule do not have furniture different from their neighbors, with exceptions from time to time when they were transplanted from country to country, and retained and developed patterns of their former home, just as they did in the realm of agricultural (q.v.) practices, architectural (q.v.) patterns, and other forms of culture. The fact that they usually came from a country with a higher culture into areas where they were pioneers necessitated their producing their own furniture, since markets were not accessible, or their pioneer conditions did not make it possible for them to buy expensive furniture. This must have been the case in Prussia when, during the 16th century, Dutch Mennonite settlers established themselves along the Vistula River, and again when their descendants began to move into Poland and Russia. In the prairie states of America, this tradition was soon given up for various reasons. In the early days in Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay, the



Furniture of Mennonite Home in Russia

1. Kleine Stube—Children's room; 2. Eckstube—Bedroom; 3. Schlafbank—Bed opened for the night; 4. Truhe—Dowry chest; 5. Grosse Stube—Parlor; 6. Ruhbank und Glasschapp—Bench and china cabinet; 7. Kommode—Chest of drawers 8. Bett in der grossen Stube—Bed in parlor.

Mennonites continued to make their own furniture after traditional patterns.

The furniture used in traditional Mennonite homes of the Prusso-Russian background is closely related to the pattern of the house. Each room serves a special purpose and has its corresponding furniture, which is always the same. Only slight and gradual deviations occur depending on economic conditions and size of family. Some of the best descriptions of interior arrangements and furniture of this tradition can be found in Arnold Dyck's Verloren in der Steppe and Peter Epp's Eine Mutter, as well as in the article by W. Schmiedehaus, "Mennonite Life in Mexico" (Menn. Life, April 1947, 29).

Entering a traditional Mennonite home of Prussia, Russia, Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay through the front door, one enters the front hall (Vorhaus), from which one proceeds to the back hall (Hinterhaus), which leads into the kitchen and into the kleine Stube (see drawing No. 1). This room is usually occupied by day and night by the youngest children, has a table and two beds called the Schlafbank, which during the day are used as benches. At night the lid is opened and the benches are pulled out and serve as double beds (see drawing No. 3). The next room is the Eckstube (see drawing No. 2). This is the bedroom of the parents. It has a bed in which the bedding is kept, topped by the two pillows. For the night it is pulled out to make a double bed just like the Schlafbank (see drawing No. 3). In this room there is also a Ruhbank, a bench located under the window and used for sitting and resting, a large traditional dowry chest containing heirlooms, etc. (see drawing No. 4), a table, and some chairs. From this room one proceeds to the parlor or grosse Stube (see drawing No. 5), which is used only when exceptional guests come. It contains, right next to the brick stove which heats all three rooms, a bench called the Ofenbank which is used for resting. Right above the bench is a traditional Mennonite clock (q.v.). At the other end next to the wall is the china closet, called Glausschaup (see drawing No. 6), containing traditional china inherited from the parents to which occasionally items are added as a birthday present. Between the windows toward the front yard stands a chest of drawers, above which hangs a large mirror (see drawing No. 7). Toward the inner wall stands a bed filled almost to the ceiling with bedding and topped with pillows (see drawing No. 8); in front of it are some chairs. This is used when guests come. This room also has a table. Next to it in the corner is the wardrobe, called Kleedaschaup, where the family's Sunday clothes are kept. The closet is made after patterns dating far back into the early history of the Mennonites in Prussia. Another door from here leads to the front hall. Next to the front hall on the opposite side is the room for the grown boys, called the Sommerstube, which contains a bed, table and chairs, and possibly some tools for carpenter work.

All this furniture was made in the home carpenter shops. Not every farmer was a carpenter but some who had the inclination, ability, and time made these pieces of furniture for themselves and also for their neighbors. In some communities there were carpenter shops which served the entire community. This is also the case in Manitoba, Mexico, and South America. Naturally, with economic progress, some families preferred to buy the furniture in use in their respective countries. This was the case to some extent in Russia, but particularly in the United States, and also in Canada. To what an extent the Mennonites of Prussia had retained these patterns or when they disappeared or where modified is still to be investigated. (See also Architecture.) C.K.

Fürsorge-Komitee (Guardians' Committee) was the name of the agency established by the Russian government in 1818 to succeed other agencies to supervise the foreign settlements in Russia, and be responsible for their progress and administration. The full name was Guardians' Committee of the Foreign Colonists in the Southern Regions of Russia (German, Fürsorge-Komitee für die Kolonisten der südlichen Gebiete Russlands). It had its seat originally at Kherson, later at Ekaterinoslav, and finally at Odessa. It had three branch offices; Ekaterinoslav, Kherson, and Bessarabia. At first the Fürsorge-Komitee was subject to the Ministry of the Interior. In 1837 it became subject to the Ministry of Royal Estates. Both agencies were located in St. Petersburg. In 1871 the Fürsorge-Komitee was abolished and the foreign settlers, including the Mennonites, became subject to the provincial and local authorities of their respective settlements and communities (see also Government of Mennonites in Russia). C.K.

A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland . . . (Langensalza, 1932); D. G. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia . . ." (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Stanford University, 1933); Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908).

Fürst, Lorenz, of Bülach, Switzerland, an Anabaptist martyr. Because he taught that "neither the flesh nor the blood of Christ is in the Mass," and said that "he had permitted himself to be rebaptized, and Conrad had baptized him at Wasserberg, and he counted infant baptism as naught, but as false and of no value," he was sentenced on Aug. 17, 1529, at Zug in Switzerland, to be executed by being cast into the sea with bound hands and feet. Neff.

R. Nitsche, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in der Schweiz zur Reformationszeit (Einsiedeln, 1885) 97-98; ML II, 21.

Fürstenland, a daughter settlement of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement in Russia, was founded 1864-70 and consisted originally of six villages known by the following numbers and names: No. 1, Georgstal, 30 farms; No. 2, Olgafeld, 28 farms; No. 3, Michelsburg, 35 farms; No. 4, Rosenbach, 18 farms; No. 5, Alexandertal, 23 farms; No. 6, Sergeyevka, 20 farms. In 1923 the village Karlovka with 10 farms was added. Each farm consisted of approximately 175 acres. This land was rented from the Grand Duke Michael Nikolaevitch, hence the name "Fürstenland," and was located south of Chortitza in the Melitopol district, Taurida, volost Verkhne-Rogatchik. The settlement consisted of approximately 19,000 acres, which was originally rented at the price of one ruble and 25 kopecks per dessiatine, which by the time of World War I was raised to 14 rubles per dessiatine (ca. $2.75 per U.S. acre).

The land was under the administration of Moritz Schumacher at Grushevka and had been rented through the mediation of Peter Dyck, a chairman of the Chortitza Agricultural Society, who became the Oberschulze of the settlement. Each village had a school at which worship services were also held. Before the emigration to Canada in the 1870's, the Fürstenland Mennonite Church was independent. After Elder Johann Wiebe emigrated to Canada in 1875, with about one thousand persons, Isaac Warkentin was leading minister and the congregation was again a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonite Church. In 1910 the Mennonite Brethren at Olgafeld erected a meetinghouse with a seating capacity of three to four hundred. Johann Enns (1850-1934) was leader of the Fürstenland M.B. Church for 40 years. The membership in 1914 was 63. The settlement developed some industries, such as two flour mills and factories of which the Jacob Niebuhr (q.v.) factory was most outstanding.

In the great emigration of 1874 ff. from the Ukraine, about 1,100 Fürstenländers migrated to Manitoba, where they settled in the West Reserve, forming about one third of the original settlement.

After the Revolution, in 1924-26, the majority (about 160) of the families of Fürstenland sold their property to families coming from Volhynia and emigrated to Canada, leaving only some 14 Mennonite families in the villages. Soon the collectivization of agriculture was carried through. Before the German invasion of the Ukraine in 1941 some men had been exiled. During the German retreat the Mennonites of Fürstenland made their trip westward on covered wagons; some of them were forcibly sent back by the Russians; the remaining have reached Canada and South America. C.K.

Jacob Niebuhr Questionnaire; Mennonite Weekly Review, Feb. 22, 1951, p. 6; Friesen, Brüderschaft; ML II, 21.

Fürstenwerder (see Bärwalde), a village in the former Free State of Danzig, 12 miles east of Danzig, with a Catholic, a Protestant, and a Mennonite church, on the Elbing Vistula, near the "Danziger Haupt" (see map of Danzig). Fürstenwerder is the name (since about 1830) of an independent Mennonite congregation, which formerly belonged to the "Flemish Mennonite congregation in the Grosse Werder" and was called the "Bärwald'sches Quartier"; from 1809 on was known as Bärwalde and had its own elder (Isaac Schulz, 1809-34).

Since 1768 there has been a meetinghouse in Fürstenwerder, which has been preserved without any important alterations to the present. In that year the bishop of Culm, who in the name of the King of Poland had supreme ecclesiastical authority in the Grosse Werder, had permitted the overgrown Mennonite congregation to erect four meetinghouses, whereas up to this time the Flemish Mennonites had only the church built in Rosenort in 1754. The new buildings were begun in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, and Heubuden, on the condition that the Mennonites build and perpetually maintain a Catholic chapel on Möskenberg at Petershagen. The buildings were progressing well, when in the summer of 1768 the bishop suddenly forbade and forcibly prohibited their completion. The reason was this: Anna Steffen, the only daughter of Jakob Steffen, a Mennonite resident of Tiegenhagen, was with her own consent abducted by Catholic nuns with aid of the Tiegenhagen priest, taken to Culm, and married to a Pole. Since the girl was still a minor, the parents demanded her surrender, and finding no hearing from the bishop they appealed to the King of Prussia, who had control of the Elbing region as a special right from Poland. The king ordered the bishop to release the girl; but now the bishop visited his wrath on all the Mennonites of the Grossen Werder, by prohibiting the completion of the four buildings, and declared that he would not consent to having them finished until they stopped bothering him about Steffen. At the end of October he gave his consent and the buildings were finished. The Catholic chapel in Petershagen, which was finished at the same time, was burned down by lightning in 1778 and was not rebuilt. The Mennonites terminated their obligation by paying a lump sum.

In 1853 Claas Epp, the Schulze of Fürstenwerder, emigrated to the province of Samara (Am Trakt settlement), followed in 1859 and the following years by the preacher Cornelius Classen and finally also Elder Johann Wiebe to the Alt-Samara settlement in the same province.

The Fürstenwerder congregation was incorporated in 1880. In 1924 it had a membership of 540 souls. According to the Gemeinde-Kalender of 1941, the number of souls in 1940 was 556, of whom 450 were entitled to vote, and 106 were unbaptized children. The elder was Jakob Jantzen (preacher from 1894, elder 1911); preachers were Heinrich Dau (ordained 1912), Johannes Dyck (1919), Ernst Dyck (1928), Heinrich Wall (1934); the deacons were Gustav Wiens (1923) and Gustav Schulz (1928). Jakob Jantzen died an accidental death in 1942, and was succeeded as elder in 1943 by Johannes Dyck. The congregation was extinguished by evacuation westward before the advancing Russian army in 1945. H.G.M.

Ernst Crous, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreussischen Mennoniten," in Gesch.-Bl. XI (1954) 13; Mitteilungen der Konferenz der ost.- und westpreussischen Mennonitengemeinden, Nos. 1-3 (September 1943, November 1943, and February 1944, a mimeographed copy in the Research Center at Göttingen); ML II, 21 f.

Füsslin, Johann Konrad (1704-75), a Swiss Reformed clergyman and research scholar in history, pastor in Veltheim, canton of Zürich. His writings are distinguished by his wide reading as well as a thorough knowledge of the sources and an objectivity rare at the time. His greater work has the title, Staats- und Erdbeschreibung der schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft. For Anabaptist history two of his works come into consideration:

(1) Beyträge zur Erläuterung der Kirchen-Reformations-Geschichten des Schweitzerlandes, enthaltende authentische bishero zum theil ungedruckte, zum theil gantz rare Urkunden, öffentliche Vorträge, Gutachten, Ratschlüsse, Manifeste, Missive, Unterredungen, Verträge, Lehrsätze, Confessionen, Schutz- und Streitschriften, Darinnen die Zwistigkeiten der Römisch-Catholischen, der Lutheraner und der Reformierten, wie auch der Wiedertäufer und anderer Sectierer, auf das klarste an den Tag gelegt werden. Nebst Historisch-Critischen Anmerkungen zur Beschüzung des Seeligen Reformationswerckes herausgegeben von Johann Conrad Füsslin, 3 vv. (Zürich and Leipzig, 1741-49).

(2) Johann Conrad Fuesslins Cämmers des Capitels zu Winterthur neue und unpartheyische Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie in der mittleren Zeit (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1770-74).

The first work contains a mass of historical notices as well as council protocols, orders, and provisions of the Swiss governments concerning the beginnings and the earliest period of the Anabaptist movement, which constitute a valuable supplement to Egli's Aktensammlung. Very worthy of note are the critical notes and commentaries, although in many respects his judgment has been corrected by more recent research.

In the second book the author reveals himself as the Swiss Gottfried Arnold (q.v.). Under the collective term "Sonderlinge" he discusses the Manichaeans, Cathars, Albigenses, Bogomiles, Waldenses, Mystics, Beguines, Hussites, Adamites, Taborites, Materialists, Pantheists, etc. He discusses the Deutsche Theologie (q.v.) at length. The rise of Anabaptism he traces back to Müntzer as he had already done in the earlier work: near the end of 1524, while Müntzer was staying not far from Eglisau, he met with Hubmaier, and especially with Felix Manz, Conrad Grebel, and Wilhelm Reublin. "Here adult baptism was agreed upon." But this is not correct (see Grebel). On the whole Füsslin tries to do justice to the Anabaptist movement. He writes, "Some time ago I was involved in a controversy concerning the Anabaptists. The question in dispute is whether the Anabaptists should be reckoned among the anti-Trinitarians and whether Servetus should be reckoned one of them. I denied this categorically and therefore was contradicted by the publisher of the Musaei Helvetici and the deceased chancellor von Mosheim. . . . I have in my possession various printed and unprinted Confessions of Faith of the old and the new Anabaptists from Switzerland, Alsace, and the Netherlands, in which they express themselves in such a way on the Trinity of the Godhead, that they can be reckoned among the anti-Trinitarians only with the greatest unreasonableness. . . . Bullinger incorrectly called Servetus an Anabaptist. He erred and did these people (the Anabaptists) a grave injustice. He made the serious mistake of classing all who separated from the Roman Church but did not join the Reformed as Anabaptists" (III, 238).

Anyone who wishes to study the origin and early period of Anabaptism in Switzerland dare not overlook these works of Füsslin. (ML II, 22.) NEFF.

G

Gaaikema, a Dutch Mennonite family found in the province of Groningen. Nearly all of them were farmers. Johannes Harkes Gaaikema (1747-1825) and his son Luurt (1786-1848) lived in the hamlet of Gaaikemaweer near Niehove; both were deacons of the Humsterland (q.v.) Old Flemish congregation. To the same family belonged Luurt Luurts, a farmer and preacher (1738-87) of the Old Flemish congregation of Houwerzijl (q.v.), and also Tiete Popkes, a farmer at Oldehove, preacher 1721, and after 1732 elder of the Old Flemish congregation of Humsterland (Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 131). Tiete Popkes died in 1773. His grandson Tiete Popkes (b. Dec. 25, 1772, at Oldehove, d. soon after 1830) took the family name of Gaaikema as did many of his relatives. This was the ancestor on the maternal side, the paternal ancestor being Harm Gaaikema, a farmer at de Waarden near Grijpskerk. At present two descendants, brothers, are Mennonite pastors: Harm H. Gaaikema, b. 1904 at Noordhorn, who first studied law and then theology, serving the congregations of Dantumawoude 1935-46 and Harlingen 1946- ; and Menno J. J. Gaaikema, b. 1909 at Noordhorn, serving Uithuizen 1933-47 and Zijldijk 1947- . vdZ.

Gabor Bethlen: see Bethlen Gabor.

Gabrielites, an early Anabaptist group in Moravia and Silesia, led by Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.). It began in 1527, merged later with related groups in Moravia (Philipites and Hutterites), broke away again, and entered into many an unpleasant controversy, mainly with the Hutterites, whose practice of community of goods they opposed. The story of this group up to the death of their leader in 1545 is told in the article Ascherham, which also reports that toward the end of his life more and more brethren fell away from his spiritualistic leadership, apparently seeking closer ties with the genuine Anabaptist way of life. His minimizing of adult baptism and all the other orders or regulations of a disciplined brotherhood were obviously not to the liking of these less sophisticated brethren. At the end of his life Ascherham is said to have been a "shepherd without sheep."

After Ascherham's death (1545) the group disintegrated. Those who had fled to East Prussia (q.v.) in 1535-40 seem to have united with the Mennonites of that area. Those in Silesia most likely joined with the Schwenckfelders, with whom they had many tenets in common. But the greater part of the Silesians returned to Moravia and joined the Hutterites. In Moravia proper some settlements had existed since 1533 (if not earlier) and had weathered the severe persecutions of 1535. At first Ascherham prevented any negotiations with the Hutterites, whom he detested; but when he died, the way was opened to an organic unification of the two Anabaptist groups. Of this the Hutterite chronicles give us a detailed story (Geschicht-Buch, 195-200). They report how several Gabrielite brethren had come to the Hutterites to find out about their teachings and the reason for the erstwhile division. "They asked for information about our main tenets (Hauptartikel) and received a declaration of five points, concerning (a) baptism, (b) community of goods, (c) marriage, (d) authorities or (e) false brethren and separation from the world" (text in the Geschicht-Buch). After studying these articles and talking them over, the Gabrielite visitors joined the Hutterite community on Jan. 16, 1545, and submitted to the discipline of the entire brotherhood. Still more followed this example; from Silesia alone 300 brethren are said to have come to join with the same group.

Only three Gabrielite groups in Moravia remained independent: in Kreuz near Göding, in Znaim, and in Eibenschitz. In the latter place a debate took place in 1559 with representatives of the Moravian or Bohemian Brethren (from Bunzlau) with a view to possible unification. But these talks eventually failed because the Gabrielites insisted upon adult baptism while the Moravians defended the practice of infant baptism. In 1565 the last three groups also joined the Hutterite brotherhood, and as such ceased to exist as a separate group. R.F.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Loserth, Communismus; W. Wiswedel, "Gabriel Ascherham und die nach ihm benannte Bewegung," Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., 1931, 100; J. Th. Müller, "Die Berührung der alten und neuen Brüderunität mit den Täufern," Ztscht für Brüdergesch., 1910 (a very important research study); ML II, 24 f.

Gäde, Gerhard J., b. in the Molotschna settlement, Russia, attended the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule, taught at Lichtfelde, Molotschna, and later at the Davlekanovo Zentralschule, Ufa. In 1911-15 he taught at the Omsk Zentralschule, Siberia. In 1925 he attended the Mennonite General Conference (Bundeskonferenz, q.v.) in Moscow. He was a very gifted educator with artistic inclinations and a severe critic of the weaknesses in Mennonite culture and practice. C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer (Abbotsford, 1949) 332 ff.

Gadwal Mennonite Brethren Mission Station, India, located in the Gadwal Samista, Raichur District, 100 miles southwest of Hyderabad, was built by the American Baptist Mission, which occupied this field at first, but in 1937 transferred the field and work to the M.B. Mission. On the mission premises are a residence for the missionaries, a church and school building, a hospital with a number of ward buildings, and some smaller buildings.

Resident missionaries stationed here are Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Unruh, Margaret Willems, and Edna Gerdes. The station has for some time been supervised by J. A. Wiebe and by J. J. Dick. Activities include regular church services, a primary school, and a dispensary. The Gadwal field, comprising 1,200 square miles, has a population of 200,000. Response to the Gospel message has been very good, and in 1949 there was a total church membership of 3,500. J.H.L.

Gaeddert (Gäddertz, Gödert, Goedert, Gederts, Gedert, Geddert) is a Prussian Mennonite family name, the earliest available record of which dates back to 1630. In the Montauer Dorfbuch of 1630 appears the name of Wilhelm Gäddertz, together with 20 other Mennonite family names. Montau was the oldest Mennonite settlement of the Sartowitz-Neuenburger lowlands near Culm, dating back to 1567. Since then the name appears occasionally in the records of the Mennonite settlements along the Vistula River in the settlement records of Central Poland and Volhynia, later in those of Russia, and finally in the Mennonite records of North and South America. The church records of the Frisian Church at Montau-Gruppe, of the Frisian and Flemish Church at Schönsee, and of the Frisian Church at Obernessau contain the names "Goedert" and "Geddert."

It seems that the name was difficult to translate. The same author first translates it correctly in the Danzig church records (according to Gustav E. Reimer) as "Gotthard," then incorrectly as "Gerhard" and "Gideon." Various spellings of the name appear in the records.

Dietrich Gaeddert (q.v.) was one of the most widely known members of this family. He was a minister of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church, Russia, and founder of the Hoffnungsau Mennonite Church near Buhler, Kan. Albert M. Gaeddert, the present pastor of the church, and Gustav R. Gaeddert, an educator, have been active in CPS and MCC work. G.R.G.

H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal zwischen Fordon und Weissenberg bis zum Ausgang des 18. Jahrhunderts (Marburg, 1952) 47, 140, 145, 148, 151-53, 159; G. E. Reimer, "Die Familiennamen der Westpreussischen Mennoniten" (Weierhof, 1940) 98, 100; Chr. Hege, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," in Menn. Gesch.-Bl. V (August 1940) 29; Alexanderwohl Church Record (microfilm, Bethel College Historical Library).

Gaeddert, Dietrich (1837-1900), a Mennonite (GCM) minister, was born March 2, 1837, at Alexanderwohl, Russia, the oldest son of Jacob Gaeddert and Elisabeth Ratzlaff, both of Alexanderwohl. His teacher was Heinrich Buller. Gaeddert taught school for eleven years in Paulsheim, Rückenau, and Fürstenwerder, Russia. On June 4, 1856, he was baptized in the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church and on Dec. 14, 1867, he was elected minister of the church. He married Maria Martens in 1859. Of their thirteen children six died in infancy and the others came with them to America. After the death of his wife in 1874 he married Helena Richert (1858-1953) in 1879. To this union thirteen children were born, of whom two died in infancy.

Gaeddert was chosen delegate to investigate the prairie states and provinces in America for settlement, but was unable to go. In 1874 he became leader of a group of Alexanderwohl immigrants to America who crossed the Atlantic on the Teutonia and settled in Harvey, McPherson, and Reno counties, Kansas. He organized the Hoffnungsau Mennonite Church, became elder in 1876, and served the group till his death. The detailed diary of Dietrich Gaeddert, which he kept in Russia and America, is a valuable record pertaining to the coming of the Mennonites to America and the early experiences in this country.

Gaeddert assisted in the founding of Bethel College, Newton, Kan., and was on its board of directors from its founding until his death. He served the Home Mission Committee of the Western District Conference and assisted in organizing a number of congregations of this committee, often serving with baptism and Lord's Supper. He died Dec. 31, 1900, and was buried in the Hoffnungsau cemetery, where the church has erected a memorial. A.J.D., G.R.G.

"Obituary," Christlicher Bundesbote, Jan. 24, 1901, 6-7; Alexanderwohl Church Record, Bethel College Historical Library; Dietrich Gaeddert, Diary.

Gage County, Neb., is located in the southeastern part of the state, with Beatrice (pop. 12,000), the county seat, near its center. There are two Mennonite (GCM) churches with 512 members (1953), the First Mennonite (328) and Beatrice Mennonite (174). The Beatrice Mennonite Hospital is also located in the county. The Mennonite settlement is concentrated west and largely within a 12-mile radius of Beatrice. A few scattered families live farther west and north extending into Jefferson and Saline counties.

The first Mennonites to buy land in this county were 12 Prussian Mennonite families of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, who settled in Gage County in early 1877. They obtained good quality unimproved land for five to six dollars per acre. In 1878 another group of 34 families settled here, and in 1884, 10 families from Russia. Other families have migrated to the county from Germany and Russia since these early settlements, but not in large numbers. (See Beatrice Mennonite Church and Beatrice First Mennonite Church, and Beatrice, Neb.) D.P.M.

Gainsborough, a city (1951 pop. 12,604) in east central England, county of Lincoln, in the neighborhood of which a Separatist congregation formed about 1600. Shortly after its inception John Smyth, a former Anglican clergyman and "a man of able gifts and a good preacher," was chosen pastor. Smyth's early writings, which include a kind of church polity entitled Principles and Inferences Concerning the Visible Church (1607), reveal that in principle and organization the Gainsborough group closely resembled the Brownist and Barrowist congregations, already forming for more than a decade.

The membership of the congregation included some Separatists who later were among the Pilgrim Fathers. William Bradford in his chronicle, Of Plymouth Plantation (1630-50), although he does not mention Gainsborough by name, refers to the original congregation as those who "joined themselves (by a covenant of the Lord) into a church estate, in the fellowship of the Gospel, to walk in all His ways made known, or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them." The same source states that they held meetings regularly for about a year, "notwithstanding all the diligence and malice of their adversaries, they seeing they could no longer continue in that condition, they resolved to get over into Holland as they could. Which was in the year 1607 and 1608."

The writings of both Bradford and Smyth indicate that the membership was scattered in various towns and villages, "some in Nottinghamshire, some of Lincolnshire, and some of Yorkshire," since the borders of the three counties join near Gainsborough; also, there was no one place of meeting. Shortly after forming, the congregation, for the sake of convenience, divided into two parts, the one gathering at Gainsborough under Smyth, and the other at Scrooby under Richard Clyfton. At the time of leaving for and upon arrival at Amsterdam both groups thought of themselves as belonging to one congregation.

At Amsterdam Smyth and his followers set up a congregation independent of the one already established there in 1593 by the English Separatists under the leadership of Francis Johnson and Henry Ainsworth. Instead they made contacts with the Dutch Mennonites, and several of the group joined them. Smyth himself agreed with their principles and therefore wished to introduce baptism on confession of faith in his congregation. In 1609 he baptized himself, then Thomas Helwys and John Murton, as well as 40 other members of his congregation. This congregation planted on Dutch soil by the Separatists from Gainsborough thus became the original congregation of the Baptists (q.v.). In 1612 Helwys and Murton returned to England with their followers and founded the congregations from which the General Baptists sprang. Most of the followers of Smyth who remained in Amsterdam joined the Mennonite Church after his death.

The Scrooby leaders, arriving at Amsterdam somewhat later than Smyth, broke company with him, due to the contention and the acceptance of what Bradford calls "some errours in the Low Countries." After a year, in 1609, with John Robinson as pastor, they moved on to Leiden. The congregation at Leiden as well as the later Plymouth covenant of the Pilgrim Fathers reveal a close kinship to the mother congregation at Gainsborough. The only evidence of Separatism at Gainsborough after 1608 is recorded by Hanserd Knollys, who states that during the years 1625-29 he knew a Brownist there "who used to pray and expound the Scriptures in his Family, with whom I had Conference and very good Counsel." I.B.H.

W. T. Whitley, ed., The Works of John Smyth (London, 1915); S. E. Morison, ed., Of Plymouth Plantation 1620-1647, by William Bradford, sometime Governor thereof (New York, 1952); C. Burrage, The Early English Dissenters in the Light of Recent Research (1550-1641) I (Cambridge, 1912) 229-35; E. A. Payne, The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England (London, 1951), 41-46.

Galahad United Missionary Church, Galahad, Alberta, had a membership of 31 in 1953. D. C. Eby was its pastor.

Galax, Va., the site of Civilian Public Service Camp No. 39, which was approved in May 1942 and was closed in May 1943. Operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, the camp was a National Park Service camp, located 15 miles south of Galax on the Blue Ridge Parkway. When the camp was closed the men were moved to Three Rivers, Cal. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 149-50.

Galenists (Dutch, Galenisten) were the followers of the Dutch Mennonite leader Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz de Haan. They were also called Lamists (q.v.).

Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (Geleyn de Haen), physician and preacher of Amsterdam, was born Oct. 8, 1622, at Zierikzee, Zeeland, the Netherlands. His parents were Abraham Geleynsz and Katrijntje Gillis, the latter a granddaughter of Gillis van Aken (von Aachen). In Zierikzee Valerius de Schoolmeester had died as an Anabaptist martyr, who in his book Proba Fidei (1568) asserted that man can contribute to his cleansing from sin toward an evangelical perfection. Galenus also later emphasized sanctification.

The Mennonite congregation of Zierikzee avoided taking sides in the controversy between the Flemish and Frisians and published a booklet along these lines: Een Christelijcke Proeve ende overlegginge ofte rekeninge, waerin dat allen Broeders ende Susters vermaendt worden tot een scherp ende neerstich ondersoec haers selfs (1570). Since they did not take sides they were called stilstaanders by the others and were banned both by Flemish and Frisians. Galenus also did not consider as Mennonites only those who subscribed to confessions of faith. He insisted that each had the freedom not to sign those articles of faith which are not prerequisite for salvation. The Zierikzee congregation had a specific way of life. One spoke little and deliberately and adhered to simplicity of dress and household furnishings. Galenus also emphasized a way of life of earnestness and simplicity. François de Knuyt, elder of the congregation, who wrote the book Corte Bekentenisse onses geloofs (1618?), taught young Galenus, who later concluded from this book that not every word of the Bible has the same value and that only the sayings of Christ are the Word of God.

After completing the Latin school Galenus went to Leiden in 1642 to study medicine. Here he met Pieter Jansz Moyer, elder of the Flemish church, who in 1626, when he was still a Mennonite minister in Amsterdam, had been the coauthor of the Olive Branch, the confession which had united the Frisian, Flemish, and High German Mennonite groups. This contact must have strengthened Galenus' desire to see all Mennonites united. On March 2, 1645, he was graduated as Doctor of Medicine.

Early in 1646 Galenus began practicing medicine in Amsterdam, and on Sept. 16 he married Saertghen Bierens, a daughter of Abraham Dircksz, who was also a coauthor of the Olive Branch. In 1648 he was elected preacher by the United Mennonite Church which was meeting in the "Het Lam" church, the present Singelkerk. When he accepted the ministry, doubts had already arisen regarding his orthodoxy in matters pertaining to the doctrine of satisfaction. Galenus left the impression that the death of Christ was more a proof of the truth of his teaching than an act of satisfaction, which view had also been expressed by some martyrs.

One of the first tasks confronting the young minister was to reply to the Waterlanders, who were proposing closer co-operation between the two groups. They had suggested in 1647 that each group should retain the freedom to formulate its own beliefs, avoid disputes along these lines, but they would have unity through the Word of God in the Bible. Although such a proposal would have been acceptable for Galenus a few years later, he then, in March 1649, wrote a letter declining such an invitation. He must have done so because he still saw the Waterlanders through the eyes of the Flemish, who considered them too tolerant toward non-Mennonites.

Soon after this he was delegated to Texel to defend Elder Claes Arentsz, who in a dispute with the Reformed had aroused the anger of the Calvinists by speaking slightingly of infant baptism. This mission shows that he had the confidence of his coministers. In June of that year he was present at a meeting of the delegates of Flemish congregations at Haarlem which strongly opposed union with the Waterlanders. These experiences must have raised the question in Galenus to what degree elders and congregations may exercise authority. His doubt whether any human being or any human authority ever could determine what someone else had to believe was intensified through his association with the Collegiants. They formed a group in Amsterdam under the leadership of Adam Boreel, whom Galenus befriended, which did not recognize any church as the true church of Christ. Among the Collegiants, many of whom considered the "college," a voluntary organization of "interdenominational Christendom," above their own special church, were also Socinians (q.v.). Those who thought that Galenus was also Socinian accused him in 1655 in a pamphlet Commonitio of this despised and feared heresy. In spite of the fact that on Easter Monday 1655 Galenus declared that not in a single issue in which the Anabaptists differed from the Socinians did he "fully" agree with the latter, the suspicion remained. A meeting of the ministers and deacons of the Lamist congregation became necessary.

Before this meeting took place Galenus and David Spruyt had on Jan. 11, 1657, presented to their coministers the "Nineteen Articles," in which they discussed the question whether any church could claim to be the true church of the Lord. The authors denied this possibility and refused to bind the conscience of human beings to the authority of an office, whose bearers were fallible men, to definite doctrines formulated by men, and to ordinances which are always administered by men. These views were exactly the opposite of what a group of ministers of the Lamist congregation considered sacred. They thought that the confessions which had been written in the beginning of the 17th century were the exact summary of the faith which all Mennonites had confessed from the beginning. Galenus pointed out that the martyrs had not died for a faith in which there had been no deviation and that in the writings of Menno Simons a change in the concept of the church is noticeable. He preferred to use the Bible as the guide for faith and life and to let every man interpret it.

An attempt to solve the tensions caused by this development was made at a general conference of Mennonite congregations held in June 1660 at Leiden under the chairmanship of Thieleman Jansz van Braght, at which it was decided to ask Galenus and Spruyt to give up their views or to discontinue their ministry. The two accused men, however, refused to accept this verdict, believing that only their congregation could dismiss them and not a meeting of congregations. An attempt to have the ministers of the Amsterdam congregation deprive them of their office was unsuccessful since many members shared their views.

It seemed for a time that the Concept van Verdrag of Jan. 31, 1662, had restored peace. However, two newly elected ministers caused a new outbreak of unrest. Pieter van Locren, who shared Galenus' views, preached on Oct. 1, 1662, that in the Final Judgment the question would not be what man had believed, but what man had done. On Oct. 15 Samuel Apostool, who represented the other side, stated that no one could ever do enough good works to be justified in the sight of God and that only faith in the satisfaction through Christ could save men. In the afternoon service Galenus warned against this "misleading" teaching which might cause people to stop wrestling with sin. The tumult which resulted from these discussions in the pulpit in Amsterdam spread throughout all Mennonite congregations in Holland, and even in foreign countries sides were taken for or against Galenus.

Laurens Hendricksz, a deacon of the Lam congregation and a strong opponent of Galenus, appealed to the court of Holland to have Galenus banned from the country because of Socinian views. This failed, as did other attempts to have him removed, because the majority of the members of the congregation favored Galenus. The final stage of the disagreement, which a contemporary satirically called the Lammerenkrijgh (War of the Lambs), centered around the Lord's Supper. Galenus was willing to admit everyone regardless of possible deviations in religious concepts as long as he lived an irreproachable life. His opponents refused to admit those who in their estimation did not fully believe in the vicarious death of Christ. There was also a difference of opinion regarding the support of widows and orphans of former ministers. When the burgomaster, who was asked to help straighten out the difficulty, did not succeed in restoring the peace, one fourth of the members of the congregation rented a building at the end of May 1664, which they arranged for a church. On June 22 the first service was held in this church and thus a new congregation was organized. Since the building in which they worshiped was known as "de Zon," the group became known as Zonists. For a long time Galenus tried to win the Zonists back to his congregation. Since he did not succeed, there was now no reason why his congregation should not unite with the Waterlanders. They, like Galenus, considered the general confessions as human formulations of faith and practiced tolerance regarding deviating views which could be based on the Bible. Thus the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation which met at the "Toren" (Jan Rodenpoortstoren) united with the Lamist congregation on June 1, 1668. This example was followed by other Waterland and Flemish congregations.

The Zonists, too, eventually attracted some Waterlanders to them. On July 18, 1674, the Mennonite congregations which had sided with Apostool united in the Zonist Sociëteit, which was based on the Oprecht Verbondt van Eenigheyt of 1664. This Verbondt takes the general Mennonite confessions as a basis and states that no ministers who do not agree with them can be admitted to congregations of the Sociëteit. On Nov. 27, 1674, a Lamist Sociëteit was also organized for mutual assistance in matters pertaining to vacancies and religious instruction. Galenus wrote the catechism for this Sociëteit, Anleyding tot de kennis van de Christelijke Godsdienst (1677).

Gradually all Dutch Mennonite congregations belonged either to the Zonists or Lamists. When the Lamist and Zonist congregations in Amsterdam finally united in 1801 the unity of the Dutch Mennonites of the middle of the 16th century was restored. This happened on the basis advocated by Galenus, that subscribing to a formulated confession of faith is unnecessary and that each congregation practice complete autonomy.

In 1680 the Lamist congregation of Amsterdam authorized Galenus to train preachers. In 1692 a training school for ministers was established, of which Galenus was instructor until his death (April 19, 1706). This training school developed into the present Mennonite Theological Seminary. Outstanding students of Galenus were Abraham Verduyn, Joannes Houbakker, and Adriaen Spinniker.

The foundation of Galenus' basic beliefs is the Bible, in which the New Testament gets preference above the Old. The Bible is necessary for salvation and is the rule for faith and life. The human mind illuminated by God is in position to understand the true meaning of the Bible; obscure parts must be interpreted in accordance with the teachings of Christ, whose holy and blameless life is the foundation for faith. The Bible is also the source for his statement of the characteristics of God. Most important is the experience of God's fatherly love and for that reason the knowledge of God can never be purely intellectual. It must be coupled with trust, in fact even a sacred and pure "being in love" with God.

Christ is the Son of God, but Galenus does not want to discuss His possible oneness with the Father, the relationship of His two natures, and the secret of His Incarnation, because Christ Himself was satisfied with the simple statement in Matt. 16:16. God anointed His Son with the Holy Spirit so that He could save the world through His teaching. His teaching includes claims and promises. Galenus strongly stresses the way of life required by God. He devoted the book Christelijke Zedekonst, which was published after his death, to this topic. God's promise is in harmony with His divine nature, which men can approach step by step. He elaborated on this in his exegesis on the Beatitudes entitled Acht trappen ter Saligheyd. This thought he likely borrowed from Coornhert. The potent means for achieving this is prayer which draws divine grace to the one who is praying. The experience of this grace is for him the center of spiritual life. To illustrate this he used selections from letters of the martyrs which he added to two of his books. His Verhandeling van de Redelijk-bevindelijke Godsdienst demonstrates how strongly he emphasized experience.

Galenus did not develop a special church concept. All who possess a genuine faith and obedience to God and are reborn through His Spirit belong to those whom Christ is gathering about Him. The best description of this he found in Erasmus' Ratio seu methodus compendiosa perveniendi ad veram theologiam (Opera V. Col. 84 b-d). The Mennonite congregations are to strive to attain this state. The leaders are to take a position of serving, and not ruling or certainly not of rank. It is the right and duty of every Christian to teach and preach after a reasonable preparation, upright living, practice of knowledge, and after an express call of the entire congregation, as he stated in a writing against Laurens Hendricksz. Through baptism, which is a publicly given proof of the acceptance of Christianity, one joins the general Christian Church and not any particular congregation. Water baptism is not necessary for salvation; the only prerequisite for that is baptism by the Holy Spirit, but it is helpful because it reminds the Christian that he has committed himself to lead a God-pleasing life. The Lord's Supper is not essential either but it aids in remembering the inexpressible love of God which was most gloriously revealed in the death of Christ on the cross. At the end of life the Christian expects judgment over what he has done during his life. The disobedient will receive punishment depending on the degree of unrighteousness. Those who have had unwavering faith shall through grace receive eternal life.

Galenus' writings appeared as follows: Negentien Artikelen with "Nader Verklaringe" and "Wederlegginge van Laurens Hendricksz" in 1659; Brief aan C.S. (Claes Stapel), 1677; Anleyding tot de kennis van de Christelijke Godsdienst, 1677; Kort Begrijp, 1682; Beknopt vertoog van de gelijkluijdende Getuygenissen der Heilige Schrift, published in 1684, contains Bible references for the two previously mentioned writings. A dedicatory sermon which Galenus preached for the new church at Zaandam, Anspraak an de Vereenigde Doopsgezinde

GALICIA
Mennonite Settlements
(According to W. Kuhn)
KEY Cities ○
Mother Colonies settled 1784-85
Daughter Colonies settled 1830-50 ▲
Daughter Colonies settled 1862-72 ●
0
5
10
15
20
25
SCALE OF MILES
Bug River
Dnestr River
Rava Ruskaya
Troscianiec (1871)
Zólkiev
Ehrenfeld (1864)
Lvov (Lemberg)
Yavorov
Gorodek Yagellonski
Kiernica (1848)
Neuhof (1830)
Einsiedel (1786)
Falkenstein (1784)
Rosenberg (1786)
Dornfeld
Neu-Horozanna (1850)
Bobra
Przemyslany
Lipovce (1872)
Podusilna (1872)
Zydoczov
Stry
Dobrovslany (1871)
Drogobych
Sambor
Viszenka (1862)
Mosciska
Przemysl
Galicia
And Surrounding Territory
Volhynia
Ukraine
Brody
Lvov
Einsiedel
Stanislavov
Przemysl
Poland
Galicia
Krakóv
Germany
Czechoslovakia
Hungary
Rumania

Gemeente te Zaandam, to which he added Acht trappen ter Saligheyd and Tegens den Indrang van het Hedendaagze Pausdom (possibly written by Adam Boreel), was published 1687. His most important work is Verdédiging der Christenen, die Doopsgezinde genaamd worden, beneffens Korte Grondstellingen van hun gelove en leere, which appeared 1699. After his death three additional writings of his were published (in 1707) by Wilhem van Maurik: Veertien Predikatien over de gelijkenis van den Verloren Zoon, Christelijke Zedekonst, and Verhandeling van de Redelijk-bevindelijke Godsdienst.† H.W.M.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 667, 700, 701, 797; II, Nos. 780, 838, 905, 1185-87, 1244, 1301, 1304, 1321, 1393-94, 1398, 1403, 1522, 1762, 1764, 2043-46, 2629, 2630, 2694, 2818; II, 2, Nos. 259, 588; DJ 1837, 45, 104, 107; 1840, 65 f.; DJ 1850, 88 ff.; Doopsgez. Lectuur 1858, 88 ff.; DB 1863, 137, 147; 1873, 142; 1875, 27 f.; 1884, 34; 1887, 121; 1888, 103 f.; 124; 1892, 104; 1900, 1 ff., 88; 1901, 119 ff.; 1902, 89, 94 ff.; 1909, 158; 1916, 148 ff., 158 ff.; 1918, 49 ff.; Catalogus Amst., 117, 133, 153, 207, 217, 230, 242, 257, 258; Biogr. Wb. III, 166-71; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954); K. O. Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn kring ('s Gravenhage, 1896); S. Cramer, "De vereeniging der twee Amsterdamsche gemeenten in 1801," DB 1898; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs (Haarlem, 1900, 1902); W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912); J. Lindeboom, Stiefkinderen van het Christendom ('s Gravenhage, 1929); C. W. A. Roldanus, Zeventiende-eeuwsche Geestesbloei (Amsterdam, 1938); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952); besides these see Catalogus Amst., 113-33, for the collection of pamphlets; ML II, 26-29.

Galicia, until World War I a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, thereafter Polish until 1939. About 3,300 German families, including 28 Mennonite families, settled in the vicinity of Lemberg (q.v.), when Emperor Joseph II invited colonization in the patent of Sept. 17, 1781. They came for the most part from the Palatinate. The oldest church record states that they came from various parts of Germany, and were of Swiss origin. In 1784 they lived in three newly laid out neighboring communities, Einsiedel (18), Falkenstein (7), and Rosenberg (3 families). All three places were in the county of Szczerzec (Shchirets), about three miles southwest of Lemberg.

These Mennonites were assured of religious liberty and freedom from military service by a decision of the chancellory, which was announced to the government of Galicia and which designated the following conditions:

(1) They were to be treated as Lutherans, since their case was not regulated by a public law, but they were silently admitted as settlers without being required to join one of the recognized creeds.

(2) Like other non-Catholics they would be permitted to build their own little church as soon as they had 100 families.

(3) They and their descendants, as long as they remained Mennonites, should be exempt from military duty, but no other Mennonite immigrants would be admitted; no member of a tolerated church was permitted to join the Mennonite congregation (Menn. Bl., 1858, 51; 1887, 37).

Some of the new colonists were disturbed by political conditions. Among the native population a conspiracy against the new settlers threatened to grow, and it was feared that it would not be possible to buy more land later. Therefore eleven families, including perhaps all the Amish, sold their possessions and migrated across the border into Russia, to the Hutterian Brethren from Hungary and Moravia, who had already settled in Vishenka, province of Chernigov. They did not stay here long, but soon settled in the province of Volhynia. Nearly all of their descendants emigrated to America in 1875.

The Mennonites remaining in Galicia prospered. In 1800 there were at least 87 members, probably about 100 souls in 15 or 16 families. Their exemption from military service, though sometimes threatened by subordinate officials, was always confirmed by the authorities; this happened in 1812, 1828, 1832, and 1848. After the introduction of universal military service they had the right, as in Prussia, to choose noncombatant service.

Their numbers grew rapidly through their high birth rate; in 1868 their preacher Johannes van der Smissen gave the membership as over 80 families with 400 souls. The official census, which usually reported figures too low, shows 61 families with 362 persons. For the increase subsidiary settlements were founded; in 1830 at Neuhof with about 500 acres, divided into 12 farms; in 1848 at Kiernica with 3,200 acres and Horozanna with 740 acres; in 1864 Ehrenfeld-Blyszczyvody with 2,500 acres, and besides these a number of estates which several families took up and divided. These subsidiaries sometimes formed congregations in themselves.

In 1878-83 a new emigration took place. Seventy-five families, half of the settlement, emigrated to America, principally to Kansas and Minnesota. These were on the whole the poorer members of the congregation.

The remaining members now began to rent land in addition to what they purchased. Between 1866 and 1870 four families moved in. The official report states that there were in Austria-Hungary 490 Mennonites in 1890, 497 in 1910; but these figures are too low. In 1914 there were about 600 Mennonites in the country—200 children and 400 baptized members. They were scattered in more than 100 localities. About one half were leaseholders and had leased over 30,000 acres. The others owned a total of over 130,000 acres. Several young men had adopted city vocations. Over 30 had attended the Gymnasium or Realschule, and about 12 the university.

Religious services and schools for children were at first held in private homes. In 1816 a school was built at Einsiedel and services held there; in 1839 the school was rebuilt as a church. In the subsidiary congregations services were held in the homes of the preachers; some meetinghouses were also erected—Neuhof 1865, Kiernica 1860 (Menn. Bl., 1887, 39), Ehrenfeld-Blyszczyvody 1865. In 1914 there were meetinghouses in Einsiedel, Neuhof, and Kiernica. Services were held in each about six times annually. In 1909 a legally incorporated congregation was formed, called Lemberg-Kiernica (q.v.). In 1911 a house was bought in Lemberg containing a chapel, a parsonage, an office, and living quarters for the chairman (Kurator) of the church council. In 1910 an association was organized with the name "Mennonit," to promote the cultural and social interests of the Galician Mennonites.

Since in Austria civil marriages were not recognized, the ministers were obligated to keep exact records of births, marriages, and deaths, which were state documents. From the beginning of the settlement until the accession of Francis Joseph these books were kept by Catholic parish priests; but most Protestant churches kept their own in addition. The Mennonite church records were begun about 1805. They were the most valuable treasure in the Mennonite archives. In April 1913 the Galician Mennonites began the publication of the Mennonitisches Gemeindeblatt für Oesterreich (q.v.). World War I early prevented its further publication.

In the 1880's and toward the end of the 19th century a considerable number of Galician Mennonite families emigrated to the United States. They constituted the major portion of five congregations of the G.C.M. Church, namely, Arlington and Hanston, Kan., Butterfield and Westbrook, Minn., and Perry, Okla. The Hanston congregation was the first, established in 1885; it bore the name "Einsiedel" 1885-1952. In 1880 and the years immediately following, 70 Galician families out of 144 left for America, a total of 369 persons out of 718 in Galicia in 1880.

World War I brought much tribulation and suffering to the Galician Mennonites, since this area was repeatedly in the battle zone. Numerous members lost their lives or disappeared, and there was much destruction of property. The Polish-Ukrainian war (1918-19) and the Bolshevik invasion of 1920 added to the troubles. Austrian sovereignty came to an end in November 1918, and Galicia became a part of the new Polish state in May 1919. Relations between the Polish government and the Mennonites were always very good. In 1925 a home for students (Schülerheim) was established in Lemberg, led by Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Schroeder from the Molotschna settlement in Russia, in which most of the children of the widely scattered families lived while they attended school in Lemberg.

The first theologically trained (partly) and supported minister was Heinrich Pauls, who served 1908-20. He was followed by Pastor Gsell 1920-27. The church then paid for the theological training of Arnold Bachmann, who served from 1932 until the expulsion of the Germans from the Lemberg area in 1939. In that year the congregation had a population of about 550 souls living in 100 different localities. Through mixed marriages many husbands and wives as well as children were Catholics.

The economic and occupational life of the Galician Mennonites underwent great changes after 1885. The main settlements originated in 1784-1830 and daughter settlements were established in 1830-85. The period 1885-1918 marked the disintegration of the old settlements. After half of the Mennonites had gone to America, others began to occupy large estates, mostly as renters. Of the 116 Mennonite families in Galicia in 1914 half were renters and only one sixth lived in the original settlements, while in 1884 half of them had been living there. Occupations other than farming, such as teaching, law, and medicine, became common. With an increased number receiving higher education, more and more moved into cities. Many adopted the Polish culture. Intermarriage with other Protestants and even Catholics became common. Many efforts were made to counteract these disintegrating forces. Particularly the Lemberg church, the "Schülerheim," the social organization (Geselligkeitsverein Mennonit), and the Gemeindeblatt served this purpose.

World War II quickly brought an end to Galician Mennonitism. In 1939, as a result of the Russo-German treaty, Lemberg and the surrounding territory was taken by Russia and all Germans were evacuated. Beginning in late September 1939 and ending by Jan. 1, 1940, all the Galician Mennonites were resettled in the region of Thorn and Posen in West Poland, by then occupied by the Germans. When the Russian armies in 1945 defeated the Germans and occupied this territory also, the Galician Mennonites again had to flee westward into Western Germany. About 30 per cent of the entire group lost their lives in this period.

The remnant of the Galician Mennonites have resettled with the Danzig Mennonites in Uruguay (1951), where they have held together as a religio-cultural segment in the several congregations there.

H.Pa., C.K.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen, 1784-1934. Gedenkschrift zur Erinnerung an die Einwanderung der Mennoniten nach Kleinpolen (Galizien) vor 150 Jahren. Im Auftrage der Mennonitengemeinde zusammengestellt (Lemberg, Verlag der Lemberger Mennonitengemeinde, 1934); attached to this book in a separate folder is Stammbäume der mennonitischen Familien in Kleinpolen; "Erste Nachrichten von unseren Rücksiedlern aus der Lemberger Gemeinde," Menn. Bl., January 1940; "Die Rücksiedlung der Neuhöfer," ibid.; "Die schweizerische Herkunft der Galizischen Mennoniten," Der Mennonit II (1949) 74 f., 94-96; W. Kuhn, "Swiss-Galician Mennonites," Menn. Life VIII (January 1953) 24; Martin Schrag, "Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Background," Menn. Life IX (October 1954) 156; Naamlijst 1787, 63; DB 1865, 95-108; ML II, 29 f.

Galle (Gally), a South German Mennonite family of Swiss origin. An Anabaptist preacher with the name Gally participated in the religious disputation on Jan. 16, 1613, at Wädenswyl in the canton of Zürich and was later sentenced to galley slavery. As far as is known Peter Gally or Galle was the only member of the family to emigrate to the Palatinate; as a young man he settled in Erbesbüdesheim near Alzey. (Uncorroborated tradition has it that bearers of the name went down the Rhine as far as the Netherlands.) Peter Galle probably had only two sons, one of whom, Peter, took over the Geistermühle in 1734. He was married to Anna Kolb of Wolfsheim (probably the younger sister of Dielman and Martin Kolb) and had nine children, all of whom married Mennonites and settled in the vicinity with the exception of Peter, who is said to have emigrated to America. The family is found chiefly in the Uffhofen and Weierhof communities and has produced some important preachers: Peter Galle, d. 1762; Jakob (1734-1801); Johannes (1766-1838); Peter (1758-1825). Today (1953) there are about ten Galle families with about 50 souls living in the Palatinate and Hessen. On Sept. 12, 1850, Jakob Galle, the great-grandson of the first miller, emigrated to America from the Geistermühle with his children. Kansas has several families with this name. C.G.

Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932) 372.

Galle, Jakob (1732-1801), of Uffhofen (q.v.), Germany, a preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Erbesbüdesheim (q.v.) 1762, elder 1767, who dedicated the new church at Sembach, Jan. 1, 1778 (Brons, 216), did much to sustain and revive his congregation. His son Johannes (1766-1838), "a man of zeal for the customs and discipline of the fathers" (Menn. Bl., 1855, 52), was preacher of the congregation of Oberflörsheim (q.v.). He also served many years as elder of the church at Weierhof (q.v.), but separated from it and the other large congregations in Hesse and the Palatinate when they began to engage educated ministers for a salary. He also opposed the introduction of the new hymnal and catechism. He apparently clung to the old Ausbund (q.v.), for in his letters he frequently lamented that the martyrs' hymns were being abandoned. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror he valued very highly. He must have been a gifted speaker. His extensive correspondence with brethren in America, Switzerland, Bavaria, and Alsace reveals an unusual knowledge of the Bible. His most faithful adherents he found in Heppenheim a.d.W., Oberflörsheim, Uffhofen, Kühbörncheshof, and Neudorferhof. These five congregations formed a close union under his leadership, published the Deknatel catechism and the 35 questions and answers by Gerrit Roosen anew, held their own meetings, and energetically resisted all innovations (mixed marriages, foreign mission, etc.). After the death of Galle this division among the Palatine-Hessian congregations gradually disappeared. NEFF.

A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1912); ML II, 30.

Galleys, long, narrow, two-masted medieval war vessels with 26 benches for oarsmen, on each of which five galley slaves sat in chains to perform their arduous task. As a rule they were criminals condemned for life to this unbearably hard work. Punishment on the galleys was one of the severest penalties imposed by the seafaring peoples like France and Italy. It was also used in punishing heresy. France was the first to do this in condemning the Huguenots to lifelong galley service. Anabaptists also shared this sad fate.

In 1540, 90 Anabaptists were taken from prison in Falkenstein (q.v.) in Austria to Trieste by King Ferdinand, to be delivered as galley slaves to the Doge of Venice, Andrea Doria. They managed to escape. Twenty were recaptured and ended their lives at the galleys (Beck, 147; see also Aschelberger). On May 12, 1562, at Utrecht Willem Willemsz was condemned to six years of galley service (Vos, 240).

Nearly 75 years later in the canton of Zürich (Switzerland) three Anabaptists, Hans Landis, Galli Fuchs, and Stephan Zehender, were sentenced to the galleys and were taken bound to the French ambassador in Solothurn, where they were freed with the aid of their brethren in Bern (Müller, 216). In the canton of Bern punishment at the galleys for Anabaptists was expressly rejected; but in 1648 it was applied against two Anabaptists, and in 1671 it was actually carried out against six. In two years they returned home. In 1714 five others were sent to the galleys. Two of them died at sea, but the other three were released in January 1716 at the intervention of the Dutch Mennonites. When in the following year four were again sentenced in Bern to service as galley slaves, the States General in Holland intervened and had them freed.

The sentence of galley service remains a blot of religious intolerance and violent persecution on the record of the Protestant states. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Müller, Berner Täufer, 215-32; Menn. Bl., 1913, 15; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter en Barbara Frv (Groningen, 1890) 119; DB 1906, 6; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1250, 1254a, 1371, 1375-85, 1780-82; ML II, 26.

Gallitz (also Gollitz, now Skalica) is a county and village (pop. 600) in the former Znaim (Znojmo) district of Moravia between Austerlitz (Slavkov) and Stiegnitz, four hours from Znaim. In 1563 the Anabaptists erected a Bruderhof there, which became one of the chief Hutterite households (Geschichts-Bücher, 215). In the Bohemian revolt it was severely damaged by Dampierre's troops in 1619, and again in 1623 and 1662. LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 314, 539, 592, 649, 658 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 215, 418, 504; ML II, 34.

Gallneukirchen in Upper Austria was shortly after 1530 the center of a live Anabaptist movement. (Wolkan, Lieder, 24.) vdZ.

Gallus, Carolus (1530-1616), a Dutch Roman Catholic priest at Deventer, then Reformed pastor, deposed as priest in 1561 for heresy, at the request of Count Johan of Nassau undertook the task of introducing the Reformation in Gelderland in 1578. He was appointed professor of theology in the University of Leiden. Released from his position in 1592, he became a Reformed preacher at Oldenbroek, where he died. He was a violent antagonist of Anabaptism. Two of his writings bear witness of this: (1) Lehre des Christelicken geloovens in veer boecken tegen den wedertöpern erdommen (Bremen, 1577); and (2) Malleus anabaptistarum. Een hamer op dat hoeft aller wederdoperschen secten (Arnhem, 1606). (ML II, 34.) K.V.

Gallus Kleermaecker (tailor), an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed at Antwerp in 1573 together with Sijntgen van Rousselare (q.v.) and Maeyken Gosens (q.v.). The Martyrs' Mirror gives a letter of consolation and admonition, which is signed, "By me your weak brother and servant, to the utmost of my ability." (Mart. Mir. D 644-46, E 695-97.) NEFF.

Gamerslach, Jacques van de, a Dutch Mennonite preacher of the Flemish congregation at Leiden. In the afternoon service held on April 27, 1664, after a communion service had been held in the forenoon, T. J. van Braght (q.v.), elder of Dordrecht, preached a sermon. Then before the whole congregation van de Gamerslach made a confession of his faith and was thereupon ordained as elder (leraer in den vollen dienst) by the laying on of hands by van Braght. Before this time he had been a preacher. After July 23, 1680, his name is no longer found in the records; so we may assume that he died about that time. Van de Gamerslach, who took a strict stand, e.g., repudiating marriage outside the church, successfully managed the union of his congregation with the conservative Zonists (q.v.). He was one of the representatives of Leiden who signed the Oprecht Verbond van Eenigheydt in 1674, and was one of the buitenmannen (leaders from outside) called in to settle the schism at Utrecht, 1661 against W. van Maurik (q.v.) and his friends, when he likewise represented conservative views. VDZ.

L. G. Le Poole, Bijdr. tot de kennis van het Kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden . . . (Leiden, 1905) passim; DB 1916, 170 ff.

Gammeren, Abraham van, a member of the Huiskoper (Danzig Old Flemish, q.v.) congregation of Haarlem, Holland, was excommunicated in 1741 because of his sympathy with the Moravian Brethren (q.v.). Dirk van Gammeren, who translated the sermons of the Moravian leader Count of Zinzendorf (q.v.) into Dutch in 1758, may have been a relative of Abraham van Gammeren. VDZ.

W. J. Lütjeharms, Het philadelphisch-oecumenisch streven der Hernhutters in de Nederlanden in de 18de eeuw (Zeist, 1935) 134, 239.

Gam(m)eren, Adriaen van (d. 1725), was an elder of the Danzig Old Flemish Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam. He may have been a descendant of Jacob Gijsbertsz van Gameren (q.v.), one of the early Anabaptists of Amsterdam. VDZ.

Ganglofs, Claes, an author and elder of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Emden at the end of the 16th century and the beginning of the 17th, who played a role in the Huiskoper (q.v.) dispute at Franeker in 1588, which dispute split the Flemish into two divisions, a strict one and a more lenient one. Ganglofs was one of the elders appointed to mediate the quarrel and traveled with the group to Haarlem, where they presumably reached an agreement on the position they would take. He sided with the strict party and worked in East Friesland, Westphalia, Groningen, and Overijssel, opposed the attempt at unification made by Lubbert Gerritsz in 1604, applied the ban in marriage with absolute severity, opposed mixed marriages, and required rebaptism of persons wishing to join his congregation. He wrote the following works: Proeve des Geloofs (1570, reprint 1610); Antwoort ende verclaringhe op de presentatie tot vereeninge (1605, 1626, 1631); Nieu Geestelyck Liedboecxken (Groningen, 1593, 1606, 1615, 1633); Dat gebedt ons Heeren Jesu Christi (1593, 1623); Grondich Bewijs van Gods Gemeynt (1599, 1605, 1626); Vermaning en zendbrief aan zyn huisvrouw (1605, 1633); and a letter to his brother which contains 29 songs. Some of the songs are about persons in Almelo, Bocholt, and Leer. Some of these writings were published by J. de Buyser in the Christelyck Huysboeck (1643), 854-76, in which he attacked the views of Claas Claasz of Blokzijl. Presumably either Ganglofs himself or his ancestors came from Flanders; in 1655 a Joorys Gangeloof of Flanders (DB 1877, 11) was a member of the congregation at Aardenburg, Zeeland. K.V., VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 477, 558; DB 1865, 68; 1900, 74; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 628; Biogr. Wb. III, 178 f.; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1919, 147-53; Catalogus Amst., 104, 185, 224, 269; ML II, 34.

Gansfort, Johan Wessel (1420-89), precursor of the Reformation in the Netherlands, born at Groningen, educated in the school of the Brethren of the Common Life at Zwolle. He became the bosom friend of Thomas à Kempis, the famous author of The Imitation of Christ. Throughout Europe he was respected as a man of extraordinary learning. He traveled in France and Italy and visited the papal court. His liberal views, deviating from those of the Catholic Church, led to his dismissal from the faculty at Heidelberg. After this event he lived again in Groningen, and regularly visited the noted school at the near-by abbey at Aduard. In consequence he exerted unusual influence on the clergy of Friesland and Groningen, thus preparing the way for the Reformation in these parts. His heretical concept of communion he stated in a book, De coena Dei (The Lord's Supper). Two scholarly Dutch Humanists, Hinne Rode and Cornelis Hoen, acquainted Zwingli with Gansfort's ideas. From them Zwingli derived his doctrine on the communion. Thus the concept of the Dutch Mennonites concerning communion is not taken from Zwingli, but was taken directly from Gansfort by Frisian preachers. K.V.

M. van Rhijn, Wessel Gansfort (The Hague, 1917); J. Lindeboom, Het Bijbelsch Humanisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1913) 39-55; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1920, 148-53; ML II, 35.

Gantz-Hernley Mennonite Church (MC), of the vicinity of Manheim, Pa., a member of Lancaster Conference, worships in two meetinghouses. The Gantz meetinghouse, a brick building 40 x 60 ft., located 3½ miles northwest of Manheim, was built in 1915 on the site of the first church, which had been purchased in 1880. The Hernley church was built one mile north of Manheim in 1745 on land contributed by the Penns and was enlarged in 1919. Sunday school and worship services are held every Sunday alternately in the two churches. The membership in 1955 was 256; the ministers were Abram M. Risser and Clyde L. Metzler; the deacons were Isaac E. Tyson and John R. Nissley; the bishop in charge was Homer D. Bomberger. An early division resulted in a considerable loss into the Church of the Brethren. I.D.L.

Gar Creek Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct. About 1854 Mennonites first settled at Gar Creek, a village eleven miles northeast of Fort Wayne, Ind. Among them Michael Rothgeb, Abram and Jacob Bixler, John Federspiel, Hezekiah Rothgeb, and Nancy Lowery. Services were held in Bethel Chapel, a union building. There was no resident minister. Eli Stoffer, a minister in the Hudson (Ind.) congregation, and others conducted occasional services. In 1900 there were 20 members. After the establishing of the Fort Wayne Mission in 1903, the mission workers assumed responsibility for the services at Gar Creek. On Oct. 22, 1905, the building was rededicated for church services. Regular services were discontinued about 1910. H.L.O.

Garber Mennonite Church (MC), of Lancaster Mennonite Conference, is located five miles northeast of Hanover, York Co., Pa., in Richard Danner's bishop district. By 1814 the scattered members had a church-schoolhouse built in the village of Menges Mills. By 1889 the present house was built. The membership in 1953 was 30, with William H. Martin as pastor, and John L. Ruppert as deacon. Joseph Hershey, at least by 1806, was a resident minister in this middle district, which also included Hershey and Bair's Codorus until a recent date. Summer Bible school has been held since 1951, with 235 in attendance. I.D.L.

Garbrant Gabbisz (Gerbrand Gabesz) van der Scellingh (from the island of Terschelling?), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death by the sword on April 15, 1540, at Alkmaar, province of North Holland, because he had been rebaptized and did not believe in the "holy sacrament of the Mass." He is thought to have been a follower of the revolutionary Anabaptist leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 748, 2; DB 1909, 24; Mellink, Wederdoopers, 173.) vdZ.

Garden City, Mo., a village (pop. 590) in Cass County, approximately 50 miles southeast of Kansas City. Mennonites (MC) moved into the community in 1860 and eight years later organized a congregation. There have been four congregations in the community, Clearfork (MC) 1868-76, Clearfork (GCM) 1876-85?, Sycamore Grove (MC) 1816- , and Bethel (MC) 1885-1947, which merged with Sycamore Grove in 1947. In 1954 the Mennonite population of this area was approximately 300. J.D.Y.

Garden Mennonite Church (GCM), about halfway between Moundridge and Halstead, Kan., was organized in 1887, by about 15 families (51 charter members), of Garden Twp., Harvey Co. D. W. Schmitt and Jacob Vogt, Sr., planned the building, and Katie M. Krehbiel of Halstead donated the plot for the church, which was dedicated on Sept. 9, 1888.

The first deacons were Jacob Vogt, Sr., D. T. Eyman, and John Dettweiler. Among the early settlers were names such as these: Leisy, Schmutz, Schmitt, Eyman, Dettweiler, Schowalter, Latchar, Berger, Bachman, Vogt. A number of these early settlers later moved to the west coast.

On Aug. 30, 1890, S. S. Baumgartner began his service of nearly 20 years as minister and elder, during which the membership grew to 147. Other ministers serving this church were A. A. Sommer, H. P. Peters, N. R. Kaufman, J. R. Duerksen, J. M. Janzen, A. J. Dirks, and Victor Graber. The membership in 1955 was 90, with Virgil Dirks as pastor. L.C.R.

Gardner Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was established near Gardner, Grundy Co., Ill., in perhaps the early 1860's by families moving there from Pennsylvania and Ohio. Among the families were Buckwalter, Showalter, Tinsman, Kulp, Shelly, Whitmore, and Bachman. The first minister, John G. Bachman, an aged man, was ordained in 1863. Two years later John F. Funk and Henry Shelly were ordained to preach in English and German respectively for the congregation. Once a month Funk came from Chicago to preach for the congregation. Several years after the organization of the congregation, a white frame church was built about two miles west of Gardner. Some time after 1885 the last remaining family, the Lewis Culps, moved to Elkhart, Ind., after which the church was sold. M.G.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931) 174-76.

Garfield County, Okla., with Enid as its county seat, has four Mennonite congregations in or near Enid, with a total of about 550 members in 1954, two thirds of whom are M.B. (Enid 210 and North Enid 189) and one third G.C.M. (Bethel 30 and Grace 126). H.S.B.

Garrett County (Md.) Old Order Amish Settlement. Garrett County is in western Maryland bordering Somerset Co., Pa. The settlement consisting of about 75 communicant members is located several miles south of Oakland. The first to locate there came probably sometime before 1850; among them were the families of Pfeil, Gortner, and Miller from Germany, and Yutzy, Slabach, Selder, Beachey, Gnagey, Schrock, and Petersheim from Somerset and Cambria counties, Pa. The congregation was probably organized in 1855. Through the preaching of John Holdeman several families left, including two preachers. Daniel Beachey was the first bishop in the congregation. After his death in 1897, bishops from the Somerset churches served the congregation until 1908. Lewis M. Beachey, the present bishop, was ordained at that time. The settlement has always considered itself as one church district, even though in the early days of the settlement several families lived about ten miles west of Oakland, near Aurora and Eglon, W. Va. The congregation worships regularly in a meetinghouse built in 1949. L.M.B.

Gartental is the second Mennonite colony established in Uruguay. Most of the 431 Mennonites who arrived in Uruguay on Oct. 19, 1951, are living there. About 330 of them are from Danzig and Poland, while the rest are from Russia. Gartental includes approximately 4,400 acres 30 miles from the city of Paysandu on the Paysandu-Mercedes highway. The San Pedro River bisects the land. It is 45 miles from El Ombu, the first Mennonite settlement in Uruguay. The land is gently rolling, with soil from sandy to heavy black. Crops are wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, sugar beets, and flax. The purchase price was 648,000 pesos ($272,350). Funds from North American Mennonites were loaned to the colony to make the down payment.

The Gartental Mennonite Church was organized almost immediately with Rudolf Hein as elder, and Ernst Enss and Johannes Bergmann as preachers, all having been ordained earlier in Europe. This congregation was one of the three to organize the Uruguay Mennonite Conference on Feb. 21, 1953. E.SCH.

Gärtnerbrüder (Gardener Brethren), an ancient name for members of the "old evangelical" churches, which was also applied to the Anabaptists (especially in Augsburg in 1530; Keller, Reformation, 11, note 8). The real name was "Gartbrüder" from "gartenn," to wander. (ML II, 35.) NEFF.

Gaspard Deken (de Decke), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jasper de Schoenmaker.

Gast, Johann (d. 1552), of Breisach, Reformed parson and prolific writer at Basel, Switzerland, disciple of Oecolampadius. His diary, preserved only in excerpts (by Tryphius) and as manuscript (a translation by Buxtorf-Falkeisen appeared in Basel in 1856), and also his book, De anabaptismi exordio, erroribus, historijs abominandis, Confutationibus adjectis (Basel, 1544), are the most important sources for the history of the Anabaptists in Basel. Since he speaks polemically and in addition copies much from others (especially Zwingli's In catabaptistarum strophas elenchus) he must be used with caution. He is a violent opponent of the Anabaptists, and sees in them only obstinancy and hypocrisy. In Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Berlin, 1821), by Reiswitz and Wadzeck, his name is incorrectly (p. 231) given as Johann Gustius, and his book inexactly.

Hagenbach describes Gast as having a sharp, malicious tongue, in whose diary everybody is defamed. And Hase says that his book is a confused collection, in part based on records, and in part on Swiss anecdotes to defame the Anabaptists, though they actually (unintentionally) frequently honor the Anabaptists. E.C.

K. Gesner, Bibliotheca instituta et collecta (Zürich, 1574 and 1583); P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1888) p. X; K. R. Hagenbach, Johannes Oekolampad (1859) 382; K. Hase, Das Reich der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1860) 148; ML II, 35.

Gasteiger (Gasteyer, Gastaiger), Christian, a Hutterite martyr, a smith by trade, was seized May 30, 1586, at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, Germany. Two days later two Jesuits and the city priest appeared in his cell to talk to him about his faith. But he refused to renounce his faith. Three weeks later the Jesuits appeared again, with the same negative result. Two days later the priest and a doctor of the Holy Scriptures discussed infant baptism with him; he met their assertions with Scripture. They pronounced him a heretic. The judge who visited him on the following day, and told him that he had received orders from the court, if Gasteiger did not accept the faith in which his parents had died, he must be placed on the stake. But Gasteiger replied that he was prepared to die from day to day and would not deviate from the truth. From his prison he wrote the brotherhood an epistle, urging them to trust him, for he would fight well for the eternal crown.

After an imprisonment of 12 weeks in Ingolstadt Gasteiger was welded upon a cart and on Aug. 25 taken to Munich. There he was sentenced on Sept. 13 to die by the sword. The prince, Duke William, was not at home, the chief judge had died, the subordinate judge refused to pronounce the verdict, the mayor and many councilors opposed it, but the Jesuits insisted. When he reached the site of execution he expressed his joy at the nearness of the martyr's crown. The executioner and the Jesuit made another attempt to bring him to recant, but he refused, knelt down, and presented his neck to the sword. His martyrdom is commemorated in the song of the five brethren who were executed for their faith in Bavaria, "Himmlischer Gott und Herr, lass dich erbarmen schier." It is found in Th. Unger, "Ueber eine Wiedertäuferlieder-Handschrift des 17. Jahrhunderts," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Gesch. des Protestantismus in Oesterreich XIII (1892) 144-53. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 299 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 423 f.; Mart. Mir. D 755, E 1062; Wolkan, Lieder, 235; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 117; ML II, 35 f.

Gätte (Gäta and Göda; now Kuty) in Czechoslovakia (formerly Hungary) near the Delta of the Thaya and the March, was in the 16th century a part of the Holitsch domain. In the great persecution of 1550, say the chronicles, there was in Gätte in Hungary a Bruderhof with 150 children, also many sick, lame, and blind. But they were ordered to leave the estates of Berthold von Lipa, and wandered about at the mercy of the populace. In 1552 four deacons were confirmed at Gätte. Then the Bruderhof is not mentioned until 70 years later. On April 15, 1627, Croatian horsemen from Moravia plundered it. LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 241, 249 f., 208, 606; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 319, 331, 341, 808; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML II, 36.

Gayman, Christian (1825-98), of Cayuga, Ont., was ordained minister about 1863, and bishop about 1875, and became one of the active leaders of the Old Order Mennonite schism in the Ontario Mennonite Conference (MC) in 1889. At the 1888 conference he openly stated that he wished to form a conference of his own and did so in May 1889, at the Wideman Church at Markham, Ont. He was joined by Bishop Abraham Martin of Waterloo County, and Bishop Christian Reesor of Markham. Gayman's home congregation was the Cayuga Church near South Cayuga, in Haldimand County, near the shore of Lake Erie. H.S.B.

Geary First Mennonite Church (GCM) in west central Oklahoma, a member of the Western District Conference, was organized on Aug. 15, 1897, five years after Mennonite settlers had moved into the area, with 22 white and 3 Indian members. In 1953 there were 95 members. The church property consists of a brick veneer church completed in 1929 and a parsonage finished in 1948. Ministers who have served the congregation are J. S. Krehbiel 1897-1916, Henry Riesen 1917-24, Henry D. Penner 1926-33, P. E. Franz 1936-41, H. N. Harder 1943-45, A. H. Peters 1946-52, and Henry Hege 1952- . A.H.P.

Geauga County, Ohio, Old Order Amish Settlement, consisting of eleven districts and approximately 1,000 baptized members who live in Geauga and the adjoining Trumbull Co., Ohio. The first Amish family to move into the area was that of Samuel Weaver, from Holmes Co., Ohio, in the spring of 1886. In 1887 Simon Mast from Holmes County and ministers Dan Byler and Jacob Byler and families moved to Geauga from Lawrence Co., Pa. A congregation was organized in 1887 with ten families from Holmes County and several from Lawrence County. Isaac Hershberger, a deacon from Indiana, joined the settlement in 1888.

The eleven districts in 1953 with date of formation are as follows: North Parkman 1953; South Parkman 1944; Troy 1897; South Middlefield East 1900; South Middlefield West 1946; Huntsburg 1921; Burton Station 1937; East Middlefield; Mast 1921; Mesopotamia South 1940; Mesopotamia North 1940. The latter two districts are in Trumbull County, but belong to the larger Geauga County settlement. The entire settlement has 10 bishops, 13 deacons, and 20 ministers. J.A.H.

Y. J. Byler, "First Amish Settlers in Geauga Co., Ohio," The Budget, Jan. 26, 1950, Feb. 2, 1950.

Gebhardt, (Heinrich) Ernst (1832-99), a Methodist minister of Germany, spent some time in South and North America and England accompanying R. Pearsall Smith as song leader at his evangelistic meetings. Gebhardt wrote many original hymns and translated over fifty Gospel hymns from English into German, most of them Moody and Sankey songs. They appeared in his Frohe Botschaft and Evangeliums-Lieder (C. F. Spittler, Basel), which were distributed in Europe and America in innumerable volumes. He was the compiler and editor of many other songbooks.

Gebhardt's translations of such songs as "Rock of Ages"—"Fels des Heils," and "Oh, Have You Not Heard"—"Ich weiss einen Strom" seem to have more poetic quality than the English. His contribution to the spread of Gospel songs among German-speaking Mennonites of Europe and America can hardly be overestimated. (See Hymnology.) C.K.

Lester Hostetler, Handbook to the Mennonite Hymnary (Newton, 1949) 90, 144; RGG II, p. 906.

Gebietsamt (Russian, Volost; i.e., district government) was the name (German) of the authority established by Mennonites in Russia to govern a large settlement consisting of a number of villages; its head was the Oberschulze (q.v.). This form of Mennonite district self-government was transplanted from the Mennonite settlements in Russia to Manitoba, Mexico, and South America. (See also Government of Mennonites in Russia.) C.K.

E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia (Altona, 1955) 84 f., 90-96.

Gebietsvorsteher: see Oberschulze.

Gebser, August Rudolf (1801-74), in 1828 professor at the University of Jena, Germany, in 1829 superintendent and cathedral preacher, 1830-56 professor of theology at the University of Königsberg. Later he lived in Weimar, Kösen, Eisleben, and Halle, where he died. His manifold works, mostly theological, are predominantly occasional writings. In his Commentatio de primordiis studiorum fanaticorum Anabaptistarum saeculo XVI, which appeared anonymously at Königsberg in 1830, he tried to prove that the Anabaptist movement emanated from Nikolaus Storch (q.v.). A copy of this rare book is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library and in the university library of Göttingen. (ML II, 41.) E.C.

Geel (Geelen), Jan (Johan) van: see Jan van Geelen.

Geeraardsbergen, a town in the Belgian province of East Flanders, about 1560 a center of Mennonite activity. At this time a number of brethren were arrested, but escaped with the aid of the jailer. It is not known whether or not there was a Mennonite congregation there. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Geeraerdt van de Walle, of Hansbeke in Flanders, who was arrested and tried in November 1590 at Gent, Belgium, evidently was a Mennonite preacher. His trial gives an interesting account of the character and the principles of the Mennonites in Flanders. As early as 1578 Geeraerdt participated in the Mennonite meetings, but not until 1587 was he admitted to baptism on faith by Hans Busschaert (q.v.). He related that meetings in Gent were held in weavers' workrooms; the women sat near their spinning wheels; a number of men, some from outside the city, entered, but not at the same time. He admitted that he had written letters to the Dutch province of Zeeland; and that he also had sometimes explained "the doctrines of Menno Simons." A New Testament which he possessed was taken away when he was arrested. Geeraerdt was a simple brushmaker and farm laborer. The extant documents do not tell the outcome of the trial. (Verheyden, Gent, 69; idem, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Geeraert Saelen (Sielen, Zeelen, Zielen), an Anabaptist martyr, originally from the vicinity of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, was burned at the stake at Brussels, Belgium, on March 2, 1568.

He was about 23 years of age. He refused to betray the names of other Mennonites in the city. During his trial he gave some interesting information about the baptismal practices of the Mennonites. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 73, No. 40.) vdZ.

Geerken Vrancken, a sister-in-law of the martyr Metken (q.v.), was also an Anabaptist martyr. She was probably drowned on Aug. 28, 1547, at Echt, at that time belonging to the duchy of Gelder, now the Dutch province of Limburg. Particulars about her were not available. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . I ('s Gravenhage, 1937) 326, 399.

Geerloff Gerritsz (Hemelinck), a martyr, was hanged at Utrecht in the Netherlands on April 20, 1570, for the simple reason that he had been present at a religious meeting held at night at Bunschoten, province of Utrecht, his home, and had listened to a sermon by a Mennonite preacher. It is not clear whether he was a Mennonite himself or not. vdZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, "Onze Martelaren," in Ned. Arch. voor Kerkgesch. I ('s Gravenhage, 1902) No. 71.

Geert Cornelis, wife of Frans Philipsz of Leiden, was put in a sack and drowned near the Schooltoren in the moat of Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 24, 1539. (The year 1538 given by Brandt is wrong; it must have been 1539.) Brandt mentions that this woman, who was a follower of David Joris (q.v.), was of lax sexual morals; during the trial she gave information about the sex behavior of the Davidjorists with words that, as Brandt says, should not contaminate the paper. It was largely rumored that among the Davidjorists there was much immorality. In most cases these rumors have proved to be false or at least inaccurate and much exaggerated. But there was a germ of truth in those reports, as the case of Geert Cornelis proves. vdZ.

G. Brandt, Historie der Reformatie I (2d ed. Amsterdam, 1677) 134; DB 1917, 162.

Geert H. (exact name is unknown), a Mennonite from Danzig, East Prussia, a follower of Dirk Philips (q.v.), apparently a preacher or elder, who in 1567 was delegated by the Danzig congregation, together with Dirk Philips and Hans Sikken, to settle the quarrels which had arisen in the Netherlands between the Flemish and the Frisians (see Flemish Mennonites). (DB 1893, 54, 63 note 3, 64.)

Geert Jansdochter (Guert Jan Mickersdochter) of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, was put to death together with her mother Stijntgen, Jan Mickers' widow (q.v.), because she had been (re)baptized and did not believe in the sacrament of the Mass. Both women were drowned at Alkmaar on April 16, 1540. They are supposed to have been followers of Batenburg (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 748, 2; DB 1909, 24.) vdZ.

Geertgen Cort Pietersd of Leiden was drowned at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 23, 1539, with three other women, because she had been (re)baptized. They were probably followers of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 749.) vdZ.

Geertgen Geluwers of Zwolle was tortured and drowned on June 3, 1539, at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. She may have been a follower of David Joris (q.v.). For particulars see article Lambrecht Duppijns. vdZ.

Bijdr. en Mededelingen Hist. Genootschap, Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 21, 208, 210.

Geertken Erasmusdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Maastricht, was burned at the stake on Sept. 11, 1538, at Vught near 's Hertogenbosch in the Dutch province of North Brabant. She was one of the nine members of Paulus van Drunen's (q.v.) congregation, who were executed at Vught on Sept. 9 and 11, 1538. (DB 1917, 189.) vdZ.

Geertruidenberg, a town in the Dutch province of North Brabant, where in former times there was a small Mennonite congregation, closely connected with those of Breda (q.v.) and Oosterhout. It belonged to the Flemish Mennonites, and in 1665 joined the Zonist (q.v.) branch. Deacons at this time were Jan Jansz van Langereyt and Augustijn Gerritsz Hulstman. It seems to have had no preacher at that time. Blaupot ten Cate (Holland II, 43) informs us that this congregation died out before or about 1750; but it probably dissolved much earlier, for after 1674 no mention of it is made in the records of the Flemish church of Rotterdam, which used to keep a careful eye on a number of small Flemish congregations in the surroundings. Geertruidenberg now has a population of 3,344 souls, 85.2 per cent of whom are Roman Catholics. No Mennonites are found now in this town. vdZ.

Geertruydt (or Geertruy Jansdochter), the wife of Menno Simons, whom he married in 1536. In 1554 (Opera, 259a) he wrote that he and his wife had been refugees for 18 years. This marriage very likely took place in Groningen where he resided temporarily in quietness. Vos's assumption that Geertruydt came from Witmarsum and was the daughter of Herman Hoyer has not been established. Fiction writers have gone into great detail in covering this phase of Menno's life, but the actual information about his wife and family is extremely scarce. Geertruydt's sister Griet was married to Rein Edes. Menno wrote Griet a letter, from which Vos (Krahn, 37) drew erroneous conclusions regarding further family relationships.

Life as a wife of a refugee preacher was not easy. In 1544 Menno reported that he had been unable to find a hut for as long as a year or even half a year for his "poor wife" and their small children (Opera, 521). Repeatedly Menno writes about his "poor sick wife" (Opera, 259a, 234a). In a writing to a Lasco in 1544 he speaks of "our small children" (Opera, 521). They must have had at least two daughters (Opera, 392b), and according to Vos (p. 4) they had a son Jan. Geertruydt must have died between 1553 and 1558. In 1553 Menno sent greetings from his wife (Opera, 456b) while in 1558 he included regards from his daughters only (Opera, 392b). Their son had probably died by this time. One daughter reported details of her father's life to P. J. Twisck (Vos, 14). C.K.

C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 97 ff.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1917) 3-6, 66, 266, 317; DB 1906, 3; ML II, 85.

Geertruydt Adriaens de Roevre (Geertken Erasmusdochter of Tricht), wife of Wouter Hoogendoren, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death and burned at the stake at Vught, province of North Brabant, on Sept. 11, 1539, with three other martyrs; the day before, four martyrs had been burned, among whom was Paulus van Drunen (q.v.), the bishop of their congregation. Van Braght includes a report on the martyrs of Vught in which he places their martyrdom wrongly in the year 1538; he also says that 12 Anabaptists were executed, whereas the records name only eight. Some of the names given in the records are found in the Martyrs' Mirror but other names are not handed down by van Braght. The name of Geertruydt, mentioned in the official records, is not found in the Martyrs' Mirror. It is rather surprising that she is found in the Reformed martyrbook by Adriaen van Haemstede (q.v.), De Geschiedenisse ende den doodt der vromen Martelaren, of 1559. Haemstede no doubt considered her as Reformed, which is an error. She was an Anabaptist, as the records clearly show. (Mart. Mir. D 41-42, E 447; DB 1917, 189; see also 's Hertogenbosch, and Vught.) vdZ.

Geertruyt Faes, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 18, 1577, together with Mayken Truyens and Laureys Janssen. The method of execution was not stated in the records. Geertruyt was charged with the crime of having received (re)baptism and attended the meetings of the Mennonites. Geertruyt and the two other martyrs executed on the same day were the last Anabaptists to die for their faith at Antwerp. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 211; XIV, 98-99, No. 1122.) vdZ.

Geertruyt Jansdochter (surnamed Kemster), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr. It is assumed that her surname means that she was a native of Kennemerland, a district of the province of North Holland, north of Haarlem. She was arrested at Haarlem on May 24, 1539, and after torture on May 28 was drowned there on June 3, 1539. She may have been a follower of David Joris (q.v.). For particulars see Lambrecht Duppijns. vdZ.

Bijdr. en Mededelingen Hist. Genootschap Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 200-01, 208, 210, 211, 218.

Geervliet, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland on the island of Putten, formerly the seat of a small Flemish Mennonite congregation. It seems to have formed one congregation with the neighboring towns of Heenvliet, Spijkenisse, and Zuidland; was also called "het Brielsche land" congregation; later it was usually called Spijkenisse (q.v.). Of the origin of this congregation nothing is known. It may have been founded by Anabaptist refugees from Flanders. It was represented at the Flemish conference at Leiden in 1660 by its preachers Huygh Barentsz van der Klock, Leendert Pietersz, and Adriaen Jansz. In 1674 it joined the stricter branch of the Zonists (q.v.). For many years it was financially supported by the church of Rotterdam. In 1671 Jan Abrahams was chosen as a preacher, but he served for only one year, moving to Brielle in 1672. After this the pulpit was nearly always vacant. In 1733 and again in 1736 it contributed a small amount to the Dutch Fund for Foreign Needs in behalf of the Prussian refugees; so it still existed at this time; but soon after, in any case before 1760, it must have been dissolved.

The martyr Jan Jansz Brant (q.v.), a native of Zuidland, was executed at Geervliet on Nov. 29, 1559 (Offer, 550; Mart. Mir. D 243, E 617). Whether there was already at this time a congregation cannot be determined. vdZ.

Geestelijck Liedt-Boecxken, een, inholdende veel schoone sinrijcke Christlijcke Liedekens: oock troostlijcke Nieuwe-Jaren, Claech- unde Lof-Sanghen, ter Eeren Godes: Alle oprechte Godt-meenende Liefhebberen der Waerheyt Christi, Olden unde Jonghen seer dienstlijck, deur D. J. (n.p., n.d.). This Anabaptist hymnbook in the Low German language was published at the end of the 16th century. The author is David Joris (q.v.). It was probably published by Gillis Roman (q.v.) at Haarlem, Holland. There is also a second edition, enlarged by two hymns; this second edition was in the Dutch language. A copy of the first edition is found in the Royal Library at The Hague, one of the second edition in the Library of the University of Gent. The hymns, for a large part composed by David Joris himself, deal with Anabaptist martyrs of the period 1529-36. The fourth hymn is dedicated to Anneken N., viz., Anneken Jans of Rotterdam. This hymn was also included in the Offer des Heeren of 1562. Many of the hymns contain an ecstatic apocalyptic mysticism, as taught by David Joris. vdZ.

Wolkan, Lieder, 58 f.; F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens, (The Hague, 1900) 165-67.

Geestelijcke Bijenkorf, title of a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook published in 1637 at Alkmaar, of which, as far as is known, no copy is extant. vdZ.

Geestelijke Belangen, Adviescommissie voor de (Advisory Committee for Spiritual Matters), a Dutch Mennonite committee, which gives advice to the executive board of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite Conference), especially in matters of spiritual interest. It was established in 1941; its members are appointed by the A.D.S., and all kinds of Dutch Mennonite activities and spiritual movements are represented in this committee, which meets six to seven times a year. The board appointed to compose a preachers' manual (Kanselboek, q.v.) was a subcommittee of the Geestelijke Belangen committee. vdZ.

Geestelijke Goudschaale, De, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook. Of the first three editions no copy is extant. The first edition appeared in 1662 at Franeker, the second at Leeuwarden in 1683, but the date of the third is not known. The fourth edition, enlarged and edited by Wiger Jansen, was published at Leeuwarden, 1751. It has three parts, containing respectively 95, 76, and 17 hymns, all without notes. This hymnbook was used in some Mennonite congregations, e.g., on the island of Ameland (q.v.), until about 1850. vdZ.

DJ 1837, 63; DB 1889, 10; 1891, 7; 1900, 85 f., 97-99; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 43.

Geestelyke ofte Nieuwe Herpe Davidts, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, published at Amsterdam in 1752; it contains 284 hymns on 554 pages and a suffix of 17 hymns (all without notes). This hymnbook is a modified and enlarged reprint of the last edition (1724) of Veelderhande Schriftuurlyke Liedekens (q.v.). The edition of 1752 under its new title was intended for use in the congregations in Prussia. vdZ.

Geesteranus, Johannes, b. 1586 at Alkmaar, a member of a Dutch family of which many members served the Reformed Church as pastors, was a Reformed pastor himself, serving at Vreeland 1609-17?, and Alkmaar 1617?-19. In this year he was dismissed on the charge of Socinianism (q.v.). He soon joined the Rijnsburg Collegiant (q.v.) movement and was the first to receive baptism by immersion at Rijnsburg. He declined an appointment as rector (president) of the Socinian College at Rakow, Poland. After his dismissal he had made his living by weaving. When action was taken against the Socinians in the Netherlands Geesteranus settled at Norden, East Friesland, Germany. Here he met with two other ex-Reformed ministers, both also dismissed—his brother Petrus Geesteranus, and Dirk Rafaelsz Camphuysen (q.v.), to whom he was bound by a warm friendship. In 1622 Geesteranus, his wife, and his only son died of the plague at Norden. Geesteranus is said to have shared the Anabaptist view that a Christian should not assume a government office. (N.N.B.Wb. III, 190-92; DB 1883, 70.) vdZ.

Geestlicke Liederen, Vijf, is a small volume of Dutch hymns published by Jan Theunisz (q.v.) at Leiden in 1600. All songs are signed with the motto "Jaecht naer best" (Striving for the best). vdZ.

Gehman (Geeman, Geyman, Gayman, Gahman, Gaueman), Bernese family name now having representatives in various districts of the Mennonite Church in North America, especially in the Lancaster, Franconia (MC), and Eastern District (GCM) conferences of southeastern Pennsylvania. The progenitors of most or all of these Gehmans were the brothers Christian and Benedict Geeman, who arrived at Philadelphia on the ship Samuel on Aug. 11, 1732, accompanied by their sister Anna Geeman. Immigrant Christian purchased land in Berks Co., Pa., while Benedict located in Lehigh County. The descendants of these pioneers are strongly represented in both the Lancaster and Franconia conferences. Lancaster has had about a dozen deacons and ministers by the name of Gehman, and Franconia thirteen. The first Franconia preacher by the name of Gehman was Abraham Gehman (d. 1792) of the Rockhill congregation, a son of immigrant Christian; both father and son are buried in the Rockhill cemetery. Preacher Abraham in turn was the father of Preacher Samuel Gehman (1767-1845). Daniel Gehman of Berks County (d. 1809) served in the Gehman congregation of the Lancaster Conference, first as a deacon as early as 1774, and after 1792 as a preacher. His great-great-grandson Moses Gehman, ordained in 1912, frequently writes for the Gospel Herald, and for a generation has been the senior minister in the Weaverland-Groffdale district, to which the Gehman congregation belongs.

When the Mennonites located in Lincoln Co., Ont., at the "Twenty," beginning about 1800, one of the settlers was named Gehman. In 1862 a Christian Gayman (q.v., 1825-98) at Selkirk, Ont., was ordained as a preacher, and in 1875 was made a bishop. After several years of tension he withdrew from the Mennonite Conference of Ontario in 1888 and served in the Old Order Mennonite Church when it was organized in 1889 in Ontario.

The General Conference Mennonite Church, Eastern District, had difficulty with a minister named William Gehman (q.v., 1827-1918), ordained preacher at Upper Milford in 1849. After several years of tension on the issue of prayer meetings (promoted by Gehman), he and 23 others, mostly laity, were expelled in May 1857. Gehman's group, in which he served as an elder, took the name Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.). This group eventually merged with other small Mennonite bodies to form the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (now known as United Missionary Church except in Pennsylvania). William Gehman's son, William G. Gehman (1874-1941), of Bethlehem, Pa., served as an M.B.C. presiding elder 1905-36.

Mennonites named Gehman have also been found in a few other states besides Pennsylvania, especially in Iowa. Ernest G. Gehman, formerly of the Franconia Conference, has taught at Eastern Mennonite College in Virginia for many years. Although a Mennonite named Gehmann appears in a 1759 Palatinate census list (at Neidenfels), the name seems not to have played much of a role in European Mennonite circles. J.C.W.

Gehman, William, a descendant of Christian Geeman who arrived in Philadelphia in 1732, b. Jan. 22, 1827, in Hereford Twp., Berks Co., Pa. He grew up on the farm and later learned the trade of a miller. He was married to Anna Musselman; they had nine children, including W. G. Gehman, presiding elder of the Pennsylvania Conference (MBC) 1905-41, and Allen M. Gehman, treasurer of the same Conference 1902-28.

Gehman was a minister and co-worker of John H. Oberholtzer and in 1849 he was ordained at Zionsville, Pa., by the General Conference Mennonites. Disagreeing with his leader on the subject of prayer meetings, he in 1857 organized the Evangelical Mennonites, a group that later helped to form the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church. He was thus the first to start the movement which resulted in the organization of the M.B.C. Church.

In 1858 Gehman erected at Zionsville the first M.B.C. Church. In 1879 he was elected the first presiding elder of the Pennsylvania Conference, which office he held until 1892, when he retired from active service.

"Father" Gehman, as he was known, never lost his interest in the church. He attended every annual conference up to the time of his death. Altogether he was present at 106 semiannual, annual, special, and general conferences without missing one session. At 29 of these he served as chairman.

He was noted for being punctual in the Sunday school, and kept his place in his class up to the last Sunday before his death. He died April 12, 1918, in his 92nd year. His body lies interred in the M.B.C. cemetery at Zionsville. E.R.S.

Gehman Mennonite Church (MC), located near Adamstown, Brecknock Twp., Berks Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Conference. The first Mennonites to settle here were a group of Swiss, who came in 1754-58, among them Niklaus Schantz, Hans Schantz, Joseph Wenger, Jost Schoenauer, Hans Burchalter, Hans Moser, and Christian Gehman. The congregation was probably organized in 1760. It worshiped in private homes until 1846, when the first meetinghouse was built, which was replaced in 1913 by a larger frame meetinghouse. Christian Bauman (1724-90) was the first minister, Joseph Wenger first deacon. Daniel Gehman was an outstanding man in this congregation (1774 ord. deacon, 1792 ord. minister, d. 1809). Ever since 1774 there has been a Gehman as minister or deacon in this congregation. In 1955 the membership of the congregation was 90, with Paul Z. Martin and Benjamin S. Zeiset as ministers. A.M.W.

Geiger Mennonite Church (MC), located on Bleam's Road two miles south of Baden, in Wilmot Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont., was organized by Bishop Benjamin Eby in 1831. The members first worshiped in a schoolhouse; a meetinghouse was built in 1842, replaced in 1874 by a frame building. Remodelings followed in 1913 and 1940. A large buggy shed was built in 1930. The deacons who served here were Ulrich Steiner (1800-57), ordained 1831; Amos S. Cressman (1834-1909), ordained 1864; John Nahrgang (1839-1912), ordained 1872 and about 1899 went to the Old Order Mennonites and served in upper Waterloo (South Peel); Osiah Cressman (1866-1933), ordained 1902; Eli Good (1862-1934), ordained 1904; Abraham Good, ordained 1932; Joseph Cressman, ordained 1944. Ministers who served were Abraham Honsberger (1801-38), ordained at the organizing of the church; Ulrich Geiger (1797-1864), ordained 1838; Amos S. Cressman, ordained 1867; Osiah Cressman, ordained 1903; Moses H. Roth (1898-), ordained minister in 1931, and bishop in 1937. Early bishops were Benjamin Eby of Berlin and Henry Shantz of Wilmot. Amos S. Cressman became bishop in 1875 to relieve Henry Shantz. After him for more than 20 years neighboring bishops served until Moses Roth became bishop. Sunday school was organized in 1901. By 1934 the enrollment was 91 and in 1953 it is 120. Church membership was 31 in 1890, 61 in 1934, and 92 in 1953. Until about 1935 preaching appointments on Sunday mornings alternated with Biehn's congregation. Young people's meeting continued to do so.

In early years Geiger's was a parent church for scattered congregations several townships north. J.C.F.

Geil, John, Mennonite (MC) leader and preacher, b. April 9, 1778, in New Britain Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., d. Jan. 16, 1866, affiliated with the Franconia (MC) Conference (q.v.). His father, Jacob Geil, had emigrated with his parents from Alsace or the Palatinate at the age of eight. John married Elizabeth Fretz (1781-1849) on April 22, 1802; she was the daughter of Mark Fretz (1750-1840), deacon of the Lexington congregation. They were the parents of eight children. Although John went to school but six weeks he was able to write both German and English. He was gifted with a keen mind and a remarkable memory. Ordained in 1810 or 1811 he served in the congregation at Line Lexington, Bucks Co., Pa., as a beloved and influential minister for over half a century. He farmed near the Fretz mill in New Britain Township and attended market in Philadelphia. Physically he was tall, slender, erect, well-proportioned, and had a high forehead. As an aged man he wore his white hair almost to his shoulders. In disposition he was modest and quiet and a man of strict simplicity. In the pulpit he was logical and fluent. His farewell address to his congregation in 1852 (published as a broadside with the title Abschiedsworte) is a model of pastoral love and concern. His brother Jacob Geil (1771-1856) was a Mennonite minister in Fairfield County, Ohio. J.C.W.

John F. Funk, Biographical Sketch of Preacher John Geil (Elkhart, 1897).

Geisberg, a French Mennonite congregation, a member of the Alsatian conference, located on the northern Alsatian-Palatine border, two miles southeast of Wissembourg, until the end of World War II a part of the Deutschhof-Geisberg (q.v.) congregation, with origins reaching back to 1760. The earliest settlements were at Schafbusch and Niederrödern, later Geisberg and Deutschhof, and the congregation changed its name after these localities several times. Until 1849 the services were held at Schafbusch just west of Geisberg. In that year a meeting room was constructed in the entrance portal of the Geisberg castle (Schloss). In the fighting of 1944-45 the Geisberg castle was largely destroyed. With the aid of American Mennonite relief and reconstruction workers stationed in Wissembourg the meeting room was rebuilt and rededicated on Aug. 3, 1947. In 1953 the baptized membership of Geisberg was 63, with 13 unbaptized children. The elder was Philipp Hege (Schafbusch) since 1928, preacher Fritz Hirschler (Geisberg) since 1937, deacon Jean Hirschler (Geisberg) since 1921. H.S.B.

Philipp Hege, "Das kriegszerstörte Gotteshaus zu Geisberg (Elsass) wieder hergestellt," Der Mennonit I (1948) 58.

Geiser (Geyser, Gyser), a Mennonite family name originating in Langental, canton of Bern, Switzerland, probably dating back to the 14th century with persons whose occupation was goat herding.

The first recorded bearer of the name who was connected with the Anabaptists was a Gabriel Geyser, who was fined in 1685 by Bernese authorities because it was suspected that he had connections with the Anabaptists. Early in the 18th century some members of the Geiser family who espoused the Anabaptist faith moved from Langental to the Jura where as early as 1724 Johannes Geiser and his wife Anna Jorg and four children were residing on the Sonnenberg Mountain in the commune of Corgémont. A list of 1768 names some members of the family living at Aux Convers. By 1823 most of the family lived in the vicinity of La Chaux-de-Fonds where Johannes Geiser (b. 1756) was a minister. In the early 1830's members of the Geiser family moved to the Sonnenberg settlement in Wayne County, Ohio, where a number have been prominent in church activities. Today in the Jura Geiser is one of the most prominent names among the Mennonites, six of their ministers carrying this name. Best known is Elder Samuel Geiser of Brügg, who wrote Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden, a history of the Swiss Mennonites, upon the request of the Swiss Mennonite Conference, for many years secretary of the conference. Elder David Geiser (d. 1950) long served the congregation at Chaux d'Abel, Elder Louis Geiser serves at Les Bulles, and Elder Samuel Geiser of Les Fontaines serves at Jeangisboden. D.L.G.

Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931).

Geiser, Abraham (1857-1928), elder of the Mennonite congregation in Chaux d'Abel in the Bernese Jura of Switzerland, was born on April 13, 1857, at Mont Cortébert, and grew up on Mont-Soleil near St. Imier, one of 12 children. Since his parents were pioneers in this remote settlement his education was limited to just a few weeks. At the age of 18 he was converted, and, feeling an urge to preach the Gospel, attended the Bible Training School of St. Chrischona for two winter terms. In the autumn of 1879 he married Katharina Gerber; they had four children. For 22 years he lived on a farm near Les-Bois, farming as well as preaching. In 1890 he was ordained as elder. He was one of the most influential Mennonite preachers of his time in Switzerland and was for several years president of the Conference of the Swiss Mennonite churches. In 1918 he sold his farm and with his oldest son and the son's family settled in Pays de Gex, 10 miles from Geneva, in France. Here, in St. Genis, there was a small congregation of Protestants, which was on the point of dissolution. It was soon arranged that this group would meet in Abraham Geiser's house. Several other Mennonite families from the Jura moved into the area, thus forming the nucleus of the present Pays de Gex Mennonite congregation. Later this congregation was in the care of his youngest son. After the close of World War I Abraham Geiser received an invitation from the Conference of Mennonites in Alsace to settle in Alsace, whereupon he and his oldest son Japhet leased a large farm near Colmar and settled there in 1924. In the spring of 1928 he died. He was buried in a cemetery in the Pays de Gex community.† S.G.

Geistliche Lieder, Sieben, a booklet of seven hymns, translated from the Groote Liedenboeck (q.v.) of Leenaert Clock. There are at least five editions: Amsterdam, 1664, 1691, and 1711; Basel, 1822; and Giessen, 1834. They are added to T. T. v(an) S(ittert), Christliche Glaubens-bekentnus. vdZ.

Geistliches Blumengärtlein, a rare devotional book published anonymously in Amsterdam 1680, which contains reprints of a number of Anabaptist and half-Anabaptist tracts and also a lengthy doctrinal work entitled Schriftmässiger Bericht und Zeugnis betreffend die rechte christliche Taufe, Abendmahl, Gemeinschaft, Obrigkeit, und . . . Ehestand, samt einer Bekentnis der Artikeln des christlich-apostolischen Glaubens. Erstlich geschrieben anno 1526 von H.D. Between its articles II and III a Danklied is inserted which has Hans Hut (q.v.) as its author, while as conclusion a hymn is printed which is a versification of the Apostles' Creed, said to have either Peter Riedemann (q.v.) or Siegmund Wiedemann (q.v.) as its author.

It is certainly surprising that all of a sudden such a number of Anabaptist writings should be published in Amsterdam, in the German language, at the end of the 17th century when Anabaptism in its classical form had practically died out. The only explanation could be that a pietistically minded author discovered somewhere in Amsterdam old pamphlets or perhaps a Hutterite manuscript book, as we know that the Mennonite Library of Amsterdam has at least one such Hutterite codex, and more of them must have been in circulation in Holland, due to Dutch relief work among the Hutterites. Searching for new devotional material the author gladly took hold of this unknown and fresh literature. Now he offered it to the reader quite harmlessly as a pietistic devotional book under the popular title of Geistliches Blumengärtlein (Spiritual Flowergarden; concerning this title see Geistliches Lustgärtlein). The once obnoxious connotation of "Anabaptist" origin had long since been lost, and the devout reader could meditate on these ideas without becoming too aware that these tracts contain much more than mere edification. In fact one is surprised to find in this volume (in the Bericht) an article defending community of goods (q.v.) and another defending nonresistance (q.v.), doctrines which must have appeared to Pietists almost as revolutionary. Yet by 1680 the mood of Protestantism had changed to such an extent that Anabaptist writings were actually welcomed as an enrichment of available devotional literature, in the same way as Mennonites of all branches now zealously read Lutheran, Calvinist, and Schwenckfeldian writings for their own enjoyment and edification (Friedmann, Mennonite Piety, 25).

The Blumengärtlein contains writings by Hans Denk (q.v.), Hans Hut (q.v.), Jörg Hauck von Juchsen (q.v.), Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.), plus the afore-mentioned Schriftmässiger Bericht, and two hymns. The unknown editor did not know how to identify the last-mentioned tract, and—apparently merely guessing—put down, "For the first time written by H.D. in 1526" (the initials standing for Hans Denk). In 1891, Ludwig Schwabe published this doctrinal tract in the Zeitschrift f. Kirchengeschichte (XII, 466-93), attributing it to "Hans Denk," who thus became a teacher of the ideal of communistic living. The existence of this Hutterite practice was then (1891) very little known, whereas Hans Denk had become popular through the writings of Ludwig Keller (q.v.). In 1931 Robert Friedmann identified this Bericht as an abridged version of the great Article Book (q.v.) of the Hutterian Brethren, dating from about 1547; as far as is known it had never been published in print, hence the editor must have used a Hutterite manuscript book. It is even possible that all the other tracts were also taken from the same codex, as we know that the Hutterites had the custom of such combination books. In any case, the transformation of a genuine 16th-century collection of Anabaptist tracts into a pietistic devotional reader deserves our greatest attention.

The Schriftmässiger Bericht, however, fits no other known version of the "Article Book," and for that reason is a valuable addition to our knowledge of Anabaptist literature and its manifold recasting. Its nearest model is an Anabaptist codex in Wolfenbüttel of 1582, which suggests the approximate date of the original copy of our tract. It goes without saying that Hans Denk had nothing to do with it, never taught community of goods, and is quite foreign to the entire genius of this remarkable doctrinal writing. The Geistliches Blumengärtlein, however, apparently never became very popular—perhaps it was yet too strong a drink for that rather soft period. The main significance of the book, however, rests in the fact that it is a testimony to a certain kinship, external though it seems to be, between Anabaptist and pietistic writings. While their genius is different, a mutual appreciation was nevertheless possible, particularly at a time when the original Anabaptist thought had almost completely died away. Copies of the Blumengärtlein are to be found in Göttingen, Munich, Berlin, and Dresden.
R.F.

L. Schwabe, "Ueber Hans Denck," in Ztsch. f. Kirchengesch. XII (1891) 466-93; R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift der Hutterischen Täufergemeinschaften in Mähren," in Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. XXVIII, 1931, 80 ff.; idem, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 25 f.

Geistliches Lustgärtlein (hortulus animae), a very popular title for devotional books ever since the Middle Ages, the idea being that the soul or the mind ambles in a lovely flower garden while reading the prayers and devout meditations of such a book. The number of books with this or similar titles is fairly large, both of Catholic and Protestant origin. Particularly during the period of Pietism (q.v.) this type of devotional literature became exceedingly well liked, the most outstanding example of it being the hymnal of Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.), Das geistliche Blumengärtlein inniger Seelen of 1729, with many reprints both in Europe and in Pennsylvania.

Among Mennonites two books of this or related title are known and once were much in use: (a) Johann Philip Schabalie (q.v.), Lusthoef des Gemoets, 1638, consisting originally of two parts, the second of which is the famous Biblical history, The Wandering Soul [first published separately in 1635]. The first part, a book of "spiritual exercises" (geestelijke oeffeninge), was soon published also independently as the very Lusthoef itself, and passed through innumerable editions both in Dutch and in High German. It proved to be a really popular religious reader of high value, with all its wealth of edification, information, and imagination. However, no American edition is known.

(b) Perhaps still more popular was another devotional book of this title, Neu vermehrtes Lustgärtlein frommer Seelen, das ist heilsame Anweisungen und Regeln zu einem gottseligen Leben, . . . first edition 1787. No author is named, and the origin of the book is rather obscure though it may be safely assumed that it is of non-Mennonite (possibly Lutheran) origin. No reference to this book could be found anywhere; and yet it is one of the most successful devotional books among European and American Mennonites (particularly among the Amish). It had eight editions in Europe between 1787 and 1854, and thirteen or more editions in America between 1824 and 1941. The first part of the Lustgärtlein (i.e., Heilsame Anweisungen, etc.) appeared, as far as research could ascertain, first as an appendix to the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.), the well-known Mennonite prayer book, in Herborn, Nassau. A chart with a complete survey of all editions may be found in Friedmann, Mennonite Piety, 212, demonstrating the tremendous appeal of this book, in spite of its otherwise surprising obscurity. It is quite uncertain whether the book is found in any European collection of devotional books (thus far inquiries have been negative); on the other hand Goshen College Library has a great number of well-worn copies, collected from Mennonite and Amish homes. It is still being published.

The book is divided into two unequal parts: (a) a collection of rules and counsel for the conduct of a pious life "agreeable to God," and (b) a collection of prayers for everyday and for holidays, also an extensive formulary for the Lord's Supper. The appropriateness of these prayers and counsel (for which the "Book of Proverbs" is quite frequently quoted) for many occasions, or just for general edification, may explain why this strange book became so unusually popular among Mennonites in spite of the fact that certain passages (e.g., concerning infant baptism) run directly counter to Mennonite tradition. Today the book is still in use among the Amish, and it might even be conjectured that there were Amish groups in Hessen and Waldeck which originally adopted this book for their use, although also Mennonites in the Emmental (Switzerland) and in Bavaria soon became fond of it.

The fact that the oldest known edition bears the title, Neu vermehrtes . . . Lustgärtlein, seems to indicate that an earlier (thus far unknown) edition existed, presumably of 1750-70, which was later enlarged and published prior to the Mennonite edition of 1787. The entire tone of the book is extremely pietistic, emphasizing thoughts on death and dying, typical of 18th-century devotion. R.F.

R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949—see index; the idea of Lustgärtlein in general is discussed in a footnote on p. 208). Reference to the idea of Lustgärtlein may also be found in Hermann Beck, Die Erbauungsliteratur der Evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands (Erlangen, 1883—16th century only) and by the same author, Die religiöse Volksliteratur der Evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands (Gotha, 1891).

Geistreiches Gesangbuch, worin nebst den Psalmen Davids eine Sammlung auserlesener alter und neuer Lieder zu finden ist, zur allgemeinen Erbauung herausgegeben (chief compiler Hans van Steen, an elder in the Flemish congregation at Danzig), the first German hymnbook of the West Prussian Mennonite churches, first edition at Königsberg in 1767, was long used in West Prussia, then in Russia, Manitoba, and in Mexico, where it is still in use. Further editions were published in West Prussia as follows: Königsberg 1775; Marienwerder 1780, when the title was changed to Geistreiches Gesangbuch zur Oeffentlichen und besonderen Erbauung der Mennonitischen Gemeine in und vor der Stadt Danzig, with an appendix, Anhang einiger Gebethe zur Kirchen- und Haus-Andacht, Elbing 1794; Marienwerder 1803, again with altered title, Gesangbuch, worin eine Sammlung alter und neuer Lieder zum gottesdienstlichen Gebrauch und allgemeinen Erbauung ausgegeben, Ps. 104 v. 33; Marienwerder 1819, when the title was changed a third time to read Gesang-Buch worin eine Sammlung geistreicher Lieder befindlich. Zur allgemeinen Erbauung und zum Lobe Gottes herausgeben; Elbing 1829; Marienburg 1838, "durchgesehene und verbesserte Auflage"; Elbing 1843; Graudenz 1845; and Danzig 1864. The Elbing edition of 1843, the ninth, was reprinted in Odessa for the Russian Mennonites in 1844, 1854, 1859, and 1867. A fifth undated Russian edition was printed in Leipzig, undated sixth and seventh editions again in Leipzig, the last distributed in Halbstadt. In 1843 (Elbing) the word "worin" in the title was changed to "in welchem."

The Mennonites who emigrated from Russia to Manitoba in 1874 had eight unchanged editions published at Elkhart, Ind., by the Mennonite Publishing Company, 1880, ——, 1889, 1895, 1903, 1909, 1916, 1918. Editions were published in 1926 and 1937 (durchgesehene amerikanische Ausgabe) by the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa. When the Old Colony Mennonites went to Mexico in 1922 they took this book along as their hymnbook, and there published two editions (1940, 1943). Three further editions for Mexico appeared at Scottdale (1944, 1949, 1954).

The contents of this hymnal have been changed but slightly during the entire period of 200 years. It never had any musical notation. The predecessor of this book was the Dutch Veelderhande Schriftuurlijke Liedekens . . . (q.v.), used in West Prussia 1724-69, which had been in use in Holland since the days of the Reformation.

Originally the Geistreiches Gesangbuch contained 505 songs and 150 Psalms, selected and translated from Dutch songbooks in use and chosen from the Halle, Stargard, Quandt, and Rogall songbooks. The Psalms were omitted with the third edition, which contained 620 hymns in 652 pages. In the sixth edition a second part (Zweiter Teil) was added making the total of 725 songs. The Geistreiches Gesangbuch has the unusual record of having been in use for nearly 200 years, going through 11 editions in Prussia, 7 in Russia, 11 in America, and 2 in Mexico, a total of 33 editions ranging from 3,000 to 5,000 copies each, making it the most widely used hymnbook of the Prussian-Russian Mennonites. (See article Hymnology of the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia.)† C.K.

Gelassenheit, self-surrender, resignation in God's will (Gottergebenheit), yieldedness to God's will, self-abandonment, the (passive) opening to God's willing, including the readiness to suffer for the sake of God, also peace and calmness of mind, in Dutch devotional literature leijdzaamheid (MQR, 1950, 22, note 17, suggests about 15 possible translations, none perfectly fitting). Only if man relinquishes his self-will may he become an instrument of God. The main Biblical locus seems to be Rev. 13:10, "Here is the patience [RSV has 'endurance'] and faith of the saints," even though Gelassenheit goes further than patience and endurance.

The mystical literature of the Middle Ages abounds in the description of this quality, deemed necessary for the contemplative life. Occasionally the mystics speak here also of the "mystical death" of the self. However, mystics understand this term primarily in a passive sense, for without such passive self-abandonment the craved union with God could not be attained.

Among the "Spiritual Reformers" of the 16th century (Spiritualists, q.v.) the term Gelassenheit appears again, but now with a more active connotation, closer to the divine principle of love. Rufus M. Jones recognizes here rightly a kinship to the ideas of the Quakers. It was above all Hans Denk (q.v.) who became a telling witness to this more positive interpretation of Gelassenheit. "If I run in the truth, that is if I run sufferingly (leidenderweis), then my running will not be in vain" (Was geredt sey, Schwindt, 34). "If man shall become one with God, he has to suffer what God intends to work in him" (Ordnung Gottes, Schwindt, 46). "There is no other way to blessedness than to lose one's self-will" (Was geredt sey, Jones, 23).

It was most likely Denk who made this idea popular among the Anabaptists. They had good reasons to accept it: their own teaching of obedience and discipleship (q.v.) almost required this attitude as the precondition of a reborn soul to walk the narrow path. The idea of martyrdom (q.v.) becomes bearable only on such a basis of self-surrender and joyous acceptance of God's willing. Only through Gelassenheit may suffering become the royal road to God. A beautiful example for this idea may be found in Michael Sattler's (q.v.) well-known letter to the brotherhood at Horb, sent out of his prison in May 1527. "In this peril I completely surrendered myself unto the will of the Lord, and . . . prepared myself even for death for His testimony. [Yet] I deemed it necessary to stir you up to follow after us in the divine warfare" (quoted from Martyrs' Mirror).

Perhaps the most outspoken representatives of Gelassenheit among early Anabaptists were the Philipite Brethren (q.v.) in Moravia, the rival group to the Hutterites, in the 1530's. It might even be claimed that Gelassenheit in a more passive connotation of quiet acceptance of suffering for the Lord's sake was the distinguishing doctrine of this group. Their strongest leader was most likely Michael Schneider (q.v.), of whom Wolkan has this to say: "[In his hymns] he is more profound [than the other brethren]; doctrinal questions do not concern him much, the idea of discipleship, however, seems to have influenced him most. Gelassenheit fills his mind: he is ready to suffer calmly, and even in the last hour he remembers his enemies, and he prays to God for them, for the highest virtue to him is brotherly love" (Wolkan, Lieder, 36). Gelassenheit and martyrdom belong then closely together.

Out of this Philipite group came the remarkable tract Concerning the True Soldier of Christ (q.v.) by Hans Haffner (q.v.) of about 1534. Its major idea is Gelassenheit, the victory over "world, flesh and the Devil." "The world truly accepts Christ as a gift, but does not know him at all from the point of view of suffering" (leidenderweis, the same term which Denk used a few years earlier). "When we truly realize the love of God, we will be ready to give up for love's sake even what God has given us." It is by this Gelassenheit that a true disciple is first recognized. Only by overcoming all selfishness will a community of love become possible.

In continuation of such thoughts, the Hutterites made the term Gelassenheit their own in a more earthly sense: the relinquishing of one's worldly possessions, in other words "absolute personal poverty," and subsequently the sharing of all earthly goods by the entire group. In fact, thus interpreted Gelassenheit becomes a central teaching of the Hutterite brethren. The great Article Book (q.v.) of about 1547 and its abbreviated version, the Five Articles . . . , are very outspoken in this regard; e.g., the third article is entitled, Von der wahren Gelassenheit und christlichen Gemeinschaft der Güter (Geschicht-Buch, 219). The idea is repeated in numberless tracts. Here hardly any mysticism is left; Gelassenheit is rather brought into close proximity to brotherly love which, the teaching goes, requires complete communal life. That Gelassenheit as preparedness to martyrdom was not forgotten, either, can likewise be proved from Hutterite literature. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder mentions Gelassenheit at seven different places, from 1529 to 1792 (see Index). On page 16, for instance, we read, "We should expect the Lord's work and Cross daily, as we have surrendered unto His discipline (Zucht) and have agreed (verwilligt) to accept whatever He may send upon us with thanksgiving, and to bear it with patience" (1529).

Naturally also the Martyrs' Mirror of 1660 abounds in quotations indicative of this basic attitude of the Anabaptists. A particularly fine example of it is contained in a letter which the brother Hans van Overdam wrote from his prison to the authorities of Gent in 1550. "We would rather through the grace of God suffer our temporal bodies to be burned, drowned, racked, or tortured, as it may seem good to you, or be scourged, banished, or driven away, or robbed of our goods, than to show any obedience contrary to the word of God, and we will be patient therein, committing vengeance to God, for we know that He says vengeance belongeth to me, I will recompense." Orley Swartzentruber, who quotes this passage (MQR, 1954, 139), calls this attitude "eschatological patience," that is, a patience born of an eschatological hope and expectation. This attitude, he thinks, belongs to the eschatological idea of the kingdom of God, which is "near" both in time and in spirit.

It would not be difficult to multiply these quotations from all branches of the Anabaptist movement. Actually the entire tract of Menno Simons, "The Cross of Christ" (1555, new Eng. ed. 1946), is basically nothing but an elaborate meditation on the virtue of leijdzaamheid.

In the period of Pietism (q.v.) the term Gelassenheit assumes again a new meaning, somewhat nearer to the mystical concept than to the Anabaptist interpretation. J. von Lodenstein (q.v.) and Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.) are particularly fond of the term which now means the unperturbed calmness of the soul (Seelenfrieden) in the contemplation of divine grace. This new interpretation is definitely quietistic, but as such an element of genuine piety. The "Stillen im Lande" practice Gelassenheit, that is, aloofness from the turmoil of life and strife. The world is left to itself, and all activism, i.e., the application of love to the shaping of life, becomes reduced to a mild morality. Suffering is now understood sentimentally, but a certain longing toward unity with the Divine somehow recalls the outlook of the medieval mystics. In England, the Quakers continue the line of the "Spiritual Reformers," approximating the idea of Gelassenheit with their term "opening of the mind."

Present-day Mennonitism has lost the idea of Gelassenheit nearly completely; yet with the recovery of the ideal of discipleship also Gelassenheit may be revived. R.F.

Article "Gelassenheit" in RGG II, 968-70; R. Friedmann, "Concerning the true soldier of Christ," MQR, 1931, 91 ff.; idem, "Anabaptism and Protestantism," MQR, 1950, 22-24; Rufus M. Jones, Spiritual Reformers of the Sixteenth Century (London, 1914, 1928); A. M. Schwindt, Hans Denck (Schlüchtern, c. 1922); Wolkan, Lieder; idem, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Das Klein-Geschichtsbuch (Philadelphia, 1947); O. Swartzentruber, "Piety and Theology of the Anabaptist Martyrs in Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror," MQR, 1954, 1, 2.

Gelder, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor was Dirk van Gelder (b. 1685 at Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, and d. there 1762).

He was a member of the Reformed Church, but his wife, Machteld Bruins, is supposed to have been a member of the Mennonite congregation. Their son Arend van Gelder (b. 1709 at Kampen and d. 1772 at Zaandam) was baptized in his childhood in the Reformed Church at Kampen. As an adult he moved first to Amsterdam and later to Zaandam, where he operated a grocery store. In Amsterdam he was married to Alida Nieuwenhuizen, who was a Mennonite, and van Gelder himself also joined the Mennonite Church, receiving baptism upon his confession of faith in the Zon (q.v.) meetinghouse at Amsterdam in 1734. Hendrik van Gelder (q.v.) was born of this marriage.

The Mennonite minister Arend Hendrik van Gelder (q.v.) was born of the third marriage of Arend van Gelder with Susanna Oortman. Pieter Smidt van Gelder, a son of Pastor Hendrik van Gelder and Maria Smidt (b. 1762 at Ouddorp, d. 1827 at Zaandam), settled at Wormerveer in the industrial Zaan district north of Amsterdam and ran a paper mill, which was continued in the world-renowned Royal Dutch Paper Manufactories van Gelder Zonen, a big business which is still carried on by members of the van Gelder family. This Pieter Smidt van Gelder, who became a wealthy man, was also sheriff and assistant-burgomaster of Wormerveer. Hendrik Arend van Gelder (q.v.), a Mennonite minister, was his grandson. The van Gelder family at Wormerveer has become allied by marriage with other Mennonite families of this district, such as Boekenoogen, Cardinaal, and Kaars Sypesteyn.

It is not clear whether Pieter van Gelder and Jan van Gelder, who were deacons of the Mennonite congregation at Utrecht about 1651-79 (DB 1916, 165 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2293), belonged to the same family. vdZ.

J. M. van Gelder, Stamboek der familie van Gelder (Amsterdam, 1899); Ned. Patriciaat IX (1918) 104-17.

Gelder, Arend van, a Dutch Mennonite minister, son of Preacher Hendrik van Gelder (q.v.) and Maria Smidt, b. 1756 at Ouddorp, d. 1798 at Groningen, was baptized at West-Zaandam in 1783. Having been trained for the ministry by his father, he passed his examination to become a ministerial candidate in 1785 before the board of the Mennonite church of West-Zaandam. Thereupon he served the congregations of Norden, East Friesland, Germany, 1785-95, and Groningen (United Waterlanders and New-Flemish in the Pelsterstraat) 1795-98. Then he resigned because of bad health and died soon after. He was married first to Dirkje Bakker of Norden and afterwards to Catharina Vissering of Leer. vdZ.

Gelder, Arend Hendrik van, the son of Arend van Gelder and Susanna Oortman, was born on Jan. 11, 1756, at Amsterdam, and died there unmarried on Aug. 18, 1819. He was the minister of the Mennonite congregation in Middelie in 1773-79, Westzaan-Zuid 1779, Amsterdam (de Zon and from 1801 the United Mennonite Church) 1779-1819. At Amsterdam he was very active in bringing about the union of the two Mennonite churches, which was achieved in 1801. He was particularly zealous in promoting the association Nut van't Algemeen. He wrote Redevoeringen over onderwerpen uit de natuurlyke historie (2 vv., 1813 and 1816). In addition he was one of the compilers of the Groote Bundel, in which 25 hymns of his composition were included. Many of them are also found in the Leidsche Bundel. The Doopsgezinde Bundel, the hymnal now used by the Dutch Mennonites, contains only one song composed by van Gelder. When the A.D.S. (q.v.) was founded in 1811, van Gelder was a member of the first executive board. K.V., vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. III, 198 f.; DB 1898, 2 ff., 24 ff.; ML II, 47.

Gelder, Hendrik van, b. 1737 at Amsterdam, d. Oct. 3, 1808, at Zaandam, the son of Arend van Gelder and Alida Nieuwenhuizen, was called as pastor of the Mennonite congregation at Ouddorp in 1759, Enkhuizen 1765, Enschede 1771, and West-Zaandam 1781-1808. He was married to Maria Smidt, a daughter of Petrus Smidt, a professor at the Zonist Seminary. Their son Pieter Smidt van Gelder was the founder of the paper factory that still bears their name. Another son was Arend van Gelder (q.v.). Hendrik van Gelder was the author of the following: Davids dankbaarheid . . . (Amsterdam, 1784), a sermon preached in the Mennonite church at West-Zaandam on March 14, 1784), when a pipe organ was installed in the church; Lyk-rede op S. Hoekstra Wz (West-Zaandam, 1786); Het voorregt der openbare godsdienst-oeffeninge (Amsterdam, 1787), a sermon preached on Nov. 4, 1787, the centennial of the dedication of the West-Zaandam church; Het leven van Joannes den Dooper in leerredenen (West-Zaandam, 1803). For a number of years van Gelder was secretary of the Zonist Conference. He also diligently studied Mennonite history, as appears from a manuscript found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. He also composed the Naamlijst of 1815. K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 759, 937; N.N.B.Wb. III, 200; DB 1869, 25; Naamlijst 1808, 73 f.; 1810, 72; Catalogus Amst., 153, 254, 311; ML II, 47.

Gelder, Hendrik Arend van, a Dutch Mennonite minister, son of Hendrik van Gelder and Aagje Mats, b. 1825 at Wormerveer, d. 1899 at Haarlem, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and then served the congregations of Mensingeweer 1851-53, Medemblik 1853-55, Drachten-Ureterp 1855-58, Bolsward 1858-63, and Haarlem 1863-84. In 1853 he married Rinske Feikema of Franeker. He was a learned man, whose learning was honored by an appointment to membership on the board of the Teylers Theologisch Genootschap. He also wrote a history of the Mennonite congregation of Haarlem, which, however, was never published. vdZ.

Gelderland, a province of the Netherlands (1949 population 1,057,941, with 3,403 Mennonites), in which the Anabaptist movement found little footing in the first half of the 16th century, with the exception of the towns of Arnhem, Nijmegen, Zutphen, and Harderwijk, and the vicinity of Winterswijk. The number of congregations has always been small. In the 17th century there were still congregations at (Zalt) Bommel and at Harderwijk. The weakness of the movement here was doubtless due to the severe persecution by Duke Karel van Gelder, who issued a stern edict against them on April 12, 1539. The present (1956) congregations in this province are at Apeldoorn, Arnhem, Nijmegen, Wageningen, Winterswijk, and Zutphen. The Brotherhood House of Elspeet is also in this province. K.V.

Ned. Archief v. Kerkgesch. X (1913) 252 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 268, 291, 349; ML II, 47.

Geleyn Cornelis, an Anabaptist martyr, a shoemaker by trade, from Middelharnis, Dutch province of South Holland, was seized on Aug. 5, 1572, on the Nieuwvaert at Klundert near Breda with six brethren and several sisters who were engaged in worship. There were perhaps 100 brethren and sisters together, but most were able to escape; the captured women also escaped. After ruthless, brutal torture by Alba's executioners the six were burned at the stake Aug. 7 at Breda. (Mart. Mir. D 603-5; E 930 f.; DB 1912, 30-48; ML I, 370.) NEFF.

Geleynsz, Jan: see Jansz, Geleyn.

Gellius Snecanus, the "Reformer" of Friesland, was a priest at Niekerk, and after 1565 Reformed preacher at Leeuwarden, d. about 1600. He was a violent opponent of the Anabaptists and published against them the Latin polemic Methodica descriptio (Leiden, 1584), which was translated into Dutch in 1588 with the title, Ordentlijcke beschryvinge ende fondament van dry gemeyne plaetsen der H. Schrift. The synod of Bolsward meeting in 1588 commissioned him to investigate Menno Simons' Fundamentboek (see Foundation Book). The consequence was that some group had the original edition of the Fundamentboek reprinted in order to show that the revised edition of 1558 (?) omitted certain statements about the Münsterites. (N.N.B.Wb. III, 204-8; DB 1911, 42 f.; ML II, 47 f.) K.V.

Gellner (Kern), Rupp, one of the Anabaptists of the Lower Rhine living around Kreuznach and Worms known as the Swiss Brethren (q.v.), who, dissatisfied with the doctrine and life of these brethren, went to Moravia to join the Hutterian Brethren after the Hutterite apostle Hans Schmidt (q.v.) had given them a copy of a Rechenschaft of seven articles (Geschicht-Buch, 272-77). This union took place in 1556. Rupp Gellner was chosen preacher Jan. 8, 1568, at Nembschitz. On Jan. 17, 1572, he was ordained in the service of the Gospel. He died at an advanced age, March 17, 1608, at Frischau. In his last years he had become too weak to fill his office. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; ML II, 48.)

LOSERTH.

Geloofsbelijdenis, de Nederlandsche (Dutch Confession of Faith). This outstanding confession of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands was composed in 1561 by Guy de Bres (q.v.) in French. The next year it was translated into Dutch and was soon adopted by a number of Calvinist churches in the Netherlands. It was officially approved and accepted by the Dutch national (Reformed) Synod, held at Dordrecht 1618-19. This confession contains 37 articles. Articles 34 and 35 deal with Anabaptism. Article 34 says that the Anabaptists erroneously condemn the baptism of children, which baptism is right and Biblical, because the baptizing of children is the continuation of Old Testament circumcision. Article 36 rejects the doctrine concerning public authorities of "the Anabaptists and other rebellious people . . . who wish to overthrow justice, to introduce community of goods and who trample down all chastity."

These two articles, which are applicable only to Münsterite and Batenburg (q.v.) Anabaptism, but not to Anabaptism in general, as must have been known to the Synod of Dordrecht, were often used against the Mennonites in the 17th and even the 18th centuries and formed the basis on which the Reformed Church built its attempt to prevent the Mennonites from building up their congregations. vdZ.

Geloofsbelydenis voor den Doop. This Dutch Mennonite confession of which a printed copy is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library (n.p., n.d., about 1650) is a booklet of 64 pages. The title page is missing. Obviously it is a confession drawn up by a private person, who writes in a preface, "Here I publish a confession, which is to be used in our Mennonite congregations." (Catalogus Amst. 172.) vdZ.

Geloofsbelydenis der Doopsgesinden van de Socyteit oude Vlamingen genaamt, opgestelt in Vragen en Antwoorden n.p., n.d. (18th century). This confession or rather explanation of the confession originated from the Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.) Mennonites in the Netherlands. It contains 25 chapters on 134 pages. vdZ.

Geloofsbelydenisse der Doopsgesinden, bekent onder de naam van Oude Vlamingen. Hunne Societeits Vergaderinge houdende in de Botteringe-straat te Groningen. Of this confession of the Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.) group there are four editions, all at Groningen—1755, 1774, 1805, n.d. (early 19th century). The last edition contains an appendix containing a number of questions and answers drawn up by Cornelis Pietersz Sorgdrager (q.v.). vdZ.

Gelouwe, Arnout van, an opponent of the Protestants and Anabaptists, known as "the Flemish peasant," b. 1604 at Ardoye, a village between Rousselare and Thielt, became a weaver. In Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, where he settled, he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Bible, then joined the Catholic Church and used his gifts in attacking Protestants as well as Anabaptists. In 1648 he betook himself to the Mennonite church in Aardenburg, and at the close of a religious service in the presence of the assembled congregation challenged the preacher Boudewijn de Meijer to a disputation. The rumor spread through the city that a Catholic priest had appeared in the Mennonite church and was trying to convert them; such a crowd gathered before the little church that the meeting had to be adjourned, and the disputation continued at the preacher's house. In 1651 also a violent polemic against the Mennonites came from

Gelouwe's pen, attacking the book of the Mennonite preacher Francois de Knuyt (q.v.), Eene corte bekentenisse onses gheloofs, etc. Its verbose title reads, Een onverwinnelycke schrift-matighe Roomsche Catholycke belijdenisse des gheloofs, van Godt den Vater, Godt den Soon, Godt den H. Geest, den Kinderdoop, ende van het wettelyck eedtsweeren, ende van het ampt der Christelycke Overheydt, ofte een schrift-matighe teghen-gift, ghesteldt teghen de onschriftmatighe belijdenisse der nieuwghesinde Wederdooperen, voor desen uytgheeven tot verleydinghe van de eenvoudige onnoosele herten door François de Knuyt. (DB 1877, 25 ff.; ML II, 48.)

NEFF.

Gelre (Gelder, Geldern), a former duchy consisting of Lower Gelre, now the Dutch province of Gelderland (q.v.), and Upper Gelre, now part of the Dutch provinces of Limburg and North Brabant and the adjacent part of Germany. In the German part of old Gelre is found the city of Geldern, the home of the dynasty of the dukes of Gelre. In Lower Gelre only a few traces of Anabaptism are to be found in the 16th century (see Gelderland). In Upper Gelre Anabaptism-Mennonitism was rather widespread. The "Wassenberger Predikanten" (q.v.) were active here, and Menno Simons preached in this region (see Illekhoven and Visschersweert).

vdZ.

Gem Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Gem in central Alberta, had its beginning in November 1928, when 25 Mennonite families, immigrants from the Ukraine and Siberia, settled here, some of whom were the Mennonite Brethren, some Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and some General Conference Mennonites. On June 2, 1929, the M.B. congregation organized with 35 members and with H. K. Siemens as leader. They met in the school every Sunday for worship together with the members of the other two branches.

In 1932 a church was built, which was enlarged a few years later. In 1952-53, because of its unsatisfactory location and poor condition, it was sold and a new one was erected. An important milestone was the opening of the Bethesda Bible School on Nov. 12, 1933, which with a few interruptions has served until the present. On Dec. 16, 1934, P. P. Doerksen was chosen as leader of the congregation.

The membership in 1953 was 130. The congregation has continued to grow, in spite of the fact that the subsidiary congregation in Countess became an independent congregation in 1939, and many members have gone to British Columbia. In 1942 all the members of the E.M.B. congregation formally united with the M.B. congregation. H.H.S.

Gemeenschap voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk. This Dutch Mennonite association has operated under different names. It was founded in 1917 as Vereenigung voor Gemeentedagen van Doopsgezinden, then it was called Elspeetse Vereniging, until it received its present name after World War II. For its history and activities, see Broederschapswerk. vdZ.

Gemeentedagbeweging, the popular name of the former Dutch Mennonite Association Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen voor Doopsgezinden (now Gemeenschap voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk): see Broederschapswerk, Gemeenschap voor Doopsgezind.

Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten, a biweekly periodical, the organ of the Gemeindeverband of Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria (q.v.). The paper owes its origin to the awakening that took place in the congregations of Baden in the middle of the 19th century. In the 1860's several leading ministers became aware of the necessity and benefit of such a publication for the South German congregations. In particular Christian Schmutz (q.v.) of Rappenau was zealous in promoting the project. At that time the only German Mennonite periodical was the Mennonitische Blätter, which had been published since 1854. The records of the meeting of the elders on Oct. 14, 1869, state briefly, "Brother Ulrich Hege of Reihen proposes that a church periodical be published for our congregations. This meeting gives its consent to the proposal and commissions him to be the editor."

Beginning in 1870 the Gemeindeblatt was published monthly first as a four-page, and later as an eight-page paper. In 1896 the masthead read, "Published—with the co-operation of several preachers and with the consent of the Aeltestenrat—by Ulrich Hege in Reihen." In the earlier years this statement was correct, for a series of important articles was contributed by Christian Schmutz of Rappenau, who was a leader in the awakening in the congregations of Baden. His articles on church discipline, mixed marriages, and communion were thus to become effective in wider Mennonite circles. The frankness with which all questions of church life were openly discussed is striking. This frankness is also to be noted in the 1880's when the matter of union with the Vereinigung der Mennoniten im Deutschen Reich was debated; the Gemeindeverband did not join the Vereinigung. Elder Ulrich Hege (q.v., 1812-96) was distinguished by his interest in Mennonite history, combined with a strong publicistic interest. He published excerpts from Menno's works on baptism, communion, etc. Also writings of Hans Denk (Von der wahren Liebe und Ordnung Gottes) and of Hubmaier (q.v.) were published. In the 1880's when the works of Ludwig Keller (q.v.) were stimulating research in Mennonite history, each of his books as it appeared, was discussed in the Gemeindeblatt. Also the personal connections of Schmutz occasioned many an article. Frequently there was material from the Martyrs' Mirror or one of the martyr hymns. The Gemeindeblatt sponsored a movement toward Mennonite union, viz., the Conference of the South German Mennonites (q.v.), to which all the South German congregations now belong. Connections with West Prussia were given special attention. There was also correspondence with Mennonites of other countries (America, France, Switzerland, and Russia). From the beginning there were reports from the missions on Sumatra and Java.

The lifework of the first editor of the Gemeindeblatt can best be stated in the words of the number celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its founding: "Precisely the first volumes of the Gemeindeblatt prove that the paper was not the hobby of a few people, but met a real need in spite of much opposition. From North and South Germany, from Switzerland, and from Russia come voices asking to be heard. Sometimes the ideas expressed were in diametric opposition to each other, and for the editor it must have been by no means an easy matter to arbitrate and prevent the expressions from leading to divisive strife, but especially in those questions that dealt with fundamentals to lead to mutual understanding. A decisive attitude was taken against both the influence of rationalism and a petrified formalism. The earnest striving and longing for a spiritual revival in the Mennonite brotherhood stood in the foreground; likewise the effort to bring back to the consciousness of our church members the teaching and faith of our forefathers."

What seemed to Ulrich Hege to be his chief task he expressed in the motto on the masthead of the first issue in 1871: "That ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment" (I Cor. 1:10). The paper strove in the first place to promote and preserve the spiritual life in the congregations on the foundation which has Jesus Christ as its cornerstone. Its next task was to contribute "to a union and unification, pleasing to God, of our greatly scattered congregations, not only with respect to space, but also with respect to the inner mind, the various views, and organization. Although they are united in the confession of the principal doctrines, because of a few deviating views they are in part so distant to one another and take such a cold attitude to each other, showing little brotherly love" (Gbl., 1873, 3).

At an advanced age, after serving as editor for 26 years, Ulrich Hege passed the office on to his son, traveling evangelist Jakob Hege of Reihen (1848-1911). From now on, historical articles retired to the background. The devotional aspect became dominant. Otherwise the form of the periodical remained the same (news from all the congregations of Germany and from foreign countries). The co-operation of fellow ministers decreased. It is apparent that the time of the first love was past for the paper. The publisher must rely more upon himself. "For my brother the assumption of the editorship in addition to his work as traveling evangelist denoted a great burden, especially since there was at times a dearth of colaborers" (Gbl. 1919, 2).

Beginning in 1901 the Gemeindeblatt, in agreement with the general wish, became a biweekly four-page paper, and in this form it has continued to serve the Mennonite brotherhood to the present. It was intended to serve as a Sunday paper for members living widely scattered and to create a closer bond in general by its more frequent appearance (Gbl., 1900). That the paper continued to satisfy an inner need is shown by the fact that the number of subscribers rose to 1,200.

Jakob Hege published the paper until his death in 1911. In the first decade of the 20th century there was a lively debate among the South German congregations on the subject of the Conference of the South German Mennonites (q.v.). Because of the active connections of the publisher with the Mennonite preachers in the Palatinate, the contributions of articles from the congregations on the left of the Rhine were especially numerous.

In 1911 the editorship was given to the youngest son of the founder of the Gemeindeblatt, Philipp Hege (1857-1923) of Stuttgart, the third and last member of this family to serve in that office. The years before the war reflect the high points of the conference work of South Germany, when E. Händiges as traveling evangelist rallied the Mennonites of South Germany, in particular those of Bavaria. The paper was able to appear throughout World War I.

Worthy of note are the regularly appearing articles, "Concerning the War," later called "Rundschau," which afforded an excellent survey of the contemporary situation and testified to the healthy, long-range vision of the writer. The paper gave information concerning the situation of congregations in the homeland and in foreign lands, reports on the suffering of the Russian brethren after the Revolution, and the rising relief work known as Mennonitische Flüchtlingshilfe, and later the Deutsche Mennonitenhilfe. The devotional character of the paper retired to the background, while historical matters of the past and present came to the fore. It is significant that already under the previous editor the congregational affairs were no longer publicly discussed. The periodical has taken on the character of a Sunday religious journal.

Philipp Hege was taken from the churches by death in March 1923. He was followed in office by Gysbert van der Smissen of Heilbronn (1859-1923). By December of the same year the paper was again orphaned by the unexpected sudden death of the editor. In 1924 the council of elders of Baden assigned the task to Walter Fellmann of Mönchzell, and in 1925, when Fellmann joined the faculty of the missionary seminary of Wernigerode, the council appointed Christian Schnebele, the leader of the Mennonite Bibelheim Thomashof near Durlach, who was still the editor in 1956. The place of publication was transferred from Sinsheim a. Elsenz to Karlsruhe, Baden, in 1926, where it has since been printed by the Mennonite printer Heinrich Schneider.

Due to the war situation the Gemeindeblatt was suspended from 1941 (last number Jan. 1, 1941) to 1948 (first number April 1, 1948).

As the organ of the Verband of Baden-Württemberg-Bavaria, the paper is read in most of the Mennonite families of these areas. It is also read in the Palatinate and in Bavaria, and was to some extent read in North Germany, especially in West Prussia, when these congregations were still in existence. (ML II, 57 ff.) W.F., H.S.B.

Gemeindeblatt und Waisenheim, established in 1895, was the organ of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference and the Industrial Home (q.v., Waisenheim) near Hillsboro, Kan. Some of the editors were Heinrich Wiebe, Gerhard Dalke, Jakob Z. Wiebe, and Jakob G. Barkman. It was an 8-page monthly (in 1899 a few issues contained 12 pages) and was published in Hillsboro. H. H. Fast was the printer for a while. In the June 1, 1904, issue the Publishing Committee, consisting of Joh. J. Friesen and A. A. Klassen, announced that the editorship was to be transferred to Weatherford, Okla. It is not known how long the paper appeared after this. In March 1906, the Industrial Home Journal (q.v.) took over the interests in the Waisenheim, and in 1915 the Wahrheitsfreund (q.v.) became the official conference paper without any reference to the Gemeindeblatt. The Bethel College Historical Library has a nearly complete set of the Gemeindeblatt from 1897 to 1904. C.K.

Gemeinde-Kalender: see Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender.

Gemeindeordnungen, ordinances and regulations of the Hutterite brotherhood, also their church disciplines (although different in character from the conventional type of such documents, since church activities and everyday living were identical for the Brethren). They were issued by the bishop (Vorsteher) of the brotherhood. Some 30 such Ordnungen are known from 1561 to 1665, and again 1762, 1793, and later. They are among the most original creations of the Hutterites and are in many ways unique documents, revealing the strong consciousness of the brethren that they had to follow a very strict and austere way of life, the "narrow path," and that deviations must be stopped.

These Ordnungen are spiritual and moral as well as practical in nature (to the minutest detail). They are hortative, yet never threatening, admonishing all members of the church to co-operate most carefully and soberly in the great enterprise of brotherly living in community of goods, both in consumption and production, in the way which Christ and the apostles established. In this sense it is not incorrect to call the Anabaptist church in general, and the Hutterite brotherhood in particular, a "church of order" (see article Church and R. Friedmann, MQR, 1950, 21), i.e., a disciplined and regulated church in which this order is voluntarily accepted by all. God speaks through the bishops, who thus assume a charismatic authority.

In many regards these ordinances suggest the rules and regulations of medieval monasteries, with which the Hutterite organization has many traits in common (the principle of merit is, however, completely absent here). In some other regards these ordinances are reminiscent of the medieval guild regulations, although their outspoken Christian emphasis distinguishes them again from these secular documents.

The Ordnungen may be classified into two kinds: (a) those dealing with the general organization and discipline of the community (Gemein, Bruderhofs), its morals and its spiritual guidance, also the formulation of the general genius of the group; (b) regulations dealing in particular with the special functions of the various members of the group, with the administration of crafts and other occupational tasks and their most careful and economical fulfillment. In this group regulations for millers, cutlers (Messerer), barber-surgeons, potters (Hafner, see Ceramics), the various kinds of smiths, buyers, stock clerks (Ausgeber), stewards, and farm foremen (Weinzierl) appear more often than for other occupations. It seems that in these areas temptations were particularly strong to indulge in self-interested extra activities which could easily injure the group and spoil its good name.

The main tenor of all the Ordnungen is the battle against Eigennutz (selfishness, greed, profit-motive), and the admonition to live up to the requirements of a life in perfect community of goods. Austerity, puritanical simplicity, even a degree of ascetic living were enjoined time and again, and thus inculcated in the mind of every member. The education of the youth dared not be soft in any way, for they were to be trained for trying times and must then know why to suffer and be able to bear such situations. The reading of the old writings (epistles, confessions, hymns) was advised as helpful. All handiwork was to be diligent, solid, and reliable, carefully done without waste. Work should be done every day including Saturday, without haste but also without loafing; luxuries must not be allowed, likewise no private possessions of any kind. Ehrenpreis (q.v.) declared expressly, "Inheritance shall remain abolished as of old; if someone dies, everything he has used shall revert to the community, even his books" (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 526). It should be remarked, however, that the latter point is no longer in practice today; books are now the only possession of a brother or sister which may be left to one's children.

The Ordnungen offer an extremely valuable insight into the inner life of the brotherhood from 1561 on (when the first ordinance of this kind was laid down by the Vorsteher Lanzenstiel, q.v.). Before that year we have only Riedemann's Rechenschaft of 1540 (q.v.) and the epistles (q.v.), mainly by Jacob Hutter, or the oral tradition.

In the main, four great Vorsteher distinguished themselves in the drawing up Gemeindeordnungen: Peter Walpot (q.v.) 1565-78, Klaus Braidl (q.v.) 1583-1611, Sebastian Dietrich (q.v.) 1611-19, and Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) 1639-62 but actually leading the brotherhood since 1633. Although the first-named two men contributed much to this tradition, the great Ordnungen were yet to come: Dietrich's general ordinance of 1612 (which fills 22 leaves in one manuscript) and Ehrenpreis' general ordinance of 1651 (which fills 14 pages folio size small print of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 519-32). That we are so well informed about all these writings is due to the tradition-mindedness of Ehrenpreis and his unusual sense for the orderly collection of all rules existent before his days, together with the contributions of his own spiritual government. In one handwritten book of 1640 (Codex III, 198 of Esztergom, apparently Ehrenpreis' own copy), with additions up to 1650, this Vorsteher put together nearly everything that had been said before and also that which he himself had presented to the brotherhood since 1633. There is, to be sure, also some repetition, but always with some new angles not stressed before.

This codex has never been published; one copy of it is in the Beck collection (q.v.) of Brno, Nr. 87, another, also done by Beck in longhand, is deposited in the Mennonite Historical Library of Goshen College. Beck in his Geschichts-Bücher prints only the Bader-Ordnung of 1653 (ordinance for the barber-surgeons, actually a repetition of an earlier ordinance of 1633 in Beck, 485-87; English in MQR, 1953, 125-27) and a Weinzierl-Ordnung (order for the farm managers) of 1650 (Beck, 478-79).

A number of hitherto completely unknown Ordnungen were made public for the first time when A. J. F. Zieglschmid's edition of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch came out in 1947. Not only does the Johannes Waldner text (q.v.) contain two remarkably strong instructions by Ehrenpreis: (a) concerning absolute nonresistance (1633; Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 168-72, English in MQR, 1951, 116-27), and (b) concerning the mating of young people, also against the bad practice of unchecked match-making (Kuppelei), which recently had entered the brotherhood (1643; Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 215-18). But the most outstanding Ordnung of all is the great ordinance of 1651, which Zieglschmid prints in an appendix from a copy still preserved and in use by the Brethren today (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 519-32). It contains a comprehensive instruction which touches practically every aspect of life, stern in character and yet with a loving concern. Among other things also the idea of shunning (Meidung) is enjoined; it must not be allowed to be taken lightly or to be denied altogether. The Ordnung of 1651 contains actually a complete "philosophy of life" in the minutest detail, and for that reason deserves particular attention. A footnote says that it was read before the assembled Brethren in Slovakia as well as in Transylvania year after year, and that it was reread to the brotherhood for the last time as late as 1734. Besides this Ordnung, the larger Chronicle of the Brethren, the Geschicht-Buch, contains also two letters to the Brethren in Transylvania of 1642 (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 831-37) and of 1649 (ibid., 847-56), again by Ehrenpreis and with similar advice and admonitions.

"Be faithful and loyal, even unto the smallest detail," that is in a nutshell the message of Ehrenpreis, by which he wanted to strengthen the somewhat weakened brotherhood of his time, imbuing it with the spirit of the founding fathers. The scope of his concern is amazing. In retrospect we may say that his work has been fairly successful, even though a certain formalism became dominant as the living spirit faded out more or less. The organization and the genius of the Hutterites today is to a certain extent based on these Gemeindeordnungen, which give to the brotherhood such directions that temptations will be met and as far as possible reduced. And yet, these regulations are by no means dictatorial in character; they are presented with a generally accepted authority of the bishops, and they breathe the spirit of brotherly love and concern in maintaining the way which the Brethren considered the true form of Christian discipleship. (See Braidl, Dietrich, Ehrenpreis, Bruderhof, Community of Goods, Crafts, Economic History of the Hutterian Brethren, also Church.) R.F.

Loserth, Communismus, 252 ff.; also Loserth's articles on Dietrich (ML I, 442-43) and Ehrenpreis (ML I, 530-32), where details of these ordinances are given. Also R. Friedmann, "An Ordinance of 1633 on Nonresistance" MQR, 1951, 116-27, and J. L. Sommer, "Hutterite Medicine and Physicians," MQR, 1953, 125 ff. No special study of these ordinances has ever been made.

A chronological list of all the Hutterite Ordnungen follows:

Time of L. Lanzenstiel
1561 Ordnung of the shoemakers
Time of Peter Walpot
1568 Ordnung for the schools (Kindergarten through grades)
1569 Ordnung enjoining greatest economy at the Bruderhofs
1571 Ordnung for the millers
1574 Ordnung for the carpenters
Time of Claus Braidl
1585 Ordnung for the dyers
1588 Ordnung for the millers
1588 Ordnung for the schools, repeated 1593 and 1596
1591 Ordnung for the shoemakers
1592 Ordnung for the barber-surgeons
1599 Ordnung for the buyers (Einkäufer)
1603 Ordnung concerning dress
1610 Ordnung for the millers
Time of Sebastian Dietrich
1612 General Ordnung to be read yearly, concerning the bringing up of the youth, simplicity of life, economy and the right conduct of the Bruderhofs
1612 Ordnung for the stewards, shoemakers, buyers, potters, and cutlers
1612 Ordnung for the potters, concerning the precious, expensive ceramic wares
1612 Ordnung for the hoofsmiths, scythesmiths, coppersmiths, bladesmiths, cutlers, casemakers, watchmakers, and potters
1617 Ordnung repeated
Time of Andreas Ehrenpreis
1633 Ordnung for the barber-surgeons
1633 Ordnung concerning absolute nonresistance
1637 Ordnung for the barber-surgeons, repeated
1639 General Ordnung for the brotherhood (first draft)
1640 Ordnung for millers, stewards, and store clerks (Ausgeber), farm managers, buyers, teamsters, seamstresses, and cellar masters
1640 Ordnung also for the Diener des Worts (ministers), likewise for those who are sent out as missioners to visit the people of the world
1641 Ordnung for the cutlers
1641 Ordnung for the potters, repeated
1642 Letter to the Brethren in Transylvania
1642 Ordnung for the stewards (Haushalter)
1643 Ordnung concerning matching young people
1649 Letter to the Brethren in Transylvania
1650 Ordnung for the farm-manager (Weinzierl)
1650 Ordnung for the cutlers
1651 The great general Ordnung (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 519-32) comparable to the general Ordnung of Dietrich of 1612. This Ordnung was repeated almost every year, both in Slovakian Bruderhofs and in Transylvania, also later in Russia and now in America.
1654 Ordnung for the barber-surgeons
1655 Ordnung for the cutlers (repeated)

1762 Ordnung for stewards, farm managers, the distribution of the food at the tables, overseers of the granary (Kastner or Rentmeister), cooks and caretakers of the linen, also for dishwashers (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 535-39)
1773 Ordnung concerning uniformity of dress, etc., etc., up to
1873

Gemeindeverband (Badischer Verband, or simply Verband), terms used to designate the Badisch-Württembergisch - Bayrischer Gemeindeverband (q.v.).

Gemeinschaftsbewegung (movement for fellowship, community), the term used to designate the circles of earnest Christians arising in the Lutheran and Reformed state churches of Germany under the influence of Pietism (q.v.; P. J. Spener, 1680 ff.) and more particularly the Moravians (q.v., from 1727) and J. A. Bengel (1687-1752) of Württemberg. These earlier groups, called "Old-Pietist" (Altpietistische) Gemeinschaften and found mostly in Württemberg and Baden, in 1881 organized an association, the Verband der Altpietistischen Gemeinschaften, with some 630 local circles in 1935. In addition to this group are the less numerous circles of the "Hahn" (named for J. M. Hahn, q.v., 1758-1819) Gemeinschaft, which two Baden Mennonite congregations joined in 1858. The Gemeinschaft movement was closely related also to the Inner (Home) Mission movement (J. H. Wichern, 1808-81), which began ca. 1835, especially in the earlier period. The Protestant Union for Home Missions in Baden (Evangelischer Verein für Innere Mission in Baden), organized in 1848, and its daughter groups in the Palatinate, Hesse, etc., were particularly strongly involved in the Gemeinschaft movement. The St. Chrischona "Pilgermission" group, founded 1841, was also a part of this development. The Altpietistische Gemeinschaft remained formally inside the state church, although maintaining a strong separate fellowship life in the local circles with regular meetings. They had in general a sober, earnest, quiet though intensely devout character.

The modern Gemeinschaft movement in Germany dating from 1875, owes its rise largely to English-American influences such as the Plymouth Brethren of England, and the American Robert Pearsall Smith (d. 1898) and W. E. Boardman (d. 1886), whose influence was mediated in part through Otto Stockmayer, Jellinghaus, Rappard (St. Chrischona), Christlieb, and Elias Schrenk, the great evangelist. This movement was varied in character, but was characterized generally by an aggressive mass evangelism, a holiness emphasis, a millennialistic eschatology, and a Methodistic piety. It was in general more separatistic than the Old Pietists; many new Gemeinschaft circles were now founded and the whole Gemeinschaft movement was greatly enlarged. The new movement, which absorbed or transformed some of the older Old Pietist circles, created an all-over organization in 1888, called the "Gnadauer Verband."

About 1900 a serious division in the movement occurred, in which the Darbyite (Plymouth Brethren) more reactionary, strongly millennialist-dispensationalist and separatistical influences became dominant. This phase of the movement was centered in the Blankenburg Alliance (Blankenburger Allianz, q.v.), whose annual conferences at Blankenburg, beginning in 1886, were very influential. Ernst Modersohn (b. 1869) and Ernst Stroeter (d. 1922) were strong leaders, Modersohn being the most influential writer of the entire modern Gemeinschaft movement.

A wing of the Gemeinschaft movement, taking a strong anti-state church position, developed circles which withdrew completely from the state church and in effect became nondenominational independent groups of Plymouth Brethren character and connection. The center of this group has been the Bible School (Allianzbibelschule) founded in Berlin in 1905, but located in Wiedenest since 1918, with Joh. Warns and Erich Sauer as prominent leaders.

A related movement which also absorbed some Gemeinschaft groups is that of the Free Evangelical Churches (Freie Evangelische Gemeinden, Eglise Libre) of Germany, Switzerland, and France. It was modeled at first on the Eglise Libre Evangélique of Geneva (founded 1846). The first local church of this group was organized in 1854 in Elberfeld-Barmen, an area which has remained the center in Germany and the seat of the Association (Bund) of the Free Churches. Its Bible School was founded in Vohwinkel in 1912.

The Baptist (since 1834) and Methodist (since 1831) churches of Germany have been similar in character to the Gemeinschaft movement, and often closely related to it, but in a sense also competitors to it.

The Gemeinschaft movement has undoubtedly been a powerful influence, mostly for good, in Germany, although it has often met opposition from official church circles. It has gathered into local and larger fellowships countless thousands of earnest Christians eager for a deepening of the spiritual life and a more dedicated type of Christianity than the typical state church type has afforded. It has also furnished a large opportunity for lay participation.

The Gemeinschaft movement has characteristics which are similar to the original Anabaptist movement in the 16th century, although some of its features and emphases, in doctrine and piety, are quite un-Anabaptist. It has had considerable influence in the past 75 years upon the Mennonites of South Germany and Switzerland, as well as in South Russia. Numerous Mennonites from these areas attended the conferences in Germany, particularly of the Blankenburg Alliance. Some of the leaders like Stroeter traveled among the Mennonites of Russia and influenced particularly the Mennonite Brethren there and in North America. Jakob Kroeker (q.v.) was an active leader in the Gemeinschaft movement, and mediated its spirit among the Mennonites of Germany, and earlier in Russia. The evangelists of the movement like Elias Schrenk (d. 1913) and Jakob Vetter (d. 1918) (also Pastor Böhmerle) had considerable influence in certain South German and Swiss Mennonite circles. A considerable amount of the revival of spiritual life and activity in these areas has been due to the influence of leaders and literature of the Gemeinschaft movement (writings of Otto Funcke, d. 1910) and the influence of schools which Mennonites have attended, such as St. Chrischona (1840 ff.), Baptisten Seminar in Hamburg-Horn (1881 ff.), Missionsanstalt Neukirchen bei Mörs (1882 ff.), Evangelische Predigerschule in Basel (1876 ff.), Allianzbibelschule (Berlin 1905-18, Wiedenest 1918 ff.).

Although the hymnbooks of the German and Russian Mennonites did not adopt many of the Gospel songs of the Gemeinschaft movement, the typical hymnals of the movement, Reichslieder and Siegeslieder, were widely used in certain Swiss, Alsatian, South German, and Russian Mennonite congregations and families.

The "Conference for Faith" (Glaubenskonferenz) which was sponsored annually by the missionary society "Licht im Osten" (q.v.) of Wernigerode a.H., Germany, under the directorship of Jakob Kroeker, was closely related to the Blankenburg Conference and inspired by the Gemeinschaftsbewegung. One of its major purposes was to promote support for the work of "Licht im Osten." H.S.B.

P. Fleisch, Die moderne Gemeinschaftsbewegung in Deutschland 2 vv. (1912-14); E. Crous, "Mennonitentum und Pietismus (IV: Die Gemeinschaftsbewegung)," in Theologische Zeitschrift VIII (1952) 279-96; ML II, 65 f.

Gemeinschaftliche Liedersammlung, Die, zum allgemeinen Gebrauch des wahren Gottesdienstes aus vielen Liederbüchern gesammelt, und mit einem Inhalt sammt Register versehen. This small (12 mo., 320 pp.) hymnbook without music, was the third compiled and published by American Mennonites, and served the Ontario Mennonites as long as the German language was in use. It is still used by the Old Order group in Ontario, the latest edition being 1950. It was first published at Berlin (Kitchener, Ont.) in 1836, with reprints there 1838, 1841, 1849, 1857, 1883, 1892, 1908. The reprints of 1860 and 1870 at Lancaster, Pa., suggest it was also used in that area for at least a time. The second edition was slightly enlarged with an appendix (Anhang), which became a larger Zugabe with the third edition, both editions having a double index (Register). From 1857 on the reprints were identical at 388 pages. Probably edited by Bishop Benjamin Eby (q.v., 1785-1853), the book took two thirds of its 205 hymns from the Lancaster Conference hymnal, Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch (q.v., first ed. 1804), and most of the rest from the Franconia Conference hymnal, Kleine Geistliche Harfe (q.v.). H.S.B.

Gemmingen, an old noble family in Kraichgau, Germany. At the time of the Reformation the family was already sympathetic to the Anabaptists. The Anabaptist evangelist Philip Weber (q.v.) received an audience in 1527 from the barons of Gemmingen, who owned the villages of Fürfeld and Bonfeld in Württemberg and half of Ittlingen in Baden (Hege, 62). But he had no lasting success here, for persecution soon set in, which made it impossible for him to remain. The villages were then reformed by Martin Germanus (Stocker, 56). After the Peace of Westphalia the estates of the family again offered refuge to the Mennonites exiled from Switzerland in the 17th century. In the Gemmingen family archives are still to be found the "Bestandsbriefe für die Mennoniten Heinrich Beer und Jakob Ebe" of 1763-65 of Bonfeld, Dammhof, and Fürfeld. Other Gemmingen estates which have in part been leased by Mennonites until recent times are Rappenau, Treschklingen, Hösselinshof, Stockbronnerhof, Michelfeld, and Unterbiegelhof (the latter since 1888 the property of the family). Hege.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); C. W. F. L. Stocker, Familien-Chronik der Freiherren von Gemmingen (Heilbronn, 1895); Ztscht für die Gesch. des Oberrheins LXVIII (1924) appendix; ML II, 66.

Gemüthsgespräch: see Christliches Gemüthsgespräch.

Génard, Petrus (b. 1830 at Antwerp, d. there 1899), archivist and librarian of the city of Antwerp, Belgium, published in the Antwerpsch Archieven-blad, vv. VII-XIV (Antwerp, 1864 ff.), all the extant documents concerning persons who were judicially persecuted in the 16th century because of religion. The documents, which contain detailed and valuable information, are found in Vols. VII-XIII (Antwerp, 1864 ff.). Vol. XIV, pp. 1-127, has a chronological list of over 1300 "heretics." vdZ.

Genealogy. Genealogy and family history are closely related and often combined in the same study. While genealogy is part of family history, not all family history is genealogy. The following bibliography of Mennonite genealogies includes published books in which ancestors and descendants are listed in the natural order of succession. In some instances the books listed are basically family history rather than genealogy, but genealogical charts accompany the book. In the American section of the bibliography titles have been included only if the progenitors in America were Mennonite; there has been no attempt to include every genealogy in which a Mennonite appears. The American section has been based upon the historical collections at Bethel College, North Newton, Kan.; Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio; and Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., checked against some lists from other libraries and private collections. The Dutch and German sections were based upon these same collections, the 1919 Catalogus of the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, Adolf Schnebele's unpublished bibliography of German Mennonite imprints, and information supplied by individuals in these countries. The total number of titles listed is 310; 265 North American, 30 Dutch, 15 German.

It is immediately evident that much more genealogical work has been done by American than by European Mennonites. This may be explained in part by the natural starting point which the American genealogist finds in the date of arrival in America of the progenitor of the family. In America the first books to appear were those related to the Levering and Schnebele families, both appearing in 1858. From 1870 to the present there has been a continuous growth in American Mennonite genealogical publication with an early peak in the 1890's and a slight recession during the 1930's. The early peak in the 1890's was due to the intense research of one man, A. J. Fretz, a Presbyterian minister-farmer, who compiled eleven genealogies of Mennonite families published between the years 1890 and 1906, many of which he published privately. These books range in size from 80 to more than 870 pages and contain an amazing amount of information concerning many of the individuals listed. It is not unusual to find in the Fretz genealogies rather complete biographical sketches of persons who contributed in a special way to church and community. The number of families which Fretz treated was possible in part because of interlocking family relationships, but even so his work is monumental for one individual.

Interestingly, the increase in the number of American genealogies published in the last two decades can be attributed to two distinct groups—families which are predominantly Amish Mennonite (Old Order) and the families of descendants of Mennonite immigrants from Russia since 1873. Before 1930 this latter group was represented by only one small booklet (Deckert family), probably published before 1895. No further genealogies from this group appeared until 1930, with the majority published since 1948. It is evident that genealogical research among the descendants of these immigrants from Russia has been spurred by the imminent passing of the last generations born in Russia.

The bibliography includes materials ranging from broadsides printed on one side to volumes of more than one thousand pages. Some give little more than names and relationships. Others include data as to place of residence, occupation, church membership, and significant accomplishments. Most report life dates of individuals. A few are profusely illustrated with photographs of members of the family, notably the Brillhart book.

Since many of the genealogies have been published privately, they often lack important bibliographic features. It has been very difficult to state the place of publication accurately in many instances. The place of printing may be given, but it is obvious that the printer is not the publisher. A book may have a title page bearing one title, while the binder's title may be completely different and the better known of the two. The author's name as given on the title page may differ from that given in the body of the genealogy. The date of publication is often lacking. In many instances title page information is supplied on the cover only. In others, title page information is completely lacking.

Just as the genealogies vary in quality, they vary in ease of use. Some have ingenious numbering systems to show relationships. No numbering system, however, can take the place of a careful and complete index which locates every individual in the genealogy. Indexes are completely lacking in some of the books. Others index only those persons who are in the blood line and heads of families. Many break up the genealogy into branches of the family with a separate index for each. Indexing may not follow strict alphabetic principles. It is evident that compilers of genealogies are in urgent need of an advisory service to help them plan some of the details of their books before publication.

In the following list of titles the number of pages, where known, is given immediately following the place and date of publication. The titles are short titles only.

A. North American Families:

ACKERMAN: Sabina Claire Vliet, The Ackerman Family Association . . . Descendants of George Ackerman ... and some of the Descendents of Stephen Ackerman ... (Ackermanville, Pa., 1950) 258; ALBRECHT: Clara (Zierlein) Blake, Harriet (Martin) Albrecht and Frank Smucker, The Albrechts, 1836-1936 (n.p., 1936?) 39; ———: Lena Albrecht et al., The Albrechts, 1836-1952 (n.p., 1952?) 48; AUGSPURGER: Genealogy of the Augspurger Family (Franklin, Ohio, 1921?).

BACHTEL: see Schnebele; BARTEL: Lawrence Alfred Bartel, Genealogy of the Bartel Family ... (Zanesville, Ohio, c1950) 99; BASINGER: Edna Frances Samsal, Descendants of Christian D. Basinger ... (Bluffton, Ohio, 1955) 56; BAUER: Lister Oliver Weiss, A History and Genealogy of Hans Bauer ... (Akron, Ohio?, 1952) 126; ———: see also Stauffer and Strassburger; BAWEL: John B. Peachey, Record of the Descendants of Philip and Grace Bawel (Belleville, Pa., 1950) 34; BEACHEY (PEACHEY): Samuel M. Peachey, A Memorial History of Peter Bitsche, and . . . His Lineal Descendants . . . (Allensville, Pa., 1892; reprint: Grantsville, Md., 1953) 205; BEACHY (BEECHY): William D. Beechy, Descendants of Benjamin Beachy ... (Nappanee, Ind., 1950) 153; ———: Lucy C. Lambright, Family Record of Samuel J. Beachy and His Descendants (Millersburg, Ind., 1918) 28; ———: Lucy Eash and Ida Beachy, Family Record of Samuel J. Beachy ... (Millersburg, Ind., 1946) 80; BEERY: Joseph H. Wenger, History of the Descendants of Abraham Beery ... (South English, Iowa, 1905) 328; ———: Joseph H. Wenger, History of the Descendants of Nicholas Beery ... (South English, Iowa, 1911) 496; BEIDLER: A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Jacob Beidler (Milton, N. J., 1903) 549; BENDER: C. W. Bender and D. B. Swartzendruber, Descendants of Daniel Bender (Berlin, Pa., 1948) 192; ———: Jacob Bender and David Bender, Familien-Register von Jakob und Magdalena Bender ... (n.p., 1897) 12; ———: David M. Bender and Noah R. Bender, Family Record of Jacob and Magdalena Bender ... (Tavistock, Ont., 1925) 61; ———: Jacob R. Bender, Genealogy of Jacob and Magdalena Bender ... (Tavistock, Ont., 1947?) 91; BERGEY: David Hendricks Bergey, Genealogy of the Bergey Family . . . (New York, c1925) 1150; BERTOLET: Daniel H. Bertolet, A Genealogical History of the Bertolet Family ... (Harrisburg, Pa., 1914) 260; BLAUCH: Daniel D. Weaver and D. D. Blauch, History of ... Samuel Blauch ... and His Descendants (Boswell, Pa., 1921) 45; BLICKENSDERFER: Jacob Blickensderfer, History of the Blickensderfer Family ... (Lebanon, Mo., 1899?) 56; BLOSSER: Sarah (Yoder) Blosser, Blosser Family History (North Lima, Ohio, 1937?) 29; BOESE: J. A. Boese, Boese Family Tree (Springfield, S.D., 1931) broadside; BORKHOLDER: Andrew S. Borkholder, Family Record of John J. Borkholder . . . (Bremen, Ind., 1942) 36; BORNEMAN: J. H. Borneman, The History of the Borneman Family . . . (Boyertown, Pa., 1881); BORNTRAGER: Sam R. Borntrager, Mary R. Glick, and Katie S. Mast, Family Record of Daniel J. Borntrager ... (Haven, Kan., 1942) 48; BORNTRAEGER (BONTRAGER, etc.): John E. Borntreger, Descendants of Martin Borntraeger . . . (Scottdale, Pa., 1923) 291; BOWSER: A. B. Bowser, The Bowser Family History (Chicago, 1922) 310; BOYER: Charles C. Boyer, American Boyers (Allentown, Pa., 1940) 663; Brenneman (Breneman): Charles D. Breneman, A History of the Descendants of Abraham Breneman (Elida, Ohio, 1939) 566; ———: Albert H. Gerberich, The Brenneman History (Scottdale, Pa., 1938) 1217; Brillhart: John A. Brillhart, A Pictorial History of the Brillharts of America (Scottdale, Pa., 1926) 268; Brubacher (Brubaker): Jacob N. Brubacher, The Brubacher Genealogy ... (Elkhart, Ind., 1884) 243; ———: Claude J. Rahn, Genealogical Information Regarding the Families of Brubaker, Bomberger, Fogelsanger ... (Vero Beach, Fla., 1952) 105; Buller: John A. Boese, John A. Buller Family (Springfield, S.D., 1930) broadside; ———: Henry B. Koehn, A Compilation of the Genealogical ... Record ... of Henry J. Buller ... (North Newton, Kan., 1952?) 32; Burkholder: Report of the ... Burkholder Family Reunion, 1926-1934 (Harrisburg, Pa.) 8 vv.; Byler: Phoebe Byler, Descendants of Christian Byler ... (New Wilmington, Pa., 1946) 63; ———: Amanda D. Mast and Barbara (Mast) Swartzentruber, Descendants of Jacob Byler ... (Dover, Del., 1949) 114.

Cassel: Daniel Kolb Cassel, A Genealogical History of the Cassel Family ... (Norristown, Pa., 1896) 463; Chupp: Barbara (Chupp) Hochstetler and Anna (Beachy) Chupp, Family Record of Eli and Nathan Chupp (Middlebury, Ind., 1951) 110; Clemens: Jacob Cassel Clemens, Genealogical History of the Clemens Family ... (Lansdale, Pa., 1948) 56; ———: see also Strassburger; Conrad: S. E. Conrad and L. E. Conrad, Conrad Family Tree from 1753-1910 (Sterling, Ohio, 1910?) 39; ———: Martha E. Graber, Mary Ellen (Conrad) Krabill, and Harmon D. Schmucker, The Joseph Conrad Family (Canton, Ohio, 1937) 16; ———: Henry C. Conrad, Thones Kunders and His Children, Also a List of the Descendants ... of ... Henry Cunreds ... (Wilmington, Del., 1891) 105, 23; ———: see also Yoder; Custer: Milo Custer, The Custer Families (Bloomington, Ill., 1912) 22; ———: Agnes Williamson Storer, Elenore C. Custer, Her Family and Connections (New Brunswick, N.J., 1937) 215 (includes information on Kolb and Hunsicker families).

Decker: T. T. Johnson, Geschlechtsregister von unserm Grossvater Andreas Decker ... (Elkhart, Ind., n.d.) 10; Deter: Eunice Deter, The Deter Family History ... (Morrison, Ill., 1941) 48; Detweiler: Lizzieann J. Hostetler, Descendants of Gideon Detweiler ... (Volant, Pa., 1940) 58; Diller: J. L. Ringwalt, Descendants of Casper Diller (n.p., 1877) 56; ———: J. F. Ringwalt, The Diller Family (New Holland, Pa., 1942).

Eash: Levi T. Eash, Descendants of ... Jacob Eash ... (Middlebury, Ind., 1934) 639; Eberhart: Uriah Eberhart, History of the Eberharts ... (n.p., 1891) 263; Ebersole (Eversole, etc.): Charles E. Ebersol, The Ebersol Families ... (Lansing, Mich., 1937) 281; Eby: Ezra E. Eby, A Biographical History of the Eby Family ... (Berlin, Ont., 1889) 144; ———: Jacob Eby, A Brief Record of the Ebys ... (Lancaster, Pa., 1923) 50; ———: Franklin Stanton Aby, The Eby Family Bulletin (Chicago, 1923-24) 4 vv.; Eichelberger: Abdiel Wirt Eichelberger, Historical Sketch of Philip Frederick Eichelberger ... and of His Descendants ... (Hanover, Pa., 1901) 162, 77; Engle: Morris M. Engle, The Engle History and Family Records ... (Hummelstown, Pa., 1927) 161; ———: S. H. Engle, The Melcher Engle Family History and Genealogy, 1730-1940 (n.p., 1940) 489; ———: Herbert C. Engle, A Record of the Descendants of Jacob S. ... Engle (North Canton, Ohio, 1955); Ernst: E. Z. Ernst, A Condensed Genealogical Record ... of Sebastian Ernst (Los Angeles, Cal., 1927) 22; Esh (Esch): Benjamin L. Blank, Genealogy of the Descendants of Christopher Esh (New Holland, Pa., 1949) 200; Ewert: Benjamin Ewert, Ewert-Stammbaum (Winnipeg, Man., 1951?) 39; ———: Milton H. Ewert, The Ewert Family Tree (n.p., 1952) 19.

Farney: Laura E. Farney and Julius Farney, Genealogies of Three Large Families (Watertown, N.Y., 1933) 448 (includes information on the Virkler and Zehr families); Flickner: Katie B. Graber, The Flickner Family Record ... (Milan, Kan., 1942) 18; Freed: Jacob A. Freed, Partial History of the Freed Family ... (Souderton, Pa., 1923) 113; Fretz: A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of John and Christian Fretz ... (Elkhart, Ind., 1890) 607; ———: A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of John and Christian Fretz ... (Milton, N.J., 1904) 125; Frey: Daniel D. Frey, Descendants of John Frey (n.p., 1927); ———: Mrs. Dan B. Hostetler, Descendants of Samuel D. Frey (Est. Manuel, Tamps., Mexico, 1955); Funk: A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of Henry Funck ... (Elkhart, Ind., 1899) 874.

Gehman: Anna M. Gehman, The Gehman-Gayman Family History (Mohnton, Pa., 1954) 92; Geil: Joseph H. Wenger, History of the Descendants of J. Conrad Geil ... (Elgin, Ill., 1914) 275; Gerber: E. P. Gerber, Historical Sketches ... Descendants of ... Michael Gerber ... (Kidron, Ohio, 1938?) 283; Gilliom: Peter Gilliom, Gilliom Family Record (n.p., n.d.) 40; Gingerich: Nettie Beachy, Family Record of Daniel J. Gingerich ... (Scottdale, Pa., 1930) 58; ———: Mr. and Mrs. David R. Bontrager and Mr. and Mrs. Amos D. Bontrager, Family Record of Jacob Guengerich ... (Millersburg, Ind., 1949) 92; Gingrich: Simon Henry Irick, The John Gingrich II Family Record ... (Berne, Ind., 1953) 79; Gnagey (Gnaegi): Elias Gnagey, A Complete History of Christian Gnaegi ... (Elkhart, Ind., 1897) 197; Godshalk: H. G. Allebach, Who's Who in the Godshalk Family (n.p., 1910) 90; ———: Abraham Godshalk, A Family Record ... (Harrisburg, Pa., 1912) 304; Goering: David J. Goering, The Goering Genealogy ... (n.p., 1940); ———: Jacob J. Goering, Anna Schrag Goering and Her Descendants (Moundridge, Kan. 1945?) 51; ———: Jacob M. Goering and Anna (Graber) Goering, The Jacob H. Goering Family Record ... (Galva, Kan., 1948) 85; Goldsmith: Helen (Miller) Graber and John W. Gingerich, Joseph Goldsmith ... and His Descendants (Kalona, Iowa, 1955) 95; Goosen: Alvin Buller, The Heinrich Goosen Genealogy (n.p., 1953) 40; Gottshall: N. B. Grubb, A Genealogical History of the Gottshall Family ... (Philadelphia, Pa., 1924) 112; Graber: Peter M. Graber, History of the Graber and Stoll Families (Canton, Ohio, 1917) 28; ———: Jacob M. Goering and Anna (Graber) Goering, The Peter Graber Family Record ... (Galva, Kan., 1948)

444; Groening: Jacob Z. Wiebe, Genealogy Record of the Groening and Wiebe Families (n.p., n.d.) 79; Grove: see Stukey.

Hagey: King Albert Hagey and William Anderson Hagey, The Hagey Families . . . and the Dulaney Family (Bristol, Tenn., 1951) 714; Hallman: Eli Schmitt Hallman, The Hallman-Clemens Genealogy . . . (Tuleta, Tex., 1949) 80; Harder: Menno S. Harder, The Harder Book (North Newton, Kan. 1952?); Harley: J. R. Witcraft, Heiligh and Harley Family (n.p., 1914) 31; Harnish: J. G. Francis, The Harnish Friendschaft . . . (Gettysburg, Pa., 1955) 541; Heatwole: D. A. Heatwole, A History of the Heatwole Family . . . (Dale Enterprise, Va., 1882) 24; ———: Jacob Heatwole, Chronicle of the Heatwole Family (n.p., 1901); ———: Cornelius Jacob Heatwole, History of the Heatwole Family . . . (New York, 1907) 274; Hege: Genealogical Register of the . . . Descendants of Hans Hege and Also of . . . Henry Lesher . . . (Chambersburg, Pa., 1859) 46; Heise: Henry R. Heise, Heise Family Record (Gormley, Ont., 1925) 8; Helmuth: Joseph P. Helmuth, Family Records of Friedrich Helmuth . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1933) 138; Herr: Theodore Witmer Herr, Genealogical Record of . . . Hans Herr . . . (Lancaster, Pa., 1908) 785; Hershberger: Eli P. Hershberger, History, Descendants of Peter Hershberger . . . (Elkhart, Ind., 1950?) 139; Hershey: Scott Funk Hershey, History of the Herschey Family (New Castle, Pa., n.d.); ———: Henry Hershey, Hershey Family History (Scottdale, Pa., 1929) 291; Hertzler: John G. Hertzler, A Brief Biographic Memorial of Jacob Hertzler and a Complete Genealogical Family Register . . . Also, an Appendix of the Christian Zug Family (Elkhart, Ind., 1885) 368; Hertzler (Hartzler): Silas Hertzler, The Hertzler-Hartzler Family History (Berne, Ind., 1952) 773; Hess: John H. Hess, A Family Record of the Hess Family . . . (Lititz, Pa., 1880) 68; ———: John H. Hess, A Genealogy of the Hess Family . . . (Lititz, Pa., 1896) 248; ———: Frank G. Roupp, Hess Record; Descendants of John R. Hess . . . (Fall River, Kan., 1949) 100; Hochstetler *(Hostetler)*: Harvey Hostetler, Descendants of Jacob Hochstetler . . . (Elgin, Ill., 1912) 1191; ———: Mrs. Amos D. Hostetler, Descendants of David J. Hochstetler (Nappanee, Ind., 1953) 99; Holdeman: Edwin L. Weaver, Holdeman Descendants . . . (Nappanee, Ind., 1937) 574; ———: Obed Johnson, A Compilation of the Genealogical and Biographical Record of the Descendants of David S. Holdeman . . . (North Newton, Kan. 1951) 178; ———: see also Shaum; Horner: Viola (Gates) Horner, Descendents [!] of Jacob Horner . . . (Converse, Ind., 1949) 51; Horst: Hettie K. (Horst) Hess and Lydia Ruth Hess, John Horst Family . . . (n.p., 1940) 149; Hostetter: The Hostetter Family (n.p., n.d.) (Chart printed on both sides); Huber *(Hoover)*: Harry M. Hoover, The Huber-Hoover Family History . . . (Scottdale, Pa. 1928) 335; Hunsberger: Byron K. Hunsberger, The Hunsbergers (Norristown, Pa., 1926; rev. & enl. ed.: Norristown, Pa., 1941) 2 vv.; Hunsicker: Henry A. Hunsicker and Horace M. Hunsicker, A Genealogical History of the Hunsicker Family (Philadelphia, 1911) 358; ———: see also Custer.

Isaak: Peter Isaak, Stammbuch meiner Voreltern . . . (n.p., n.d.) 89.

Janzen: Kathryn Klassen et. al., The Peter Janzen Family (n.p., 1948?); Just: L. R. Just, Just Family History (Hillsboro, Kan., 1947) 103.

Kaegy *(*Keagy, etc.): Franklin Keagy, A History of the Kägy Relationship . . . (Harrisburg, Pa., 1899) 675; Kaiser: Thomas E. Kaiser, The Kaiser Families . . . (Oshawa, Ont., 1931) 20; Kauffman: Daniel W. Kauffman, History of the Kauffman Family (Omaha, Neb., 1888) 32; ———: Charles Fahs Kauffman, A Genealogy and History of the Kauffman-Coffman Families . . . (York, Pa., 1940) 775; ———: Joel C. Beachey, Family Record of Moses and Katie Kauffman . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1941) 65; ———: Mannoah A. Kauffman, Abraham Kauffman Family History . . . (Fresno, Ohio, 1949?) 100; ———: Barbara (Kauffman) Gingerich, Family Record of Jacob Kauffman . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1952) 16; ———: see also Shetler; Keller: E. S. Shumaker, Descendants of Henry Keller . . . (Indianapolis, Ind., c1924) 594; Keyser: Charles S. Keyser, The Keyser Family . . . (Philadelphia, 1889) 161; King: Isabelle (King) Yoder, Centennial Memoir; the Life Story and Genealogy of Abraham and Mattie King (Harrisonburg, Va., 1949) 49; Klopfenstein: John Henry Klopfenstein, Klopfenstein Family Record . . . (Grabill, Ind., c1926) 68; Koehn: Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Koehn; Descendants and Relation Circle . . . (North Newton, Kan., 1955); Kolb: see Custer, Kulp, and Strassburger; Kratz: A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of John Valentine Kratz . . . (Elkhart, Ind., 1892) 314; Krehbiel: History of the Valentine Krehbiel Family . . . (n.p., 1902?) 12; ———: W. J. Krehbiel, History of One Branch of the Krehbiel Family (McPherson, Kan., 1950) 100; ———: Jacob M. Goering, The Jacob Krehbiel, Sr., Family Record (Hillsboro, Kan., 1951) 133; Kulp: Daniel Kolb Cassel, A Genealogical History of the Kolb, Kulp or Culp Family . . . (Norristown, Pa., 1895) 584; Kurtz: Alta Kurtz Christophel, Ascending and Descending Genealogy of the Children of Joseph Kurtz and Lydia Zook (Mishawaka, Ind., 1941?) 26.

Landes: Henry S. Landes, Descendants of Jacob Landes . . . (Souderton, Pa., 1943) 24; Landis: D. B. Landis, The Landis Family of Lancaster County . . . (Lancaster, Pa., 1888) 90; ———: Norman A. Landis and H. K. Stoner, The Landis Genealogy . . . (Berlin, Pa., 1935); ———: Ira D. Landis, The Landis Family Book (Lancaster and Bareville, Pa., 1950-54) 4 vv.; ———: Mary (Landis) Hoover, et al., Landis Family . . . (n.p., 1951) 14; ———: see also Strassburger; Lantz: Jacob W. Lantz, The Lantz Family Record . . . (Cedar Springs, Va., 1931) 265; Lapp: Genealogy of the Descendants of Isaac and Barbara (Stoltzfus) Lapp (n.p., 1941) 115; Leatherman: I. John Letherman and Emma Leatherman Candler, All Leatherman Kin History . . . (Nappanee, Ind., 1940) 1146; Lederach: see Strassburger; Lehman: Laura (Lehman) Mellenbruch et al., The Genealogy of the Lehman Family (Willcox, Ariz., 1943) 107; Lehmann: Peter S. Lehmann and Peter Gilliom, Eine kurze Chronik der Familie Lehmann (Berne, Ind.?, 1914) 37; Leisy: E. E. Leisy, Leisy

Family Tree (n.p., 1954); Lesher: Lydia Ruth Hess, John Lesher Family (Marion, Pa., 1939) 64; ———: see also Hege; Levering: H. G. Jones, Wigard and Gerhard Levering and Their Descendants (n.p., 1858) 193; ———: J. Levering, Levering Family History and Genealogy (n.p., 1897) 975; Longacre (Longaker, Longenecker): History of the Longacre-Longaker-Longenecker Family (Philadelphia, 1902?) 310.

Markley: Henry S. Dotterer, Descendants of Jacob Markley ... (n.p., 1884) 36; Martin: John D. Risser, Family Record of Abraham Martin ... (Hagerstown, Md., 1940) 48; ———: Adam R. Martin and Kenneth E. Martin, Family Record of Jacob M. Martin ... (Hagerstown, Md., 1947) 168; Mast: C. Z. Mast, A Brief History of ... Jacob Mast ... (Elverson, Pa., c1911) 822; ———: Moses C. Mast and John P. Weaver, Mast History of Eli D. Mast ... (Cadwell, Ill., 1952) 63; ———: Henry J. Otto and Mary (Gingerich) Otto, Descendants of Jacob D. Mast ... (Nappanee, Ind., 1952) 79; Maurer: Frank T. Kauffman, Family of Abraham and Susanna Maurer and Ummel Relatives ... (Richmond, Cal., 1953) 30; Maust: Jonas D. Gnagey, A Complete History of Jonas Maust and His Father's Family (Parnell, Iowa, 1935); Mazelin: D. D. Mazelin, The Mazelins in America ... (Berne, Ind., 1941) 262; Metzger: see Tanger; Meyer (Meyers): see Moyer; Miller: C. J. Miller, Memorial History of John F. Miller . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1906) 9; ———: Harry D. Miller, S. S. Yoder, and Earl Miller, Miller Family History . . . (Middlebury, Ind., 1927) 92; ———: Allen H. Miller, Yost D. Miller Family Record (Pekin, Ill., 1927) 46; ———: Walter Speas and Esther (Yoder) Speas, Family Record; Jacob J. and Anna (nee Schrock) Miller . . . (Kalona, Iowa, 1942) 80; ———: Emanuel J. Miller, Family History of Joni Miller . . . (Wilmot, Ohio, 1942) 123; ———: Emanuel J. Miller, Family History of the Descendants of Jeremiah Miller . . . (Wilmot, Ohio, 1943) 69; ———: Emanuel J. Miller, Family History of the Descendants of John F. Miller . . . (Wilmot, Ohio, 1943) 105; ———: Henry D. Miller, Descendants of John C. Miller (Nappanee, Ind., 1952) 51; Moyer (Meyer, Myers): A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Christian and Hans Meyer . . . (Harleysville, Pa., 1896) 739; ———: A. J. Fretz, Genealogy of the Moyer Family (Milton, N.J., 1909) 144; ———: Edna Ruth Mueller, Moyer Family History (Halstead, Kan., 1948) 34; Mullet (Mollat): Joyce Nadine (Mullet) Getz, We Would Remember . . . Genealogical Compilation of the Mollat Immigrants . . . (Dayton, Ohio, 1950) 264.

Nash: A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of William Nash . . . (Milton, N.J., 1903) 88; Neff: Elizabeth (Clifford) Neff, A Chronicle . . . Regarding Rudolf and Jacob Näf . . . and Their Descendants . . . (Cincinnati, Ohio, 1886) 352; Nissley: The Nissley's (Prospectus with genealogical chart) (Mount Joy, Pa., 1918) 23; ———: Harry Hoyt Nissley, A Chronologically Arranged Collection . . . Descendants of John Nissley . . . (Detroit, 1949?) (broadside printed on both sides); Niswander: Inez Ernzen, Hands Across the Years; a Historical Genealogy (Beloit, Kan., 1953) 163 (Includes information about the Sherk family).

Oberholtzer: A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Martin Oberholtzer . . . (Milton, N.J., 1903) 254; ———: Elisha S. Loomis, Some Account of Jacob Oberholtzer . . . and of Some of His Descendants . . . (Cleveland, Ohio, 1931) 414; Otto: Annie E. Gingerich, Family Record of Daniel D. Otto . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1929) 16.

Pankratz: Helena (Schroeder) Schmidt, The Jacob Pankratz Genealogy (Canton, Kan., 1940) 60; Pauls: Jacob B. Neufeld, The Pauls Family Record (n.p., 1952) 131; Penner: Mrs. Robert Lee Koehn, A Compilation of the Genealogical and Biographical Record of the Descendants of Henry Penner . . . (North Newton, Kan., 1954) 32; Pennypacker: S. W. Pennypacker, The Pedigree of . . . (the) Sons of I. A. Pennypacker . . . (Philadelphia, 1892); Plank: Sixth Annual Plank Reunion . . . 1903 (n.p., 1903) 40; ———: Charles Plank, Descendants of Isaac J. Plank (Lyons, Kan., 1938) 26; Preheim: Jacob M. Goering, The Peter Preheim Family Record . . . (Hillsboro, Kan., 1953) 130.

Raber: John A. Raber, Family Records of Jacob Raber . . . (Sugarcreek, Ohio, 1915?) 78; ———: Daniel J. Raber, Raber Family History . . . (n.p., 1937) 20; Reesor: L. J. Burkholder, The Reesor Reunion of 1928 and Family Chart (Markham, Ont., 1928) 16; ———: Reesor Family Reunion, The Reesor Family in Canada . . . (n.p., 1950) 160; Reist: Henry G. Reist, Peter Reist . . . and Some of His Descendants (Schenectady, N.Y., 1933) 118; Richert: Maria Dora Richert and Edna Richert Sawatzky, Jacob A. and Anna Kliewer Richert Family (Newton, Kan., 1955); Rittenhouse: Daniel K. Cassel, A Genea-biographical History of the Rittenhouse Family . . . (Philadelphia, 1893-97) 6 vv.; Rosenberger: E. Matthews, Rosenberger Family . . . (n.p., 1892) 60; ———: A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Henry Rosenberger . . . (Milton, N.J., 1906) 336; ———: Paulyne Grace (Mickley) Kramer, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Joseph Detweiler Rosenberger (Perkasie, Pa., 1953) 32; Roth: Harvey Reeser and Norma (Hamilton) Reesor, The Genealogy of Christian and Catherine (Rich) Roth (Brownsville, Ore., 1953) 17; ———: Ruth Caroline Roth, A Genealogical Study of the Nicolaus and Veronica (Zimmerman) Roth Family (Elkhart, Ind., 1955) 331; Royer: J. G. Francis, Royer Family in America . . . (n.p., 1928) 654.

Schartner: Eldon Smith, The History and Record of the Schartner Family (n.p., 1953) 190; Schlabach: Emanuel J. Miller, Daniel Schlabach Family History . . . (Wilmot, Ohio, 1942?) 32; ———: Mahlon C. Schlabaugh, A Memorial History of Daniel and John Schlabach . . . (Kalona, Iowa, 1945) 58; Schmidt: J. Boese, Schmidt Family Tree (Avon, S.D., 1931) broadside; ———: Jacob Alvin Schmidt, Schmidt Family Record . . . (Vermillion, S.D., 1948) 35; ———: H. U. Schmidt, A Record of Schmidt's (n.p., 1951) 23; Schnebele (Snively): J. Snively, Genealogical Register of the . . . Descendants of John Jacob Schnebele . . . and also of . . . Samuel Bachtel (Chambersburg, Pa., 1858) 31;

Schneider (Snyder): Joseph Meyer Snyder, Hannes Schneider and His Wife . . . Their Descendants . . . (Kitchener, Ont., 1940?) 499; Schnell: Hervey Schnell and Frances (Schnell) Lehman, Schnell-Bader Family (Orrville, Ohio, 1946) 29; Schrag: Edwin P. Graber, Memoirs of . . . John Schrag and Family (n.p., 1952) 108; Schrock: Silvanus Yoder, A Brief History . . . With a Complete Genealogy of the Descendants of Peter Schrock (Scottdale, Pa., 1923) 101; ———: Martha A. Schrock, The Tobias Schrock Family Record . . . (Decatur, Ind., 1950?) 83; Schroeder: Henry R. Schroeder, The Heinrich Schroeder Family Record (n.p., 1952) 24; Schwartz: Anna D. Schwartz, Descendants of Johannes Schwartz (Berne, Ind., 1949) 243; Sensenig (Sensenich, Senseney, etc.): Barton Sensenig et al., The "Sensineys" of America . . . (Philadelphia, 1943) 159; Shaum: Catharine Mumaw, Shaum Family History (Wooster, Ohio, 1915?) 60; ———: Harvey S. Rutt, History of Chester Township, Wayne County, Ohio, and the Genealogy of the Shaum and Holdeman Families . . . (Smithville, Ohio, 1930) 155; Sherk: see Niswander; Shetler (Schoettler): Samuel D. Guengerich, A Memorial History of Daniel Schöttler, Sr. . . . and also of Jac. & Rebecca Kauffman . . . (Wellman, Iowa, 1910) 119; Shirk: Henry Yocom Shirk, The Shirk Family History and Genealogy . . . (Elkhart, Ind., 1914) 137; Shoemaker: Benjamin H. Shoemaker, Shoemaker Pioneers . . . (Philadelphia, 1955); Showalter: Preston M. Showalter, Family Record of the Showalters (Maugansville, Md., 1943) 95; ———: Elizabeth Anna Showalter, Our Family; Facts of the George B. Showalter Family (Scottdale, Pa., 1955) 30; Slonaker (Schlonaker, Slonecker, Sloneger, Sloniger, etc.): James Rollin Slonaker, A History and Genealogy of the Slonaker Descendants . . . (Los Angeles, 1941) 732; Sloneker: A Short, Simple, Story, Modestly Told (n.p., 1903); Smiley: see Yoder; Sprunger: Abraham J. Sprunger and Samuel F. Sprunger, Geschlechts- und Namens-Register der Familie Sprunger (Berne, Ind., 1890) 67; Stauffer: Henry S. Bower, A Genealogical Record of Daniel Stauffer and Hans Bauer . . . (Harleysville, Pa., 1897) 203; ———: (Stover): A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Henry Stauffer . . . (Milton, N.J., 1899) 371; ———: Ezra N. Stauffer, Stauffer Genealogy (Goshen, Ind., c1917) 179; Steiner: Eunice Deter, Decendants [!] of Ulrich Steiner . . . (Morrison, Ill., 1947) 85; Stemen: History of the Stemen Family . . . (Fort Wayne, Ind., 1881) 45; Stoll: see Graber; Stouffer: David Stouffer, The Genealogy and Historical Sketch of the Stouffer Family (Toronto, 1918) 30; Stover: see Stauffer; Strassburger: Ralph Beaver Strassburger, The Strassburger and Allied Families of Pennsylvania (Gwynedd Valley, Pa., 1922) 520 (While the Strassburger family treated here is not Mennonite, a number of Pennsylvania Mennonite families are included: Bauer, Landis, Kolb, Ziegler, Clemens, and Lederach.); Strausz: Jacob M. Goering and Anna (Graber) Goering, The Jacob Strausz, Sr., Family Record . . . (Galva, Kan., 1948) 76; Strickler: Harry M. Strickler, Forerunners; a History or Genealogy of the Strickler Families . . . (Harrisonburg, Va., c1925) 425; ———: Abigail (Hull) Strickler et al., Stricklers of Pennsylvania . . . (Mt. Joy, Pa., 1942) 420; Stucky: Harley J. Stucky, The Joshua P. Stucky Family Record . . . (North Newton, Kan., 1952?) 8; Stukey: Elmer Leonidas Denniston, Genealogy of the Stukey, Ream, Grove, Clem and Denniston Families (Harrisburg, Pa., 1939) 591; Stutzman: Harvey Hostetler, Descendants of Barbara Hochstedler and Christian Stutzman (Scottdale, Pa., 1938) 1391; Swartley: A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record . . . of the Swartley Family . . . (n.p., 1906) 81; ———: Samuel R. Swartley, Genealogy Record of Descendants of Elizabeth Gehman and Abraham R. Swartley . . . (Lansdale, Pa., 1916) 60; Swartzendruber (Schwartzentruber): (P. Swartzentruber), Peter Swartzendruber (and) Wilmina Eash Genealogy, 1777-1955 (Westmoreland, N. Y., 1956) 127.

Tanger: Frederick Sheely Weiser, The Tanger-Metzger Genealogy (Gettysburg, Pa., 1955); Treichler: Melissa J. (Treichler), History and Family Record of John Treichler . . . (n.p., 1906) 60; Troyer: Descendants of Abraham A. Troyer (n.p., 1951) 12; ———: Eli J. Troyer, Troyer Family Record . . . (Howe, Ind., 1952?) 32; ———: Hiram B. Troyer, Descendants of Michael Troyer (Nappanee, Ind., 1953) 37.

Ummel: see Maurer; Unruh: J. A. Boese, Unruh Family Tree (Avon, S.D., 1932) broadside; ———: Peter U. Schmidt, The Peter Unruh Genealogy . . . (Goessel, Kan., 1941) 128; ———: Abraham J. Unruh and Verny Unruh, The Tobias A. Unruh Biography . . . and Family Record . . . (Pulaski, Iowa, 1950) 49.

Virkler: see Farney.

Weaver: Esther Susan Weaver, Descendants of Henry B. Weaver (Ephrata, Pa., 1953) 35; Weber (Weaver): Ezra N. Stauffer et al., Weber or Weaver Family History (Nappanee, Ind., 1953) 197; Welty: Samuel H. Baumgartner, Brief Historical Sketches of Eight Generations, Descendants of Ulrich Welty . . . (Indianapolis, Ind., 1926) 395; Wenger: Jonas G. Wenger, Martin D. Wenger, and Joseph H. Wenger, History of Christian Wenger . . . (Elkhart, Ind., 1903) 259; Wideman: Ida (Wideman) Reesor, The Family Chain . . . Henry Wideman . . . (Claremont, Ont., 1931?) 12; Wiebe: see Groening; Wismer: A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of Jacob Wismer and a Complete Genealogical Family Register . . . (Elkhart, Ind., 1893) 372.

Yoder: Christian Z. Yoder, Genealogical Records of Descent from John Yoder, Jacob Zook, Daniel Conrad and Nathan Smiley . . . (Wooster, Ohio, 1932) 122; ———: Tillie M. Beachy, Family Record of Moses and Barbara (nee Miller) Yoder . . . (Arthur, Ill., 1934) 71; ———: Marie Agnes (Beachy) Miller, Family Record of Moses and Barbara (nee Miller) Yoder . . . (Centerville, Mich., 1951) 80; ———: Sarah B. (Frey) Hostetler, Descendants of Jacob J. Yoder (Nappanee, Ind., 1951) 105.

Zehr: see Farney; Ziegler: see Strassburger; Zook: (Zug): see Hertzler, Kurtz, and Yoder.

Ezra E. Eby's two-volume A Biographical History of Waterloo Township (Waterloo County, Ontario) (Berlin, Ont., 1895-96) and Joseph B. Snyder's Supplement to Eby's history (Waterloo, Ont., 1931) contain extensive genealogical material concerning Mennonite families in this area.

B. Dutch Families:

Beets: A. A. Vorsterman van Oyen, Genealogie van het Geslacht Beets ('s Gravenhage, 1884); Bruyn: J. G. de Groot Jamin, Jr., Geslachtslijst van de Familie Bruyn (Amsterdam, 1886).

Cate, ten: G. ten Cate, Geslachtslijst van den Frieschen Tak der familie ten Cate (n.p., 1896); Coolman (Koolman): (J. Huizinga), Stamboek of Geslachtsregister der Nakomelingen van Fiepke Foppes en Diever Olferts . . . (Geslacht Coolman) (Groningen, 1887); Coopmans: see Koopmans; Corver: G. Vissering, Geslachtslijst van de familie Corver 1590-1847 (n.p., 1936).

Delden, van: P. Moussault, Het Geslacht van Delden (Laren, 1954); Dyserinck: A. A. Vorsterman van Oyen, Het Geslacht Dyserinck (Amsterdam, 1885).

Eeghen, van: F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van Oorkonden betrekking hebbende op het Geslacht van Eeghen in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1918).

Fontein: J. G. A. Fontein, "Genealogie van het Geslacht Fontein," in Jierboekje fan it genealogysk wurkforban (Ljouwert-Leeuwarden, 1953).

Gelder, van: J. M. van Gelder, Stamboek der Familie van Gelder . . . (Amsterdam, 1899); Geuns, van: (A. M. Cramer), Brief betreffende den Stamvader der Familie van Geuns . . . (n.p., n.d.); Glerum: C. P. Glerum Jzn, Het Zeeuwsche Landbouwersgeslacht Glerum 1580-1940 (Overveen, 1940).

Halbertsma: (G. ten Cate), Geslachtslijst van de Familie Halbertsma (n.p., 1897); Heyningen, van: Geslacht-lijst van de Familie van Heyningen (Amsterdam, 1817); Hoekstra: A. H. Stikker, Een Familie van Galjootschippers, Commandeurs op Groenland en Friese Vermaners: Baske-Hoekstra-Veenstra (n.p., n.d., 1943); Huidekoper: E. Huidekoper, Huidekoper Holland Family 1730-1924 (n.p., 1924); Huizinga: (J. Huizinga), Stamboek of Geslachtsregister der Nakomelingen van Derk Pieters en Katrina Tomas . . . (geslacht Huizinga) (Groningen, 1883).

Koolman: see Coolman; Koopmans: W. J. J. C. Bijleveld, Geslacht Coopmans (Koopmans), repr. from De Nederlandsche Leeuw, 1930; Kuyper: Jan Aten, De Doopsgezinde Krommenieër Zeildoekfabrikeurs-familie Kuyper (n.p., n.d., 1952).

Leendertz: Stammbaum der Familie Leendertz (n.p., 1907); Lennep, van: F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van Oorkonden, betrekking hebbende op het Geslacht van Lennep 1093-1900, vol. I (Amsterdam, 1900); Loosjes: Geslachtsboek van de Familie Loosjes (Haarlem, 1905); ———: Gerrit Jan Honig, De Zaanlandsche Geschied- en Plaatsbeschrijver Adriaan Loosjes en zijn geslacht (Zaandijk, n.d.); Luyken: P. van Eeghen, Jan Luyken en zijne Bloedverwanten (Amsterdam, 1889).

Meihuizen: Jacob Huizinga, Stamboek of Geslachtsregister der Nakomelingen van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry . . . (Groningen, 1890); ——: J. Meihuizen Szn, Het Geslacht Meihuizen 1622-1922 (n.p., n.d., 1937); ———: (J. Meihuizen), Stamboek van het Geslacht Meihuizen 1400-1945 (n.p., n.d.,); Mesdag: G. Mesdag Kz, Het Geslacht Mesdag (Groningen, 1896); ———: G. van Mesdag, Het Gestacht Mesdag (n.p., 1943) 46; Muller (Mueller): J. W. Müller, Das Geschlecht Müller aus Gerolsheim (Oegstgeest, 1926); ———: G. Kalff, Jr., Samuel Muller en zijn acht kinderen (n.p., 1941); ———: H. Muller, Onze stamvader Prof. Samuel Muller en zijn vrouw Femina Geertruida Mabé (Amsterdam, 1944); ———: J. W. Muller, Het Geslacht Muller (Müller) . . . (Amsterdam, 1951).

Neufville, de: A. C. de Neufville, Histoire Généalogique de la Maison de Neufville . . . (Amsterdam, 1869); Nieuwenhuyzen: A. A. Vorsterman van Oyen, Genealogisch Overzicht van de Familie Nieuwenhuyzen (Amsterdam, 1884).

Pama: C. Pama, De Pama's te Surhuisterveen ('s Gravenhage, 1942); Pauw: H. N. Slinger, Het Doopsgezinde Geslacht Pauw (Alkmaar, 1938).

Salm: W. (J. J. A. Wijs), Stamboom van de familie Salm (n.p., 1936); ———: (J. C. te Winkel-Losen), De eerste Bewerkers van het Stamboek (der Familie Salm) (Amsterdam, 1917); Sleutel: J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Het Geslacht Sleutel (Leeuwarden, 1867); Stuurman: F. J. Stuurman, Het Geslacht Stuurman (Zeist, 1941).

Teyler (Teyler van der Hulst): Stamboek der Teyler's of Geslachtsregister der Nakomelingen van Thomas Teyler . . . (Haarlem, n.d.)

Veen: E. A. Veen, Een Friesch Koopmansgeslacht, het geslacht Veen (Amsterdam, 1947); Veenstra: see Hoekstra; Veer, de: Geslachtsregister van Cornelis Isaac de Veer (n.p., n.d.); Velden, van der: Genealogische Geschriften over de Familie van der Velden (n.p., n.d.); Vietor: Hendrik Haitzema Viëtor, Het Geslacht Viëtor (Steenwijk, 1910); Vissering: G. ten Cate, Geslachtslijst van de Familie Vissering (n.p., 1903); Vliet, van der: W. J. J. C. Bijleveld, Genealogie van het Geslacht van der Vliet (The Hague, 1924); Vondel: A. A. Vorsterman van Oyen, Joost van den Vondel en zijn geslacht ('s Gravenhage, 1887); Vries, de: J. H. de Vries, De Amsterdamsche Doopsgezinde Familie de Vries (Zutphen, 1911).

Waarde, de: De Waarden en het Geslacht de Waard (Groningen, 1937); Warnaars: J. H. Warnaars, Het Geslacht Warnaars (Amsterdam, n.d., 1921); Willink: P. B(eets), Stam-boek der Willingen of Geslacht-register der Nakomelingen van Jan Willink . . . (Deventer, 1767); Wouters: A. Haga, Bijdrage tot de genealogie van het Doopsgezinde Sneekscke geslacht Wouters (n.p., 1941).

Concerning the following Dutch Mennonite families genealogical data with their family coats-of-arms are found in A. A. Vorsterman van Oyen, Stam- en Wapenboek van aanzienlijke Nederlandsche Familiën: Vol. I (Groningen, 1885): van Aldewerelt, Blaauw, Blijdenstein, Brants, Bruyn, Bruyning, de Clercq, Dyserinck, van Eeghen, van Eik, de Flines, Fontein, de Haan. Vol. II (Groningen, 1888): van Halmael, van Heukelom, van Heyningen, van Heyst, ten Kate (Cate), Koopmans, van Lennep, van der Mersch, Messchert, de Monchy, de Neufville. Vol. III (Groningen, 1890): Portielie. Rahusen, Roeters van Lennep, Sieuwertsz van Reesema, van Vollenhoven, Vreede, and in appendix Fontein, Hesselink, Mesdag.

A valuable source of genealogical information is Nederlandsch Patriciaat, first issued in 1910 at The Hague. The following Dutch families, which have been entirely or partly Mennonite, are found in the Ned. Patriciaat: van Alde(r)werelt, VII (1916) 8-14; XLII (1956) 23-43; Blaauw, VII (1916) 48-52; X (1919) 21 f.; Blijdenstein, XXXIII (1947) 7-34; Brants, V (1914) 47-52; Bruyn, IV (1913) 78-84; Bybau, V (1914) 68-72; XXXII (1946) 48-55; Cardinal, VIII (1917) 95-102; X (1917) 68 f.; ten Cate, XVII (1927) 109-14; de Clercq, II (1911) 60-68; XI (1920) 43-53; Craandijk, XXXVI (1950) 91-103; Doyer, XXX (1944) 32-68; Dyserinck, II (1911) 116-21; XL (1954) 97-107; Ebeling, XV (1925) 114-20; van Eeghen, II (1911) 121-28; X (1919) 96-105; Flines, de, VII (1916) 174-79; Fock, VIII (1917) 148-53; van Gelder, I (1910) 152-63; IX (1918) 104-17; van Geuns, XIV (1924) 89-107; van Gilse, XXXIX (1953) 87-98; de Haan, II (1911) 175-80; X (1919) 120-26; XVII (1927) 179; XXXV (1949) 47-61; Halbertsma, V (1914) 172-81; XII (1921-22) 206-17; XV (1925) 135 f.; XL (1954) 174-98; van Halmael, XXVI (1940) 60-64; Hannema, XVIII (1928-29) 313-24; van Heukelom, IV (1913) 174-81; XXVII (1941) 140-57; van Heyst, XXXVI (1950) 188-93; Huidekoper, XVII (1927) 206-16; Hulshoff, XXVIII (1942) 78-105; Jannink, XIV (1924) 155-64; Jeltes, X (1919) 136-42; Kaars Sypestein, XVII (1927) 339-44; Kool, XVIII (1928-29) 97-116; Koopmans (Coopmans), XI (1920) 124-32; Kops, X (1919) 190-200; XL (1954) 206-28; Laan, XII (1921-22) 171-86; Leendertz, XIX (1930) 120-42, 290 f.; Lely, XLII (1956) 213-24; van Lennep, IX (1918) 231-52; Loder, VI (1915) 225-28; Loosjes, XIV (1924) 180-88; Lugt, XXIX (1943) 291-318; van der Meersch, II (1911) 329-33; van der Mersch, VIII (1917) 298-302; Messchaert (Messchert), XVI (1926) 212-36; Mol (1), X (1919) 272-81; de Monchy, III (1912) 263-75; XXV (1939) 142-62; Müller (Muller), XIX (1930) 152-62; de Neufville, VI (1915) 275-78; van der Pals, V (1914) 312-16; XVI (1926) 237-42; Patijn, I (1910) 334-38; IX (1918) 280-84; van der Ploeg, XVII (1927) 282-93; Pol, XXVIII (1942) 227-44; le Poole, X (1919) 354-59; XLI (1955) 291-305; Portielje, VI (1915) 314-16; Prins, XII (1921-22) 120-30; Rahusen, V (1914) 326-30; Rueb, II (1911) 413-19; XV (1925) 435-45; Scheltema, XXVII (1941) 218-88; XXVIII (1942) 368-70; Schimmelpenninck, I (1910) 410-13; XIII (1923) 322 f.; van Schouwenburg, XIV (1924) 267-83; Sieuwertsz van Reesema, V (1914) 336-39; de Stoppelaar, XXVIII (1942) 287-304; Uitterdijk, XI (1920) 289-92; de Veer, XXV (1939) 270-313; Vissering, XXIV (1938) 300-18; van der Vliet, XI (1920) 320-31; Vollenhoven, XI (1920) 332-37; van Vollenhoven, XVI (1926) 278-340; Vreede, XLI (1955) 341-70; de Vries, V (1914) 439-49; XXVII (1941) 370-92; Warnaars, IV (1913) 431-35; Westendorp, IV (1913) 445-49; Willink, XXXVI (1950) 368-78.

Data concerning the following Dutch noble families, which were Mennonite or of Mennonite descent, are found in the Nederlandsch Adelsboek (The Hague): Hartsen (1929) 168-70; Rutgers (1916) 421-30; Schimmelpenninck (1917) 67-76.

C. German Families:

Bachmann: Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen, 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934). The second appendix, "Stammbäume der mennonitischen Familien in Kleinpolen," consists of genealogical charts for the following families: Bachmann, Bergthold, Brubacher, Ewy, Forrer, Hubin, Jotter, Kintzi, Klein, Laise, Linscheid, Merk, Müller, Rupp, Schmidt, Schrag, and Stauffer; Beckerath: Heinrich von Beckerath, Stammbaum von Beckerath nebst Deszendenz (Krefeld, 1903); ———: Oskar von Beckerath, Familie von Beckerath (vol. II) (Krefeld, 1936); Bergen (Bargen): Fritz van Bergen, Der Berg; Sippenzeitung der Familien van Bergen, van Bargen, 1933?-1940? (Frankenau/Gutfeld, Ostpreussen); Bergthold: see Bachmann; Brubacher: see Bachmann.

Conwentz: Margarete Boie, Hugo Conwentz und seine Heimat . . . (Stuttgart, 1940) 284.

Delden: P. Moussault, Het Geslacht van Delden . . . (Laren, 1954) 283; Dirksen: George Conrad, Geschichte der Familie Dirksen . . . (Görlitz, 1905) 2 vv.; Driedger: Gustav E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940; Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins, Nr. 3). The appendix of 12 pages is entitled "Beiträge zur Stammtafel der Familie Driedger."

Epp: Kurt Kauenhowen, Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennoniten-Familien Epp-Kauenhowen-Zimmermann, 1934?-1943? (Göttingen); with volume 7 this becomes simply Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes Danziger Mennoniten Familien. While the Epp, Kauenhowen (Couwenhoven), and Zimmermann families receive primary emphasis, there are occasional genealogical articles relating to other Mennonite families with a Danzig background. Ewy: see Bachmann.

Fieguth: Abraham Fieguth, Stammbuch der Familie Fieguth . . . (Marienburg, Wpr., 1938) 45; Forrer: see Bachmann; Funck: Herman Funck, Familie Funck-Richen Stammbaum . . . (Schorndorf, 1939) 23.

Hege: Christian Hege, Chronik der Familie Hege . . . (Frankfurt am Main, 1937) 55; Hubin: see Bachmann.

Jotter: see Bachmann.

Kauenhowen: Kurt Kauenhowen and Walter Kauenhowen, Die Kauenhowen; Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte und dem Leben des Geschlechtes Kauenhowen, 1926 (vol. I, Nr. 1) (Verden) no further issues published; ———: see also Epp; Kintzi: see Bachmann; Klein: see Bachmann.

Laise: see Bachmann; Leyen: Wilhelm Kurschat, Das Haus Heinrich und Friedrich von der Leyen in Krefeld (Frankfurt, 1933) 33; Linscheid: see Bachmann.

Merk: see Bachmann; Mueller: Heinrich Müller, Versuch an Hand des Stammbaumes der Familie Müller . . . (Frankfurt a.M., 1919?) 50; ———: see also Bachmann.

ROOSEN: Berend Paulus Roosen and Otto Roosen, Stammbaum der Familie Roosen (Hamburg, 1875); ———: (Berend Carl Roosen), Geschichte unseres Hauses (Hamburg, 1905) 118; ROY: Curt von Roy and Roderich von Roy, Die Familie des Peter von Roy . . . (Oppeln, 1918) 50; RUPP: see Bachmann.

SCHMIDT: see Bachmann; SMISSEN, VAN DER: (Klenze), Familien-Chronik der Familie van der Smissen (Danzig, 1875) 146; ———: Heinz Münte, Das Altonaer Handlungshaus van der Smissen, 1682-1824 . . . (Altona/Elbe, 1932; Altonaer Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Heimatkunde) 178; the first 48 pages contain the van der Smissen genealogy; SCHMUTZ: Zweihundertvierzig Jahre Familiengeschichte, ein Stammbaum der Familien Schmutz (Leuterstal, 1936) 281; SCHRAG: see Bachmann; STAUFFER: see Bachmann.

WIEBE: Nachrichten über die Familie Wiebe und einige mit ihr in Verwandtschaft stehende Familien (Berlin, 1872).

ZIMMERMAN: see Epp.

Kurt Kauenhowen of Göttingen, Germany, has devoted a great deal of time to research in Mennonite family history, particularly the Mennonite families of West Prussia. His "Das Schrifttum zur Sippenkunde und Geschichte der taufgesinnten niederländischen Einwanderer (Mennoniten) in Altpreussen und ihrer Abzweigungen" in Mitteilungen der Niederländischen Ahnengemeinschaft e.V., I:66-109 (May 1939) includes 34 references to monographs and articles on 21 Mennonite families. In 1954 he compiled a manuscript bibliography of materials relating to 101 "nordostdeutschen" Mennonite families, including branches of these families which had migrated to Russia and to North America. Most of his entries are periodical articles, many of them from his own Mitteilungen (see Epp above). Walther Risler, in his "Quellen zur Geschichte der Krefelder Mennonitenfamilien" in Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, Pfalz, 1939), lists materials relating to 17 Mennonite families in Crefeld. Many of the items he lists are articles published in Die Heimat: Mitteilungen des Vereins für Heimatkunde in Crefeld, 1921-? (Crefeld). In MQR, April 1949, Gustav Reimer reports extensive West Prussian Mennonite genealogical materials which he was able to take with him on his flight from Marienburg in 1945. The exact location of these materials at present is not known. N.P.S.

Genemuiden, a town in the Dutch province of Overijssel, situated on the Zwarte Water. At Bergklooster, not far from here, a large number of Anabaptists, having come from North Holland and crossed the Zuiderzee by boat en route to Münster, were taken prisoner on March 23, 1534. See for particulars Bergklooster. vdZ.

General Conference Mennonite Church (formerly the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America), the first American Mennonite general conference organization and now the second largest Mennonite body of America, was organized May 28, 1860, at West Point, Iowa, by three small Mennonite congregations. By 1955 it had grown to 244 congregations with a membership exceeding 50,000, located in the United States, Canada, and South America.

Background. The first period of Mennonite history in America roughly coincides with the colonial period. This was a time of immigration, beginnings, and setting of patterns. Although there was great appreciation of the freedom in the new country, there was also a deep consciousness of separation from the surrounding world, due to difference in religious convictions and practices, and to some extent in language and customs. Outside pressure, especially as expressed by aggressive Scotch-Irish neighbors, urging political participation, and military service as they faced the Revolutionary War, caused much concern among Mennonites.

After the Revolution (1789) to about the middle of the 19th century the continued lack of Old World contacts and increasing isolation in America gradually tended to congeal the patterns of life and thought among the American Mennonites. During this second period of American Mennonite history, with largely older and untrained leadership, patterns of custom and tradition became increasingly set and authoritative. Slowly blood relationship, the family ideal of religion, a cultural church, separation on a social as well as religious basis, tended to crowd out the personal, voluntary, glowing spiritual life of the "new creature in Christ" which had been so real and vital in earlier days.

John C. Wenger writes as follows of these early Mennonite days in America: "Their Christianity was not that of 'radical' Christians; it had settled down to a comfortable, conventional, denominational type. There was no thought of evangelistic work, no need for any kind of mission work, no occasion to alter any of the set patterns of worship. The faith and practice of the immigrants was good and satisfying; why change? From 1683 to the ordination of John H. Oberholtzer, almost 160 years later, no significant changes were made, and no one intended to make any. The Bible had not changed; why should anyone introduce any innovations? Only with great effort would it be possible to introduce Sunday schools, evangelistic services, Bible study and prayer meetings, evening services, and church boards of charities, publication, education, and missions. This was the situation 160 years after the thirty-five Krefelders arrived at Philadelphia on the good ship Concord, October 6, 1683."

About the new life under these conditions H. P. Krehbiel writes as follows: "During that period a number of persons being spiritually awakened, recognized the lethargic condition of the church and endeavored, though not wisely, to awaken the church from its drowsy spiritual stupor. Unfortunately the effect was schismatic . . . . Yet there was hope in the stir and commotion."

John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.), a young school-teacher and minister who later also became a businessman (locksmith) and publisher, was the leader of a more progressive group in Pennsylvania. After he and 15 other ministers were excommunicated by the older group for insisting on a written constitution, they

General Conference Mennonite Churches in North America
Scale of Miles
0
50
100
200
300
400
500
Ohio River
Mississippi River
Missouri River
Fraser River
Columbia River

organized the "East Pennsylvania Conference of Mennonites" (q.v.) on Oct. 28, 1847. Besides the adoption of a written constitution they advocated dropping the collarless ministerial coat, keeping minutes of meetings, publishing a catechism, Sunday-school work, free association with other denominations, mission work, etc.

In 1852 Oberholtzer began publishing the Religiöser Botschafter (q.v.), the first continuing Mennonite periodical in North America. In 1858 the new conference adopted a resolution strongly favoring mission work. European Mennonite contacts were renewed. Ministers were appointed to visit congregations in the interest of spiritual growth. In 1866 a mission society was established and city mission work begun. Oberholtzer served as chairman of this conference from 1847 to 1872 practically without a break.

Two unfortunate minor schisms occurred within the first ten years of the new group's history. The first was the breaking away of a small group in 1851 led by Abraham and Henry Hunsicker, bishop and preacher respectively, who, excommunicated by the new conference, continued for a time a small group known as the Trinity Christian Society, which ultimately disappeared. The second schism was that led by William Gehman in 1857 as a result of the prohibition of prayer meetings by the new conference, followed by the excommunication by the conference of Gehman and 23 others. This group, first called the Evangelical Menonites (q.v.), later merged with other similar groups in Ontario, Ohio, and Indiana to form the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.).

A second center of new life developed among the Mennonites who had migrated from Pennsylvania to Ontario for economic reasons, but also to keep their promise of allegiance to the English Crown. Here Daniel Hoch (q.v.) of Vineland in Lincoln County was leader. Because of aggressive itinerant evangelistic work, he with other leaders was excommunicated by the Ontario Mennonite Conference in 1849. Long before this, Mennonites had also settled in Ohio, where Ephraim Hunsberger (q.v.), who also knew Hoch, became the leader. In 1855 "The Conference Council of the United Mennonite Community of Canada-West and Ohio" was formed, a very small group with three small congregations, with Hoch and Hunsberger as leaders. Here, too, the cause of missions was urged. In 1858 this Canada-Ohio Conference met at Wadsworth, Ohio, to which the Pennsylvania group was also invited. The following year this conference created a "Home and Foreign Missionary Society of Mennonites." Unfortunately Hoch later withdrew from the group to join the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, and the Ontario parts of the conference disappeared.

About the middle of the 19th century several groups of Mennonites from Bavaria and the Palatinate emigrated to America, most of them settling in Illinois and Iowa. They were acquainted with mission and publication work and were otherwise rather progressive. Soon contact was made with the Oberholtzer group in Pennsylvania, the Hoch group in Canada, and the Hunsberger group in Ohio. Daniel Krehbiel (q.v.) was the leader of the Iowa-Illinois group, which at that time was unaffiliated.

Organization, Growth, and Activities. The various Mennonite groups interested in union were invited to send representatives to a conference which was to meet May 28, 1860, at West Point, Lee Co., Iowa. At this meeting, with three congregations participating, Oberholtzer was elected chairman, and Christian Schowalter (q.v.), a teacher in the Iowa community, secretary. A committee of five was elected to work out a "Plan of Union" and report the next day. This the committee did. The conference, after some discussion, adopted the plan, and "The General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America" was under way. The second meeting was held at Wadsworth, Ohio, May 20-23, 1861, with eight congregations responding. Gradually the movement grew. Later most of the 19th-century immigrants from Russia, Prussia, Poland, and Switzerland, joined the Conference. In 1953 the Central Conference Mennonites (q.v.) came in as a district conference, merging with the Middle District Conference in 1956. At General Conference sessions individual congregations have been coming in. The name was changed in 1953 to "General Conference Mennonite Church."

Present organization provides that each congregation has direct relation to the General Conference. At the triennial meeting of the Conference each congregation has one vote for every 30 members or fraction thereof. The accompanying chart indicates the present organization and areas of activity.

In the interest of democracy, no person can succeed himself more than once in any office, committee, or board; with certain exceptions no person can hold a position in more than one standing board or conference office at one time. The conference officers, plus two representatives from each of the four standing boards, form the executive committee which acts for the conference between sessions. The Council of Boards and standing committee meet conjointly once a year (usually in December) for consideration of common problems.

There are six district conferences within the General Conference: Eastern, Middle-Central, Northern, Western, Pacific, and Canadian. The congregations have a direct relationship to their respective district conferences. However, the district conferences have no direct organizational connection with the General Conference. Each congregation, as well as each district conference, is more or less autonomous. The General Conference assumes only an advisory, not a legislative, relationship to the congregations and the district conferences. From the very beginning the emphasis has been on "unity in essentials; liberty in nonessentials; and love in all things." However, the boards are directly responsible to the General Conference, and are not autonomous.

The Great Commission of our Lord has from the beginning been considered the basic task of the Conference and the congregations belonging to it. The first American Mennonite mission work was established by the General Conference in 1880. The missionary was S. S. Haury (q.v.) of Summerfield, Ill., and the field was among the American Indians in Oklahoma. In time (1900 and later) foreign mission work was begun in India, China, South America, Africa, Japan, and Formosa. Even before the foreign work was begun, home mission work was done, mainly with the thought of gathering together scattered Mennonite families. Altogether, some 250 missionaries have been sent to foreign lands and some 200 persons have been employed as home mission workers.

Publication and education were emphasized from the beginning. During the years some twenty-five different publications have come into being, only about one half of which are still in existence. The Mennonite (q.v.) and Der Bote (q.v.) are the official English and German Conference papers. Sunday-school and young people's material, church hymnals, and a variety of other Christian material is produced. Three bookstores are operated by the Conference (Newton, Kan.; Berne, Ind.; Rosthern, Sask.). The following schools are serving the Conference constituency and report to its triennial sessions: Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago (which is under a board elected by the General Conference); Bethel College in North Newton, Kan.; Bluffton College in Bluffton, Ohio; Freeman Junior College in Freeman, S.D.; Rosthern Junior College in Rosthern, Sask.; Mennonite Collegiate Institute, Gretna, Man.; and Canadian Mennonite Bible College in Winnipeg. In addition to these there are a number of academies and Bible schools. Approximately one thousand General Conference young people annually attend the above conference-related schools.

A third area of activity pertains to relief and peace. Besides carrying on its own program in these areas, the Conference helped to organize the Mennonite Central Committee in 1920 and ever since has been affiliated with it in work of general relief, Civilian Public Service, colonization, peace education, etc. Hospitals and homes for the aged are maintained in various areas by district conferences or local groups. The Mennonite nonresistant faith finds positive expression in relief work and voluntary service.

Cultural Background. All American Mennonites are either of Swiss-South German or Dutch-North German background. There is no other Mennonite conference that has such a variety of groups with different cultural backgrounds as the General Conference, which is composed of many shades of these two main cultural groups. We mention briefly a few facts concerning each.

Swiss-South German Background. 1. The descendants of those who came out of the Mennonite Church (MC) with Pennsylvania-German background at present largely constitute the membership of 28 congregations, mostly in Eastern Pennsylvania.

2. The descendants of those who came to America from South Germany in the 19th century constitute most of the membership of 12 congregations. This group earlier exerted great influence in directing the organization and development of the General Conference. The congregations at Donnellson, Iowa; Summerfield, Ill.; Halstead and Moundridge, Kan.; Reedley and Upland, Cal., are some of those belonging to this group.

3. The descendants of those who came directly from Switzerland to Ohio and Indiana in the 19th century at present constitute the major part of the membership of 11 congregations, e.g., Berne, Ind., and Bluffton, Ohio.

4. The descendants of the Swiss who came from South Germany and France, via Volhynia, Russia, arriving in 1874, now constitute the major part of the membership of 12 congregations. The Eden Church at Moundridge, Kan., belongs here; also the congregations at Freeman, S.D.; Pretty Prairie, Kan., and others.

5. The descendants of the Swiss who came from South Germany via Galicia now largely constitute the membership of 5 congregations located at Arlington, Kan.; Butterfield, Minn., and elsewhere.

The General Conference Mennonite Church Organization

6. The descendants of Amish background now largely constitute the membership of 27 congregations mostly in the Central District Conference, largely in Illinois and Indiana, formerly (before 1872) affiliated with the Amish Mennonite (MC) group.

7. The descendants of Hutterite background now largely constitute the membership of 7 congregations, mostly in South Dakota.

Dutch-North German Background. 1. The descendants of the Dutch who came via Prussia in 1874 now largely constitute the membership of 6 congregations. Among them there are churches at Beatrice, Neb., and Newton and Whitewater, Kan.

2. The descendants of the Dutch who came via Prussia and South Russia, arriving in America in 1874 ff., constitute the major part of 70 congregations. This is the largest cultural group in the General Conference. The congregations are scattered all over the West. Many are located in Kansas, Minnesota, and Canada. Alexanderwohl at Goessel, and Hoffnungsau at Inman, Kan., are two of the original settlements in the United States, from which have come a number of younger congregations. In Canada the large Bergthal congregation in Manitoba and the Rosenort congregation in Saskatchewan belong to this group.

3. The descendants of the Dutch who came via Prussia and Polish Russia in 1874 now largely constitute the membership of 11 congregations. Among them are Gnadenberg at Elbing, Johannesthal at Hillsboro, and churches at Canton and Pawnee Rock, Kan., and Meno, Okla.

4. The descendants of the Dutch who came via Prussia and South Russia, arriving after World War I (1922-25, 1930, and 1948-53), now largely constitute the membership of 40 congregations, practically all in Canada.

Mixed Background. More than a dozen congregations already have such a mixture of members of various Mennonite backgrounds as well as some of non-Mennonite background that it is impossible to classify them. The Bethel College congregation at North Newton, Kan., is an example of this. Many congregations, through individual family migrations, are becoming more and more mixed.

In the past the various General Conference Mennonite groups lived in different countries, separated from each other for many decades at a time; thus each developed its own peculiarities, not only in dress and food, but also in point of view and world outlook, in language and social customs, as well as in Biblical interpretation and religious practice. However, in essentials they are one; and because of their feeling of kinship and the desire to work with each other, they have been drawn together since coming to America and have been influenced by the social process involved.

Characteristics of General Conference Mennonites. Renewed attention is given today to the nature and function of the church. It is spoken of as an outpost —a mission station—in the world to win the lost to Christ. Increasingly the church is thought of as the very body of Christ in a given community, and as the visible reality of our Lord in the world. As His body the local congregation, as well as the over-all organization, is to serve as His hands and feet, and with His mind and heart spend itself in ministering to those for whom He died. If the church is the body of which Christ is the head, that body cannot be divided; hence the current ecumenical interest. Only as the body of which Christ is the head can the church fulfill its appointed mission—"that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (John 17:21).

This concern for the faith was one of the main reasons for the organization of the General Conference. The Conference constitution, in all revisions, as also that of 1950, in Article III speaks of the origin and growth of the Conference as a result of "a deeply felt desire for closer union of individual congregations in order: (1) to establish more firmly and to deepen the basic Christian faith and (2) to testify to its relevance to all of life."

This "basic Christian faith" is further elaborated in Article IV, under the heading "Our Common Confession," as follows:

"The General Conference believes in the divine inspiration and the infallibility of the Bible as the Word of God and the only trustworthy guide of faith and life; and in Jesus Christ as the only Saviour and Lord. 'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (I Cor. 3:11).

"In the matter of faith it is, therefore, required of the congregations which unite with the Conference that, accepting the above confession, they hold fast to the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ (Eph. 2:8, 9; Titus 3:5), baptism on confession of faith (Mark 16:16; Acts 2:38), the avoidance of oaths (Matt. 5:34-37; Jas. 5:12), the Biblical doctrine of nonresistance (Matt. 5:39-48; Rom. 12:9-21), nonconformity to the world (Rom. 12:1, 2; Eph. 4:22-24), and the practice of Scriptural church discipline (Matt. 18:15-17; Gal. 6:1).

"The General Conference believes that membership in oath-bound secret societies, military organizations, or other groups which tend to compromise the loyalty of the Christian to the Lord and His Church is contrary to such apostolic admonition as: 'Be ... not unequally yoked ... with unbelievers' (II Cor. 6:14, 15), and that the church 'should be holy and without blemish' (Eph. 5:27)."

A second characteristic of the conference is the emphasis on freedom and autonomy—Christian freedom, not license, for the individual, and autonomy for the congregation. Each believer stands before God Himself in faith as a free individual, uncoerced by other believers. Each individual soul, created in the image of God, is competent and responsible to deal directly with God through Christ, without intervention of parent, priest, sacrament, church, or state. This personal responsibility to God is the basis for freedom of conscience. This is true, within limits, in both faith and practice.

The chief interest in autonomy is not in property rights, or any other material aspect. It is rather a matter of the spirit. The local congregation must be free and autonomous "so that it may move to some mountain of transfiguration or to some upper room at Pentecost." Nicholas Berdyaev is reported to have said that "freedom is a burden rather than a right, a source of tragedy and untold pain." Freedom is not only to be free from something, but also to be free to something. This involves duty and responsibility.

Of the larger free churches in America, General Conference Mennonites in polity are probably most like the Baptists and Congregationalists. The feeling of affinity with these groups is indicated by the fact that their colleges and seminaries have often been the choice of Conference young people not attending their own, both in earlier years before General Conference schools existed and even now. A number of early and later Conference leaders attended schools at Oberlin, Rochester, and Chicago. Some Methodist schools, such as Garrett, have also been chosen, but very few have gone to Presbyterian or Southern Baptist schools as is the case in some other Mennonite groups.

In recent years the Conference has been moving toward a closer and more integrated organization, including headquarters and executive secretaries, all of which was needed, but which also has its distinct dangers.

The Conference began with unity of all Mennonites in America as one of its goals, as is indicated by the very name that was adopted. It has always been in the forefront in inter-Mennonite co-operation, such as hospitals, old people's homes and orphanages, Civilian Public Service, relief work of various kinds, all-Mennonite conventions, and Mennonite cultural conferences.

The fellowship with other Mennonite groups as well as with non-Mennonite Christians, is indicated by the practice of open communion and the former membership in the Federal Council of Churches (q.v.). General Conference ministers usually participate in local interdenominational ministerial associations, and congregations fellowship with others in summer Sunday evening services in most towns where they are located. The colleges regularly employ teachers not only of other Mennonite groups but also some non-Mennonite Christians.

An open fellowship has its dangers. Because of this the Conference has been more open to some of the non-Mennonite ideas and practices that have here and there caused dissension in congregations, such as child evangelism, eternal security, dispensationalism, materialistic millennial interpretations, various Calvinistic, modernistic, and Fundamentalistic interpretations of Scripture, as well as materialistic influences and trends toward worldliness and secularization.

A fourth characteristic of the General Conference Mennonites is a spirit of dynamics or ability to change. Christian respect for personality is the basic assumption of democracy. The respect for the individual personality underlying democracy is of highest value from the Christian point of view. In democratic America, Mennonites were free to reject change and did so. Because of this inertia they were finally in danger of dying. Oberholtzer and his group recognized this and were willing, at considerable cost, to bring about needed revitalization.

In line with this Christian respect for personality most General Conference congregations are giving women as well as men the right to vote. Laymen as well as ministers have a share in the councils of the church. Delegates to conferences are men and women, young and older people, and far more laymen than ordained ministers.

A noticeable change has been taking place from a plural, untrained, unsalaried ministry to a single, salaried, trained minister for each congregation; from an elder in charge of more than one meeting place to an elder for each congregation, and from different levels of ordination as evangelist, preacher, and elder to one full ordination. Socially the Conference has changed from the position that life insurance and political voting were evil and thus to be shunned, to where these are considered not only good, but to be embraced as a Christian duty. The rural-urban trend with all its implications and many other changes are affecting the Conference.

Finally and above all, from the very formation in 1847-60 until now, the General Conference Mennonites have always been characterized by a deep sense of mission. As a part of this sense of mission there has been a strong emphasis on consistent everyday Christian living of every Christian all through the history of the General Conference. It is considered important to believe right, but this faith must also issue in living and doing right. This living right goes deeper and means more than conforming to any outward rules and regulations. Not that one can earn anything in God's sight by living right, but it is an expression of gratitude for salvation through Christ Jesus. He is not only our Saviour but also the Lord of everyday decisions and ordinary living. The Gospel is not only to be brought into all the world geographically, but also to penetrate all levels and areas of personal and corporate life on earth.

Conference Leadership. It is impossible to list all who have served as leaders in Conference affairs in one area or another. Here follows a partial list with some attempt to classify them according to the area in which they rendered outstanding service.

Conference Leaders: P. R. Aeschliman, John B. Baer, J. J. Balzer, Peter Balzer, Jacob Buller, Walter Dyck, Benjamin Ewert, Allen M. Fretz, Dietrich Gaeddert, David Goerz, W. S. Gottshall, Daniel Hege, Michael Horsch, Ephraim Hunsberger, Cornelius Jansen, Jacob H. Jansen, Maxwell Kratz, Christian Krehbiel, Henry J. Krehbiel, Olin Krehbiel, W. W. Miller, John Moser, John H. Oberholtzer, H. D. Penner, Johannes K. Penner, Abraham Ratzlaff, P. K. Regier, Heinrich Richert, P. R. Schroeder, Andrew B. Shelly, Anthony S. Shelly, Christian Schowalter, C. H. A. van der Smissen, I. A. Sommer, Samuel F. Sprunger, Joseph Stucky, Jacob Stucky, L. Sudermann, J. J. Thiessen, David Toews, Emmanuel Troyer, B. Warkentin, P. P. Wedel.

Leaders in Missions, Education, and Publication: Henry J. Brown, N. E. Byers, D. H. Epp, H. H. Ewert, H. A. Fast, I. I. Friesen, S. J. Goering, Mrs. R. A. Goerz, N. B. Grubb, Gustav N. Harder, J. E.

Hartzler, G. A. Haury, Mrs. S. S. Haury, Samuel S. Haury, N. C. Hirschy, Lester Hostetler, Ed. G. Kaufman, Frieda Kaufman, John W. Kliewer, Cornelius Krahn, H. P. Krehbiel, A. E. Kreider, J. H. Langenwalter, J. F. Lehman, Samuel K. Mosiman, S. F. Pannabecker, Peter A. Penner, Peter W. Penner, Rudolphe Petter, Jacob Quiring, L. L. Ramseyer, J. M. Regier, J. G. Rempel, Peter H. Richert, C. J. van der Smissen, C. Henry Smith, J. N. Smucker, J. R. Thiersstein, John Thiessen, John Unruh, Catherine Voth, Henry R. Voth, Abraham Warkentin, C. H. Wedel, D. C. Wedel, Peter J. Wiens.

STATISTICS OF G.C. CONGREGATIONS AND MEMBERSHIP

	Congregations		Membership
District	Conf.	Non-Gen. Conf.	Conf.	Non-Gen. Conf.	Children (Unbaptized)	Total Population
Canadian	49	22	12,810	1,195	28,425	22,430
Central	19	1	3,020	?	642	3,662
Eastern	28	0	4,558	0	1,519	6,077
Middle	20	0	5,258	0	1,951	7,209
Northern	26	5	5,605	395	2,926	8,926
Pacific	21	2	3,280	64	904	4,248
Western	66	0	13,584	0	5,045	18,625
	229	30	*48,115	1,654
South America	5	0	1,989
				48,115
North American Total				49,769	21,412	71,181

* This is not an accurate figure as 6 churches did not report. The total membership is probably somewhat over 50,000. E.K.G.

Constitution of the General Conference Mennonite Church (Newton, 1950); J. W. Fretz, "Reflections at the End of a Century," Menn. Life II (July 1947); General Conference Handbook of Information (Newton, 1956); Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); idem, "The General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America," Menn. Life I (July 1947); H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of Mennonites of North America I (St. Louis, 1898); II (Newton, 1938); S. F. Pannabecker, "The Anabaptist Concept of the Church in the American Mennonite Environment," MQR XXV (January 1951); J. C. Wenger, "Mennonites Establish Themselves in Pennsylvania," Menn Life II (July 1947); S. F. Pannabecker, "The Development of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America in the American Environment" (Yale University Ph.D. dissertation); idem, "John H. Oberholtzer and His Time—A Centennial Tribute 1847-1947," Menn. Life II (July 1947); Paul R. Shelly, Religious Education and Mennonite Piety Among the Mennonites of Southeastern Pennsylvania: 1870-1943 (Newton, 1952); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950); ML I, 29-32.

Geneva (Genève, Genf), a canton of Switzerland, area 107 sq. miles, pop. (1950) 201,505. Its capital, Geneva, lies at the source of the Rhone in Lake Geneva, and has a population of about 124,000. During the Reformation the city was not untouched by the Anabaptist movement, although under the autocratic rule of Calvin (q.v.) it was unable to assert itself.

In 1532 two foreign Anabaptists, tortured at Basel, revealed that the Anabaptists were increasing in number along Lake Geneva; but they were uncertain whether there were any Anabaptists in the city at this time.

In February 1537 two Dutch Anabaptists Herman de Gerbihan and Andry (Andre) Benoit of Engelen in Brabant came to Geneva. They spread their principles, and on May 9 appeared before the Council of Two Hundred and declared their intention to hold a disputation with the reformers. Farel and Calvin, who had already been attacked by many Genevans, took advantage of this opportunity to oppose these foreign adversaries. The council requested them to present their proposals in writing, and when this was done, it decided that the newcomers receive a hearing before the council; for the credulity of the people made it dangerous to hold a public disputation. On May 14 the principles of faith were read aloud; Farel demanded a public discussion, but the councilors objected, saying, "We know well that you will be the victors, but you may be sure the populace will hear the errors of the Anabaptists more greedily than your truths: to proclaim the untruth to the people is sufficient to create a taste for it." Calvin replied, "You are quite right. But if we now refuse the disputation the Anabaptists will boast that we are defeated and do not dare to defend our faith. Of the two evils it is better to choose the lesser." The council finally consented to grant this request of the reformers and also the Anabaptists. The public disputation began May 16, 1537, in the monastery of Riva (de rive) and lasted two days. Without doubt it dealt principally with the question of baptism, the Anabaptists insisting that disciples of Christ may be baptized only when they are capable of giving an account of their faith.

The rug dealers and other persons of rank who made up the council and who believed that they possessed all the knowledge needed to distinguish between doctrines, apparently did not favor this public disputation. On May 18 they met and decided that the disputation would lead to strife rather than to unity and would more likely cause faith to waver than strengthen it; it must therefore be discontinued. These persons should be ordered to leave the city and its canton. All notes taken during the disputation were to be turned in to the city hall and destroyed, lest any of them appear in print. The Anabaptists should no longer be called brethren, because they were not in harmony with the church and were unwilling to worship with its adherents.

The council summoned the two Anabaptists and told them it would be glad to give them a hearing, for it gave everyone a hearing; but because their doctrines were not founded on the Scriptures they must be declared false. It asked them if they were ready to recant, return to God and beg His forgiveness. The Anabaptists replied that thev would in no case recant. On May 19 they were again summoned and questioned. They answered that their conscience did not permit them to take any other position; they were then ordered to leave the city permanently. They betook themselves to the canton of Bern.

On May 30 Johannes Bomeromenus, a printer, and Jean Tordeur (Stordeur), both from Liége, who had declared themselves willing to die in defense of the doctrine that infants should not be baptized, were expelled from the canton.

On Sept. 7 Farel and Calvin notified the authorities of several citizens who persisted in holding Anabaptist ideas. The council decided to prosecute them. On Sept. 11 a dealer in caps, named Guider, who was suspected of Anabaptist ideas, recanted.

Jacob de Lesture, suspected of Anabaptism, refused to appear before the council, and was banished. This sentence was opposed by Georges de Lesclef, Jean Philippe, and the councilor Lullin. On Sept. 28 Jane, a glover, was expelled from the city for life because she persisted in her Anabaptist faith; but on June 7, 1538, after the banishment of Farel and Calvin, the council permitted her to return if she would obey the laws.

In spite of persecutions a considerable number of citizens went over to the Anabaptists: Jean Japin, called Cologny, a citizen of Geneva, one of the originators of the Reformation, made a public statement in favor of the Anabaptists, and was consequently sentenced to a year in prison on bread and water so that he would no longer trouble the preachers.

Two of the declared adherents of Anabaptist doctrine were Jacob de Meraulx and Jean Moynier. Their secret fellow believers were probably numerous, for on Oct. 8, 1537, the council expressly ordered the preachers not actually to refuse the sacraments to the Anabaptists, and to let simple admonition suffice. On Jan. 14, 1538, Farel lamented the victory of several Anabaptists.

The theological discussions with the Anabaptists, by opening people's eyes, produced a ferment among them. Farel and Calvin, feeling themselves deserted by a portion of public opinion, and wishing to execute a great coup, had all the inhabitants subscribe to an orthodox confession of faith in order to separate the sheep from the wolves. But the populace distrusted these measures; and hostile magistrates were appointed, who opposed Farel and Calvin. The conflict grew so serious that the council decided to expel Farel and Calvin. The latter retired to Strasbourg, where he married Idelette de Bure (van Buren) (q.v.), the widow of a Dutch Mennonite, and where he lived until 1541. In the meantime public sentiment in Geneva had changed; friends of Calvin had again come into power and recalled him to organize and lead the new church. Calvin returned as a victor and gave the Genevans a new constitution. By means of these regulations the church attained supreme authority and Calvin was its undisputed head until his death in 1564.

Under the scepter of the all-powerful Calvin, who had Michael Servetus killed at the stake in 1553, and who sternly suppressed any attempt to cause a division in the church, there was obviously no room in Geneva for Anabaptists.

Like Luther and Zwingli, Calvin also attacked the Anabaptists. In one of his works, Bréves instructions pour armer tous bons fidéles contre la secte commune des anabaptistes, dedicated to the preachers in the county of Neuchâtel, he declared, "To write against all the false opinions and errors of the Anabaptists would be so long a story, almost a hell, from which one could not emerge,—for this vermin is different from all other people in that it not only errs in certain points, but has also caused a sea of nonsensical talk." Here are a few additional specimens of Calvin's opinion of the Anabaptists: "They conclude that all use of arms is of the devil. . . . It is certain that it is the intention of these wretched fanatics to condemn all fortifications, munitions, and all bearing of arms. . . . But the Christian not only does not offend God in seizing a weapon, but really has a divine calling to do so, which cannot be refused without blasphemy.—A man who had only an ounce of brain, would he talk like the Anabaptists?—It is easy to see that these unfortunate fanatics will attain no other end than to reduce everything to turmoil, set up community of goods, in spite of the fact that they fully and completely deny it.—Or they will not be content until they have persuaded all rulers to resign, in order to step into their positions and establish themselves there as in an unowned possession.—These unfortunate persons spit out many of the most irrational blasphemies: the government of the councillors is according to the flesh, they say; that of the Christians according to the Spirit.—As concerns the faith which they claim to have, I want to say that they make of themselves enemies of God and of the human race.—These poor insane people accept as revelations from heaven all the fables they have heard their grandmothers tell.—If the animals could speak, they would talk more sensibly than they. These crazy persons want to take the Lord with them in order to have Him quickly defend their idle talk. Their basis for a change in this command (concerning Jesus' teaching on the oath) is an obvious blasphemy; for it would follow from it that Jesus Christ had rescinded that which had been established by God, His Father, which can surely not be tolerated."

He expresses himself similarly in the Traité contre les anabaptistes. But the above citations are sufficient to characterize the work in which Calvin attempts to refute the chief Anabaptist doctrines, such as baptism, oath, discipline, communion, relation to government, the bearing of arms, and the nature of the soul. Theodore von Beza asserted that Calvin was completely victorious in this matter. The reading of these lengthy pages has not made the same impression on us.

It seems that since Calvin's time there has not been a Mennonite church in Geneva. At any rate no trace of any has been found. Not until World War I was there a small contact between Geneva and the Mennonites. In 1912 a French Mennonite, Pierre Kennel, who was the descendant of Bernese

Brethren who were expelled at the end of the 18th century and fled to France, settled in Geneva to enter upon his vocation as a university teacher. As professor at the university he lectured on biology. Then came the war. Proud of being true to his Christian conviction, his social concepts and the inherited traditions, he refused to obey the French mobilization orders. . . . Thereupon on May 7, 1915, the city council and the university demanded that he withdraw from his academic work.

In 1926 about 20 Mennonites were living in Geneva and its vicinity, but without forming an organized congregation. Their names were Geiser, Kennel, Wenger, and Wüttrich. (See Gex.) P.K.

Dean Antoine Gantier, Histoire de Genève; A. Roget, Hist. du peuple de Genève (7 vv., 1870-82); J. R. Gaberel, Histoire de l'Eglise de Genève (3 vv., 1853-62); A. L. Herminjard, Correspondance des reformateurs dans les pays de langue francaise (9 vv.); P. Charpenne, Histoire de la reforme et des Reformateurs de Genève (Paris, 1861); Baroche, Dictionaire historique de la Suisse; Eug. Choisy, La Theocratie à Genève; Calvin, Oppuscules francaise, 579-646; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932) 164; ML II, 66 ff.

Gent (English, Ghent), present capital of the Belgian province of East Flanders, pop. (1949) 166,797, with suburbs 218,328. With the exception of Antwerp no other city in Belgium had as long a list of Anabaptist martyrs as Gent. The Anabaptist and Calvinist martyrbooks together list 110 victims; van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror lists 92 Anabaptist-Mennonite martyrs. The research of V. van der Haeghen published in Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais (The Hague, 1890) proved that the number of victims was much higher, and A. L. E. Verheyden (Het Gentsche Martyrologium 1530-1595, Brugge, 1946), who studied the sources, lists a total of 252 victims, subdivided in five groups: 51 Iconoclasts, 30 Calvinists, 146 Anabaptist-Mennonites, 23 heretics, 2 Lutherans. So the Anabaptist-Mennonites are by far the largest part of the executed. And of 146 Anabaptist-Mennonite martyrs no fewer than 105 or 72 per cent were burned at the stake; of the Calvinists only 23 per cent were executed in this cruel way. K. Vos (in ML II, 69) stated the surprising fact that the names of the victims found in the official records at times greatly differ from those mentioned in the Offer des Heeren and the later martyrbooks, including the Martyrs' Mirror. He concluded:

"This deviation is in part explained by the use of secret names. For many of these martyrs the names are scarcely known. For instance, in 41 cases the principal source of our knowledge is a song composed on their death by a poet of Gent; it is found in the Offer des Heeren, 649-54, and includes martyrs of 1562-69, according to eyewitness accounts. The song was already printed by 1577. It contains a few errors because the poet had to rely entirely on his memory. A second song, Offer des Heeren, 556-59, lists 12 martyrs of 1559. A song found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569 reveals that these martyrs were betrayed by a Beguine and arrested while they were eating a meal."

Verheyden made a thorough study of the materials; although the records of the sentences are incomplete (until 1538, during 1540-55 and 1568-71 lacking), Verheyden by using other old books and documents succeeded in procuring a nearly complete list. The first Anabaptist martyr of Gent, Willem Mulaer, was executed on July 15, 1535; the last ones, Bartholomeus Panten and Michiel de Cleercq, both suffered death on Sept. 15, 1592. The most important martyrs and leaders of the congregation were Hans van Overdam and Hans Keeskooper (d. 1551), Claes de Praet (d. 1556), Joost de Tollenaar (d. 1589), and Michiel de Cleercq (d. 1592).

There must have been an important and at times very numerous congregation at Gent. Anabaptists may have been at Gent as early as 1530, and very likely a congregation came into existence soon after. Not much is known of this congregation. Occasionally the trials of the martyrs supply some facts, and it is mostly from the official records and the martyrbooks that its history is known. They used to meet in secret places, sometimes in the houses of members, sometimes also in grainfields or wooded spots in the neighborhood of the city, usually in numbers not larger than 25 or 30. Meetings are said to have been held every day.

During the first period (1530-40) a certain revolutionary spirit seems to have prevailed in the congregation: this fact can be concluded from the deaconship of Mahieu Wagens (executed Aug. 15, 1538), a revolutionary. But in general the church followed the paths of the movement in Holland, those of a peaceful Anabaptism-Mennonitism. David Joris, who visited the Gent congregation, had scarcely an adherent in this congregation. The congregation—also in the following periods—seems to have consisted more of refugees seeking shelter here rather than of citizens of Gent.

In the following period (1540-73) the congregation was usually served by outside elders from Antwerp or even from Holland, e.g., Gillis van Aken, Cornelis Claissone from Leiden, Jan van de Walle, Christiaen (may be identical with Chr. Janssens Langedul from Antwerp) and Joachim Vermeeren from Antwerp, later also Hans Busschaert, Paulus van Meenen, and Hendrik van Arnhem. Of great blessing were the sojourns of Leenaert Bouwens at Gent. He visited the congregation several times in 1554-56 and 1557-61 and baptized 116 or 129 persons here.

The congregation of Gent had its own preachers and deacons, but no elder of its own. That they desperately wanted one is shown by a letter written by Adriaen van Kortrijk to the church of Antwerp in the name of the principal Flemish congregations. In this letter, which is undated but must have been written about 1545, Adriaen points out that the congregation is like a flock of sheep without a shepherd; the congregations of Flanders are all said to be young, and have too infrequently been visited by elders from Holland. So Adriaen insists that a bishop be sent. It is not known whether this request was granted. The time of prosperity of the church about 1550 was at the same time a period of terrible martyrdom. Many members were executed and many left the city, fleeing to England

(London), Holland (especially Haarlem), and Emden in East Friesland.

In 1566 rising Calvinism became active in Gent; in this year a number of Catholic churches were plundered and images of saints destroyed. The Mennonites, maintaining their principle of nonresistance, did not co-operate with the Calvinist iconoclasts. Notwithstanding their nonparticipation they were terribly persecuted in 1567-73 during the reactionary and implacable Catholic government of the Duke of Alba: within those six years no fewer than 49 members were put to death. The congregation, which is said to have numbered 400 members in 1567, greatly decreased in the following years, both by execution and flight. But church life was still very active; secret meetings continued, and a solid organization is proved by the activity of the deacons.

In 1577-84 Calvinism reigned in Gent. Under the supremacy of the Calvinist government the Mennonite congregation too had a time of rest and security; no one was executed, only a few were banished from the city. But equality with the Calvinist church was not yet obtained: Calvinism considered the Mennonites as heretics just as Roman Catholicism had done before. This is proved from the fact that a debate between Calvinist and Mennonite leaders held in the fall of 1581 was fruitless; and a request of the Mennonites presented to the city government in February 1582 to obtain the use of one of the former Catholic churches taken over by the Calvinists was refused.

The Calvinist government lasted only a few years. In September 1584 the Spanish Stadholder Alexander Farnese conquered the city and the Calvinist magistrates were replaced by Roman Catholics. The new government was rather moderate toward the Calvinists, permitting them, if they wanted to keep their faith, to sell their property and leave the city. But the Mennonites, whose number is said to have been "not small," usually were handled with less moderation. So persecution again came over the congregation. A number of its members died as martyrs, others escaped and came to Holland. On March 15, 1585, nine Mennonites were arrested in the home of Jan de Cleercq. They were probably all deacons, constituting the board of the congregation of Gent. In 1589 and 1592 all the leaders of the congregation were in prison and suffered martyrdom. Then all records become silent; but the congregation still existed. It was led by a deacon preacher, who sometimes received gifts from Holland for the poor and the relatives of those who had been put to death, and who also preached if conditions made it possible to have a meeting. Though there is little positive information extant, the congregation continued to live; in 1609 an elder of Haarlem visited the church of Gent. The members were no longer living in the city, for the meeting was held at Lovendegem, a village near Gent. Here, as well as in Zomergem, another village in the neighborhood, Mennonites continued to meet. Until 1629 they met at Zomergem in a loft. But in this year a house was adapted for the meetings, which soon proved to be too small for the number of members. In this time most members were rather well-to-do merchants. Their preacher was Jacob van Maldegem and twice a year an elder came over from the Dutch province of Zeeland. They also participated in the meetings which were held at Aardenburg, just across the border on Dutch territory. For a number of years this congregation had held its meetings without attracting the attention of the government, but in 1630 the magistrates became aware of it; then it became impossible to hold meetings and about 1634 the congregation was dissolved. Its members migrated to the Netherlands; most of them settled in Aardenburg and Middelburg in the province of Zeeland.

While the congregation of Gent was still in existence the quarrels arose in the Netherlands which divided the Mennonites into different groups—Waterlanders, Flemish, and Frisians. These differences did not stir up the church in Flanders as they did the Dutch congregations. Yet there were in Gent two separate congregations—one, likely the largest, Flemish, and one Waterlander. Representatives of the latter were present at the Waterlander meeting at Amsterdam in March 1581, where it was decided that Albrecht Verspeck should visit the Gent congregation. Further particulars about the differences were not available. vdZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "De Doopsgezinden te Gent 1530-1630," in Bijdragen tot de Gesch. en de Oudheidkunde van Gent (1943) 97-130; idem, "Een Episode uit de Gentsche Kerkhervorming (June 1566-February 1567)," in Rapport-Bulletin van de Vereeniging v. Gesch. van het Belgische Protestantisme (Brussels, 1945, reprint); idem, Het Gentsche Martyrologium (Brugge, 1946); DB 1877, 80, 82, 87; 1884, 57 note 2; ML II, 68-71.

Gent, Carel van: see Carel van Gent.

Gent, Een Liedeken van XIJ vrienden van, is found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (reprint BRN II, 556-59). It begins "Ick moet een liet beginnen dat sal ick gaen heffen aen." In this song 12 martyrs executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1559 are celebrated. Their names are not found in the song itself, but a marginal note reads: for the names see the confession of Hans de Vette.

The 12 martyrs were Peter Coerten from Meenen, Kaerle Tancreet from Nipkercke, Proentgen his wife from Belle, Jacob Spillebout, Abraham Tancreet, and Maeyken Floris from Nipkercke, Anthonis van Cassele, Hans de Smit, and Marcus his brother, Hans de Vette and Miertgen his wife from Waestene, and Tanneken, wife of Hans de Smet.

This song (also found in Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 71) was found already in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. Another song celebrating these martyrs, "Een eeuwighe Vruecht die niet en vergaet," is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. For particulars about the 12 martyrs, see Verheyden, Gent, and related articles in this ENCYCLOPEDIA. vdZ.

Gent, Een liedeken van XLI vrienden binnen Gent gedoot tusschen tjaar LXIJ ende LXIX, is an old martyr song, beginning "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert Jaer/ ende tweeentsestich mede/ sachmen te Gent dits openbaer/ vrome Christenen ontleden." The song is included in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1578 (second edition of this year) and following editions. It is reprinted in BRN II, 649-54. Between a devotional preface and epilogue the 41 martyrs are briefly mentioned. The names were collected from various sources; they were copied by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror. Occasionally mistakes were made both in the names and the years of martyrdom, as has been proved by A. L. E. Verheyden's study of the sources (see Gent). vdZ.

Gentman, Cornelis (1617-96), a Dutch Reformed minister at Utrecht, who stemmed from a Mennonite refugee family from Flanders, was the moving force in 1659 in the city government's persecution of the Dutch Mennonite preachers Goris van Aldendorp, Arent van Heuven, Johan Andries van Aken, and Willem van Maurick. This dispute gave him occasion to publish several hate-filled booklets. Gentman is thought to be the author of the 12 questions on the basis of which the Mennonites of Utrecht (in 1655 and 1661), Deventer (1669), and Middelburg (1665) were to be examined by the city governments. The questions are found in Blaupot t. C., Groningen II, 205-13. (Biogr. Wb. III, 214-15; DB 1916, 156, 163, 180, 189; ML II, 71.) K.V., vdZ.

Gentner, Hans, of Sulzfeld in the government district of Eppingen in Baden, Germany, where the parson Gallus, a friend of Johannes Brenz (q.v.), had early turned to the Reformation together with his patron, Göler von Ravensberg, was won to Anabaptism by Philip Plener (q.v.) and Blasius Kuhn (q.v.) or Kumauf, who had been very active in and around Bruchsal. With Plener he went to Moravia and served as a preacher under the Philipites. But when he became acquainted with the principles of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia he left the Philipites and joined the Hutterites. Among the Philipites his withdrawal aroused great offense, which found expression in Blasius Kuhn's accusation that Gentner had not been honest with money entrusted to him. He must have succeeded in acquitting himself, for he received a position of confidence among the Hutterian Brethren.

In 1539 Gentner was sent to his former friends in Württemberg and the Palatinate with the prayers of his brethren. In Malsch (Wiesloch district), in co-operation with Wendel Metzger of Heidelsheim, he baptized men and women, some of whom were imprisoned. This mission indicates that he must have been an ordained minister. The brotherhood was so well pleased by his success that in 1540 they sent him again to the Swabian Unterland and to Württemberg, then into northern Württemberg, the near-by Palatinate, and Baden. This time he succeeded in persuading a considerable number to emigrate to Moravia. In 1541 he was again sent to Württemberg and also to Hesse.

The high regard of the brotherhood for Gentner was revealed in 1542. The charge of moral misconduct brought against Christoph Gschäl, a missionary in Carinthia, compelled the brotherhood to have a conference of preachers summoned by the new bishop, Leonhard Lanzenstiel, and his assistant Gentner, whereupon Gschäl was expelled from the brotherhood.

Another journey to Württemberg in 1543 with the deacon Michael Kramer brought Gentner into serious difficulty. He met a number of Schwenckfeldians, who believed that Jesus brought His flesh from heaven and did not receive it from Mary. Their leader was Jörg Nörlinger. Since their doctrine in general was in harmony with that of the Hutterian Brethren, Gentner, on the advice of Kramer, remained silent on this point, for he hoped that their peculiar ideas would naturally disappear if they joined the brotherhood in Moravia. But when Nörlinger arrived in Moravia and tried to come to an agreement with the elders, he stated that Gentner had not opposed him on this point. Hans Feuerbach, a recent convert, was then sent to Württemberg to summon Gentner and Kramer to Moravia. Gentner was deprived of his preaching office and Kramer was also punished (Geschicht-Buch, 190-93).

Gentner, however, soon regained the confidence of the brotherhood. For in 1545 he was sent with Georg Liebich (q.v.), who had proved his faithfulness in a long prison term at Innsbruck, to Silesia, to inform Gabriel Ascherham's numerous adherents (about 300) that the Gabrielites had joined the Hutterites after the excommunication of their leader.

In 1548 Gentner died in Schäckowitz, a half mile from Auspitz. The Geschicht-Buch (242) calls him "a faithful servant of the Word of God and His Church," who "had to endure much sorrow and many a struggle and battle for the sake of the Lord." G.Bo.

Ztscht für die Gesch. des Oberrheins, 1905, 75; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 193; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; ML II, 71 f.

Georg von Chur: see Blaurock, Georg.

Georg van Pare, an Anabaptist martyr, a Dutch physician who lived in London and was burned at the stake there in 1551. Zur Linden counts him among the Melchiorites who fled to Holland. Georg Weber calls him a unitarian. NEFF.

F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem and Leipzig, 1885) 419; G. Weber, Gesch. der Altkatholischen Kirchen und Sekten in Grossbritannien II (Leipzig, 1845) 106; ML III, 335.

George I (1660-1727), King of Great Britain and Ireland 1714-27, the son of Duke Ernst August of Hannover and Princess Sophie of the Palatinate, a granddaughter of James I of England. This German prince on the English throne was especially interested in the oppressed Mennonites in Switzerland and the Palatinate. Shortly after his coronation he tried to aid the Mennonites who, persecuted and imprisoned by the Swiss government at Bern, were finally released through the mediation of Dutch Mennonites and for the most part settled in the Palatinate. George I issued an urgent invitation to the Mennonites in the Palatinate to settle in the English colonies of America, offering them favorable terms for their transportation. To each family settling west of the Alleghenies in Pennsylvania he offered a gift of 50 acres of land and the permission to cultivate as much additional land as they wished without making any payments for ten years, after which period a small rental was to be paid (Cassel, 278). In 1717 a conference of elders at Mannheim decided to accept the offer and settle in America. In March 100 persons, led by Elder Benedikt Brechbiehl (q.v.), emigrated and were followed three weeks later by 300 more. No further emigrations of Palatine Mennonites took place until after George's death. Hege.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 2254-56; W. A. Knittle, Early Eighteenth Century Palatine Emigration (Philadelphia, 1937); C. H. Smith, Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929); D. K. Cassel, Gesch. der Mennoniten (Philadelphia, 1890); ML II, 72.

George Christian, Prince of East Friesland, Germany, 1660-65, brother of Enno Ludwig (q.v.), granted the Mennonites a letter of protection June 2, 1660, upon payment of 1,000 talers and a so-called gift of 100 ducats to his wife, Christine Charlotte, a princess of Württemberg. The Uckowallists (q.v.), who had on May 29 requested a letter of protection like that granted by Enno Ludwig, received it on June 26 upon payment of 500 talers. New extortions followed. During the brief reign of the prince the Mennonites were fined 1,200 talers for performing a baptism, which they felt they were entitled to do on the basis of the letter of protection. George's son Eberhard Christian was born posthumously. During the latter's minority his mother reigned, following the pattern her husband had set in regard to the Mennonites. (ML II, 72.) Neff.

George Frederick (1539-1603), Margrave of Brandenburg, at Ansbach and Bayreuth, Germany, a zealous promoter of Lutheranism and rigorous opponent of Anabaptism. When he took over the reign of the duchy of Prussia from his feeble-minded cousin Albrecht Friedrich, the Mennonites there requested permission to settle in Königsberg and other cities and towns. He replied in the decree of Jan. 8, 1579, that it was his duty as a Christian ruler and for him a matter of conscience to see to it that unity of faith prevailed among his subjects, as the constitution of the land already specified. But the confession of faith presented by the Mennonites showed that in many points they did not have the true Christian faith, also in the matter of police and the family they did not agree with the Augsburg Confession or the Prussian corpus doctrinae, and primarily in the holy sacrament of infant baptism their attitude was very offensive. Therefore the prince was unable to grant their request; instead all Anabaptists were to leave the country by the first of May (Mannhardt, Wehrfreiheit, 110). This mandate was renewed and intensified in 1585 and Nov. 12, 1586, making it punishable by death and confiscation of goods for any "who would not adhere to the church books of the country" to remain in the country; but the tradesman was to have free access by water or land to carry on his business (Hartknoch, 497). These mandates were evidently not strictly enforced, for Mennonitism maintained itself in the duchy of Prussia. Neff.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); Hartknoch, Preussische Kirchen-Historia (Frankfurt, 1686); ML II, 73 f.

George the Bearded (1471-1539), Duke of Saxony, in 1500 assumed the reign over the Saxon-Albertine hereditary lands in Germany. He opposed the Reformation. Nevertheless the new doctrine managed to spread in his realm.

He was particularly severe in his measures against the Anabaptists, whom he wished to wipe out. Under the influence of Johann Eck (q.v.), he was one of the most fanatical opponents of Anabaptism in the era of the Reformation (Gess, 811). On Dec. 31, 1527, he issued a Draconian mandate against "the old, damned heresy of the Anabaptists" (according to Jacobs, 426, reprinted in Codex Augusteus, the great Saxon collection of laws, I, 433 ff., and Wappler, Thüringen, 266). Since death was the penalty for adhering to the doctrine of adult baptism, the Anabaptists avoided publicity, propagating their faith silently (Jacobs, 426). It is supposed that the Anabaptists withdrew in part into the Schwarzburg district of Frankenhausen (Jacobs, 430).

But the movement was not broken in Saxony, as is apparent from the fact that Duke George issued a new mandate against the Anabaptists Dec. 23, 1534. It surpasses all previous mandates issued against the Anabaptists in Germany and Austria by its base appeal to the avarice of the populace. Not only the clergy, but also secular officials and all subjects were urged to co-operate in the persecution of the Anabaptists. Anyone who considered infant baptism and the sacraments as naught or expressed himself unfavorably about them, and on the other hand recognized baptism of believers and "similar unchristian ideas" as correct, should be drowned; if there was no suitable water at hand he was to be beheaded; his property should be confiscated. Life and possessions were already lost "if they cannot deny that they have written seriously about it or taken part in it and not opposed it." Even by recanting they could not save life or property. The entire population was challenged to participate in this religious persecution. Anyone who seems lax in the capture of persons suspected of Anabaptism shall be punished; anyone who on the other hand distinguishes himself shall be rewarded with one third of the property of the condemned one. (Codex Augusteus I, 433-36; Jacobs, 438; Wappler, Thüringen, 383.) This mandate became in part a pattern for the extension of the later imperial laws of 1544 and 1551 against the Anabaptists. Thus no alternative remained for the Anabaptists, in consideration of their relatives and friends, than to seek out infertile regions and live for their faith in solitude; many hid in the depths of the Hohenstein Harz and in the desolate "Schraubishain," also called Schraubenstein, east of Sangerhausen between Riestedt Blanckenhain and Beiernaumburg, where they lived under the open sky and assembled for worship from far and near (Jacobs, 439).

The measures of persecution undertaken by Duke George were not limited to his own realm. He was also the moving power in the annihilation of the Anabaptists in the region of Quedlinburg, as well as in the counties of Mansfeld, Schwarzburg, Stolberg, and Hohnstein in the south Harz. Most zealous in the pursuit of Anabaptists was George's cousin, Cardinal Albrecht; in Halberstadt he discovered two families in September 1535 (Knobloch and Heune), who had left the forest to avoid the inclement weather because of the expected confinement of the mothers. The statements of the prisoners reveal the high moral standards required of the Anabaptists and their deeply felt religious faith. They died as martyrs to their faith. In the following years further executions followed, which are ascribed to the personal intervention of the duke (Jacobs, 493; Wappler, Inquisition, 91). Even those who would have recanted found no mercy. Anabaptists who had recanted but had again left the Catholic Church had their hands cut off before drowning (Wappler, Thüringen, 161 and 430). The duke "considered the substitution of death by the sword for death by fire as adequate clemency" (Dollinger).

George later learned from experience what it means to have one's family dispersed by death. The last years of his life were saddened by the death in rapid succession of his wife (1534) and nine children. For grief he let his beard grow, thus acquiring the epithet "the Bearded." His inheritance, which he had wished to give Ferdinand of Bohemia, went to his brother Henry, who introduced the Reformation in the duchy. From now on nothing is heard of Anabaptist executions in the country. HEGE.

E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins für Gesch. und Altertumskunde XXXII (Wernigerode, 1899); P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913); idem, Inquisition und Täuferprozesse in Zwickau zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1908); F. Gess, Akten und Briefe zur Kirchenpolitik Herzog Georgs von Sachsen II (Berlin, 1917); R. Dollinger, "Memminger Sektenbewegungen im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert," in Ztscht für bayrische Kirchengesch. XII (1937) 131; H. Becker, Herzog Georg von Sachsen als kirchlicher und theologischer Schriftsteller (Leipzig, 1928); H. von Welk, Georg der Bärtige (Braunschweig, 1899); ML II, 73.

Georges Bare (Barre), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, on Feb. 5, 1556. Bare was quite impetuous, for in prison he broke an image of the Virgin off the wall. His brother, who was Catholic, visited him in prison and sought to deflect him from his faith, but in vain. The efforts of the Catholic churchmen as well as torture were likewise fruitless. Bare remained steadfast in his faith. After a month of solitary confinement he was executed. His property was confiscated. Bare was born near Rijssel (Lille) in France and lived in Kortrijk. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 32, No. 4.) vdZ.

Georges, E. F., a Dutch artist who in 1849 made a bust of Menno Simons, following a painted portrait, formerly the property of Marten Schagen (q.v.), and now found in the room of the church board at Utrecht (DB 1890, 75). vdZ.

Geraert (Geert) Passamentwerker (official name, Geraerdt Franssens), an Anabaptist martyr of Thienen, Belgium, was burned at the stake at Antwerp on Dec. 16, 1558. He remained steadfast in his suffering and is celebrated in the song "Aenhoort Godt Hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 16). vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 454, 466; XIV, 24-25, No. 273; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML III, 384.

Geraert Sieryns, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist, is named in the last stanza as the author of the hymn "Mijn heer, mijn God, mijn Vader, groot van machten" (My Lord, my God, my Father, great of power), found in the Dutch hymnbook Het Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. (Wolkan, Lieder, 70.) vdZ.

Gerbel, Nikolaus (d. 1560), a humanist and convinced Lutheran, professor of law at the University of Strasbourg, Alsace. To him is frequently ascribed a booklet described as nonextant, De anabaptistarum ortu et progressu. It is erroneously referred to in Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Berlin, 1821) by Reiswitz and Wadzeck (231), where it is confused with a work by Joh. Gast (q.v.). Büchle considers it doubtful that Gerbel wrote the booklet mentioned above. It is his opinion that the assumption is based on a false interpretation of the passage in Zeltner's Theatrum concerning Gerbel's rare book, Novum Testamentum Graece ed. Nicolaus Gerbelius, Hagenoae, in aedibus Thomae Anshelmi Mentio Martio. Anno salutis 1521. This can, however, hardly be the case, for this work appeared in 1521, before there were any Anabaptists. Wilhelm Horning evidently has no knowledge of Büchle's book. He says (p. 33): "Concerning the origin and spread of the Anabaptists, Gerbel wrote De anabaptistarum ortu et progressu. This booklet has disappeared (Geigel should probably be Geiger). Here—he writes on one occasion—all is quiet and peaceful. Two Anabaptists, Hoffmann and Hieronymus Frei, are still held in prison. I do not hear, however, that their ideas are improving. Each holds obstinately to his opinion." NEFF.

A. Büchle, Der Humanist Nikolaus Gerbel aus Pforzheim (Durlach, 1886); W. Horning, Humanist Nikolaus Gerbel, Förderer der lutherischen Ref. in Strassburg (1485-1560) (Strasbourg, 1918); Varrentrap, Nicolaus Gerbel (Strasbourg, 1901); ML II, 74.

Gerbens, a Mennonite family at Grouw, Dutch province of Friesland. Ruurd Gerbens, after 1680 elder of the Jan Jacobsgezinden at Leeuwarden, wrote Korte Belijdenisse des Christelijken Geloofs . . . (Leeuwarden, 1698, 2nd ed. Groningen, 1717; see Biogr. Wb. III, 216). In Grouw during the 18th century this family belonged to the Groote Huys (Waterlander) congregation. There some of them were deacons; e.g., Sjoerd Gerbens, who was among the first Mennonites to take a government office (1795) and who was an ancestor of the Binnerts (q.v.) family. About 1800 some members of this family adopted Grouw as their family name.

Ruurd Gerbens van Grouw (d. 1806), likely a brother of Sjoerd, was a preacher of his home church 1763-97; in 1797 he moved to Berlikum. In 1796-1806 he served the congregation of Molkwerum, where he was the last untrained minister. (DB 1895, 116.)

Tjalling Gerbens van Grouw (another brother?) served the congregation of Zutfen 1762-63, Middelharnis 1764-70, and den Hoorn on the island of Texel from 1770 until his death in 1810 (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1971-75, 2112-15, 2117, 2417; DB 1873, 145; 1881, 49). Cornelis Gerbens van Grouw, apparently another brother, served as preacher at Berlikum in 1783-90 and at Pieterzijl 1790 - ca. 1812.

Joannes Gerbens van Grouw was a (untrained) preacher of Berlikum 1754-60, Dokkum 1760-71, and De Rijp 1771-79. He died in 1779 of an epidemic raging in this town (DB 1917, 22, 61).

Romke Gerbens (another brother?), who later assumed the family name of Zuiderbaan, served in 1785-93 as a (untrained) minister in his home church (Groote Huys) at Grouw. He was active in the political movement of the Patriots and came in conflict with the district government and fled to Emden. Here, though he was already at an advanced age, he attended the Latin school, then studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and served the congregation of (unknown) 1797-1802 and of Blokzijl from 1802 until his death in 1803. Other ministers of this family were Kornelis Gerbens van Grouw, about whom nothing further is known, and Gerben Kornelisz van Grouw (died after 1815), preacher at Berlikum 1783-? and Pieterzijl 1790- ca. 1812. vdZ.

F. H. Pasma, De Doopsgezinden te Grouw (Grouw, 1930) 16 ff.; several issues of Naamlijst.

Gerber (Gärber, Garber, Garver), a Mennonite family originating near Langnau, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The name denotes the occupation of tanner. There are two very old tanning establishments in Langnau today. The Langnau Gerber family is one of the most numerous in the canton of Bern today.

Members of the Gerber family who were Mennonites left the Emmental for the Jura as early as the middle of the 16th century. This family figured in all of the Swiss Mennonite migrations and especially the one directed to Wayne County, Ohio, 1817 ff. Some of the leading Mennonite farmers and preachers of the Jura bear the name today.

Wälti Gerber of Röthenbach was one of the earliest and most prominent Anabaptist ministers in the Emmental, taking part in the disputation at Bern in March 1538. He preached fearlessly, although forbidden to do so by the state, and baptized many. He was imprisoned at Burgdorf, escaped, but was captured and executed at Bern on July 30, 1566.

This name has been represented in the ministry in the Jura and Emmental from early times to the present. Michael Gerber, a deacon living in the Jura, emigrated to Wayne County, Ohio, in 1822 and became the ancestor of most of the Gerbers in that area. Christen Gerber from Giebel near Langnau, ordained to the ministry in 1821, became influenced by the preaching of Samuel Fröhlich and helped lead half of the Emmental congregation to form the first congregation of Neutäufer (see Apostolic Christian Church).

About 1735 three Mennonite Gerbers came to America from Switzerland, and settled in Lancaster Co., Pa., and in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, where the name was changed to Garber. In York Co., Pa., the Garber Church was erected in 1814. In Virginia many members of this family have united with the Church of the Brethren.

The name Gerber was common among the Amish of Alsace during the 18th and 19th centuries. Their descendants (some of whom use the form Garber) are to be found today in Ontario, Indiana, Ohio, Kansas, Illinois, and Missouri.

Today there are seven Mennonite ministers in Switzerland who bear the name Gerber. The present (1954) president of the Swiss Mennonite conference is Elder Samuel Gerber.

Seven brothers named Gerber who lived at Les Joux near Les Genevez in the Bernese Jura became outstanding farmers and leaders in their community from 1870 to 1930. Their story as well as picture was published in several Swiss agricultural periodicals at the beginning of the century.

D.L.G.

In July 1711, when a large number of Bernese Mennonites were expelled to the Netherlands, there were a number of Gerbers among them. Hans Gerber, a preacher of the Reist (see Reist, Hans) congregation in the Emmental, refused to go; he was arrested and sentenced to the galleys (q.v.). Peter Gerber of Langnau left the ship at Breisach, Germany, returned to Switzerland, was arrested there and chained; apparently he was also sent to the galleys. One of the Swiss Mennonites who came to the Netherlands was Claas (Nicolaas) Gerber, who served the "Nieuwe Zwitsers" (q.v.) as preacher in 1739-61. vdZ.

E. P. Gerber, Descendants of Deacon Michael Gerber, 1763-1938 (Kidron, Ohio, 1938); Gem.-Kal. 1924, 77; 1925, 87; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) passim (see index, 210); Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottdale, 1937) 119-20, 125-26; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1317, 1322, 1334, 1352-54, 1358 f.; J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890), see Index, 124. ML II, 74 f.

Gerber, Johann, known as Stockhannes (1838-July 8, 1918), living "im Stock" near Langnau, Switzerland, of a well-to-do farmer family. Shortly after 1870 Gerber, who until then was a "worldly man," was converted. In August 1875 he was ordained as preacher of the large but decadent congregation of the Emmental, and was soon after appointed elder. Through his piety, his love for the church, and his activity he greatly built up the congregation. Two meetinghouses, at Kehr in 1888 and in Bowil-Bomatt in 1899, were built during his eldership. Johann Gerber, though a man of little education, was a great blessing to the Mennonite church. The Martyrs'

Mirror and the faithful loyalty of the martyrs were always a powerful inspiration for him. vdZ.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, n.d.-1932) 478; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 118.

Gerber, Samuel, a son of Jacob and Catherine (Ropp) Gerber, was born near Carlock, McLean Co., Ill., Sept. 8, 1863. As a boy he moved with his mother to the vicinity of Tremont, Tazewell Co., Ill. He was married to Magdalena Sears of Tiskilwa, Ill., Dec. 30, 1886. Two sons and three daughters were born to them. He was a member of the Pleasant Grove Amish Mennonite congregation, near Tremont, was ordained to the ministry there on May 2, 1897, and ordained bishop May 21, 1911. He was also bishop of the Hopedale (Ill.) congregation 1921-25, and a number of other congregations in the Western A.M. Conference. He served as secretary or assistant secretary of the Western A.M. Conference 1902-05 and 1908, assistant moderator 1911, 1912, and 1920, moderator 1913-19. He was on the merger committee which effected the dissolution of Western A.M. Conference and the reorganization of Mennonite district conferences west of Indiana 1920-21, moderator of the merged Illinois Mennonite Conference 1925, secretary of the Mennonite General Conference 1907, and member of the first Illinois District Mission Board. He was also active in evangelistic work. He was a farmer throughout his life near Groveland, Tazewell Co., Ill. He died Oct. 28, 1929, and was buried in Pleasant Grove Mennonite Cemetery near Tremont. N.P.S.

Harry S. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois, 1829-1929 (Goshen, 1931) 607.

Gerber, Wälti, of Röthenbach, a Swiss Anabaptist martyr, a respected and outstanding Swiss Brethren preacher in the Emmental, attended a disputation in Bern in 1538, presumably the great disputation of March, records of which are in the state archives. These records name "Welltti Gerwer" in a list of Swiss and Bavarian Anabaptists. He escaped from prison with the aid of an Anabaptist locksmith of Burgdorf. He remained true to his faith and preached and baptized. He stressed the teaching that the Christian cannot be a ruler. The Bernese government was not able to apprehend him until they offered a reward of 100 guilders for his capture; he was executed July 30, 1566.

In the first edition of the Martyrs' Mirror (1660), van Braght does not name Wälti Gerber, although he must have known of his death from a letter written by the elders of Alsace, listing 42 martyrs in the canton of Bern. He omitted the names of the Bernese martyrs of 1566 intentionally, for he feared "it might cause them (the brethren in Bern) greater persecution, from which they are not yet entirely free." But he is listed in the German edition of Ephrata (q.v.) in 1748. A.-T.

A. Fluri, Täuferhinrichtungen in Bern im 16. Jahrhundert (Berner Heim 1896, 301); Chronik of Haller and Müslin (Zofingen) 111; Müller, Berner Täufer, 75; Th. de Quervain, Kirchliche und Soziale Zustände in Bern . . . (Bern, 1906) 150, 156; "Acta des gesprächs zwüsschen predikanten unnd Touffbruderenn . . ." in Bern archives; ML II, 75.

Gerbert, Camill (1860-1918), studied at the universities of Strasbourg, Zürich, and Tübingen; in 1886 he was made pastor in Saarebourg (Lorraine) and in 1898 accepted a call to Biebrich a. Rh. At the outbreak of World War I he went to Belgium as a chaplain. In January 1918, at the request of his congregation, he returned to Biebrich, where he died May 27, 1918. He is the author of the meritorious work, Geschichte der Strassburger Sektenbewegung zur Zeit der Reformation 1525-1534 (Strasbourg, 1889). It is based on thorough research in the sources and is a valuable study of Anabaptism in Strasbourg, though it is now superseded, especially by Hulshof's (q.v.) work. The author's viewpoint is that of the Protestant Church, but he treats the Anabaptists with a refreshing objectivity, even though he does not do justice to some individual leaders like Hans Denk. The book marks great progress from the research done by T. Wilhelm Röhrich; therein lies its lasting significance. NEFF.

A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Gesch. der Strassburger Wiedertäufer in den Jahren 1527 bis 1543," in Ztscht f. d. Hist. Theol., 1860; ML II, 75.

Gerbéviller, a town eight miles south of Lunéville, France, where a Mennonite congregation was formed in 1908. It was, however, short-lived. Until 1914 the elders Pierre Sommer and Joseph Schmouker served it. After the outbreak of World War I religious services were omitted, for the region lay in the battle area. The town was completely destroyed, and most of the Mennonites moved away. (ML II, 75.) HEGE.

Gerbrand (Gerbrandt), a Mennonite family name occurring first in 1711 in Danzig, 1727 in the Danzig area, especially at Einlage and Walldorf. Before World War II there were only nine Mennonites with this name, who lived in the region of Elbing and Thiensdorf-Rosenbart. Jakob Gerbrandt of the Ufa (q.v.) settlement in Russia was appointed as traveling elder about 1910, and served widely scattered settlements in Siberia with baptismal services, ordinations, and communion. John Gerbrandt (q.v.) was an elder of the Drake Mennonite Church, and his son Jakob Gerbrandt is secretary of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization. H.P.

G. E. Reimer, Die Familennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940).

Gerbrandt, Jakob, from Grossweide, Molotschna, Russia, attended Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., 1897-1902, and returned to Russia where he became an itinerant minister of the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz (General Conference) for the Mennonite settlements in the province of Ufa and in Siberia. He was an elder at Barnaul, Siberia. Nothing is known of his later life and work. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 716, 718; Unser Blatt I, 45.) C.K.

Gerbrandt, John (1854-1938), a Mennonite (GCM) elder and leader, the son of Johann and Katharina Gerbrandt, was born Dec. 23, 1854, in Schwiniar, near Gombin, Poland, his ancestors having come from Marienwerder, West Prussia. He was baptized and received into membership of the Wymysle Mennonite Church in Poland by Elder Gerhard Bartel. In the spring of 1875 he immigrated to the United States with his parents and two sisters, settling in Marion Co., Kan., a mile north of the present town of Hillsboro. On Dec. 26, 1880, he married Helena Klassen of the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church east of Newton. To this union seven children were born.

He was an active member of the Johannesthal Mennonite Church north of Hillsboro (GCM). In 1887 he was called to the ministry and on Dec. 22, 1890, he was ordained elder of his church. He also took an active part in organizing the Friedensthal Mennonite Church north of Durham, Kan.

In 1904 he joined a land inspection delegation to Saskatchewan, where free homesteads of 160 acres were being offered by the Canadian government. He selected homesteads not only for himself and his two sons, but also for a number of relatives and church members in what is now the Drake, Sask., district. He emigrated to Saskatchewan with his family in 1905 and was followed by a number of families from Kansas and Oklahoma. On Feb. 12, 1906, he organized the North Star Mennonite Church at Drake with 20 charter members, and became its first elder. These charter members came from the Johannesthal, Bruderthal (Kan.), and Alva, Okla., churches. By 1931, after 25 years, the membership had risen to 277.

Gerbrandt took a keen interest in the educational and conference activities of the General Conference churches in Western Canada. He was chairman of the Canadian Conference for four years and its vice-chairman for seven years. In addition he was an active member of its committee on home missions for many years. He died at Drake on Aug. 16, 1938. J.G.

Gerdes, Daniel, b. April 19, 1698, at Bremen, Germany, d. Feb. 11, 1765, at Groningen in the Netherlands, served from 1736 until his death as professor of theology at the University of Groningen and editor of a number of theological writings. For Mennonite history he is of interest because of his disputes with Joannes Stinstra (q.v.), the Mennonite minister of Harlingen, who had in 1740 published a Deductie in behalf of the freedom of Mennonites to preach without being authorized by the government. Gerdes in his Elenchus veritatum (Groningen, 1740) stated that freedom of conscience should be granted but not freedom of preaching, since teaching of false dogma means licentiousness. In his Twee Godgeleerde Verhandelingen (Groningen, 1741) Gerdes deals with Socinianism (q.v.) and states that Socinians cannot be considered Christians. In his De Vrijheid des Geloofs (Groningen, n.d.-1741), he directly attacks Stinstra, accusing him of anti-Christian teachings. Especially in the last-named book Gerdes proves himself an intolerant and implacable Calvinist. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 216-22; Chr. Sepp, Joh. Stinstra en zijn tijd (Amsterdam, 1865-66) I and II, passim.

Gerdt (Gerhard, Gerryt) Eilkeman (Eikelman) of Coevorden, Dutch Province of Drente: see Peter van Norg.

Gerig, an Alsatian Mennonite family of the Mulhouse, France, area, several members of which emigrated to the United States about the middle of the 19th century, locating in Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa. Two sons of Jacob Gerig (d. 1850 in Mulhouse), Sebastian (q.v.) and Benjamin, leaving Alsace in 1856 and 1860 respectively to escape military service, became bishops in the Mennonite Church (MC) in the United States, the former at Wayland, Iowa, 1879-1930, the latter at Smithville, Ohio, 1896-1913. Sebastian's grandson Vernon Gerig has been bishop at Wayland since 1953, and Benjamin's son Jacob S. Gerig has been bishop at Smithville since 1913. D. S. Gerig (d. 1955), a brother of Jacob, was a long-time professor and registrar (also briefly acting dean) at Goshen College. A nephew of Sebastian, C. R. Gerig, was bishop (MC) at Albany, Ore., 1907-42. Another branch of the family was prominent in the Salem Evangelical Mennonite Church at Gridley, Ill. Of this line was Elder Joseph K. Gerig (q.v., d. 1944), prominent leader in the Evangelical Mennonite Conference, Emerald Gerig at Woodburn, Ind., and Gaylord Gerig at Pioneer, Ohio. C. L. Gearig was long a minister in the Church of God in Christ Mennonite congregation at Wauseon, Ohio. Whether the name Gering, found among the Volhynian Swiss Mennonite congregations of the G.C.M. Church at Moundridge, Kan., Freeman, S.D., and elsewhere, was originally the same as Gerig is not certain, but probable. H.S.B.

Gerig, Joseph K. (1868-1944), elder in the Evangelical (Defenseless) Mennonite Church, was born on Oct. 28, 1868, at Grabill, Ind., the fourth of the ten children of Joseph and Katie Nofziger Gerig. He was married to Leah B. Gerig on Dec. 5, 1889; one daughter was born to them. He began his ministry in 1898 as assistant pastor of the Defenseless Mennonite congregation of Woodburn, Ind. In 1908 he took charge of the Salem Gospel Mission in Chicago, serving actively and effectively for 21 years. He was ordained as elder on Oct. 2, 1917. He was also appointed church evangelist for 18 months and superintendent for the Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan district. For one and one half years he was pastor of the congregation in Pioneer, Ohio. His outstanding spiritual ministry ended in his death on April 7, 1944. He was buried at Woodburn. (Zion's Tidings XXIV, No. 11, May 15, 1944.) Ch.L.R.

Gerig, Sebastian (1839-1924), bishop of the Sugar Creek Mennonite Church (MC), Wayland, Iowa, from 1879 to 1924, was born in Pfastatt, Alsace, the son of Jakob and Elisabeth (Zimmermann) Gerig. He united with the Amish Mennonite Church in France at the age of 17, and in 1856 emigrated to America to escape compulsory military service. After spending a few weeks in Ontario he traveled to Iowa, living in Davis and Lee counties for six years and in Ohio approximately two years. After his marriage to Magdalena, youngest daughter of Bishop Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), he established his home in Henry Co., Iowa, where he lived the rest of his life. To this union were born twelve children, all of whom became members of his church. Three of his grandsons are in the ministry of the Mennonite Church (MC): Vernon Gerig, Wayland, Iowa; Willard Leichty, Wayland, Iowa; and Maynard Wyse, Archbold, Ohio.

Gerig was ordained to the ministry in the Sugar Creek Amish Mennonite Church in 1869 and ten years later to the office of bishop. In 1916 he ordained his successor Simon Gingerich. Gerig was a leader in the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference, serving either as moderator or assistant moderator in 1897, 1900, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1908, and 1909. A man of sound judgment and keen insight, he led his congregation through the changes brought about by the introduction of Sunday schools, young people's meetings, evangelistic services, and the English language. (Gospel Herald, April 17, 1924, 63.) O.G.W.

German Teachers' Association: see Mennonite Teachers' Association.

German Teachers' Institute (Kansas) was organized through the efforts of H. A. Goerz, Peter Balzer, H. D. Penner, and others. The first Institute met Aug. 6, 1894, at Hillsboro for two weeks. After the first session of the Institute the Mennonite Teachers' Association (q.v.) became the sponsor. Its officers were also the officers of the Institute. A curriculum (Lehrplan) for the Institute was produced and revised a number of times. The attendance at the Institute ranged from 25 to 57 during the years 1894-1905. Sessions took place at Hillsboro, Bethel College, Newton, and Buhler. Mennonite congregations contributed toward the financing of the Institute. Later teachers lectured without compensation.

The purpose of the Institute was to foster and promote the German schools and to raise the educational and spiritual level of the Mennonite constituency by reassuring the teacher in what he already possessed, by making him conscious of his need for further study, and by training him in the art of teaching. It also aimed to achieve uniformity in methods of teaching and to make the teacher aware of the fact that teaching is a profession. The Institute usually was held in August. A three-year curriculum was covered during the session including Bible, psychology, grammar, principles of education, history of education, methods, etc. Demonstration lessons were presented on various levels in Bible and church history for observation and criticism.

In 1908 the two-week term was reduced to one week. Sunday-school teachers and other Christian workers were also invited to attend. Later the term was reduced to three days. During World War I the Institute was discontinued. German and Bible were now taught in summer Bible schools where mostly voluntary workers with little preparation were employed. Gradually the change from German to English was completed. The German Teachers' Institute fulfilled well a difficult task during the days of pioneer education and the transition period.
C.K.

H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites of Kansas (Hillsboro, 1925) 85 ff.; Lehrplan für das Deutsche Lehrer-Institut.

German-English Academy, former name of Rosthern Junior College (q.v.) of Rosthern, Sask.

Germantown (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), the first Mennonite congregation in America, observed its first baptism and communion service in 1708, but congregational life began at least as early as 1690. In that year a visiting Reformed minister from Holland, Rudolphus Varick, found the Mennonites there worshiping every Sunday, with "Menist" Dirck Keyser of Amsterdam reading a sermon from a book by Jobst Harmensen. For a time the Mennonite settlers here, who first came in 1683, had worshiped with the German Quakers, who in the early years constituted the majority of the settlement. In 1690 (or 1698; the manuscripts differ), Willem Rittenhouse (d. 1708) was chosen as first preacher and Jan Neuss as deacon. In 1702 a second election was held, when Jacob Gottschalk and Hans Neuss were chosen preachers. In early 1708 the newly arrived (1707) Palatine Mennonite families united with the Dutch-speaking church, as a result of which three deacons (Isaac van Sintern, Heinrich Cassel, and Conrad Jansen) and two preachers (Harmen Karsdorp and Martin Kolb) were chosen from the newer immigrants. About the same time, when the membership was 34 (in 1712 it was 99), eleven new members were baptized by Jacob Gottschalk, who thus began serving as the first Mennonite bishop in America. Gottschalk's brief sketch of the early history of the congregation to 1712 (preserved in Michael Ziegler's historical letter of 1773 to Holland; see Wenger, 395) is the only extant source for the early years. In 1708 also the first log meetinghouse was built on land donated by Arnold van Vossen in 1703. In 1770 this building was replaced by a stone building, which is the oldest Mennonite meetinghouse in America still in use. At that time the membership was 25, but in 1789 it had grown again to 46. By 1798 the monthly services were being conducted by visiting ministers from the Franconia district churches. By 1839 the congregation was "facing dissolution," but it survived and in 1863 was reorganized as a member of the Eastern District Conference (GCM). (See Germantown Mennonite Church, GCM.) In the early 19th century apparently the relations to the Franconia Conference (MC) had become so tenuous that the congregation was in effect an independent congregation.

The first Mennonite conference session in America was held at Germantown in 1725. At this session the Dordrecht Confession of 1632 (18 articles) was adopted as the official confession of the American Mennonites, and was printed two years later (1727) in English to communicate to the English-speaking populace the Mennonite articles of faith.
H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown 1683-1708," MQR VII (1933) 227-50; idem, "Was William Rittenhouse the First Mennonite Bishop in America?" MQR VII (1933) 42-47; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937), with chapter I (Part II, Congregational Histories) "Germantown," 87-95.

Germantown Mennonite Church (GCM). During the early 1800's the old Germantown congregation gradually declined. In the division of 1847 in the Franconia Conference the remaining handful of members sided with the new Eastern Conference led by John H. Oberholtzer and Abraham Hunsicker. In 1851, when the Hunsicker group broke with the new conference, the congregation stayed with Hunsicker. During the next years the preachers were Abraham Hunsicker, Henry Hunsicker, F. R. S. Hunsicker, and Israel Beidler. In 1863 the congregation was formally reorganized with 13 members. Finally in 1876, after the death of Beidler, the congregation returned to the Eastern District Conference and has continued weekly worship throughout the years since then. Ministers since 1876 were John A. Haldeman, N. B. Grubb, W. MacArthur, H. Frederick, A. Funk, S. M. Grubb, S. Musselman, F. Gabel, J. Bayley, A. S. Shelly, H. Landes, W. Wolfe, and R. Brewer.

The 1770 meetinghouse, the oldest Mennonite meetinghouse in America, is located with its ancient burial ground along historic Germantown Avenue at Herman Street (6100) in Germantown, now incorporated in North Philadelphia. In 1916 an addition was built to the meetinghouse. Though the membership today is only 37 there has been a renewal of interest and life in the congregation. The interior of the meetinghouse was largely restored to its colonial simplicity in 1952. To preserve and promote it as a Mennonite "shrine" the incorporate ownership of the meetinghouse and grounds has recently been transferred into the hands of a joint board composed of representatives of the congregation, the Eastern District Conference, and the General Conference Mennonite Church.

J.H.F.

N. B. Grubb, The Mennonite Church of Germantown (Philadelphia, 1906); D. K. Cassel, History of the Mennonites (Philadelphia, 1888).

Germantown (Pa.) Mennonite Settlement, the first permanent Mennonite settlement in America, was established Oct. 24, 1683, six miles north of the then one-year-old town of Philadelphia. The first Mennonite group settlement in America, however, was that established by Plockhoy (q.v.) in 1663 with Dutch settlers at Horekill (q.v.) on the Delaware some 70 miles south of Germantown, which was destroyed by English raiders a year later. Earlier even than this, scattered individual Dutch Mennonite immigrants or traders were found at New Amsterdam and Gravesend (Long Island), but they did not form a congregation and left no trace.

Germantown (also called Germanopolis) was founded personally by the Pietist scholar Francis D. Pastorius (q.v.) who, as agent for the pietistic Frankfurt (Land) Company, purchased 15,000 acres from William Penn's agents at London in May 1683 and proceeded to Pennsylvania in June to locate the land. He had previously (March 1683) spent a week at Kriegsheim (Kriesheim) in the Palatinate visiting the Quakers there, certainly in regard to their interest in settling in Pennsylvania (they came to Germantown in 1685). In March 1682 three Crefeld Mennonites, led by Jacob Telner who had visited New York and Pennsylvania at least once in 1678-81, had purchased 5,000 acres each to aid their needy coreligionists at Crefeld to find new homes. Ultimately none of the Frankfurt Company ever came to Pennsylvania except Pastorius, and no settlers were secured through their agency. But on July 24, 1683, 13 Crefeld German (Dutch-speaking) families including 33 persons sailed from Gravesend (London) on the "Concord," arriving at Philadelphia on Oct. 6, 1683. They were largely poor people, weavers, who had scarcely enough money to reach the new world. On Oct. 24 the townsite of Germantown was laid out along a single village street, lots being drawn to decide the allocation of the several plots of land to the individual families.

Two smaller Mennonite groups joined the Germantown settlement from other localities: (1) from Hamburg-Altona, Germany, eight Dutch-speaking families came in 1700—two Karsdorp families, two van Sinteren, and one each of Roosen, Berends, Klassen, and van Vossen; (2) from the Palatinate (Kriegsheim-Mannheim, Germany), five German-speaking families, in 1707—Kolb, about this time or earlier, Kassel, Bowman, and Graf, and a Clemens in 1709. Of these 13 families Roosen and Berends soon returned to Germany. Apparently the descendants of the Hamburg families did not remain permanently in the Mennonite fold, but the Palatine families, apparently all farmers, remained and all became prominent in the life of the Franconia district settlement and elsewhere. Thus a total of roughly 40 Mennonite families settled in Germantown in the first 25 years 1683-1708. In the latter year the Mennonite congregation here, when it built its first meetinghouse and held its first communion service, had 45 baptized members, of whom 11 were added by baptism just before the communion. By April 6, 1712, the total number was 99, including the Skippack settlement some 12 miles farther north in the open country. Who the additional 54 members received in 1708-12 were is not known, except that some new settlers came from the Palatinate, most of whom, being farmers, went directly to Skippack. The Mennonite immigration from Crefeld-Lower Rhine had ceased by 1708 or earlier. It is possible that the two Connerts families, listed in one source as Germantown Mennonite members in 1708, were related to Thones Kunders, one of the 13 Crefeld families. Gorgas, another Mennonite family from Germany, was in Germantown in 1709.

Until William I. Hull proved that most of the original (1683) families were an interrelated group of Quakers, it had been assumed that the group was Mennonite. But since only one family (Jan Lensen) of the original 13 remained Mennonite, while the other 12 appear in the Quaker meeting records, and since most of them had signed a Quaker marriage certificate at Crefeld in 1681, it is safe to assume that this first group of Germantown settlers was essentially a Quaker movement. There was a Quaker congregation in Crefeld 1667-86, all former Mennonites. A total of 15 Quaker families came from Crefeld to Germantown, all by 1686. Later two of the first 12 Quaker families, Abraham and Hermann op den Graeff, reverted to the Mennonites.

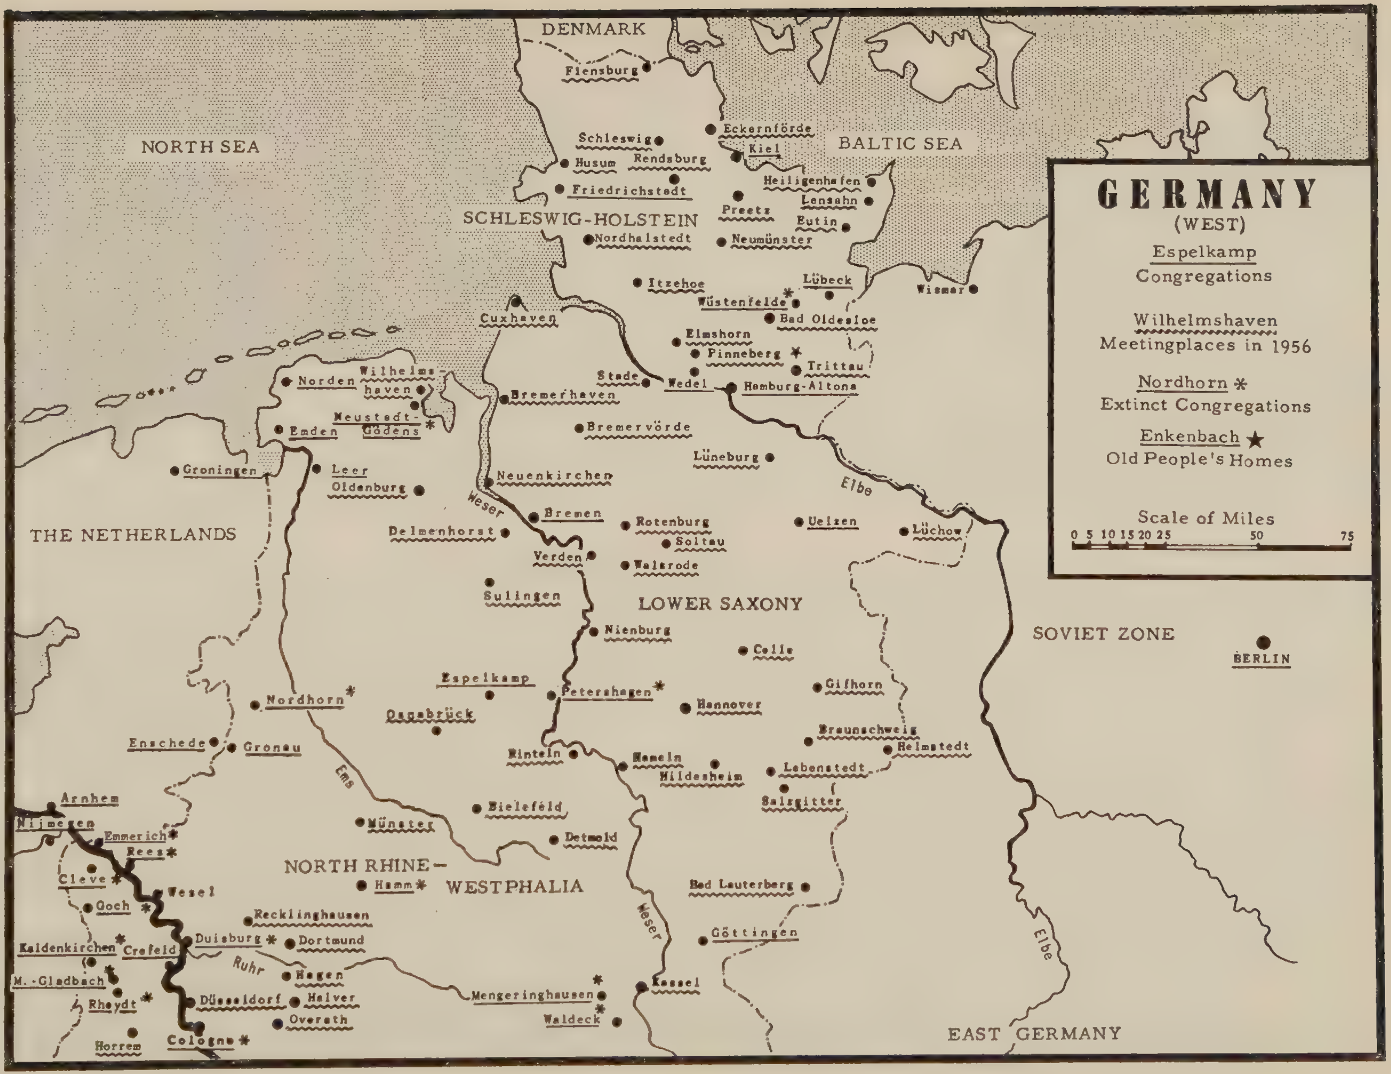
A total of 16 Mennonite families ultimately came from Crefeld to Germantown as follows: 1683—Lensen, 1684—van Bebber, 1685—Telner (returned soon to Crefeld), Umstat (Umstead), and Jansen, 1687—van Bebber and Streypers, 1688—Sellen, 1690—Neuss (Nice), 1693—Kuster (Custer), 1702—Hosters, 1703—Neuss (Nice), (?)—Tyson. Two additional families came from the Lower Rhine, 1691—Kasselberg, 1702—Godschalk from Goch. Five additional families probably came from the same general region although their exact residence is unknown, 1685—Papen, 1698—Engel, before 1702—Krey, before 1707—Jansen. Of this total of 23 Crefeld-Lower Rhine families, few have had permanent representatives in later American Mennonitism (Updegrave, Umstead, Johnson, Nice, Tyson, Godshalk, Engel, Sellen). Three other Dutch Mennonite families, directly from Amsterdam, William Rittenhouse and Dirk Keyser and his son Peter, arrived in 1688. Peter Keyser joined Alexander Mack's Dunkards in 1719. Rittenhouse was the first Mennonite preacher (1690 or 1698) at Germantown.

It has often been asserted that the first Mennonites came to Germantown because of a direct personal invitation from William Penn, but this is incorrect. Penn never visited Crefeld, and there is no record of his ever visiting any Mennonites in Germany. He may have met some Mennonites when he visited the Quakers in Kriegsheim on Aug. 23 and 26, 1677, three years before he applied for the grant of Pennsylvania, but the tension between the Quakers and Mennonites there at that time renders this dubious. There is no trace of any correspondence between Penn and any Mennonites who lived in Germany or who came to America. In the pamphlets published by Penn and his agents on behalf of the colonization of Pennsylvania, not the slightest reference is ever made to Mennonites. Penn's alleged invitation to Mennonites in Germany to come to Pennsylvania, personally or by publication, is purely legendary. The Mennonites (and Quakers) who came from the Lower Rhine area came to Germantown to escape oppressive persecution. Those who came from the Palatinate and Switzerland to Germantown from 1707 on also came to find greater religious freedom and to take advantage of the economic opportunities which the rich colony afforded. Many others besides Mennonites and Quakers of course came to Germantown in 1683-1709. Hull lists a total of 397 immigrant persons (excluding children) with provenance as follows: Holland—63, Crefeld and Kaldekerk—96, Kriegsheim and neighborhood—41, other Germany—49, uncertain Holland or Germany—120, other European countries—11, Great Britain—17. It is clear that the Mennonites were not more than 15 per cent of the Germantown population in 1708, the Quakers possibly a somewhat larger proportion. Germantown was a German settlement, but it was not essentially a Mennonite settlement; nor was it primarily a Crefeld settlement.

The Mennonite settlement in Germantown never prospered greatly, apparently never exceeding 100 baptized members in size. It was too much under the influence of the stronger Quakers and other environment and was not able to retain its own natural increase. Besides, the main stream of Mennonite immigrants from Germany and Switzerland, being farmers, passed it by for settlement on the land. Apart from the conference held in the Mennonite meetinghouse here in 1725, the first Mennonite conference in America, which adopted the Dordrecht Confession of Faith, nothing of significance happened in Germantown, and the settlement did not exercise any particular leadership among the Mennonites in the following years. The up-country Franconia settlement and the inland Lancaster settlement, both rural and German, became the significant Mennonite centers in America. Dutch language Germantown Mennonitism was only a small pocket, with the honor of having been the first settlement, with the first meetinghouse, first preacher and bishop, and first organized congregation. The tradition of connection with the Dutch Mennonites of the Lower Rhine and Holland was kept alive for several generations, and did serve the Franconia Mennonites in a minor way by giving them the Dordrecht Confession and the Martyrs' Mirror. For the history of the Germantown Mennonite congregation see the preceding two articles. H.S.B.

W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore College, 1935); C. Henry Smith, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929); idem, The Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909); idem, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1945); S. W. Pennypacker, The Settlement of Germantown (Philadelphia, 1899); idem, Hendrik Pannebecker (Philadelphia, 1894); Wilhelm Hubben, Die Quäker in der deutschen Vergangenheit (Leipzig, 1929); C. F. Jenkins, The Guidebook to Historic Germantown (Germantown, 1904); J. L. Rosenberger, The Pennsylvania Germans (Chicago, 1923); Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); K. Rembert, "Zur Geschichte der Auswanderung Krefelder Mennoniten nach Nord-Amerika," in Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten, No. 2 of the Schriftenreihe des Menn. Geschichtsvereins (Weierhof, 1939); H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in Germantown," MQR VII (1933) 227-50; Ernst Correll, article "Germantown," ML II, 76-81, with older literature cited.

Germany. Introduction. Modern Germany, established as a nation in 1871 by the Treaty of Versailles following the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, suffered considerable territorial loss in the East as a result of defeats in World Wars I (area 180,999 sq. mi. in 1919) and II (136,462 sq. mi. in 1946) and now has no territory east of the Oder-Neisse River line. All the German population, with small exceptions, living east of that line was evacuated or expelled westward and has now been added to the population of the truncated Republic of Germany, with a (1946) population of 65,151,019 excluding the Saar. All the Mennonites who had lived in Danzig and East and West Prussia, as well as those in the three congregations in Poland (q.v.), were transported westward in this action, some of them later emigrating to Canada and Uruguay. In 1956 the country was still



GERMANY
(WEST)
Espelkamp
Congregations
Wilhelmshaven
Meetingplaces in 1956
Nordhorn *
Extinct Congregations
Enkenbach ★
Old People's Homes
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25 50 75
DENMARK
NORTH SEA
BALTIC SEA
SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN
THE NETHERLANDS
LOWER SAXONY
SOVIET ZONE
NORTH RHINE–
WESTPHALIA
EAST GERMANY
Flensburg
Schleswig
Eckernförde
Kiel
Husum
Rendsburg
Friedrichstadt
Heiligenhafen
Lensahn
Preetz
Eutin
Nordhalstedt
Neumünster
Itzehoe
Lübeck
Wismar
Wüstenfelde *
Bad Oldesloe
Cuxhaven
Elmshorn
Pinneberg *
Trittau
Stade
Wedel
Hamburg-Altona
Bremerhaven
Bremervörde
Norden
Wilhelmshaven
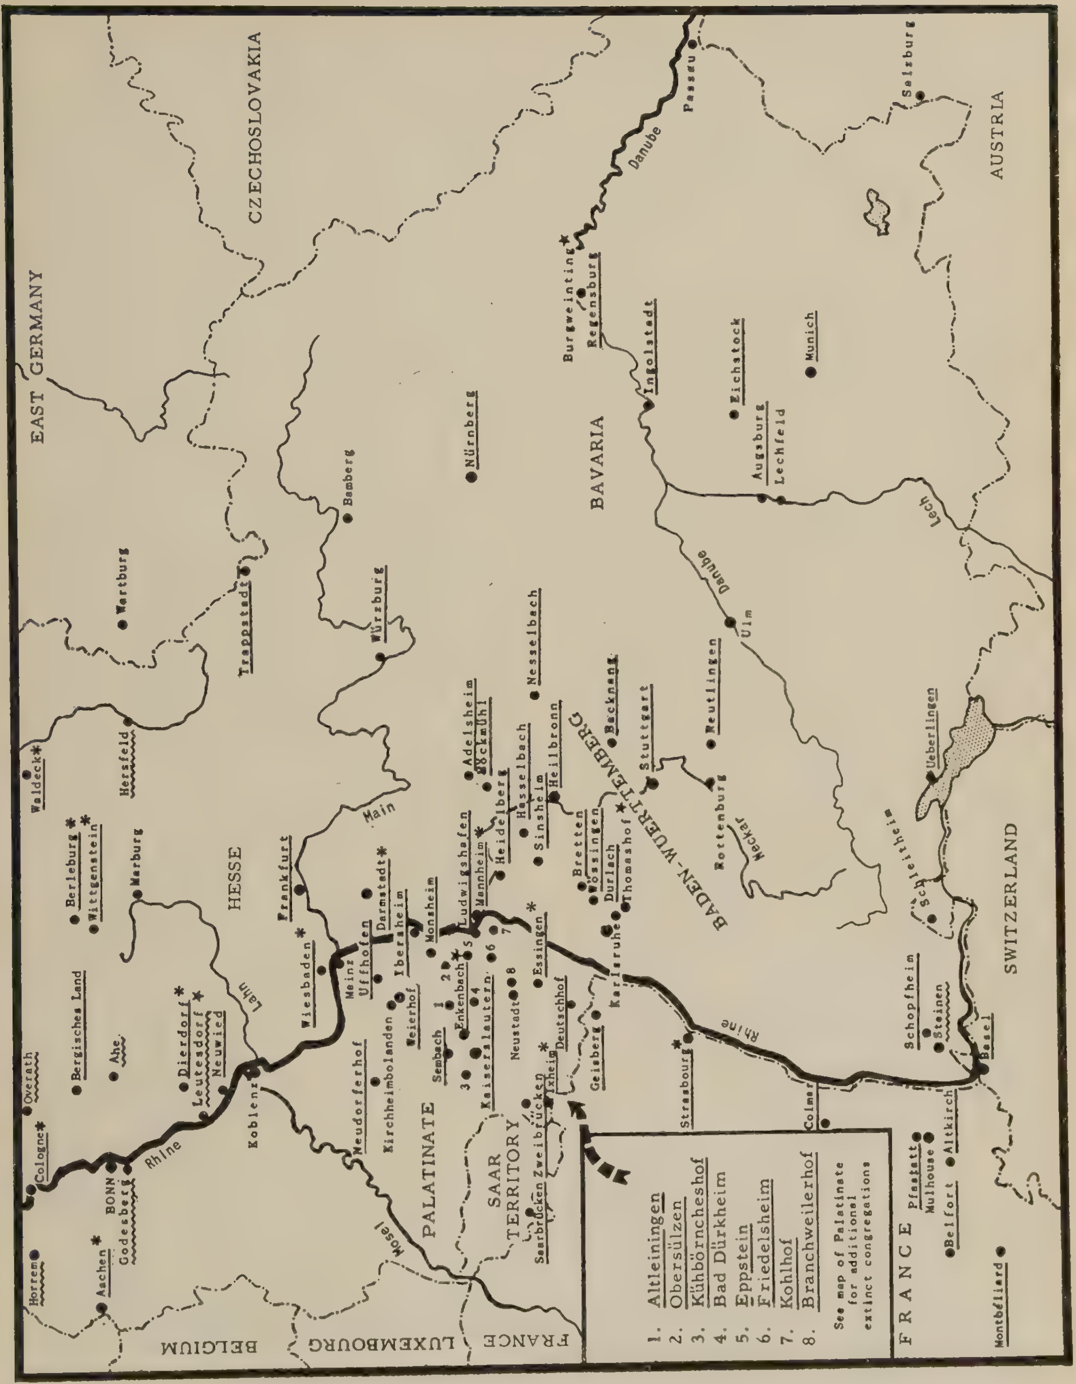
Neustadt-
Gödens *
Emden
Groningen
Leer
Oldenburg
Lüneburg
Neuenkirchen
Elbe
Weser
Bremen
Rotenburg
Soltau
Uelzen
Lüchow
Delmenhorst
Verden
Walsrode
Sulingen
Nienburg
Celle
Espelkamp
Petershagen *
Gifhorn
Nordhorn *
Osnabrück
Hannover
Braunschweig
Enschede
Gronau
Rinteln
Hameln
Hildesheim
Lebenstedt
Helmstedt
Ems
Salzgitter
Bielefeld
Arnhem
Nijmegen
Münster
Detmold
Emmerich *
Rees *
Cleve *
Wesel
Hamm *
Bad Lauterberg
Goch
Recklinghausen
Göttingen
Kaldenkirchen *
Crefeld
Duisburg *
Dortmund
Ruhr
M.-Gladbach
Hagen
Kassel
Rheydt *
Düsseldorf
Halver
Mengeringhausen *
Overath
Waldeck *
Horrem
Cologne *
BERLIN



EAST GERMANY
CZECHOSLOVAKIA
AUSTRIA
SWITZERLAND
FRANCE
BELGIUM
LUXEMBOURG
FRANCE
HESSE
BAVARIA
BADEN-WUERTTEMBERG
PALATINATE
SAAR TERRITORY
Rhine
Danube
Main
Lahn
Mosel
Neckar
Lech
Horren
Aachen
Cologne
Overath
Bergisches Land
Ahe
BONN
Godesberg
Dierdorf
Leutesdorf
Neuwied
Koblenz
Waldeck
Berleburg
Wittgenstein
Marburg
Hersfeld
Wartburg
Trappstadt
Wiesbaden
Frankfurt
Mainz
Uffhofen
Darmstadt
Ibersheim
Monsheim
Neudorferhof
Kirchheimbolanden
Weierhof
Sembach
Enkenbach
Kaiserslautern
Neustadt
Ludwigshafen
Mannheim
Heidelberg
Adelsheim
Hasselbach
Sinsheim
Heilbronn
Nesselbach
Essingen
Deutschhof
Geisberg
Ixheim
Zweibrücken
Saarbrücken
Bretten
Wössingen
Durlach
Thomashof
Karlsruhe
Backnang
Stuttgart
Reutlingen
Rottenburg
Würzburg
Bamberg
Nürnberg
Burgweinting
Regensburg
Passau
Ingolstadt
Eichstock
Augsburg
Lechfeld
Munich
Ulm
Salzburg
Ueberlingen
Schleitheim
Schopfheim
Steinen
Basel
Strasbourg
Colmar
Pfastatt
Mulhouse
Altkirch
Belfort
Montbéliard
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
1. Altleiningen
2. Obersülzen
3. Kühbörncheshof
4. Bad Dürkheim
5. Eppstein
6. Friedelsheim
7. Kohlhof
8. Branchweilerhof
See map of Palatinate for additional extinct congregations

divided into East Germany (Russian Zone) with a population of some 18,000,000, in which there were possibly a maximum of 800 Mennonites (souls) of former West Prussian residence, but no organized congregations or ordained ministers, and West Germany with about 47,000,000 and some 15,000 Mennonites (souls). The total number of baptized Mennonites in 1955 in Germany is about 11,500 in 60 congregations. Of these, 18 congregations with some 7,200 baptized members (total 8,700 souls) are in North Germany (above Frankfurt), 36 congregations are in South Germany with about 4,500 baptized members (5,400 souls), of which 18 are in the Palatinate and Hesse with 2,400 members, 9 are in Baden, 6 are in Württemberg, 8 are in Bavaria, and one in Frankfurt, these last 24 congregations having a total of 2,100 members. Of the congregations in North Germany 9 are refugee congregations of former Danzig-West Prussian origin established since 1945. Many such refugees have also become members of the old established congregations in both North and South Germany.

The German Mennonite congregations are all (except Frankfurt) members of one of two conferences: (1) Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden (q.v.), mostly North Germany with the Palatinate and Hesse, and (2) the Verband Badisch-Württembergisch - Bayrischer Mennonitengemeinden (q.v.), almost all of whose congregations are in the three last indicated territories. In addition, the Süddeutsche Konferenz (q.v.) includes practically all the congregations in the Palatinate and Hesse and in the Verband, although this conference is not quite the same in character as the other two. Most of the congregations of the Palatinate and Hesse are members also of a local conference called the Pfälzisch-Hessische Konferenz. The refugee congregations of the former Danzig-West Prussia area are represented in a ministerial committee called "Aeltestenausschuss der Konferenz der west- und ostpreussischen Mennonitengemeinden." A committee for co-operation in North Germany (Gemeinden-Ausschuss in Norddeutschland) has been formed to help the 9 old North German congregations and the 9 new North German refugee congregations to work together. A "Mennonitischer Zentral-Ausschuss" serves as liaison between the German conferences and the MCC of North America, which has conducted relief work in Germany since 1946 and now has permanent German and European headquarters in Frankfurt (Eyseneckstrasse 54). Four other organizations have been formed which represent or serve all Mennonites in Germany regardless of conference affiliation: (1) Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, (2) Mennonitisches Altersheim, (3) Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe, (4) Deutsches Mennonitisches Missionskommittee.

The only current German Mennonite church paper is the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten, published since 1870 by the Verband. Der Mennonit (founded in 1948), though printed (at Karlsruhe) and edited in Germany, is published as an international European Mennonite journal by the MCC. Full information about the German Mennonite congregations, organizations, and institutions is found in the yearbook, Mennonitischer Gemeinde-Kalender, published since 1892 by the South German Conference. The Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter, founded in 1936, is the organ of the Mennonite Historical Society (Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein).

German Mennonite institutions include four old people's homes in Germany—Leutesdorf (q.v.), Enkenbach (q.v.), Pinneberg (q.v.), and Burgweinting (q.v.); two relief agencies, Mennonitisches Hilfswerk "Christenpflicht" (q.v.) founded in 1924, and Hilfswerk der Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden (q.v.) founded in 1947. There is also a Genossenschaftliches Flüchtlingswerk (q.v.) to aid in resettlement of refugees in Germany. Only the Verband has a deaconess (q.v.) work. The Mennonite board of directors of the former Weierhof school (Verein für die Anstalt am Donnersberg) operates a student house (Schülerheim) connected with the public high school (Gymnasium) at Kirchheimbolanden near Weierhof. The Verband has a significant institution in the Bibelheim Thomashof (q.v.), founded in 1920, a spiritual retreat center.

ANABAPTISM IN GERMANY, 1525-1650

At the time of the rise of Anabaptism (1525-35) what is now called Germany was a collection of 256 autonomous political units within a loosely organized Empire, called the Holy Roman Empire. Although Switzerland, the Netherlands, and North Italy were technically within the empire, they were actually independent, and the Hapsburg dominions, including Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, were outside the orbit of Germany proper. The account of the Anabaptist movement in this article will therefore exclude all these territories. The area "Germany" in the 16th century as it is used here had therefore much the same boundaries as modern Germany 1871-1914, although, not having a unified government, it was broken up into many separate governments with varying religious policies.

The soil in Germany had gradually become rather well prepared for a new religious movement. Already in the late Middle Ages sectarian tendencies had entered Germany (Waldenses, q.v., 1211-1480; Brethren of the Common Life since 1401; etc.). Erasmus and Luther, each in his way, were outstanding advocates of church reform. In the early twenties of the 16th century Carlstadt, Müntzer, and the Zwickau Prophets (Storch, etc.) each propagated a reform of his own, which were often wrongly called Anabaptist. Yet it was not the criticism of infant baptism which was decisive, but the introduction of adult baptism. So Anabaptism proper, arising out of Zwingli's reform, was part of the original Reformation movement.

A. South and Middle Germany. Anabaptism entered Germany first from the South (Switzerland), where it began in Zürich in January 1525. Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), appearing in Waldshut from Zürich in April 1525, baptized Dr. Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.), the pastor of the Lutheran Church there, and they together baptized most of the congregation, some 360 persons in all. In July Hubmaier published his Von dem Christlichen Tauff der Gläubigen. Other pamphlets by him followed. But in December of that year the Austrians conquered the city and forced Hubmaier to flee, practically ending the Anabaptist congregation. Hubmaier went to Augsburg (q.v.) next, where early in 1526 he established an Anabaptist congregation which became very large and influential, but he went on to Moravia, leaving Augsburg in the hands of Hans Denk (q.v.), whom he had baptized in May 1526.

Augsburg and Strasbourg (q.v.) now displaced Zürich and Switzerland as the centers of the growing Anabaptist movement, remaining so for some years. Michael Sattler (q.v.), a noble man of God, became the chief leader in this area of southwest Germany until his execution at Rottenburg in May 1527. He was no doubt the leader of the Schleitheim conference, the first Anabaptist conference, of February 1527, and the author of the notable confession which it produced, the Brüderliche Vereinigung (q.v.). Hans Denk, who moved about in the area Augsburg-Basel-Strasbourg-Worms, was the leader of a somewhat more mystical-spiritualist wing, but died at Basel in November 1527. He was related in spirit to men like Johannes Bünderlin (q.v.) of Linz, a more radical spiritualist and only for a short time an Anabaptist (1527-29), Entfelder (q.v.), likewise only briefly in the movement, and Jakob Kautz (q.v.) of Worms. The Sattler and Denk groups remained separate at Strasbourg, and probably constituted two distinct bodies. Denk preferred the "Inner Word" to the "Outer Word," and taught Christ as a teacher to follow and imitate rather than as a redeemer whose atonement saves men. Jakob Kautz's Seven Theses of June 7, 1527, at Worms also carry this position. Sattler was a full Biblicist and a thorough evangelical.

Meanwhile in 1526-27 Hans Hut (q.v.; d. December 1527 in prison in Augsburg where he had been arrested in September) had become a most effective evangelist for the Anabaptist cause, winning many converts in Swabia, Franconia, Bavaria, Salzburg, and Tirol. In Augsburg men of note became leaders of the Anabaptist congregation in 1527-30, like Sigmund Salminger (q.v.) and the patrician Hans Langenmantel (q.v.). A noted conference was held here Aug. 20, 1527, often called the "Martyrs' Synod" (q.v.) because so many of the missioners sent out from there lost their lives as martyrs within the following years.

Another early center of Anabaptism was found in Hesse, Thuringia, and Franconia, where Thomas Müntzer had had some influence in 1523-25. Melchior Rinck (q.v.) was the first Anabaptist leader here in 1528-31 (in prison 1531-51, where he died) near Hersfeld (q.v.) and Sorga, where there was a congregation. Moravian Anabaptist (Hutterite) influences were strong here for a time, numerous missioners coming here from the base in Moravia, including the noted Peter Riedemann (q.v.), who wrote his great Rechenschaft (q.v.), in prison near Marburg (Wolkersdorf) in 1540-41. Anabaptists were in considerable strength in Hesse (q.v.) as late as 1578, when Hans Kuchenbecker and his brethren drew up an elaborate confession of faith for the authorities (MQR XXIV, 24-34). Their criticism of the poor quality of life in the state church contributed greatly through Bucer to the introduction of the ceremony of confirmation, which passed from here into other Lutheran and Reformed state churches.

The next outstanding leader to arise was Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) of Rattenberg on the Inn, converted an Anabaptist in 1528, living in Strasbourg 1528-32, then chiefly in Ulm and Augsburg until his death at the latter place in 1556. He was the most notable doctrinal writer of the South German Anabaptists (see his Vermahnung of 1542 and Verantwortung of 1544, both against Caspar Schwenckfeld, and his Testamentserläuterung of much the same time). He was the leader of a strong group, as the recent discovery of some 42 letters by him (found in a Bern library) attests.

As soon as the German authorities, both Catholic and Protestant, became aware of the rising Anabaptist movement, they used every means at their command to destroy it. The first Anabaptist mandates by the Hapsburg rulers appeared in 1527. The notorious edict of the Diet of Speyer, ordering the extermination of the Anabaptists throughout the Empire, was issued April 22, 1529. In explanation of the attitude of the authorities, the close connection between the territorial government and the local church, which was already true at that time, must not be overlooked. It might have been possible to reform the whole of any given territorial church, but only as a whole and only in so far as the authorities thought fit. Luther and Zwingli and their followers had to learn that, and only as far as they learned it did they succeed at least partly. Hubmaier and the Münster (q.v.) Anabaptists tried to go the same way, but they failed. And neither a congregation of saints nor the baptism of adults could win public opinion; nonconformity and nonresistance, the refusal of oaths, nonpayment of war taxes, and refusal of public offices, sometimes a leaning toward the revolutionary peasants, sometimes the hope that the coming of the Turks would announce the coming of Christ, made them suspect. And the magistrates felt responsible for the spiritual as well as for the physical welfare of their subjects. The Anabaptists' high morality, courage, and unflinching fidelity to their convictions impressed many again and again, but these were not sufficient to change the attitude of the others in general. So the advice of the Lutheran and Reformed theologians guided by their own creed, and the decisions of the lawyers guided by their tradition, resulted in a persecution with all the cruelty of medieval law and punishment (e.g., to counterfeit a coin was punished by burning at the stake). Hege (ML III, 6 and 7) for the first 20 years (1525-44) alone enumerates 110 mandates against the Anabaptists: 27 Swiss, 27 Austrian, 15 Bavarian and Swabian, 16 Franconian, Hessian, Saxon, and Thuringian, 6 Alsatian, 4 Palatine, after 1530 also 8 in the north, besides 7 of the Emperor and the Empire in general. But though the principle of persecution was more or less the same, everywhere the practice showed much variation. The number of mandates also illustrates the number of Anabaptists in the one and the other area. Apart from Reformed Switzerland, the keenest persecutors were the Catholic King

Ferdinand I of Austria and the Catholic dukes of Bavaria. Among the Protestant princes the electors of Saxony, supported by their theologians, did not shrink from capital punishment (first case 1530 at Reinhardsbrunn in Thuringia, q.v.), whereas the Landgrave of Hesse never had an Anabaptist executed and even in cases when Saxony was also concerned he prevailed upon the elector to be content with imprisonment for life (e.g., Fritz Erbe, q.v., 1532-48 at the Wartburg near Eisenach and not far from Reinhardsbrunn). The Counts Palatine in 66 years (1544-1610) several times changed their creed (3 times Lutheran, 3 times Reformed), but the report of 350 killed in the one year 1529 in the Palatinate (at Alzey) is an error, though a smaller number were killed there indeed. The imperial cities followed different policies and were often influenced by the princes near by. At Nürnberg, Franconia, as early as March 26, 1527, an Anabaptist (Wolfgang Vogel, q.v.) was executed, at Schweinfurt in February 1529 another (Georg Braun, q.v.). In the bishoprics of Bamberg and Würzburg half a dozen were executed in 1528, and in the margravure of Brandenburg (Ansbach-Bayreuth) also about half a dozen in the same year.

The century from the middle of the 16th to the middle of the 17th records the decline of the Anabaptist movement; the persecution gradually reached its goal. From 1548 to 1650 there were (Hege) only 78 mandates (in sharp contrast to the 110 for only the 20 years 1525-44), the centers being the same as before; e.g., 24 Austrian and 16 Swiss mandates. In 1592 the last execution occurred (Thoman Haan of Nikolsburg, q.v.) in Bavaria, in 1618 the last executions (Jost Wilhelm and Christine Brünnerin, q.v.) at Egg near Bregenz in Vorarlberg (Tirol), also the last in the Holy Roman Empire. All three were connected with the Hutterites who up to 1620 sent many missionaries from Moravia to the West, as also many from the West at this time fled to Moravia (q.v.).

Strasbourg long remained a chief meeting place of the Anabaptists. Here important conferences were held in 1555 and 1557, in which the Northern (Menno Simons) doctrines of the Incarnation and of the ban were repudiated by the Southern brethren. The Strasbourg conference of 1568, attended by many ministers and elders from all over southern Germany, dealt chiefly with certain rules of discipline. In 1557 and 1571 there were disputations with the Lutheran and Calvinistic authorities respectively of the Palatinate, the former at Pfeddersheim (q.v.) near Worms, the other at Frankenthal (q.v.). The protocol of the latter was printed in 1571. Among the 15 Anabaptist participants one came from Andernach in the north, two from Alsace in the south, half a dozen from the Palatinate, one from Heilbronn, and one from Salzburg; two others and two Hutterites served as observers, so to speak.

The story of the Hutterites (q.v.) is a chapter of its own, not to be told here. The history of the Anabaptists in Thuringia came to its end in 1584 (Wappler, Täuferbewegung in Thüringen), that of the Palatinate in 1610 (Hege, Täufer in der Kurpfalz), that of Tirol in 1626 (Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tyrol). By the time of the Thirty Years' War practically all the Anabaptists in South and Middle Germany had been converted, exiled, or executed.

It is rather easy to tell the story of the Anabaptists in North Germany separately from that of those in South and Middle Germany, though of course there are connections, Strasbourg especially being the meeting point.

B. Northwest Germany. (1) Lower Rhine. In Northwest Germany much the same tendencies are found as in the South. As early as 1522 Dr. Gerhard Westerburg, a patrician of Cologne, was visited by Nicholas Storch, who influenced him against infant baptism. A little later he came in contact with Carlstadt, whose sister he married and whose pamphlets and ideas he propagated. In the autumn of 1524 he even paid Zürich a short visit. But in general the question of baptism became important later in the North than in the South. The first martyrs of the Reformation were Adolf Clarenbach (q.v.) and Peter Fliesteden (q.v.), both subjects of Jülich-Berg, but executed at Cologne in 1529; at least Fliesteden had a moderate touch of Anabaptism. About the same time (1530) Melchior Hofmann (q.v., 1495-1543) brought to this area from Strasbourg the idea of Anabaptism and of a special doctrine of the Incarnation initiating Anabaptism here and founding a congregation at Emden, and soon reaching the Netherlands also.

It is characteristic of the situation on the Lower Rhine that the dukes of Jülich-Cleve-Berg-Mark-Ravensberg (Johann III, 1521-39, Wilhelm V, 1539-92, Johann Wilhelm, 1592-1609) as well as the elector (archbishop) Hermann of Cologne (1515-47) were influenced by Erasmus and tried to follow a middle line between Luther and the Roman Catholic Church. But this middle party of reformers failed: the turning point was the war (1543), when the Emperor defeated Wilhelm V, gained Geldern for himself and so for the Netherlands, and enforced a Catholic polity. Later reform endeavors also failed, especially because Wilhelm V was handicapped by an attack of apoplexy in 1566. (It is significant that Wilhelm V was a brother-in-law for some time of Henry VIII of England and Francis I of France, later of Emperor Maximilian II and of Elector—later Duke—John Frederick of Saxony, who in 1547 was defeated by the Emperor.)

The "Aemter" and "Unterherrschaften" into which the duchies of Jülich, Cleve, and Berg were divided allowed the nobility a rather independent position. So the Aemter of Born, Millen, Heinsberg, Wassenberg, and Brüggen in the northwest corner of the duchy of Jülich adjoining the present Dutch province of Limburg along the Maas from Venlo to Sittard became a center of the Anabaptist movement. In 1529-32 especially the court of the high bailiff (Drost) Werner von Pallant (q.v.) at Wassenberg was a meeting place for several clergymen, most of them from the bishopric of Liége (Campanus, Slachtscaep) and the duchy of Brabant (Roll, Vinne), also from Westphalia (Klopreis), known as the "Wassenberger Prädikanten" (q.v.). Klopreis (q.v., d. 1535) had been in touch with Clarenbach; from the common prison at Cologne he was rescued and brought to Wassenberg as the first of this group. Here again the influence of Erasmus is found together with that of Luther and Zwingli, and also spiritualistic tendencies and the rejection of infant baptism. With the exception of Campanus (q.v., d. after 1574), the leader, they went from Wassenberg to Münster in 1532-34, were baptized there, and then were sent as apostles of the kingdom of the saints to Westphalia (Slachtscaep, q.v., d. 1534, and Vinne, q.v., d. 1534) and to the Rhineland (Klopreis and Roll, q.v., d. 1534), all ending as martyrs to their belief.

After the first congregation at Emden (1530), the Lower Rhine-Maas congregation at Maastricht (1530-35), Cologne (1531), Aachen (1533), and Emmerich (1534) must be recorded. The first martyr of this region who is mentioned in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is Vit to Pilgrams (q.v.) at München-Gladbach (not 1532, as is said there, but 1537).

At Münster (Westphalia) at first a local movement for religious and social reform was started by the Lutheran pastor Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.) and the merchant Bernhard Knipperdolling (q.v.). Roll as the first of the Wassenberger preachers had already introduced their vision in 1532. Then, after Melchior Hofmann was imprisoned (for life, as it turned out) at Strasbourg in 1533, the Dutch Anabaptists took the lead. As Hofmann had thought of himself as Elijah and Strasbourg as the New Jerusalem and of the millennium immediately following his imprisonment, now the baker Jan Matthijsz (q.v.) of Haarlem declared himself to be Enoch, and Münster the New Jerusalem. The Anabaptist movement here became militant, and at the same time baptism became a political rather than a religious symbol. In February 1534 Matthijsz himself arrived at Münster (which now was besieged by the Catholic and Protestant princes of this region), and was killed in action at Easter (April 5) 1534. But one of his disciples, Jan Beukelszoon (q.v.) of Leiden, a tailor, full of eloquence and courage, under war conditions set up a dictatorship as King David of Zion. Discipline was enforced, communism and polygamy introduced, help asked from abroad. The fact that "banners were to fly in Friesland and Holland, Limburg and Jülich," shows what districts were expected to support the enterprise. But through famine and treason the city fell on June 25, 1535. Münster became Catholic again and many executions followed; Beukelszoon and Knipperdolling died not before Jan. 22, 1536. The Münster catastrophe once more strengthened the hostile attitude of public opinion and of the authorities against Anabaptism of all kinds.

It was Menno Simons (q.v., 1496-1561) in Holland and North Germany who after the debacle gathered the nonresistant Anabaptists (for him they were named Mennonites after 1544). Soon he had to leave the Netherlands and found a refuge in East Friesland, where in January 1544 he had a disputation with John á Lasco (q.v.), the reformer of the district. Then he had to leave East Friesland and went to the Lower Rhine-Maas area, where the endeavors to introduce the Reformation had not yet come to an end. Menno stayed and worked "in the diocese of Cologne" in 1544-46. In vain he strove for a disputation with the "scholars" at Bonn (electorate of Cologne) and at Wesel (duchy of Cleve). But about 1545 he lived with Lemken (see below) at Illikhoven (one part belonging to the Amt Born, duchy of Jülich, another part belonging to Roosteren in the duchy of Geldern) and Vissersweert on the Maas (Amt Born), now both in the Dutch province of Limburg. He preached in the environs of both places and also reached Roermond and may have founded the Anabaptist congregation of Illikhoven-Vissersweert. At any rate after the Wassenberg preachers and their adherents had left for Münster, and Menno had visited the region, organized congregations remained or were founded anew.

Roelof Martens, usually called Adam Pastor (q.v.), had been ordained as elder by Menno (in 1542?) and excommunicated by Dirk Philips and Menno in 1547. Nevertheless he continued his work in his district from Overijssel in the Netherlands to the county of Mark (Hamm) in Westphalia, having his seat at Odenkirchen (exclave of the electorate of Cologne), and at Well on the Maas (duchy of Geldern), here and there under the protection of a member of the van Vlodrop family. Menno and Adam diverged from the orthodox Christology in opposite directions. In Jesus Christ Menno, following Melchior Hofmann and Obbe Philips (q.v., d. 1568), overstated the divine nature, and Adam the human one. The idea of a pure congregation called for a divine head of the church; the idea of an imitation of Christ called for a human head. Matthias Servaes (q.v.), ordained by Zillis (see below), and Heinrich von Krufft (q.v.) worked especially in the area of München-Gladbach; Matthias Servaes worked also at Cologne, where he was executed in 1565.

More to the South, in the Aemter Born, Millen, etc., of the duchy of Jülich the records show an office of teaching and baptizing and of deacons for the poor. About 1550 an elder Leitgen died, and in 1550 the "principal teacher" Remken Ramakers (q.v.) was executed at Sittard, Amt Born. They were succeeded by Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.), who had his seat at Illikhoven and worked from the Maas to the Rhine (from Cleve to Essen and from Maastricht to Bonn), being executed at Linnich on the Roer in 1551. He was succeeded as elder by Lemken (q.v.), formerly deacon at Vissersweert in 1547 and at Illikhoven in 1550, working at first in the western Aemter of the duchy of Jülich and along the Maas, later also in a wider area.

Farther to the South, in the Amt Montjoie in the Eifel Mountains, Zillis (q.v.), another elder, is found who together with Lemken (and the Dutch Waterlanders and the South German Anabaptists) fought the rigid attitude of Menno concerning excommunication and shunning from 1557 to 1560, when Menno excommunicated Lemken and Zillis as well as the Waterlanders. Thus Menno and his friends on the one side, and the Waterlanders, the "High Germans" (Lemken and Zillis in Jülich), and the Southern Anabaptists on the other side, were separated. Zillis worked in the duchy of Berg on the right side of the Rhine as well as in the duchy of Jülich on the left side. There were martyrs, e.g., Palmken Palmen (q.v., 1550) at Born, Maria of Montjoie (q.v., 1552) at Jülich, and Conrad Koch (q.v., 1565) at Honnef in the duchy of Berg. Thomas von Imbroich (q.v.) from Imgenbroich near Montjoie was executed at Cologne in 1558. Some Hutterite missionaries were executed in 1558-59 at Aachen (q.v.).

In spite of such sacrifices (or because of them) the congregations on the Lower Rhine in general held their own to the end of the 16th century and into the 17th, not being exterminated as was the case in Middle Germany and to a large extent in South Germany. In May 1591 a decisive meeting took place at Cologne under the guidance of Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.). Congregations of the Upper Rhine, Breisgau, Alsace (Strasbourg, Weissenburg), and the Palatinate (Kreuznach, Landau, Landesheim, Neustadt, Worms) were represented. Of the Lower Rhine the congregations of the city of Cologne, of the electorate of Cologne (Odenkirchen), of the duchy of Cleve (Rees), of the duchy of Jülich (area of Millen and Maas, München-Gladbach), and of the duchy of Berg were represented. Practical questions prevailed, but some doctrinal questions appear in the first part of the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). If on the one side the Trinity was confessed, on the other side the Holy Spirit was described as a power of God (and so not as the third person of the Trinity). He who was baptized according to Anabaptist order was not to be rebaptized.

The 17th century put these congregations under new conditions. Anabaptists were in general expelled in 1601 from the cities of Aachen and Cologne, in 1614 from Burtscheid (then belonging to the Imperial Abbey of Cornelismünster, now incorporated into Aachen), and in 1628 from Odenkirchen. In 1614 the united duchies were divided into tolerant Cleve under the Hohenzollerns and intolerant Jülich-Berg under the Wittelsbachs. From 1600 on the county of Mörs with the dominion of Crefeld for a century belonged to the tolerant House of Orange. Thus, early in the 17th century a congregation was founded at Crefeld, which now became the place of refuge for Mennonites on the Lower Rhine, as well as some congregations in the duchy of Cleve (Goch, Cleve, Emmerich, Rees, Duisburg). It is worthy of note that the founder of the congregation of Crefeld, Hermann op den Graeff (q.v., 1585-1642), together with a second representative, Wilhelm Kreynen (q.v.), signed the Confession of Dordrecht in 1632.

(2) East Friesland remained a place of refuge for the Anabaptists, first in the country, especially near Krummhorn (q.v.). Later there were three congregations of importance besides Emden: Norden (q.v.), Leer (q.v.), and Neustadt-Gödens (q.v.). In 1612 there were a total of about 400 Anabaptists in East Friesland. There were also some across the eastern border in the county of Oldenburg (q.v.). Among the first grants of toleration for Mennonites is that given by Count Rudolf Christian in 1626 for his country. Emden reached the climax of its history in the 16th century. Situated next to the Netherlands, but maintaining its independence, it was again and again (like Wesel in a similar situation) used as a starting point by the Anabaptists for influencing the Netherlands from the outside. In 1568 and 1579 meetings of the Waterlanders (q.v.) were held at Emden. In 1571 a Reformed synod took place there. In 1578 there was a religious disputation between the Flemish Anabaptists (q.v.) and the Reformed, of which the Protocol was published in 1578; from Cologne and Groningen Anabaptist elders were present. For years Leenaert Bouwens had his headquarters at 't Falder near Emden, and baptized 320 persons here alone, in other places of East Friesland also 323, but during 1551-82 many more in the Netherlands and a few also in Cologne, Holstein, and Mecklenburg. It is also probable that many refugees from here found their way eastward—a few, as said before, to the adjacent Oldenburg, but practically none to the district between the Weser and the Elbe (the archbishopric of Bremen).

C. Holstein and Prussia Proper. But the two duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, the dominion of Pinneberg, and the two imperial cities and Hanseatic towns of Hamburg and Lübeck were the goal for many. The first place in this area where Anabaptists were to be found was Lübeck (q.v.). Here in 1535 the burgomaster Jürgen Wullenweber (q.v., d. 1537) took a friendly attitude toward the Anabaptists. As early as 1532 Cord Roosen (q.v., 1495-1553 or 1554) of Korschenbroich near Grevenbroich (near München-Gladbach), had found his way to Lübeck. His sons and a grandson were, surprisingly, powder manufacturers. In 1546 Menno Simons held a meeting here concerning David Joris (q.v. d. 1556), and in 1552 concerning Adam Pastor. In the winter of 1553-54 Menno was living at neighboring Wismar (q.v.) in Mecklenburg, where he debated with the Reformed preacher Micron (q.v., d. 1559). Here the Wismar articles were adopted in 1554. Later Menno, with the Anabaptist printing plant recently founded at Lübeck, went to Fresenburg (q.v.) near Oldesloe between Lübeck and Hamburg. Here arose the first congregation (Flemish) in this area; and here Menno found an abode undisturbed by the authorities for his last years (1554-61).

In the second half of the 16th century the Anabaptist impact more and more shifted from the eastern to the western part of this area. During the same time here and often elsewhere it also changed its character more and more: Anabaptists were becoming Mennonites. The struggle for a new vision was disappearing, though the loyalty to convictions remained. While Baptists and Quakers soon undertook to propagate the one or other of these convictions, the Mennonites were content to have permission to live according to their convictions, and in addition to be good manufacturers or farmers and citizens. This development may be the consequence of a colonial existence, of a flight into another country, where first a living had to be made.

On the west coast of Schleswig-Holstein the first Mennonites (as we now may call them) appeared sometime before 1566 when five of them had already been exiled, on the peninsula of Eiderstedt (q.v.) in the duchy of Schleswig, not far from the border of the duchy of Holstein, belonging to the Gottorp portion. Soon there were wholesale merchants, among them Johann Clausen Codt (also Kotte, Cotte, Cothe, Coodt, q.v.), a dike-reeve who, like Marpeck, early in the 17th century sustained the religious wishes of his fellow believers by protecting the land and so being very helpful to the country. In 1621, when Duke Frederick III of Holstein-Gottorp (q.v., 1616-59) founded Friedrichstadt (q.v.) east of Eiderstedt as a Dutch place of refuge, he gave the Mennonites very liberal privileges. Some years earlier already (1616) the king of Denmark, who with the Gottorps and (until 1640) the counts of Schauenburg (dominion of Pinneberg) shared the whole country, had founded Glückstadt on the Elbe, south of Friedrichstadt, as a place of refuge; here from 1623 on Mennonites were accepted as citizens and from 1631 on were mentioned in a grant of toleration for "the Dutch nation" in the city. But the greatest importance for the Mennonites in this area was gained by Hamburg (q.v.), the imperial city, and the adjacent Altona (q.v.), first a village of fishermen, since 1604 a borough in the county of Pinneberg under the Schauenburgs, after 1640 under the kings of Denmark, after 1664 a town under municipal law. By 1575 Mennonite families were found at Hamburg (de Voss, Quins, etc., coming from the Netherlands), and 1601 at Altona (François Noë II, q.v., whose father had come from Antwerp to Hamburg, originally from Flanders). At Hamburg the Mennonites made a contract with the city in 1605 (renewed in 1635). Noë as a wholesale dealer had come in touch with Ernst, Count of Schauenburg, and was allowed with others to settle on the "Freiheit" next to Hamburg. He obtained a "privilege" for his coreligionists in 1601 (renewed in 1635 and again in 1641). Though living in different states (until 1937, when Altona was incorporated into Hamburg), the Mennonites of the two places had no separate congregations.

A still larger colonization enterprise of Dutch Mennonite refugees were the settlements in Prussia proper, the German melting pot. In Ducal (or East) Prussia the Duke, himself excommunicated by the Pope and outlawed by the Emperor, even had councilors with an Anabaptist past, from 1536 Christian Entfelder, the pupil of Denk, from 1542 Gerhard Westerburg, the pupil of Storch and Carlstadt, baptized at Münster in 1534. Immigrants were Schwenckfelders (q.v.; since 1527), Dutch Sacramentists (q.v.; since 1527), Gabrielites (q.v., 1535), Bohemian Brethren (1548), and from ca. 1535 Dutch Anabaptists, who settled especially at Königsberg and in the district of Preussisch Holland (q.v.) near the border of Royal (or Polish or West) Prussia. After the church inspection (the duke was now following a Lutheran course) in 1543 they were exiled; only a few remained. As the devastation in consequence of the "Reiterkrieg" (1519-25) opened the door for immigrants into East Prussia, so the floods of the Vistula (1540-43) did the same in West Prussia; here the immigrants were expected to drain the inundated land. The first contract was made in 1547 for the Danzig Werder or delta (Reichenberg, etc.) by Philip Fresen of Edzema (q.v.), another in 1562 for the Great Marienburg (Unter) Werder by the Loysen (q.v.) brothers at Tiegenhof. In the same period Mennonite settlers reached the cities of Danzig and Elbing as well as the lowland to the left and the right of the Nogat (Ellerwald, Little Marienburg Werder) and somewhat later also the pastures of the Great Marienburg (Ober) Werder at Heubuden. Rather early there were Mennonites also along the Vistula up to Thorn. Menno visited "the elect and children of God in Prussia" in the summer of 1549 and wrote them a letter in the autumn of that year. Later Dirk Philips (d. 1568), its founder, was at the head of the Danzig congregation. A successor of his, Quirin Vermeulen (also "van der Meulen," q.v.), in 1598 published a stately edition of the Bible in Dutch translation (the Biestkens Bible, q.v.).

In 1608 at the diet at Graudenz, the Bishop of Culm, Poland, Laurentius Gumbicki, made a statement to the effect that the Marienburger Werder was filled with Anabaptists. Yet it is reported that at least 80 per cent of the Mennonite farmers had perished of marsh fever in connection with the work of draining and clearing the land. In 1642 King Ladislav IV of Poland (1632-48) gave the Mennonites a grant of privileges in which he declared that King Sigismund Augustus (1546-72) had summoned the Mennonites into a district "which then was a desolate swamp and not used. With great effort and large expenditure they had made this district fertile and profitable by turning woodland into arable land and establishing pumps in order to remove the water from the inundated grounds covered with mud and to erect dikes against the floods of the Vistula."

MENNONITISM IN GERMANY, 1650-1800

We have already observed that from the second half of the 16th century the Anabaptist type more and more died out in Germany and was replaced by the Mennonite type. As evangelization and with it conversion and martyrdom disappeared, with later generations rebaptizing disappeared also, occurring only here and there within the Mennonite groups and being plainly replaced by adult baptism of the following generation when grown up. Thus the imperial mandate of 1529, so to speak, lost its objective; in 1768, for instance, the Imperial Court at Wetzlar even recommended that the affirmation of a Mennonite might be regarded the same as the oath of another. Thus the original endeavor to better the Christian testimony to the world, so much resented by this world, was toned down into the desire of a small religious group to be allowed to live for itself, yes, according to its tradition. And this nonconformity to the world was precisely what made these believers the best farmers, artisans, manufacturers, etc., now highly esteemed by the rulers in this period. So wanderings continued from territories where the Mennonites were persecuted as heretics to other territories where they were welcomed as good citizens. The interest of the world turned more and more from religious problems to economic ones, the Thirty Years' War being the boundary between the older and the newer attitudes.

Migrations. Going from southwest to northeast, there are the migrations of the Swiss Brethren to the Palatinate (q.v.), where after the devastations of the Thirty Years' War Elector Karl Ludwig (q.v., 1617-80) gave them a privilegium in 1664. As early as 1652 they are found near Sinsheim (q.v.; east of the Rhine, Kraichgau, now Baden-Württemberg) and soon afterwards on the Ibersheimer Hof (q.v.; west of the Rhine, now Rheinland-Pfalz). The nobility of the Kraichgau (q.v.) between Heidelberg and Karlsruhe opened their domains to the Swiss refugees, as did also Alsace (q.v.) and at least from the beginning of the 18th century also the margraves of Baden-Durlach (q.v.).

For many of the Swiss emigrants the new home was of rather short duration because of the war of the Palatine Succession (1688-97). The French invaded and devastated the territory once more, and notwithstanding the privilegium oppressions were frequently applied. So from 1707 on many of them searched and found a more lasting place of refuge in Pennsylvania (q.v.). But many also remained in Germany, some in the Palatinate, some (mostly Amish) crossing the Rhine and the Main to the north and founding (ca. 1750 and later) settlements in Nassau and Hesse (q.v.), in the county of Wittgenstein (q.v.; now in Westphalia) and in the county of Waldeck (q.v.; now in Hesse). Soon afterwards others (Mennonites) turned to the east, to the bishopric of Würzburg (q.v.; now Bavaria) and the duchy of Württemberg (q.v.). And when Emperor Joseph II, after gaining Polish Galicia (q.v.) in 1772, invited colonization there in 1781, since the new subjects needed instruction in agriculture, 28 families, most of them Palatines, some of them Alsatian Mennonites and Amish, settled near Lemberg (q.v.) in 1784.

Farther to the north as early as the 17th century the Mennonites of the duchy of Jülich (1654 from München-Gladbach, 1694 from Rheydt), often linen weavers, found their way to the place of refuge in this region, Crefeld. In addition the (great) Elector of Brandenburg in 1654 and 1660 issued mandates favorable to the Mennonites for his duchy of Cleve, quite contrary to the intolerant mandates of the Wittelsbachs in Jülich. Even in the county of Mark, now also inherited by the Hohenzollerns, a small congregation existed at Hamm (q.v., now in Westphalia). A center of its own was Neuwied (q.v.), founded in 1652 on the Rhine as the new residence of the counts of Wied. Even from the very beginning immigrants of the northern group of Mennonites (Jülich, etc.) and of the southern group (Switzerland, Palatinate) met here. In 1680 they were given a privilegium, and in 1768 the Count even helped them to get a church, opposite his castle and in the same rococo style of architecture.

Then in the east there was the migration from West Prussia to East Prussia (from 1713 on to the area of Tilsit, q.v., and from 1716 on to Königsberg, q.v.), the attitude of the kings changing, but the local authorities continuing to favor the Mennonites. Later on the Mennonites also moved to the southeast along the Vistula ca. 1750 into Poland proper (Deutsch-Wymysle, q.v., and Deutsch-Kazun, q.v.) to the west in 1765 into the province of Brandenburg (Neumark; q.v.).

Most settlements in this period secured legal toleration by a grant called a "privilegium" (concession). Some of these concessions were given by the following rulers: (1) Duke Friedrich III of Holstein-Gottorp, dated Feb. 13, 1623, for Friedrichstadt in Schleswig; (2) Count Rudolph Christian of East Friesland, May 26, 1626, for his country; (3) King Christian IV of Denmark, June 6, 1641, for Altona in Holstein; (4) King Ladislav IV of Poland, Dec. 22, 1642, for his country; (5) Elector Karl Ludwig of the Palatinate, Aug. 4, 1664, for his possessions; (6) Count Friedrich of Wied, Dec. 16, 1680, for Neuwied on the Middle Rhine; (7) King Friedrich Wilhelm I of Prussia, Jan. 30, 1721, for Crefeld. These documents have been preserved in the original or in copies in various archives, most of them also in printed form, some in several editions.

Sometimes older "privileges" were renewed or extended, and also here and there they underwent certain revisions. Sometimes they were limited to a single place (Friedrichstadt, Altona, Neuwied, Crefeld). Elector Karl Ludwig expressly mentioned the protracted war and its effects, and King Christian the importance of the immigrants for trade and commerce. Count Friedrich became the model for other princes of the Empire; he founded the town of Neuwied in the interests of his small territory specifically as a place of refuge for tolerated as well as "privileged" religious groups, hoping to secure as settlers at least part of those "useful" people who had to leave ruined homes elsewhere. The Mennonites were here allowed to conduct their own worship, though it had to be in secret and without making proselytes by "sweet words" (as it is stated in the Altona privilege), and were exempt from attending the worship of the established church, holding public office, bearing arms, and taking the oath. They were even protected against "mockery" (as it is stated in the Friedrichstadt privilege). For all this they only had to be recorded in special registers and to pay a special tax.

The situation of the princes of the Empire in this time as well as their opinions and intentions are rather remarkably revealed by the Neuwied privilege of 1680. The count had asked the Mennonites to attend the official (Reformed) services, but they had asked him to release them from this obligation. So the count pondered and said in his privilege: He was entitled to enforce his requirements, for the imperial law of 1529 expressly forbade tolerating Mennonites in the Roman Empire, and the Peace of Münster of 1648 only permitted Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Reformed, and even the Imperial Court when authorizing this new residence did not include the Mennonites. But on the other hand they were living quietly, the electors of Brandenburg and the Palatinate and the duke of Holstein and others occasionally tolerated them and so disregarded the law of 1529, and at least he was a free "Imperial Estate" as well, and so by tacit understanding empowered to do the same. And so he gave the privilege in the face of the imperial laws which had settled the problem otherwise. Not the Empire, but the individual territory possessed the real power.

To understand the system of privileges within the territories it must be pointed out that in this period people did not live under equal rights for all, but that rights were differentiated according to the political, social, ecclesiastical, and economic position of the person in question. Thus at Crefeld, e.g., there was no difficulty in releasing the Mennonites from the oath, since the Reformed clergy were liberated from this obligation also, as is seen incidentally from a report concerning the oath of allegiance. Besides, such privileges gave the princes an opportunity to secure able artisans, etc., and in this time of mercantilism it was quite common for princes to attract such persons from one another. Just as arbitrarily as privileges were given, citizenship was also transferred: at Elbing (q.v.) as early as 1585, at Tönning (q.v.) in Eiderstedt in 1607, at Crefeld (q.v.) in 1678, at Königsberg and Marienburg (q.v.) ca. 1750, at Danzig (q.v.) and in Bavaria (q.v.) not before 1800.

Though much scattered by the migrations, under these conditions the Mennonites of Germany reached the culminating point of their history in this period as far as economics were concerned. It may here be sufficient to name David Möllinger (q.v., 1709-86), "the father of the agriculture of the Palatinate," the von der Leyens (q.v.) and the silk industry at Crefeld, the Roosens (q.v.) at Hamburg, and the van der Smissens (q.v.) at Altona, shipowners and whalers of the first rank; or also the gifted mechanic and clockmaker Peter Kinsing (q.v., 1745-1816) at Neuwied, and the strong Bouman family with its manifold trade at Emden. A real host of Mennonite entrepreneurs at many places promoted the economic advance of their respective areas; kingly merchants they often were, especially in the Lower Rhine district and on the Lower Elbe.

Spiritual Life. As to the spiritual life, the northern settlements (Holstein, etc., and Prussia proper) in the beginning were dependent on the Netherlands, and the southern (Palatinate and its daughter colonies) on Switzerland. The Lower Rhine and East Friesland in their turn were already geographically as neighbors in constant contact with the Netherlands. Visits and exchange of preachers for a long time helped in this direction.

When in the north, e.g., Gerhard Wiebe (q.v., Flemish elder of Elbing 1778-98) had documents copied (Heubudener Urkundenbuch) which he regarded of particular importance also for his congregation and his time, there were among these documents some relating to the division of 1557 (Menno against the Waterlander, Jülich, and South German-Swiss leaders), that of 1567 (Flemish against Frisian), and that of 1586 (Contra-Housebuyers against Housebuyers). In the case of Quirin Vermeulen and Hans von Schwinderen (q.v.), elder and preacher of Danzig (1583-88), and for a later controversy at Haarlem in 1631, the documents show a vivid interchange of opinions and judgments.

So even in 1759 the Dutch divisions were still maintained in East Friesland, in the Holstein region, and in Prussia proper. Old Flemish of the Groningen branch had congregations at Emden, Leer, Neustadt-Goedens (q.v.), and Norden in East Friesland, and at Przechowka, etc. (q.v.), near Schwetz in Prussia proper. Those of the Danzig Old Flemish branch appear at Danzig, Elbing, Gross-Werder (q.v.), Heubuden (q.v.), Königsberg, and Nieschewski (q.v.) near Thorn, all in Prussia proper. The Flemish (alone or combined with Frisians and Waterlanders) had congregations at Emden, Leer, and Norden in East Friesland, at Friedrichstadt and Hamburg-Altona in the Holstein region. Finally the Frisians or Waterlanders (the names change) were represented at Danzig, the Gross Werder (later Orlofferfelde, q.v.), Lithuania (q.v.; the Tilsit region), Montau (q.v.), and Schweinsgrube (q.v.; later Tragheimerweide) in Prussia proper. At Emden and Hamburg-Altona the congregations had joined the conservative Zonists (q.v.) in 1674 and 1682 respectively. But at Emden and Leer in 1767, at Norden in 1780, and at Danzig in 1808, the congregations were again united.

In 1739 and following years a discipline controversy about wigs, shoe buckles, etc., at Danzig was settled after the Dutch brethren had been asked for their judgment. In 1776 at Hamburg a German translation of the Ris confession of faith (q.v.; 1766 at Hoorn) was published, which remained in use in German congregations until the 19th century.

But soon an independent spirit announced itself among the German Mennonites alongside of the dependency on Dutch developments, especially in literary productions by the settlements on the Elbe and on the Vistula. In 1660 the first German confession of faith appeared at Danzig. Georg Hansen (q.v., d. 1703), a shoemaker, from 1655 deacon and preacher and 1690-1703 elder of the Flemish congregation at Danzig, published a catechism in 1671 and a confession of faith in 1678. Gerrit Roosen (q.v., 1612-1711), a merchant, from 1649 deacon, from 1660 preacher, from 1663 elder of the Flemish congregation of Hamburg-Altona, in 1702 also published a catechism (Christliches Gemüthsgespräch) and an apologetic (Unschuld und Gegenbericht). Heinrich Donner (q.v., 1735-1804), Frisian elder of Orlofferfelde since 1772, and Gerhard Wiebe (see above) in 1778 and 1783 published a catechism, which as the Elbing-Waldeck-Zweibrücken catechism was one of the most widely used in Europe and in America. In 1792 Gerhard Wiebe also published a confession of faith.

A new influence from the Netherlands began with the introduction of trained and salaried ministers, e.g., at Crefeld since 1770, who received their education more and more at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, established in 1735.

In the South the Palatine Mennonites also showed a continued dependence on Switzerland. Peter Ramseyer (q.v., b. 1706), from 1730 preacher and from 1732 elder of the Jura congregation, for 20 years (1762-82) again and again traveled to the Palatinate to settle dissension there. The Amish (q.v.) division of 1693 especially affected the settlers in the Palatinate. Amish congregations arose by migration from the Netherlands to Volhynia; the most northern points they reached in Germany were Mengeringhausen (q.v.) in Waldeck, and Petershagen (q.v.) in Minden west of Hanover. The Amish remained in strong contact with each other, at least from Alsace to Waldeck, at meetings where "Ordnungsbriefe" supplemented earlier decisions on discipline. Hans Nafziger (q.v.), from 1731 preacher and later elder at Essingen (q.v.) in the Palatinate, a central figure in his time, held such meetings at his place in 1759 and 1779. In 1765 he traveled to the Netherlands to settle dissension among the Amish there. In 1780 he published the only edition of the Martyrs' Mirror in German in Germany at Pirmasens, together with Peter Weber (see below). In 1781 he wrote a letter to the Amish in Holland as a kind of formulary for baptism, marriage, and ordinations.

Outside Influences. As religious discrimination from 1650 on gradually lost much of its former intensity, the Mennonites could come into contact with religious movements outside their group. In fact, the Mennonite congregations not seldom proved themselves to be a fertile ground for such movements. Among the outside influences were (1) Quakers, (2) Dompelaars, and (3) Pietists.

(1) The Quakers (q.v.) appeared at Kriegsheim (q.v.) in the Palatinate soon after the Mennonites, gained some of them for their convictions, and had a congregation of their own there 1657-86, when they emigrated to Pennsylvania. They also appeared at Hamburg-Altona in 1659, but not being allowed to stay there soon left again, taking with them some Mennonites, among them the preacher Berend Roelofs (q.v.). They were at Crefeld also in 1667-83. In the latter year they induced 13 families (formerly Mennonites) to emigrate to Pennsylvania, where they founded Germantown (q.v.)—only one remained Mennonite in the long run; it was the first group of Germans to reach the later United States of America.

(2) The Dompelaars (q.v.) were found at Hamburg-Altona in 1648-1746, having their own congregation alongside the Mennonite congregation from ca. 1656 on, their own church building from 1708. Their most prominent preacher was Jacob Denner (q.v., 1659-1746) from 1684, at Lübeck 1687-94, at Friedrichstadt 1694-98, at Danzig 1698-1702, and then again at Altona until his death. He preached for an interdenominational audience. Perhaps the group was influenced by the Dutch Collegiants (q.v.) or by the English Baptists (q.v.). The Dompelaars found at Crefeld in 1705-25 were of another kind, viz., Dunkers (q.v.), who in 1719 also turned to Pennsylvania. In the Mennonite congregation at Crefeld for some time one preacher, Gossen Goyen (q.v., 1667-1737), advocated baptism by immersion, himself being rebaptized in 1724 in the Rhine, and another, Jan Crous (q.v., 1670-1729), advocated baptism by sprinkling.

(3) The Pietists (q.v.) exercised an especially long and far-reaching influence upon the German Mennonites. It came both from the outside and also through Mennonite channels. In Holland the outstanding Mennonite Pietist was Jan Deknatel (q.v., 1698-1759), from 1726 the minister of the congregation 't Lam at Amsterdam, converted (in the Pietist sense) in 1734 and standing in close relations with the Moravians (q.v.) and the Methodists (q.v.). On the Lower Rhine Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v., 1697-1769), Reformed, from 1725 an interdenominational spiritual adviser, gained a similar position.

In 1735-69 Tersteegen was in close contact with the Crefeld Mennonites and later also with Lorenz Friedenreich (q.v., ca. 1728-94), from 1758 elder of the Mennonite congregation at Neuwied. Friedenreich, in this time of letter writing and traveling and exchange of books and pamphlets, served as a liaison officer in all directions. In his last years Deknatel became instrumental in the conversion of Peter Weber (q.v., 1731-81), a weaver and from 1757-58 until his death preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Höningen near Altleiningen (q.v.) in the Palatinate. Abraham Krehbiel (q.v., d. 1804), farmer and preacher (from 1766) of the Mennonite congregation at the Weierhof (q.v.), was also from his ordination on in contact with Weber, Tersteegen, and Deknatel's son. It was as in a missionary family, and thus also the name-lists (Naamlijst), which at Deknatel's instigation were published at Amsterdam from 1731 on, and the endeavor to make them complete, widened the circle more and more. Under the pietist influence even a correspondence between Prussia proper and the Palatinate, so far distant from one another, was started (1768-73). Hans van Steen (q.v., 1705-81), elder of the Flemish congregation at Danzig from 1754, and Martin Möllinger (q.v., 1698-1774), brother of David Möllinger, preacher of the congregation at Mannheim (q.v.) from 1753, were the principal writers. Some letters also came from Gerhard Wiebe (see above) and Frienenreich, Weber, etc. Pietists in West Prussia were Isaak van Dühren (q.v., 1725-1800), converted in 1772, from 1775 preacher of the Danzig Frisian congregation, who in 1787 published a German extract from the Martyrs' Mirror, and Cornelius Regier (q.v., 1743-94), from 1764 preacher, 1771 elder of the Heubuden congregation. On the Elbe a stronghold of Pietism was the van der Smissen family, particularly Gysbert III (q.v., 1717-93) and his son Jacob Gysbert (q.v., 1746-1829), who already in 1766-68 on his cavalier's tour with his cousin Hinrich III (1742-1814) visited in England the great evangelist and cofounder of Methodism George Whitefield, and in Germany Tersteegen and the Moravian settlements, Herrnhut and Niesky. At his advice this cousin in 1781 engaged as a tutor for his many children Johann Wilhelm Mannhardt (q.v., 1760-1831), a member of the Tübingen Stift, who in 1790 married one of his pupils, thus combining these two families, which were prominent among the German Mennonites, especially in the 19th century.

Assimilation. In addition to these relations with more or less kindred movements the Christian church in general, and the great world also, entered the scene. Gerrit Roosen (see above) had already taken a position as a conservative as well as irenical trying to recommend the controversial Mennonite teaching to society as "harmless": Mennonitism in assimilation. At Friedrichstadt two Ovens (q.v.), father and son, were during 1711-82 successively one of the two burgomasters of the town: public offices were no longer abhorred. In London in 1766 the young van der Smissens (see above) enjoyed seeing English soldiers at drill; at Neuwied the young men of the Mennonite congregation in 1804 wanted to meet their new prince on horseback, with swords buckled on, like other young citizens: the principle of nonresistance was at least softened. And even Gerhard Wiebe (see above) in his confession of faith of 1792 dropped the idea of a visible congregation of saints and accepted that of an invisible church.

Whereas at Danzig in 1697 the painter Enoch Seemann (q.v., b. ca. 1660) was banned for painting portraits (Second Commandment), at Hamburg-Altona Balthasar Denner (q.v., 1685-1749) and Dominicus van der Smissen (q.v., 1705-60), the son and son-in-law of Jacob Denner (see above), were "the last German portraitists of international importance." After the Swedish General Stenbock had burned the town of Altona in 1713, Hinrich I van der Smissen (q.v., 1662-1737, father of Gysbert III) rebuilt it, thus becoming known as "the city builder." Berend Roosen (see above) discovered the famous architect Sonnin and had him build his home, one of the finest in Hamburg in the 18th century. Later the great Mennonite manufacturers gave Crefeld its architectural character by their monumental homes, one of their homes even being called "the castle" (now the town hall).

In 1687 and 1688 the Danzig congregation helped the Jesuits and the Lutherans respectively to build their churches; in 1750-51 the Hamburg-Altona congregation helped to rebuild the Lutheran St. Michael's Church; in 1779 the Emden congregation shared in the costs of a Reformed peace festival. In 1732 the Danzig Mennonites made a contribution for the Salzburg (q.v.) exiles; for decades the Friedrichstadt Mennonites had done the same for the poor Lutherans of their town. In Crefeld the van der Leyens (see above) in 1738 had Roman Catholic, Lutherans, and Reformed among their laborers and in 1789 promoted social contacts between members of different denominations.

In this course of events it is not astonishing to see also the Mennonite church buildings and services adapted to the surrounding culture. Many of the new church buildings—in 1751 Orlofferfelde, 1754 Rosenort (q.v.), 1768 Fürstenwerder (q.v.), Heubuden, Ladekopp (q.v.), and Tiegenhagen (q.v.), 1776 Gruppe (q.v.), 1783 Ellerwald (q.v., all in West Prussia), 1778 Sembach (q.v.), 1779 Eppstein (q.v.), 1784 Heppenheim (q.v., all in the Palatinate); also the old churches—1586 Montau, 1618 Schönsee (q.v.), 1638 and 1648 Danzig, 1675 and 1715 Altona, 1693 Crefeld, 1769 Emden—indeed were modest buildings. But Elbing (1590) and Friedrichstadt (1708) were fine patrician buildings, and Norden (1796) was even a finer one in a splendid rococo style. The Spitalhof (q.v., 1682) held its services in a beautiful old Gothic chapel. The church of Neuwied (1768) has already been mentioned. Organs were first admitted to German Mennonite churches at Altona (1764) and at Norden (1797).

Language was long a great barrier between the immigrant German Mennonites and the native Protestants or Catholics. This was not so true in the South, where the Swiss dialect was apparently soon given up and the High German literary idiom commonly used from the start, but in the North things were more complicated. The Mennonites from Holland of course brought the Dutch church language of their old home with them into the new one. The congregations on the Dutch-German border so close to the Netherlands, which was enjoying its political and cultural Golden Age in the 17th century, naturally also felt the Dutch influence in the matter of language. Yet naturally in the course of time the Dutch language for church services, in partly alien, partly changed surroundings, with no support from the language in general use, declined and was pushed aside. It is easy to understand that this development took place most rapidly at the most advanced Anabaptist-Mennonite outpost, in West Prussia around Danzig. By 1671 Georg Hansen (see above) lamented that the young people read German better than Dutch. So in the rural congregations at Heubuden in West Prussia in the 1750's and the city congregation at Danzig in the 1760's and 1770's the ministers began to preach their sermons in German. Farther to the west the proximity of the Netherlands was of strong influence; also the fact that the educated ministers called by these congregations had to be obtained from the Netherlands or had to get their training in the Dutch universities and especially in the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. In 1786 at Hamburg and Altona Reinhard Rahusen (q.v., 1735-93) first began the use of High German in the newly introduced weekday services; in general the High German language was not used here in sermons until 1839 and in the church records not until the 1880's. Crefeld used German after 1818, Friedrichstadt after 1826.

MODERN MENNONITISM IN GERMANY, 1800-1950

Nonresistance, etc. For the history of the Mennonites in Germany a turning point came when the French Revolution did away with local independence and local privileges, in 1789 proclaiming "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity" as the rights of all men, and in 1793 introducing universal compulsory service. Napoleon moderated this law in 1800 by allowing substitutes under special conditions, but enforced it anew in 1806. Since the treaties of Basel (1795) and of Campo Formio (1797), the Rheinbund (1806), and the treaty of Tilsit (1807) ceded the left border of the Rhine to France and placed practically all Germany west of the Elbe under the control of Napoleon I, similar decrees followed, especially in the South German states.

In the face of this danger to nonresistance the Mennonites of the Palatinate as early as 1802 sought contact with those of the Netherlands. In 1803 and 1805 at Ibersheim representatives of Rhenish congregations professed anew their adherence to the principles of nonconformity and nonresistance. Several delegates were sent to Paris on behalf of their privileges. In vain; no exceptions were allowed, only perhaps substitutes. But to obtain substitutes was rather expensive. Some congregations even regarded paying substitutes as contrary to nonresistance. For some time some of the congregations paid for the poor members who could not pay the substitutes. But later on this practice was discontinued, since nonconcerned members opposed it. So, on the one hand many emigrated to America in 1830-60; on the other hand, as the conditions continued, those remaining in South Germany gradually gave up the principle of nonresistance. The catechisms of the Palatinate and Hesse (i.e., old Palatinate on the left border of the Rhine) of 1861, and of Baden (i.e., old Palatinate on the right border of the Rhine: the Kraichgau and Baden-Durlach) of 1865 had already tacitly dropped the principle. Early in the 20th century, when Georg Wünsch (q.v.) asked a young farmer in Baden why he did not follow the traditional order, this Mennonite answered, "When every man goes, we can't stay at home."

In North Germany the kingdom of Prussia after the peace of Vienna in 1815 comprised the following Mennonite population: East Prussia 678; West Prussia 12,497; Brandenburg, etc., 692; Rhine Province and Westphalia 1,289, making a total of 15,156 Mennonites (souls). In the Rhine Province alone in 1812-27, in the government district of Düsseldorf (Crefeld, etc.), Aachen, and Cologne, there were about 883; of Coblenz (Neuwied, etc., and Trier) about 353, including some Amish, making a total of about 1,236 Mennonites (souls).

As to the western provinces of Prussia, their different parts had belonged to various states and were only now united into a larger political body. Since the eastern provinces lived under older decrees (see below), the government, after the Prussian military law of 1814 was promulgated, tried to find a similar status for those of the west. A first report was given by the Minister of the Interior in 1817, a second by a commission of the Royal Council in 1819 (Menno, several confessions including that of Dordrecht and that of Ris, the Latin history by Schijn, works on Mennonites by Zeidler in 1698, Rues in 1743, Crichton in 1786, and Starck in 1789, and other general works were cited). There was a lively correspondence between King Frederick William III and the Oberpräsident on the one side, with the congregations, especially Crefeld, on the other. Even a small Amish group at Offhausen (Altenkirchen district) received an answer from Chancellor Hardenberg. In 1826 the king ordered that all heads of Mennonite families be questioned about their position on nonresistance. In 1830 the law on the rights of the Mennonites (and Quakers) in the western provinces and Brandenburg was published. Most of the families asked accepted military service and thus became ordinary citizens. The smaller part refused military service, and were obliged to pay a special income tax of 3 per cent, were not allowed to acquire new property, and were admitted to communal, but not to state offices; new settlements were forbidden. Thus the new legal status was established. In the North as well as in South Germany many, particularly the Amish, emigrated to America in 1830-60, particularly from Nassau, Hesse, and Waldeck. Among those who remained in Germany there were frequently cases—at Friedrichstadt, at Hamburg-Altona, and in the 1820's even at Crefeld—when individuals more or less successfully tried to evade military service. In Hamburg occurred the remarkable case that in 1818 a Mennonite Lieutenant Jansen complained to the military authorities of being excommunicated by the congregation on account of his military service; it was rather surprising to him that the authorities advised him to return to civilian life. Yet the Hamburg congregation lost ground notwithstanding. Whereas in 1837 they had asserted that substitutes were as objectionable as personal service, by 1851 they had to be satisfied with avoiding personal service by the use of substitutes.

Little by little, as in South Germany, the attitude of the Mennonites in North Germany concerning nonresistance changed. Already in 1831 the congregations of East Friesland (in 1815-66 belonging to the Kingdom of Hanover) had relinquished this principle, as they then officially declared to the authorities.

In 1848 the first German parliament in the Paulskirche at Frankfurt became something like another turning point in nonresistance. A Mennonite banker of Crefeld, Hermann von Beckerath (q.v., 1801-70), a member of this parliament (and of the Prussian parliament as well) and of its committee for the constitution and even one of its ministers, discussing the fundamental laws, on Aug. 28 declared: "I think myself fortunate in belonging to one of the freest denominations. The time of privileges is gone. The modern state requires equal rights for all citizens. So the Rhenish Mennonites with only few exceptions are rendering their military service. Nonresistance with them is no longer an integral part of their creed." So an amendment in favor of nonresistance for the Mennonites offered by the members from Danzig was lost. Many applauded: a real confession! Indeed, these Mennonites of West and South Germany now regarded nonresistance no longer as a fundamental article of their creed, but as a privilege no longer tolerable because it was injurious to the rights of fellow citizens.

In 1867 even the conference of Offenthal (q.v.; near St. Goarshausen on the Rhine in Nassau), where Mennonites and Amish of the Palatinate, Neuwied, Nassau, and Hesse (the duchy of Nassau and the electorate of Hesse having just been added to Prussia) met to come to an agreement, though confessing nonresistance as an article of the creed, ruled: "But how each congregation and each young man will indeed prove our old-Mennonite nonresistance, in order to satisfy his own conscience and the demands of the authorities, we leave to the judgment of each of them." This was the formula later often repeated to save the principle and at the same time abandon it.

The situation in Prussia proper was more fortunate. In the same year (1818) when at Hamburg Lieutenant Jansen sought in vain to return to his congregation in spite of his military service, the same thing happened to a David van Riesen of Elbing who had served in the Wars of Liberation and had nevertheless also tried to return to his congregation with the help of the courts. The emigration to Russia from 1788 on alleviated the economic difficulties (as the buying of property here was also limited) for those who remained. Besides, the "everlasting" privilege of 1780 gave a matchless support. But after 1848 the Mennonites of Prussia proper also had to realize the change of the times. There was the new Prussian constitution which proclaimed equal rights and equal duties for all (Dec. 5, 1848). At Frankfurt in August 1848 the Danzig members of the parliament (Martens and Osterrath) had in vain pleaded for the Mennonite privilege of nonresistance, pleading for tolerance. The West Prussian congregations met on Sept. 14, 1848, at Heubuden and sent a petition to Frankfurt to recognize their convictions, but in vain. At Berlin in February 1849 delegates of the congregations met the Prime Minister of Brandenburg and at least obtained a postponement. But the discussions about the nonresistance of the Prussian Mennonites, their special tax and their limitations in buying new property continued. Peter Froese (q.v., d. 1853), elder of Orlofferfelde 1830-53, wrote a pamphlet in 1850 once more defending nonresistance as an article of the Mennonite creed, and Wilhelm Mannhardt (q.v., 1831-80), the noted folklorist, in 1863 did the same by means of thorough historical research (Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten).

Even in 1867 the Prussian government proposed, in a bill concerning military service, exempting the members of those Mennonite and Quaker families who by laws or privileges were released from direct service, but obliging them to furnish an equivalent. Yet on Oct. 18, 1867, the first Imperial Diet of the North German Confederation (the nucleus of the later German Empire) rejected this paragraph so that now all Mennonites had to serve in the army. Gerhard Penner (q.v., 1805-78), the elder of the Heubuden congregation 1852-77, was informed of this vote the same day by wire. On the 23rd representatives of the Prussian congregations met in his house at Warnau (Koczelitzky) and a delegation of five set out at once for Berlin and on the 24th called on the Minister of War (Roon). Nevertheless the law was published on Nov. 9, 1867. Summoned by the members of parliament of their region in February 1868 the five traveled to Berlin once more and for a whole week (Feb. 18-26) called on the king and the crown prince, ministers and privy councilors, members of the parliament, etc. Most impressive was what the crown prince said; viz., that the whole royal house was trying to help them; he warned them against emigration to Russia and advised them at least to reserve a return for their children, as probably in Russia matters would soon turn the same way. In this very week, on Feb. 20, the ministers of War and of Interior in a common report recommended that the members of the older Mennonite families who were not willing to serve with arms might be trained as nurses, wagoners, etc., only. These proposals were sanctioned by the Order of Cabinet of the king on March 3, 1868. As a consequence of the new course the limitation as to property and the special tax on the Mennonites were rescinded.

The Prussian Mennonites reacted in several ways to these transactions and decisions. A smaller part emigrated to Russia (1853 f.) and to America (1873 f.). Those remaining were divided into a group which strongly clung to the Order of Cabinet, and another which was willing to serve with arms. The congregation of Montau-Gruppe was split into two for half a century on this question. In 1909-14, of the 200 young Mennonites of Prussia proper in contact with their congregations nearly one half followed the Order of Cabinet, and the rest served with arms. In this respect for West and East Prussia World War I signified the end of nonresistance. In 1933 when the curatorium of the Vereinigung discussed the question of a new universal compulsory service nobody proposed asking for another "privilege." Even the confession of faith of the Mennonites in Prussia (1895), which forbade revenging oneself on one's neighbor, merely urged its members as far as possible to avoid the outrages of war. The German martyrs of nonresistance in World War II included only one Lutheran and many Jehovah's Witnesses, but no Mennonites. After the war American and Dutch Mennonite influences, as well as the impressions of the war, resulted in a new nonresistant trend. The new German constitution of 1950 makes provision for alternative service for conscientious objectors.

As to the problem of the oath, regulations exempting Mennonites in the courts and as officials were made in Württemberg in 1807, in Bavaria in 1811, in Nassau in 1822, in the older provinces of Prussia in 1827, etc. Under Hitler it was rather easy to get such exemptions for soldiers in the army as early as 1935. But in certain other respects there was a long struggle, the oath being regarded by the National Socialists as a special foundation of the state; hence many had to render an oath, as the authorities ordered, even by radio, and many did so without scruples, although ultimately the requirement was waived for Mennonites.

As to public offices, for the 19th century at least two South German Mennonites may be named besides Hermann von Beckerath (see above) in the North, namely, Peter Eymann (q.v., 1788-1855), a miller of Sembach (Palatinate), assistant preacher of his congregation, who was mayor of Frankenstein and in 1849 a Liberal member of the Bavarian parliament, and Jacob Finger (q.v., 1825-1904), a lawyer of Monsheim (Hesse), in 1862-65 a member of the Hessian parliament and in 1884-98 minister of state. A look at the Mennonite Adressbuch of 1936 reveals all the difficulties of the question of officeholding in a modern state such as Germany. Mail, telegraph, and railways are managed by the state, and many schools and libraries also. But is working in them a public office in the sense of earlier times? And if we find a good many Mennonites in these offices, what about Mennonites in the administration of customs or in the revenue department? But then it is only a step to the courts and the police and then again only one more to serving as captain or admiral. At any rate, the principle of avoiding public offices was nearly forgotten. Sometimes and in some places (Berlin, Crefeld) there were Mennonites in an amazing number of public offices.

In 1874 a Prussian law allowed Mennonite congregations to incorporate. After 1924 Gustav Reimer (1884-1955) in a series of lawsuits liberated the Mennonites of Prussia proper (including the Free City of Danzig) from the obligation of paying taxes to the Protestant established church.

As to nonconformity nobody wanted to be very conspicuous, different, or shocking. At the end of the 19th century nonconformity was gradually dropped even by the Amish. On the other hand, even between the world wars, e.g., 1918-39 in the Palatinate, it was a problem whether girls might be allowed to bob their hair. Sometime later even the older women had bobbed hair. Technical progress often did away with traditional fashions. Thus the world overcame nonconformity.

Foreign Influences. But also spiritual influences of the surrounding life helped to bring about change in the character of the Mennonite congregations in Germany. There was the Reveil (q.v.) in Holland in the early 19th century with its interest in missions and Bible distribution. Even in Crefeld in 1818-34 the minister Isaac Molenaar (q.v., 1776-1834), in close contact with Holland, was a spokesman of this renewal of Pietism. The English Baptist William Henry Angas (q.v., d. 1832) visited West Prussia in 1823 and the Palatinate in 1824 to make propaganda for the missions which the Baptists had started with William Carey in 1792. The Basel Mission (founded in 1815) in the South, the Berlin Mission (founded in 1824) in the North, and later (1847 ff.) the Mission of the Dutch Mennonites also were supported by the offerings of the German Mennonites. At present there is a German Mennonite Committee for Missions as a branch of an all-European Mennonite Mission Board (see E.M.E.K.). There was the "Gemeinschaftsbewegung" (q.v.) in the late 19th century with its Gospel songs which won the South more or less, in West Prussia particularly the Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart (q.v.) congregation. Pietistic influences in general came especially from St. Chrischona (q.v., founded in 1840) and many similar schools. From 1858 on the Hahnsche (q.v.) Pietists of Württemberg with their universalism reached two congregations of Baden. As the Northwest German congregations (Lower Rhine and East Friesland) were in character like the Dutch congregations, quite different influences are found here. From the Netherlands and from the universities rationalism, liberalism, and modernism found their way into these congregations. Gustav Kraemer (q.v., 1863-1948) in Crefeld (from 1903) and J. G. Appeldoorn (q.v., 1862-1945) in Emden (1904-16) were prominent representatives of these tendencies, the one coming from the German Protestant Church, the other from Holland, to which he later returned. A milder liberalism had appeared earlier in Prussia proper with Carl Harder (q.v., 1820-96), pastor at Neuwied 1857-69 and at Elbing in the progressive town congregation 1869-96, and with Hermann Gottlieb Mannhardt (q.v., 1855-1927), pastor at Danzig from 1879. In general confessional boundaries have become lax in certain areas. So we find non-Mennonite pastors of Mennonite congregations (Crefeld, Monsheim), and the opposite as well (Kiel).

The pietistic wing of the German Mennonites was since 1857 in constant contact with the Evangelical Alliance (q.v.), represented for instance by Pastor H. van der Smissen of Hamburg. The South German Conference (see below) was represented at the World Conference for Faith and Order at Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1927 (Benjamin H. Unruh). The Vereinigung has belonged officially since 1930 to the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. In 1947-48 the Vereinigung became a member of the World Council of Churches and one of the founders of the Committee of Christian Churches in Germany. In the World Council meeting at Amsterdam in 1948 it was represented (Ernst Crous and Otto Schowalter).

It must be admitted that there was a great change from the 16th-century Anabaptists to the 19th-century Mennonites and from the old Mennonites to the modern Mennonites in the 19th century. But we may also acknowledge that these changes in some respects at least have been helpful. We cannot deny that the little river ran through the centuries again and again in several smaller branches and two bigger ones, that the number of Mennonites in Germany absolutely and relatively diminished, and that much of the best substance was lost by so many emigrations. But it is nevertheless a fact that even under such conditions until our own time the Anabaptist-Mennonite vision, old and new, has in one way or the other accomplished something in the brotherhood.

In economic life it is worth noting that numerous Mennonites of the city congregations of Crefeld, Emden, Gronau, Hamburg, and Danzig became successful and wealthy merchants and manufacturers, but that the Mennonites of West Prussia and South Germany remained essentially farmers and achieved a splendid reputation in this field.

Internal Migrations. As the emigrations to Russia and to America weakened the position of the Mennonites in the homeland, so also the inland migration dispersed the few remaining over a larger area. There were movements to the East especially in South Germany, 1802 along the Danube, from 1818 and again since 1880 to Upper Bavaria. There was also the tendency to leave the rural areas and settle in the large cities. In Berlin (q.v.), for instance, there has been a congregation since 1887, in Munich one since 1893, in Stuttgart one since 1933. A large number of German Mennonites are now living far away from their home congregations. The statistics show a steady relative decline, e.g., in Prussia proper from a ratio of 127 in 1816 to 70 in 1858 to a population of 100,000; and absolutely, e.g., in Bavaria (without Palatinate), from 1,053 in 1875 to 783 in 1910. In 1910 the census gives the number of Mennonites in West Prussia as ca. 10,000, in the rest of North Germany ca. 4,000, in the Palatinate ca. 2,500, in South Germany east of the Rhine also ca. 2,500, in Alsace-Lorraine ca. 2,000. A real catastrophe was the flight and expulsion from West Prussia proper in 1945. This great tragedy meant unnumbered tragedies in single families and individuals; many perished, even by suicide. For some time many that fled to Denmark were kept there. In 1948 and 1951 more than 1,000 emigrated to Uruguay. In Western Germany refugee congregations had to be founded: Göttingen (q.v.) in 1945, later Bremen (q.v.), Bergisches Land (q.v., near Cologne), Kiel (q.v.), Uelzen (q.v.), etc.; Frankfurt on the Main (q.v.) was revived in 1948. Berlin was much enlarged (1940—406, 1955—1,122), also Hamburg (from 338 to 935), Crefeld (ca. 800 to 1,880), and Neuwied (ca. 20 to ca. 500). One thousand turned to the Palatinate. In 1955 the German congregations with membership (total 14,068 souls) were, according to the Mennonitischer Gemeinde-Kalender, as follows (the word "souls" meaning total population including unbaptized children):

North Germany—8,694 souls

Old Congregations
Berlin	1,122
Hamburg	935
Friedrichstadt	39
Neuwied	500
Emden	280
Leer	50
Norden	155
Gronau	110
Crefeld	1,880
	5,071

New Congregations
Bergisches Land	275
Bremen	500
Espelkamp	135
Göttingen	543
Kiel	436
Lübeck	189
Uelzen	465
Schleswig-Holstein	380
Westphalia	700
	3,623

South Germany—5,374 souls

Palatinate-Hesse
Friedelsheim	180
Kohlhof	70
Ibersheim	185
Eppstein	120
Ludwigshafen-Friesenheim	90
Monsheim	310
Obersülzen	221
Kaiserslautern	91
Kühbörncheshof	209
Zweibrücken	245
Saarland	87
Sembach	400
Neudorferhof	138
Altleiningen	40
Weierhof	560
Uffhofen	58
Bavaria
(Bavaria, not in the Verband)
Eichstock	32
Munich	185
Regensburg	156
	3,277
Frankfurt on the Main	170
	3,447

Gemeindeverband Palatinate
Branchweilerhof	65
Deutschhof	122
Baden
Adelsheim	41
Bretten	32
Durlach	131
Hasselbach	94
Heidelberg	42
Schopfheim	31
Sinsheim	120
Ueberlingen	87
Wössingen	64
Württemberg
Backnang	235
Heilbronn	177
Möckmühl	25
Nesselbach	32
Reutlingen	131
Stuttgart	135
Bavaria
Augsburg	60
Ingolstadt	135
Nürnberg	30
Trappstadt	65
Würzburg-Giebelstadt	73
	1,927

E.C.

LITERATURE OF THE GERMAN MENNONITES

The literature of the Mennonites in Germany, excluding the 16th-century Anabaptists and omitting small pamphlets and ephemeral literature, falls into six categories: (1) reprints of Dutch Mennonite books; (2) sermon collections; (3) devotional literature and church manuals such as confessions, catechisms, and prayerbooks; (4) historical writings; (5) hymnbooks, and (6) general theological and Biblical literature.

Of the last category remarkably little has been produced by native German Mennonites; they seem to have produced no substantial general writers throughout their history. The entire list includes only five writers: (1) Gerhard Ewert, Gross-Lunau near Culm (Sieben Betrachtungen, 1843); (2) Peter Froese, elder at Orlofferfelde (Liebreiche Erinnerung . . . von der Wehrlosigkeit, 1850); (3) Karl Harder, preacher at Neuwied and Elbing, who published (with the help of others) three volumes of Blätter für Religion and Erziehung, 1869-71; (4) Philipp Kieferndorf, preacher at Monsheim (Der Eid, 1891); and (5) Horst Quiring, preacher at Berlin (Grundworte des Glaubens, 1938, a theological dictionary). Jakob Kroeker (1872-1948), an outstanding writer with over 20 titles of quality to his credit (e.g., Das lebendige Wort, 14 vv. of O.T. exposition), was a Russian Mennonite who came to Germany permanently in 1910 and served as an interdenominational speaker and writer without membership in any German Mennonite group.

(1) The list of German translations of Dutch Mennonite authors is extensive: Menno Simons, Ein Fundamentbuch (n.p., 1575; 2nd ed. undated), Die Fundamente (Danzig, 1835), translated by P. van Riesen, Ausgang aus dem Papsttum (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1700), and Kurzer Auszug (Büdingen, 1758 and Königsberg, 1765); Dirk Philips, Enchiridion (1715, with three smaller tracts) and Von der Ehe der Christen (1765); T. J. van Braght, Tugendschule (1743) and Märtyrer-Spiegel, reprinted from the Ephrata, Pa., 1748 edition at Pirmasens in 1780; H. Schijn, Erster Anfang von dem christlichen Gottesdienst (1743); J. Deknatel, Anleitung zum Christlichen Glauben, a catechism (Amsterdam, 1756; reprints Neuwied 1790, Worms 1829, Alzey 1839); two confessions: (a) Dordrecht of 1632 in German first at Amsterdam, 1664 and 1691, then n.p., 1686, 1711, and 1742, further at Zweibrücken in 1854 and Regensburg in 1876; (b) Cornelis Ris confession of 1766 at Hamburg 1776 and 1850; the first (a) becoming the confession of the Amish, the second (b) that of the North German Mennonites. Deknatel's sermons were also published in German translation at Büdingen in 1757. J. P. Schabalie's famous Wandelnde Seele had at least nine European German editions, among them Basel 1741, 1770, 1811, Frankfurt and Leipzig 1758, 1770, and 1860.

(2) The printed sermon collections were fairly numerous, seventeen of more than two sermons being listed in 1730-1909 in the exhaustive "Annotated Bibliography of Published Mennonite Sermons" (MQR XXVII, 1953, 145-49), beginning with Jakob Denner of Hamburg and including Rahusen of Leer, I. Kröcker of Königsberg, L. Weydmann and Isaac Molenaar of Crefeld, I. A. Hoekstra of Hamburg, H. Reeder of Weierhof, J. Molenaar of Monsheim, C. Harder of Neuwied and Elbing, H. G. Mannhardt of Danzig, J. P. Müller of Emden, and three series of sermons by various preachers (Menn. Bl. supplements 1887-89, Predigten aus Mennoniten-Gemeinden 1891-99, 9 vv., and Predigten vorgetragen in den Mennoniten Gemeinden Westpreussens 1906-09, 2).

(3) The devotional literature and church manuals include, besides the Dordrecht and Cornelis Ris

Dutch confessions and Deknatel's Dutch catechism, the following confessions and catechisms: the first German confession (possibly translated from the Dutch) of 1660 at Danzig (United Flemish, Frisian, and High German Mennonites), Confession oder Kurtze und Einfältige Glaubensbekentniss, to which were attached beginning 1690 the catechism Kurtze Unterweisung and Formular etlicher christlicher Gebete; another West Prussian Confession oder Kurtze und Einfältige Glaubensbekenntniss of 1678 (Georg Hansen, elder of the Danzig Flemish congregation); Glaubens-Bericht vor die Jugend of 1671 (the first German publication of its sort) and Erklärungen der Antworten of 1678 (both also written by Georg Hansen); Confession or Kurtzer und einfältiger Glaubens-Bericht der (Danziger) Alten Flämischen of 1768 (comprising the confession of 1730 and the catechism of 1768); the very popular Elbing catechism of 1778 of the Flemish elder Gerhard Wiebe (Elbing) and the Frisian elder Heinrich Donner (Orlofferfelde), Kurtze und Einfältige Unterweisung, which became the catechism of the Amish and, reprinted first at Waldeck (1797), was often called the "Waldeck catechism," with many German reprints for the Amish, four French editions, and many editions in America as well as many reprints in West Prussia and numerous reprints in Russia; the confession of Gerhard Wiebe (1792) and the new West Prussian of 1895. Gerrit Roosen's justly popular Christliches Gemüthsgespräch (Ratzeburg, 1702), which went out of use in Germany after 1838 but was widely used in America (14 German editions, 1769-1938, and 6 English editions, 1857-1941); attached to the Gemüthsgespräch, strangely enough, was the Prussian catechism of 1690, Kurtze Unterweisung; Leonhard Weydmann's Christliche Lehre (Monsheim, 1836, and Crefeld, 1852); Johannes Molenaar's Katechismus der christlichen Lehre (Leipzig, 1841); the Christliches Lehrbüchlein of the Verband (Heilbronn, 1865). (For a complete account of all German confessions and catechisms see the article on these topics in Vol. 1 of this Encyclopedia.) The chief prayerbook (q.v.) was the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht, first published at Kaiserslautern in 1739, reprinted many times in Germany, 1753, 1781 (Pirmasens), 1787 (Herborn), 1796, 1816 (Zweibrücken), 1832 (Basel), 1837 (Zweibrücken), 1840 (Reinach), and 1852 (Regensburg), and many editions in America, largely used by the Amish. (For a fuller discussion of prayerbooks and devotional literature see Friedmann, Mennonite Piety, particularly the chapters "Mennonite Prayerbooks, Their Story and Meaning" and "The Devotional Literature of the Mennonites in Danzig and East Prussia.")

(5) The hymnbooks of the German Mennonites were basically few in number. In 1564 was published Etliche schöne Christliche Geseng, wie sie in der Gefengkniss zu Passaw im Schloss von den Schweitzer Brüdern durch Gottes gnad geticht vnd gesungen worden. About the same time, probably 1563/64, in the Lower Rhine area was published Ein schön Gesangbüchlein Geistlicher Lieder, zusammen getragen auss dem Alten und Neuen Testament durch fromme Christen vnd Liebhaber Gottes, reprinted twice with additions, the third edition being made by Leenaerdt Clock. Since 1583 the first of these hymnals is the second part of the Ausbund, whereas a number of hymns of the second hymnal appear in the first part of the Ausbund, which has become the hymnal of the Amish (first edition with this title 1583, n.p., 2nd ed. 1622, n.p., with later editions probably all at Basel, last there in 1838). The first German hymnbook of the Prussian Mennonites (they had used Dutch hymnals before) was the Geistreiches Gesangbuch (q.v., Königsberg, 1767), which went through 9 German editions, last at Elbing in 1843, and went on to long use in Russia, Manitoba, and Mexico where it is still being used. Meanwhile it was replaced in West Prussia by a new book, Gesangbuch für Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Kirche und Haus (1869, with its 5th ed. in 1922). The Danzig congregation had its own hymnal from 1780 on, also called Geistreiches Gesangbuch, displaced in 1854 by a new book called Gesangbuch zur kirchlichen und häuslichen Erbauung, reprinted in revised form in 1908. The Northwest German congregations long used Dutch Mennonite hymnals and then replaced them with modern state-church books. But the South Germans, after first using state-church hymnals, created their own hymnbooks. The first one, Christliches Gesangbuch, appeared at Worms in 1832, with a revised edition at Würzburg in 1839. The second and final one, Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch, appeared at Worms in 1854, with new editions in 1876, 1910 (revised), and 1950. A separate book was published by the Amish in Hesse and neighboring areas at Wiesbaden in 1843 (reprint Regensburg, 1859), under the title Gesangbuch zum Gebrauch bei dem öffentlichen Gottesdienst. . . .

The hymns in all these books were largely taken from the older German treasury of hymns and chorales, with few additions of the late 19th-century "Gospel song" type (see Hymnology).

(4) The historical literature produced by the German Mennonites includes the following: Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); A. Brons, Der Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (Norden, 1884, new ed. 1891 and 1912); Christian Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Christine Hege, Kurze Geschichte der Mennoniten (Frankfurt, 1909); J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ost-Friesland (1881 and 1887); B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona, 2 vv. (Hamburg, 1886-87); J. t. Dornkaat Koolman, Kurze Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Ostfriesland (Norden, 1903); idem, Mitteilungen . . . Gemeinde zu Norden (Norden, 1904); E. Weydmann, Geschichte der Mennoniten bis zum 18. Jahrhundert (Neuwied, 1905); H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe (Montau, 1918); E. Händiges, Die Lehre der Mennoniten in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Kaiserslautern, 1921); Chr. Neff, ed., Gedenkschrift zum 400jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (Ludwigshafen, 1925); Chr. Hege, Ein Rückblick auf 400 Jahre Mennonitischer

Geschichte (Karlsruhe, 1935); W. Quiring, Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (Karlsruhe, 1936); idem, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Karlsruhe, 1938); Horst Penner, Ansiedlung Mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichsel-Mündungsgebiet (Karlsruhe, 1940); idem, Weltweite Bruderschaft, Ein mennonitisches Geschichtsbuch (Karlsruhe, 1955); Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952); B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen im 16., 18. und 19. Jahrhundert (Karlsruhe, 1955). The greatest historical work of the German Mennonites has been the Mennonitisches Lexikon (1913-) edited by Christian Hege and Christian Neff, since 1947 by E. Crous (and H. S. Bender), now at the letter R. The publications of the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (founded 1933), edited by Christian Hege and since 1950 by Horst Quiring (Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter 1936-, and Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins 1938-) have been notable. The Mennonite Research Center at Göttingen, directed by Ernst Crous, was created by the MGV in 1948. The Mennonitische Blätter (1854-1941) carried much historical material. The Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten, published since 1870 by the Verband, and the Mennonitische Jugendwarte, published by the Youth Commission of the South German Conference 1920-39, also contained some historical material. Much more has been contained in the Christlicher (now Mennonitischer) Gemeinde-Kalender, published since 1892 by the South German Conference. The Mennonitisches Adressbuch (Frankfurt, 1936) tried to give complete names and addresses of all Mennonites living in Germany in 1936, by congregations. H.S.B.

In addition to the titles in the section on literature above and the bibliographies under the various articles on subsections of Germany, the following should be noted: A. H. Newman, A History of Anti-Pedobaptism . . . to 1609 (Philadelphia, 1897); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1945); John Horsch, Mennonites in Europe (Scottdale, 1942); F. H. Littell, The Anabaptist View of the Church (1952); R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); H. S. Bender, "The Zwickau Prophets, Thomas Müntzer and the Anabaptists," MQR XVII (1953) 3-16; Wiswedel, Bilder; R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); H. S. Bender and J. Horsch, Menno Simons' Life and Writings (Scottdale, 1936); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); Chr. Hege, "Early Anabaptists in Hesse," MQR V (1931) 157-78; C. Neff, "Mennonites of Germany, including Danzig and Poland," MQR XI (1937) 34-43; J. C. Wenger, "Life and Work of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII (1938) 137-66; idem, "Theology of Pilgram Marpeck," ibid. 205-56; R. Friedmann, "Spiritual Changes in European Mennonitism, 1650-1750," MQR XV (1941) 33-45; J. C. Wenger, "The Schleitheim Confession of Faith," MQR XIX (1945) 243-53; H. Penner, "Anabaptists and Mennonites of East Prussia," MQR XXII (1948) 212-25; E. Crous, "Mennonites in Germany since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (1951) 235-62; D. Cattepoel, "Mennonites of Germany 1936-1948, and the Present Outlook," MQR XXIV (1950) 103-10; O. Wiebe, "Die Mennonitengemeinden in Nordwestdeutschland vor 10 Jahren und heute," Gem.-Kal. 1956, 34-42; TA Württemberg; TA Hessen; TA Bayern I and II; ML I, 422-29.

Gerobulus, Johannes (Dutch, Outraadt), b. 1540 at The Hague, d. there 1606, was a Dutch Reformed minister at Delft, Vlissingen, Deventer, Harderwijk, and The Hague. In the fall of 1579 he held a dispute with representatives of a Mennonite congregation called the "footwashers," at Wester-Souburg near Vlissingen in the Dutch province of Zeeland. His principal opponent in the dispute was Hans de Ries (q.v.), who was at this time staying in Zeeland. (Biogr. Wb. III, 222-26; DB 1863, 112-13.) vdZ.

Gerolsheim, a village in the Palatinate, Germany, not far from Frankental, where the Mennonites were early found. Before the Thirty Years' War few clues can be found. A Jakob Raab of Ginsheim settled here; on Dec. 9, 1581, he renounced his faith and presented his four unbaptized children for baptism (Hege, 137). It can safely be assumed that there were Anabaptists in Gerolsheim at that time, for there were many in the vicinity. Through persecution by the government and the horrors of the Thirty Years' War most of them perished. Two families may have survived, who are mentioned in the first list of Mennonites of the Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv of 1664—Heinrich and Julius Cassel. Their origin is not known. The former was a Mennonite preacher (see Cassel, Heinrich). In 1685 and 1697 the lists name eight Mennonite families in Gerolsheim. The village belonged to the Barons of Dalsberg. Therefore the Mennonites were excused from the payment of protection fees in 1700-59. In the list of 1759 the following are mentioned: Peter Schmid, a son and three daughters; Jakob Peters' (?) widow, a son and two daughters; Jakob Hirschler, three sons and four daughters; Ulrich Borckholder, three sons and three daughters; and Christian Müller's widow, a daughter. The Mennonites of Gerolsheim had merged with those at Heppenheim an der Wiese (q.v.) and Obersülzen (q.v.) in a single congregation. Services were held in succession in these places, in Gerolsheim in a hall furnished for the purpose and later in a chapel, the property of Preacher David Kaegy of Bolanderhof. After the erection of the church in Obersülzen (1868) services were no longer held in Gerolsheim.

After 1702 Hans Burkholder (q.v.) served the congregation as preacher until his death in 1752. In 1758-82 Jakob Hirschler was elder, followed by Johannes Lehmann. The Mennonites living in Dirmstein (q.v.) and Offstein (q.v.) worshiped with this congregation, which in 1732 consisted of 40 families (Müller, Berner Täufer, 211). In 1833-54 Johann Borkholder was their preacher. According to Frey the Mennonites in Gerolsheim numbered 32 souls in 1806 and 36 in 1834. In 1845 the families of Heinrich Burkholder, Stefan Göbels, Johann Schowalter, Johannes Schowalter, Jakob Suter's widow, Jakob Burkholder, and Stefan Hirschler were living there. A memorandum by David Kaegy (Offstein) says: "House, barn, stable, yard (Hof), and garden in Gerolsheim I gave my daughter Barbara and her husband on Aug. 3, 1843. But since the Mennonite congregation has the upper room for a place of meeting, even if the congregation no longer wishes to use it and the owner himself uses it, the owner must pay the congregation 100 guilders and give up the chairs, stoves, table, and benches in the upper room and the smaller room without remuneration. The furniture belongs to the congregation."—In 1926 there were two families left—Schowalter and Suter.

Neff.

The Mennonite archives at Amsterdam contain about 80 letters written by Gerolsheim Mennonites to the Amsterdam congregation, specifically to the secretary of the Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden (q.v.) (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1420, 1422, 1454-67, 1474-75, 1483-1537, 1539-41, 1547-48, 1550; II, Nos. 687, 690). The first of these letters is dated Sept. 28, 1689 (written by Heinrich Cassel); the last is dated July 12, 1783. These letters, containing much information on the coming of the Swiss Brethren to Gerolsheim and the Palatinate, are very valuable for the light they throw on the social and political conditions of the Palatine Mennonites in the 18th century. The letters also contain information on the Gerolsheim congregation and its preachers. In 1730 the congregation was obliged to pay a fee of 1,500 guilders for the coronation of the new elector (in addition to their regular poll tax). In 1741 the elector doubled the poll tax. In 1744-45 they were disturbed by the French, English, and Austrian armies. In 1744 there was also much trouble with the government; they were not permitted to bury their dead in the cemeteries, and their marriages were hindered. Many wanted to emigrate to the Netherlands or to Pennsylvania. In 1744 they were afraid they would be expelled from the country. In 1744 also they wrote that they had vainly appealed to the mercy of Lord Dalensberg, to whom Gerolsheim had been allotted. There were troubles within the congregation. The Amish, who boasted of their Feinheit, were (1744) intolerant and merciless toward Hans Burckholder and his followers, who were ziemlich grob (less strict), Rudolf Egli was a spendthrift, and Hans Landis, who had gone to Holland to collect money, was a deceiver. Christian Burckholder, the son of Hans (1764) and deacon of the Gerolsheim congregation, had embezzled the poor-funds and retained for private use the contributions sent by Amsterdam in 1762-63, and had been dismissed and banned. Christian himself wrote on Feb. 27, 1765, a letter of regret and repentance to Amsterdam. The Committee for Foreign Needs at Amsterdam gave financial aid a number of times. It contributed to relief for losses from rinderpest, crop failure, flood, fire, and sickness. On Oct. 7, 1776, Jakob Hirschler wrote that the meetinghouse built about a century ago had been severely damaged by a storm, and that they wanted to have a new one built. The Gerolsheim congregation, he wrote, had 32 families and 100 members; he asked for financial aid, which was given. In 1783 Amsterdam also contributed to a new meetinghouse built in Heppenheim. Most of these letters were written by Heinrich Cassel (2), Hans Burckholder (49), Christian Burckholder (13), and Jakob Hirschler (4), who also signed a number written by Hans and Christian Burckholder. vdZ.

Müller, Berner Täufer; Frey, Versuch einer geographisch-historisch-statistischen Beschreibung des königlichen bayerischen Rheinkreises (Speyer, 1836); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); ML II, 81.

Gerrets, Vrou, van Medenblick (Medemblik, Dutch province of North Holland), composed a small songbook, Een nieu Gheestelijck Liedtboecxken, of which there were three editions—1607, 1609, and 1621. (Catalogus Amst., 270.) vdZ.

Gerretsz, Claes, a book printer at Amsterdam, who published some of the works of Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.) and Sebastian Franck (q.v.), and also reprinted Melchior Hofmann's Die Ordonnantie Godts in 1611. (BRN V, 134 f.) vdZ.

Gerrit van Benschop (Gheryt Ghijsen, or Gheryt van Wou), a Dutch Anabaptist leader in 1534-35; in his home town of Benschop (Dutch province of Utrecht) his influence was so great that Benschop became an Anabaptist center. Here and in other towns he baptized a large number of persons. Whether he was infected with the revolutionary principles of Münsterism (q.v.) and by his activities responsible for the revolts at Hazerswoude (q.v.) and Poeldijk (q.v.), is not quite clear. In February 1535 he stayed at Amsterdam and joined the group of Anabaptists who walked naked along the streets (see Naaktlopers). During this event he was taken prisoner and beheaded at Amsterdam on Feb. 25, 1535. vdZ.

DB 1917, 11, No. 22; Grosheide, Verhooren, 57-58; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.

Gerrit Boeckbinder (Geryt boeckebinder van Nyewenhuys), identical with Gerrit thom Closter, a Dutch Anabaptist leader. In the fall of 1533 he was sent from Amsterdam to Münster by Jan Matthysz (q.v.). He belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, stayed for some time in Münster (q.v.), but came back to Amsterdam. Here and at other places he baptized. Probably he was put to death at The Hague on Feb. 15, 1535. (DB 1909, 11; 1917, 80, 100, No. 4; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Gerrit van Byler, a Dutch Anabaptist imprisoned in London. The Martyrs' Mirror contains an excerpt from a letter written by Gerrit van Byler in September 1575 in the Newgate prison in London, which his son Jan handed to van Braght. In it van Byler related that as the congregation was assembled at Easter in a suburb of London it was surprised and 20 members imprisoned. He recounted his trial under "His Majesty's bishop." "Day after day they announced our execution, by hanging and burning; but the Lord strengthened us, to His name be praise." Having heard that Hendrik and Jan were "led to the slaughter," he quoted a few songs, and closed with the words (in Latin), "My hope is in God." Concerning the fate of these Anabaptists, two of them, Hendrik Terwoert and Jan Pietersz, were burned at the stake in Smithfield on July 22, 1576; one of them died in prison, fourteen women were expelled from the city, a young man was whipped, and two, including van Byler, were discharged "after enduring much misery."

These Anabaptists had fled to England from Flanders because of "severe tribulation and small opportunity for making a living." (Mart. Mir. D 604-98, E 1008-12, 1022-24; ML I, 314.) vdZ.

Gerrit van Cempen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Kempen, Gerhard von.

Gerrit (Gheryt) Claesz, from Oude-Niedorp, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Amsterdam on May 15, 1535, together with Adriaen Cornelis and Jan Jacobsz. He had been (re)baptized at "de Rijp binnen Oude Nyerop" in March 1534 but did not know the man who baptized him. The sentence is found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror. (Mart. Mir. D 412, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 70-72; ML I, 359.) vdZ.

Gerrit Cornelisz (Boon), an Anabaptist martyr, a young boatman and a citizen of Amsterdam, was imprisoned because he "was unmindful of his soul's salvation and the obedience which he owed our mother the holy church and to his imperial majesty, as his natural lord and prince, rejecting the ordinances of the holy church, has been neither to confession nor to the holy sacrament for ten years past, and has further dared repeatedly to go into the assembly of the reprobated sect of the Mennonites or Anabaptists, and has also eight years ago, renouncing and forsaking the baptism received by him in infancy from the holy Church, been rebaptized and afterward repeatedly received the breaking of bread according to the manner of the aforesaid sect, and also attended the assembly," as his sentence of death reads (Mart. Mir. D 540, E 876). The most brutal persecutions he endured steadfastly; he would not betray his brethren. On June 26, 1571, he was executed by burning. At the stake he prayed the moving prayer, "O Father and Lord, be gracious unto me, let me be one of the least of Thy least lambs or the least member of Thy body! O Lord, who lookest down here from on high and art a discerner of the hearts and of every hidden thing, before whom all things are to be accounted as nothing, Thou knowest my simple love towards Thee, accept me and forgive them that inflict this suffering upon me." A song on his martyrdom is found in Het Offer des Heeren and begins "Als men duysent vijfhondert heeft gheschreven en eenentseventig Jaer." (Offer, 654-58; Wolkan, Lieder, 69; ML I, 371.) NEFF.

Gerrit Dirksz (Gerrit Wevers or Gerrit the Weaver), an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death at Amsterdam on Jan. 16, 1553. He was a native of "Raesdorp," probably a town in Münsterland, Germany, rather than Ransdorp near Amsterdam. He had been (re)baptized and confessed that he had heard Gillis van Aken preach twice. Because he recanted he was not burned at the stake, but beheaded. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 162, 309.) vdZ.

Gerrit Ghijsen: see Gerrit van Benschop.

Gerrit van Grol (Geert van Grolle), a Dutch Anabaptist, burned at the stake at Antwerp in 1538 (exact date unknown). He was arrested in March 1538 and tried in the same month. His confession reveals interesting particulars about Anabaptism in Amsterdam, especially on the Naaktlopers (q.v.) and the uprising of May 1535. From this confession on April 17, 1538, we learn the difference between peaceful and revolutionary Anabaptism. Gerrit van Grol belonged to the peaceful group. He had been (re)baptized in Amsterdam by Jan Matthysz. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 192, 193; DB 1919, 171-72; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 39; XIV, 16-17, No. 166.

Gerrit Hazenpoet (Hasepoot), an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor, was burned at the stake at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland in 1557, exact date unknown (not 1556 as van Braght, Mart. Mir., states). When, after torture, he was sentenced to die, "his wife came to him . . . to speak with him once more, and to take leave and to bid her husband farewell. She had in her arm an infant, which she could scarcely hold, because of her great grief. When wine was poured out to him, as is customary to do for those sentenced to death, he said to his wife, 'I have no desire for this wine; but I hope to drink the new wine, which will be given me in the kingdom of my Father.' Thus the two separated with great grief . . . ; for the woman could hardly stand on her feet any longer, but seemed to fall into a swoon through grief. When he was led to death and having been brought from the wagon upon the scaffold, he lifted up his voice and sang the hymn, 'Oorlof aen Broeders en Sisters gemeen' (Farewell to all brethren and sisters). Whereupon he fell on his knees, and fervently prayed to God. Having been placed at the stake, he kicked his slippers from his feet, saying, 'It were a pity to burn them, for they can be of service still to some poor person.' The rope with which he was to be strangled, becoming a little loose, having not been twisted well by the executioner, he again lifted up his voice, and sang the end of said hymn." NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 173, E 560; DB 1874, 3; P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de Gesch. der Doopsgez. te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 19-23; ML II, 263.

Gerrit Jan Mickers, an Anabaptist martyr who, according to an account found in a list in Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 748, was beheaded at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland in February 1538, because he had been (re)baptized. But this must be an error; the person meant is the martyr Guert Jans Mickers, beheaded because she had been (re)baptized at Alkmaar on Feb. 6, 1538. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 173.) vdZ.

Gerrit (or Gheraert) Janssen Duynherder, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Tongherloo in Brabant, was burned at the stake with Hendrik Alewijns (q.v.) and Hans Marijns (q.v.) on Feb. 9, 1569, on the square at Middelburg in Zeeland after being strangled. He was seized one night at Souburg, not far from Middelburg, and was severely racked on Sept. 14, 1568. He was about 50 years old. NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 389, E 742, 758; DB 1908, 16; K. R. Pekelharing, Bijdr. tot de Gesch. der Hervorming in Zeeland (Archives VI of the Zeeuwsch Genootschap, Middelburg, 1866) 77, 85-86; ML I, 497.

Gerrit van Mandel, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gerrit Vermandele.

Gerrit Siebenacker, of Sittart near Maastricht, now Dutch province of Limburg, the otherwise unknown author of the hymn, "Gnad und Fried vom Herren," which bears his name in acrostics. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 494; Wolkan, Lieder, 100.)

Gerrit (Gheert) Vermandele (van Mandel), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake in Antwerp on March 30, 1569, together with Willem de Clercq and Pieter Verlonge. He was a weaver, originally from Kortrijk, Flanders, 26 years of age; he lived for a number of years at Borgerhout near Antwerp; he had been (re)baptized four years before by Hendrik van Arnhem (q.v.) in a wood near Antwerp. He and his companions were arrested while holding a meeting in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.) at Borgerhout. Gerrit refused to give details about the congregation. He remained steadfast in his faith and died faithfully. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 341, 369, 393, 439; XIV, 64-65, No. 713; ML III, 11.

Gerrits (Geerts, Gerts, Gertz, Gerzen, Goertz, Goerz, Görtz, Görz), a Mennonite family name: see Goerz and Görz.

Gerrits, Brixius, an elder in the Flemish Mennonite church in Groningen in 1566 (Vos, 257), a learned man versed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and well-informed in other fields of knowledge, worked with Peter of Cologne (q.v.) with great zeal for the unification of the Flemish and Frisian branches of Mennonites. Together they took part in the conference in Emden in 1578 to ratify the "Humster Peace," and then signed the Flemish peace proposal to the Frisians, April 2, 1578 (Menn. Bl. 1858, 28). Together they also took a prominent part in the great disputation in Emden (q.v.) that lasted from Feb. 27 to May 17, 1578. In 1583 Brixius was expelled from the city of Groningen by the Catholic government. In 1589 he was again summoned to arbitrate difficulties among the Flemish and for this purpose traveled to Haarlem. The difficulty in question was the Huiskoper (q.v.) dispute concerning a house purchased in Franeker in 1586, which resulted in the division into two groups; viz., the Zachte (mild) Flemish or Contrahuiskopers, and the Old Flemish or Huiskopers. Not long afterward he, who had formerly represented the very blunt, conservative view, was banned by his own church for his lenience, and joined the Frisians.

A letter from Brixius Gerrits, with signatures also by Hans Busschaert, (Paul) Backer, and Christiaen Adriaensz, "written to his dear Brethren of the Church of God in Prussia, together with its elders and preachers," written at Harlingen on Oct. 9, 1578, is included by J. de Buyser in his Christelijck Huysboek (pp. 344-47). Neff.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 257, 307; Menn. Bl., 1858, 28; ML I, 271; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 470, 473, 477b, 558 IIIb; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 55, 81, 275, 295.

Gerrits van Emden, Jan, b. April 30, 1561, probably at Emden, was of a serious nature from his early youth; at the age of 36 he was made preacher of the congregation at Appingedam (q.v.). Nine years later, driven away by the Spanish war, he settled in Haarlem, where he again preached. His service there was saddened by strife in the congregation, which he vainly attempted to settle. He then undertook a journey to the Prussian and Austrian congregations in Moravia. In 1607 he was appointed as preacher of the United Frisians, High Germans, and Waterlanders at Danzig, and about 1612 became elder at Marcushof, serving with great blessing to Danzig and the neighboring churches until his death on April 7, 1617. During his eldership the Polish Brethren or Socinians (q.v.) of Danzig, whose leader was Ulrich Pius Herwart, caused him much concern. They tried to merge with the congregation of Jan Gerrits, but the Mennonites, who rejected Socinian doctrines, tried to keep aloof; Jan Gerrits wrote a number of letters to the Dutch Waterlander leader Hans de Ries, asking his advice and requesting him to come over to Danzig to aid them in the disputes with the Socinians, which de Ries, however, declined to do. After his death some books and two letters were published, Vijf stichtelijcke predicatien (1st ed. lost; 2nd Amsterdam, 1650). One of the letters is addressed to all his children, the other to his oldest son in Haarlem. "Both letters are full of fatherly, sincere, and emphatic words of comfort." His sermons testify to a zeal to win souls to Christ by God's grace; they deal exclusively with eternal ruin of man and the saving grace of God, based solely on the sacrificial death of Christ. He is also thought to have been the author of Stichtelijke Gebeden en Meditatien, dewelke mede ter zee gebruikt kunnen worden (n.p., n.d.), which others ascribe to Hans de Ries, and of Een Vermaen-Boeckjen . . . met 42 Schriftuurlycke Liedekens (Amsterdam, 1641, 2d ed. 1648, 3d ed. 1655), of which also Jan Gerrits (q.v.), the old Flemish minister of Amsterdam, is said to have been the author.

In the 1650 edition of his sermons and letters three other sermons besides a very interesting formulary for baptism and communion, and several inspirational prayers of unknown authorship have been added. With all his simplicity of spirit he was not hostile to science. Thus, though uneducated, he knew the German and Latin languages in addition to his native Dutch. Neff.

BRN VII, 190-91; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 472; II, Nos. 2624 f., 2925-27, 2931-35; II, 2, No. 691; Biogr. Wb. III, 227; Menn. Bl., 1860, 12; 1904, 3; Schijn-Maatschoen, Uitvoeriger Verhandeling, . . . III, 42 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 53-54; idem, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 106-08; ML II, 83.

Gerrits, Jan, a preacher of the congregation at Uithoorn (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland. He and E. A. van Dooregeest were in the group delegated by the Zonists (q.v.) to negotiate with the Lamists in 1688 with the view of uniting the two groups. The negotiations, however, failed. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 424, 26.) vdZ.

Gerrits, Jan, in the first half of the 17th century a preacher of the Uckowallists (Groningen Old Flemish) in Amsterdam, who had separated from the Flemish at Groningen in 1637. He was one of the speakers on the side of Jan Luies in the debate against Pieter Jansz Twisck at Hoorn in 1622. In 1641 he published Een spieghel des gheloofs, in which is found a Confession of the Groningen Old Flemish, and in 1641 also Een Vermaen-boeckjen (which some scholars attribute to Jan Gerrits van Emden, q.v.). (Biogr. Wb. III, 226; DB 1876, 39; ML II, 83.) K.V.

Gerrits, Tijs (or Thijs) (d. Dec. 15, 1601), one of the outstanding leaders of the Harde (Strict) Frisian Mennonites in the Netherlands, who separated in 1589 from the Zachte (Mild) Frisians (under the leadership of Lubbert Gerritsz, q.v.). In 1587 he was a preacher at Hoorn, later elder at Medemblik. He originated the expression, "Shall we allow ourselves to be governed by the congregation?" He accompanied Elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) on his journeys to the North Sea islands and to Groningen. In 1599 when a quarrel arose among these strict Frisians between Jan Jacobsz and Pieter Jeltjes, Tijs Gerrits took the side of the Jan Jacobsgezinden. But about 1601 a new quarrel within the Jan-Jacobsgezinden group caused Tijs Gerrits and his adherents to separate from Jan Jacobsz and his followers. Gerrits's followers were called the T(h)ijs-Gerritsvolk. K.V.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 478; DB 1876, 30; 1893, 80 f.; J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden," in Ned. Archief vor Kerkgeschiedenis XI (The Hague, 1914) 189 f.; ML II, 84.

Gerritsz, Dirk (1565-1626), a Mennonite preacher of the Frisian congregation in Wormerveer (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, for many years. After his death a volume of his writings was published, containing two devotional tracts and a number of songs. The (abridged) title reads as follows: Twee corte vermaen brieven . . . aen sijn Kinderen, met drie Schriftuerlijcke Liedekens (Hoorn, 1629). He must have been a capable and very influential leader far beyond his home church. By trade he was a merchant. Of his six sons two were deacons and two preachers of the Wormerveer Frisian congregation. His youngest son was Oom Jacob Dirksz (q.v.). (Biogr. Wb. III, 226-27; Catalogus Amst., 228, 272.) vdZ.

Gerritsz, Lubbert (official family name Yserman), a Dutch Mennonite leader in the second half of the 16th century, characterized by his tolerance, the good friend and co-worker of Hans de Ries, with whom he composed the Waterlander confession of faith which was published at Alkmaar in 1610. He was born at Amersfoort, Dutch province of Utrecht, in 1534; by trade he was a weaver. About 1556 he was converted to the Mennonite principles and soon played a role in the small Amersfoort congregation. In 1559, when persecution arose in this town, he fled to Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, where he was ordained in the same year as elder by Dirk Philips. He was one of the delegates appointed in 1567 to arbitrate the difficulties that had arisen in Friesland which occasioned the great schism between the Frisians and the Flemish. His congregation being on the Frisian side, he became the minister of the Frisian congregation at Hoorn. Attempts at reconciliation were futile. On the questions of the ban, avoidance in marriage, and mixed marriages he took the more lenient position. A peace conference in 1578 failed. The stricter views predominated, and he was banned. In 1589 he became the leader of the more lenient (Jonge) Frisians at Amsterdam. Here he published Verantwoordinghe op die seven Artyckelen. The "Jonge" Frisians in 1591 united with the High Germans, and two years later with the Waterlanders. In 1597 the Reformed Church tried to force him to take part in a disputation; but the mayor Hooft intervened. In 1604 he made another attempt to unite the Flemish and Frisians by writing an epistle to the elders of the Flemish. He died at Amsterdam on Jan. 12, 1612. Anthoni Jacobsz Roscius (q.v.), physician and preacher at Hoorn, and Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.), the well-known painter and preacher at Leeuwarden, were his grandsons.

Besides the above Verantwoordinghe Lubbert Gerritsz published the following writings: Sommige andachtighe ende leerachtige gheestelicke Liedekens ende Psalmen Davids, followed by two letters to the Gemeente Godts in Pruissen (Amsterdam 1597, 5th ed. 1649); Sommige Christelijcke sendt-brieven, ghesonden aen diverse particuliere personen . . . (Amsterdam 1599, reprinted 1611 and 1646). In these reprints are also found Vier brieven ende een Tractaet van de Uytterlijcke Kercke. His portrait, painted 1607 by Michiel J. Mierevelt (q.v.) or his co-workers, is now found in the Rijksmuseum at Amsterdam. Joost van den Vondel (q.v.) dedicated a laudatory poem to him.† K.V., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 483, 486-88, 504, 510, 524, 528-31, 641; II, Nos. 1194-96, 1359, 1362, 1366; Schijn-Maatschoen, Aanhangsel . . . (Amsterdam, 1745) 1-41; Biogr. Wb. III, 227-29; DB 1864, 23 ff.; 1872, 59; 1876, 30 ff.; BRN VII, 62 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim; Winkler Prins Encyclopedie IX, 417 (Amsterdam, 1950); ML II, 83 f.

Gerryt mitten Baerde, an Anabaptist leader, who preached at a meeting in June 1533 at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, and explained the Scriptures from eight o'clock in the morning till four or five o'clock in the afternoon, is likely identical with Gerrit Boeckbinder (q.v.). (DB 1909, 11.) vdZ.

Gerryt Jansz and his brother Herman Jans (q.v.) were beheaded on Oct. 24, 1536, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, because they had lodged Menno Simons in their home. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 747; DB 1864, 135, note; 1906, 3; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 230.

Gerspitz, a village in Moravia near Austerlitz (Slavkov) with a Hutterite Bruderhof. It belonged to the feudal estate of Ulrich von Kaunitz, who caused the Anabaptists severe oppression. He made them responsible for economic losses he suffered, took away their grain and cattle, deprived weavers, barbers, and tailors of their trade, so that the Anabaptists threatened to emigrate. A large part of them actually left in the summer of 1603. Those who remained suffered severe loss during the Bohemian revolt. The Chronicles report, "On Dec. 29, 1620, early in the morning before dawn, the Bruderhof at Austerlitz and Gerspitz was unexpectedly attacked by several hundred horsemen who hastily plundered the place; many brethren, sisters, and children ran into the pond, which was not yet frozen over, and two sisters and a child were drowned. The next year, on Feb. 2, Poles attacked Gerspitz, shooting the housekeeper and burning the gardener." LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 405, 407, 469, 541, 556 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 335; Wolny, Die Markgrafschaft Mähren II, 1, 157; ML II, 84.

Gerstungen, a town (pop. 3,433) in the Thuringian Forest, Germany, 11 miles west of Eisenach on the Werra. It is frequently mentioned in the history of the Thuringian Anabaptist movement. The earliest mention is made in 1527. Here Anabaptist doctrine was rather widely spread, for the town was under the jurisdiction of Saxony and Hesse, and the pastor, as Justus Menius stated in his church inspection report of June 25, 1533, to the young Elector John Frederick, "together with the vicar at Herda will not accept correction in the matter of impropriety and disorderly conduct, but always refer to the Hessian church inspection whenever it serves their purpose." On May 1, 1533, Margarethe Koch, who had been imprisoned at the same time as Fritz Erbe (q.v.) in the Wartburg, was cross-examined by the parsons Conrad Buchbach at Gerstungen and Martin Berstadt of Berka; she declared her opposition to infant baptism and the bodily presence of Christ in the communion emblems. Christina Strobel or Helwig, who was executed by drowning at Mühlhausen Nov. 8, 1537, was also imprisoned in Gerstungen. A violent opponent of the Anabaptists was the tax commissar Wolf Blümlein of Gerstungen; in a trial of Anabaptists in 1544, he joined Justus Menius in demanding the death penalty for seven steadfast Anabaptists. It was, however, never carried out, for Philip of Hesse refused to give his consent. A church inspection conducted by Menius in January 1544 found 50 persons in Gerstungen who did not go to church or take part in communion services, "out of sheer carelessness or hostility, or because they have been waiting to learn of a council." They, however, promised to fulfill the requirements of the church. HEGE.

G. L. Schmidt, Justus Menius, der Reformator Thüringens (Gotha, 1867); P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); ML II, 84.

Geryt (Gheryt) van Campen, a physician from Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism and being involved in the Münsterite revolt was sentenced to death by the sheriff at Amsterdam on May 8, 1534. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 744 f.; Grosheide, Verhooren, 226.) vDZ.

Geryt Jansz, of Amsterdam, Anabaptist who was sentenced to death by the Court of Holland because of involvement in the Münsterite uprising and beheaded at The Hague on Feb. 15, 1535. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 303.) vDZ.

Geryt Meynerts, a goldsmith of Amsterdam, was one of the first Anabaptists in the Netherlands. He was charged with lutherie (heresy) and rebaptism, and although he recanted he was sentenced at The Hague on Dec. 5, 1531, together with Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (q.v.) and other Anabaptists. (DB 1917, 159.) vDZ.

Gesangbuch, Christliches, zunächst für den Gebrauch der Taufgesinnten in der Pfalz, published at Worms, Germany, in 1832, contains 383 hymns with notes. It was soon replaced by a larger book, entitled Gesangbuch zum Gottesdienstlichen und Häuslichen Gebrauch in den Evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Worms, 1856), which contained 600 hymns with notes. However, a modified reissue of the 1832 volume was made in 1839 at Würzburg under the title, Gesangbuch, Christliches, zunächst für Mennoniten zum Gebrauch beim öffentlichen Gottesdienste und bei häuslichen Andachtsübungen (Herausgegeben von der Mennoniten-Brüder-Gemeinschaft in Unterfranken des Königreichs Bayern). vDZ.

Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch in Evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Worms, 1856) is the hymnbook of the conference of South German Mennonites which was prepared with the co-operation of A. Knapp. A second edition followed in 1876. The third edition was revised and appeared with 575 hymns, both with and without four-part music (Ludwigshafen, 1910); a fourth revised edition appeared in 1950 at Ludwigshafen.

In 1873 the General Conference Mennonite Church of North America reprinted the songbook adding 22 songs and dropping the word "Evangelischen" in the title and the appendixes. In 1890 a considerably revised edition of this book was published under the title, Gesangbuch mit Noten, which experienced 15 editions (50,000 copies) between 1890 and 1936, when it was replaced by the present Gesangbuch der Mennoniten (1942) and English hymnals. (See also Hymnology.) C.K.

Gesangbuch zur kirchlichen und häuslichen Erbauung für Mennoniten Gemeinden (Danzig, 1854) was the second German hymnal of the Danzig Mennonite Church, replacing the Geistreiches Gesangbuch (q.v.) of 1780. Containing 702 hymns, it was replaced by a revised edition in 1908 with only 445 hymns. (See Hymnology of the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia.)

Gesangbuch für Mennonitengemeinden in Kirche und Haus was the second German songbook of the Mennonite churches of West Prussia, published in 1869 to replace the Gesangbuch, in welchem eine Sammlung . . . (q.v.) and the original Geistreiches Gesangbuch . . . (q.v.). The book had 700 hymns, a collection of prayers, and indexes to which in the fourth edition (1901) were added 40 religious folk songs and Psalms of the Prussian Mennonite Choralbuch, published in 1898. This songbook was widely used among the Mennonites of Russia and America. The first three editions (Danzig 1869 and 1873, Elbing 1888) consisted of 8,000 copies and the fourth (Gütersloh 1901) and fifth (1922, n.p.) of 6,000 copies.

Gesangbüchlein Geistlicher Lieder, Eine schön (n.p., n.d.-ca. 1563/64) was the hymnal of the Lower Rhine Anabaptists, appearing at the same time as the first edition of the Ausbund (1564), the hymnal of the Swiss Brethren. Two later enlarged editions appeared—(1) with 133 hymns after 1569 and (2) with 140 hymns ca. 1590. (See Hymnology of the Anabaptists.) H.S.B.

Gesangh-Boeck: see Ghesangen, Het Boeck der.

Gesangh-Boeck van Hans de Ries, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal: see Hans de Ries. Gesanghboek of Gesanghen, om op alle feestdagen voor en na de predicatie in de Vergadering te singhen, a Mennonite hymnbook, two volumes in the Dutch language, printed at Hamburg, Germany, in 1685 and used in the Flemish congregation of this town. (DJ 1837, 65.) vdZ.

Geschicht-Buch: see Chronicles, Hutterite.†

Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer nach den Urkunden dargestellt (Frauenfeld, 1895, 411 pages) by Ernst Müller, a Swiss Reformed pastor in Langnau, Emmental, Switzerland, is a most valuable historical work on the Bernese Anabaptists, which led in part to the honorary doctor's degree for its author in 1904 from the University of Jena. The spirit of the author is well communicated by his preface, in which he says, "The justification of this work lies in the fact that this section of Swiss church history has never before been treated, and therefore a gap will be filled, not only in this field, but also in the history of that great spiritual movement of the Reformation known as Anabaptism. . . . This is a martyr church, which has its justification and its strength in its history. The willingness to sacrifice and the dedication to ideal values which those manifested who suffered for their faith deserves to be snatched from the forgotten past as a monument to the character of this people."

In 20 thoroughly scholarly chapters, based on primary sources, the author traces the Bernese Anabaptists from the canton of Bern in 1525 to the early 19th century in North America. The first 90 pages are occupied with the 16th-century movement in Bern, followed by a short chapter on Bernese Anabaptists in Moravia and Russia (Hutterites). The major section of the book, pp. 104-313, is devoted largely to the persecution of the Anabaptists-Mennonites by the Bernese authorities and their emigration to Basel, Alsace, Palatinate, Holland, and Pennsylvania. Further chapters treat the Amish division, the fate of the Swiss in Holland, Prussia, and Neuenburg, the Anabaptist hunters (Täuferjäger), the Swiss Mennonites in North America, and a brief account of the Bernese Mennonites in their native canton in the 19th century.

The author is remarkably objective and sympathetic. He does not spare his own church and government. A valuable feature of the book is its exploitation of the rich materials in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives on the Swiss and Palatine Mennonites of the years from 1650 to 1750. (ML III, 176.) H.S.B.

Geschichte der Märtyrer oder kurze historische Nachricht von den Verfolgungen der Mennoniten (printed by G. L. Hartung, Königsberg, 1787). The preface (31 pages) was written in 1782. Although the author and compiler of this abridged history of the martyrs, based on Tieleman J. van Braght, does not give his name in the book, it is known that it was Isaac van Dühren (1724-1800). He states (p. 191) that the selection of the stories is not only based on the Martyrs' Mirror by van Braght, but also that they are taken in the order in which they appeared in the large volume. Investigation as to selective process, abbreviation, and presentation of the material has not yet been made. The book consists of 190 pages of text not including the preface and index, and has on its title page a vignette consisting of a mirror, lights, books, and a laurel wreath. The introduction gives an account of church history dealing mostly with the introduction of infant baptism at the time of Cyprian (q.v.). The author claims that the Mennonites are descendants of the Waldensians and opposes the claim that they were followers of Thomas Müntzer or stemmed from the Münsterites. The first part of the book treats the persecution of the Mennonites by the Catholics; the second, a much smaller part, the persecution by the Lutherans; and the third part, by the Reformed. In an appendix the commonly used arguments for infant baptism are refuted.

It appears that two editions of the book must have appeared in succession—the first in 1787 and the second in 1788 (ML I, 91). An edition, with a special 6-page extra preface, published mainly for the Mennonites of Russia, appeared in 1863 (printed by J. F. Steinkopf, Stuttgart, Germany). The appendix is followed by a poem. These editions were widely used among the members of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). In 1939 a fourth edition "of the Mennonite congregations in Manitoba" appeared at Winnipeg (printed by the Rundschau Publishing House) with a special preface. (ML II, 91; see also Isaac van Dühren and Kleine Gemeinde.) C.K.

Geschriftjes ten Behoeve van de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, a set of short writings in the Dutch language, which were sent to Mennonites living in the Netherlands in places where there was no Mennonite church. The Geschriftjes were at first edited and published by a committee, then by a union founded for the sake of maintaining contact with these Mennonites (see Verstrooiing), and later by the A.D.S. A total number of 61 writings have appeared, the first published in 1897, the last in 1941. The booklets, written in a popular style, deal for a large part with Mennonite history; Nos. 4, 34, and 42 are reports on the activities of the union; Nos. 11, 22, and 38 contain sermons. vdZ.

Gespauwde Klauw (Cloven Hoof). In the fall of 1534 a dispute took place at Amsterdam between the Anabaptist leaders Jacob van Campen, Obbe Philips, and Hans Scheerder. The theme of discussion was the question whether the Scriptures stand on "one hoof" or on "two hoofs," i.e., whether one should believe "that all that has happened in the Old Covenant corresponds with the New Covenant," meaning that the prophecies of the Old Testament will be realized in the New Testament, or that the Scriptures of the Old Testament are plain, not supposing a fulfillment in the Christian era. This theme is also repeatedly discussed by Melchior Hofmann, who defends the cloven hoof. "Ein ider muss der gespaltnen clawen wol warnemen. Denn alle Gottes wort doppelt oder zwiffach seint" (zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, 430). The expression "cloven hoof" is derived from Lev. 11:3 and Deut. 14:6; the theme is important inasmuch as the problem disturbed Anabaptism in the Netherlands in its early period and Hofmann's theory, adopted by Jacob van Campen and also by Cornelis wt den Briel and later by the Münsterite leaders, opened the door wide for an unsound and dangerous typologizing and for the idea that the kingdom of God should bear the traits of the earthly kingdom of Israel, as Jan van Leyden (q.v.) taught. On the other hand Obbe Philips could not believe that the Scriptures have a double meaning, asserting that the Scriptures stand on "one hoof." So he is a forerunner of Menno Simons, who was averse to mystics and false allegories, and who states contrary to the Münsterites and Davidjorists that the Scriptures are plain, and that one should teach and believe the express words of Christ. On this question see the writings of Melchior Hofmann. (BRN V, 167, 177, 188, 189; VII, 137; DB 1917, 133-35.) vdZ.

Gespräch zwischen einem Pietisten und einem Wiedertäufer, a booklet of 314 pages by the (Reformed) minister Johannes Jakob Wolleb of Thenniken (Switzerland), published in Basel in 1722. It is of interest because of the controversy, due at that time, between old-fashioned Anabaptism (as represented by the Swiss Brethren in the Emmental and the Jura area) and the newly arisen Protestant piety of subjectivism and emotional warmth called Pietism (q.v.). The author came from an old Basel family of theologians; at the time of the publication of the book he seems to have been under the influence of Spener and Francke; later he leaned more toward Zinzendorf and the Moravian Church.

The main argument in this fictitious discussion between a Pietist and an Anabaptist centers around the question as to how one could know or demonstrate that the "spirit" which fills the soul of the believer is genuinely derived from the Holy Spirit and not a mere fancy or imagination. Naturally, neither side could undisputably prove its point, but the churchman Wolleb claimed to see the genuine Gospel spirit rather in his church than in that of the Anabaptists. Nevertheless, the author is rather fair in his portrayal of the "Anabaptist," even allowing him long and rather good speeches. Throughout the book Wolleb is afraid of false enthusiasm (q.v.) (Geisttreiberei) and of confused inspirationalism, the old temptation of all Left-Wing Protestants. The booklet closes with a sermon against the oath. In general, an irenic spirit prevails and the new Pietism seems to be open-minded to learn also from the once slandered Anabaptists. Today the book is extremely rare; only three copies are known—one in the Goshen College Library, one in the Library of the Mennonite Church in Amsterdam, and one in Basel. R.F.

R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Scottdale, 1949).

Gesprächbüchlein. Ein christliches vnd trosthafftiges, so mit etlichen der Widertauffer öbristen Rabonen oder Vorsteher gehalten. Darin gantz Christlich von allen Artickeln, so vor je wider den Kinder Tauff sein angezogen worden gehandelt würt den heiligen Kinder Tauff damit zu erhalten und der Gottlosen falsche Heuchlerey zu erlegen, by Jobst Kinthis (Freinsheim, 1553?). The only known copy is in the Speyer (Palatinate) Landes-Bibliothek; the date 1553 is stamped on the binding. It is dedicated to Frederick II, elector Palatine, who is called upon in the foreword to exterminate "all false devilish and idolatrous teaching and rebellious heresy."

The brief condemnation of Anabaptism at the beginning of the book is strange and disappointing; it offers new evidence of the confused ideas current about the movement. The author correctly points out the great differences in the various kinds of Anabaptists, distinguishing six different branches: "Some are in agreement with Balthasar Hubmaier, Melchior Rinck, Hans Denk, Hans Hut, and Ludwig Haetzer on baptism and the preacher's calling. These do not want an interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, but build alone on the printed letter; they have the four Gospels, the epistles of Paul, James, and Peter, and the Acts and Revelation. All other writings such as Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, and Bernard they consider human work." This is, on the whole, correct, but applies more specifically to the Swiss Brethren than the Anabaptists of South Germany, whose leaders named here rather insisted on a spiritual interpretation of Scripture and attacked adherence to the letter.

"The others boast of the third David, have much in common with Mahomet Ismanelita, perhaps arisen under Heracletus A.D. 612. They have many wives like the Münsterite king Johan van Leiden, A.D. 1534. These boast of Hofmann, who calls his church the New Jerusalem." In a similarly incomprehensible manner points three and four lump the Anabaptists with the Wicliffites, the Lamperian (?) sect, and with Thomas Müntzer and his following. The author does not state his sources.

Of greatest interest to us are the final characterizations of the Anabaptists. "The fifth stay around St. Gall in Switzerland and Appenzell. . . . These have attached many of this country to them, but not a sect. For the Swiss consider it far more unchristian than our people do. I have made a collection of their opinions." If this information is reliable, it has great historical value. We gather from it that Anabaptism in the Palatinate is of Swiss origin. It is surprising that the emissaries to the Palatinate were from St. Gall and Appenzell.

"The sixth kind are those who boast of Michael Sattler, Jörg Wagner, and Leonhard Kaiser, perhaps the most pious and Christian of them all. Concerning their sect . . . one finds information in the small concordances. The leader (Vorsteher) of this brotherhood requires two things: First, the separation of their ordained . . . pastors in their parishes; likewise non-participation in all the sacraments, all association or neighborliness, wedding . . . on penalty of the ban; likewise to speak disrespectfully and defiantly to all authorities and other persons, show no honor, consider themselves alone holy and all the rest ungodly. The second, their leader forbids the brethren to reveal to anyone outside their sect concerning their faith, doctrine . . . , also not to name their preachers and leader; requires to flee our church order, preaching, and the practice of the sacraments as ungodly work because they are idol houses made with human hands, wherein God does not dwell; also our clergymen do not teach or preach right, nor conduct services right, and are themselves sinners since they preach but do not perform, and the common people will not mend their ways therefrom because of their great avarice. But Christ commands that we shall beware of such hypocrites as of false prophets (Matt. 7) and we shall prove the spirits, whether they be of God or not." This description is accurate from the point of view of an opponent; it is apparently based on personal acquaintance. It is only puzzling that the author presents the Swiss Brethren and Michael Sattler's group as two distinct branches; they cannot have been separate groups in the Palatinate. The Swiss Brethren also carried out separation rigorously. Grouping Sattler with Jörg Wagner and Leonhard Kaiser does not agree with historical facts. Kaiser was a Lutheran martyr, and Wagner was more closely related to Denk than to Sattler.

Now Kinthis lists "the leading articles of the Anabaptists." There are 13 of them: (1) rejection of infant baptism; (2) rejection of the true deity of Christ; (3) rejection of the true humanity of Christ, to the extent that He did not receive human nature from Mary; (4) rejection of the merits of Christ; (5) rejection of the sacramental character of the holy communion; (6) they break marriages for "insignificant cause"; (7) rejection of military service; (8) chiliasm; (9) rejection of government office; (10) "some agree with the Donatists and say that preaching and the sacrament are naught if the minister is not upright and holy"; (11) "some believe that before the end of the world the church will be as in the days of Noah"; (12) rejection of original sin and the assertion that those who fall after receiving baptism will not be forgiven, a doctrine they have in common with the Novatians and Cathars; (13) "some of them believe (like Origen) that in the end the devil will be saved with all the ungodly." Kinthis makes not the slightest reference to their rejection of the oath.

The Gespräch (conversation), in the form of statement (Anabaptist) and counter statement (Kinthis), has four divisions, and constitutes a comprehensive defense of infant baptism; but it rarely touches the root of the matter. The Anabaptist always insists on the simple meaning of Scripture; his statements are agreeably short and logical, whereas his opponent unfolds a long-winded dialectic skill. He presents the customary evidence for infant baptism and explains at great length that even very young infants also have faith, which God Himself works in them. There are very few historical facts in the book. Once Kinthis sharply attacks emigration to Moravia.

Concerning the author's personality not much is revealed. He says specifically, "I am not a theologian, but a simple layman without understanding." But he shows an extraordinary knowledge of theology. He is especially familiar with the works of the Church Fathers; he also knows the writings of Brenz, Bucer, Bullinger, and Pellikan. Luther he calls "our beloved honorable father . . . in Christ"; but he shows some Calvinism (?) in confessing himself to be a Predestinarian. "God has in His eternal counsel already determined which child shall be saved or damned." The Anabaptist is also a learned theologian, with a command of Latin and a knowledge of the Church Fathers. On one occasion Kinthis accuses him, "You learned that in the University of Brno." This indicates that the Anabaptist was a Hutterite missionary on a mission in the Palatinate; he shared the opinion common among the Anabaptists of that time, that infant baptism was introduced by Pope Nicholas I, and that children should not be baptized before about 12 years of age.

In the fifth section Kinthis discusses the question whether children who are born dead are saved; and in the sixth section he answers the question affirmatively, saying that God in His mercy imparts faith to them.

In the epilogue the author briefly states the occasion for writing the book. Because some fanatics had settled in the Palatinate who criticized the holy baptism of infants, seduced the populace, and moved away with wife and child, thus creating dissension and disorder, he felt called to write, in order that these people might be persuaded to return to the true church. (ML II, 103 f.) NEFF.

Gesselsdorf, a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren in Hungary: see Kesselsdorf.

Getrewe Warnung der Prediger des Evangelii zu Strassburg über die Artickel, so Jakob Kautz, Prediger zu Wormbs, kürtzlich hat lassen ausgohn, die frucht der schrifft und Gottes worts, den kinder Tauff, und erlösung unsers herren Jesu Christi, sambt anderm, darin sich Hans Dencken, und anderer widertäuffer schwere yrrtumb erregen, betreffend. Beweren die geyster, ob sie aus Got sind, dann es sind vil falscher propheten inn die welt ausgangen. I. Johan. IV. (Strasbourg, 1527). This is the title of a booklet in quarto with 47 unnumbered pages. It was written by the Strasbourg reformers, especially Bucer (q.v.). The contents are a factual refutation of the seven theses which Jakob Kautz (q.v.) posted in Worms. The authors complain that Kautz did not dispute with them in writing, for in the year before he had written quite honestly and fraternally to Wolfgang Capito (q.v.); the latter had replied and urgently warned him. Since then (said the authors) he had not been heard from. The booklet considers Hans Denk the actual originator of the doctrines promoted by Kautz, and violently attacks and misjudges him (see Denk), whereas it gives Michael Sattler (q.v.) very favorable comment. Ludwig Haetzer is also mentioned; the Anabaptist movement is briefly characterized, thus giving the book a certain value for Anabaptist history. (ML II, 105.) NEFF.

Getuygenisse, 't, Ende de Naeghelaeten Schriften van Christiaen Rijcen, a rare book, published by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem, Holland, in 1588, contains sixteen letters and seven songs written by the martyr Christiaen de Rijcke (q.v.), executed in 1588. In addition this volume contains three letters of the martyr Adriaen Jansz; at the end of the book is found a song by Carel van Mander in commemoration of Christiaen's martyrdom. A copy is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. vdZ.

Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais I (The Hague, 1890) 321-31.

Geuns, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestors were apparently as follows:

(1) Steven Freriks (or Fredriks), a landowner, b. 1625 at Holwierde, Dutch province of Groningen, who about 1657 moved to Dyckhusen near Neustadt-Goedens in East Friesland, Germany. Here he married Lysabeth Dircksdochter, from Pilsum, East Friesland, and died in 1679. One of his sons was (2) Jan Steevens, b. in Dyckhusen 1660 and d. in Neustadt-Goedens 1716. He was a landowner and a businessman and a deacon of the Old Flemish congregation. He was married to Gepke Lubberts Cremer of an old Mennonite family (see Cremer family). One of his sons was (3) Elder Lubbert Jans Cremer (q.v.), who adopted his mother's family name, as was then very commonly done both in Friesland and East Friesland.

(4) Steeven Jans Cremer, another son of Jan Steevens, b. 1696 at Neustadt-Goedens, migrated about 1740 to Groningen in the Netherlands. He was a cloth merchant and rather well-to-do. He seems to have loosened his ties with the Old Flemish Mennonite congregation, because he played an important role among the Collegiants (q.v.) in Groningen, being their leader for a number of years. This Steeven Jans called himself S. J. van Geuns, i.e., from (Neustadt) Goedens and this became the family name. He was married first to Dieuwertje Roos of Groningen and then to Dieuwertje Alringh of Leer. He died in 1737.

One of his sons was (5) Matthias (Matthijs) van Geuns (1735-1817) (q.v.), a medical professor at Harderwijk and Utrecht. This Matthias had a number of children; one of them was (6) Steven Jan van Geuns (1767-95), who was a medical professor at the University of Utrecht at the same time as his father (N.N.B.Wb. I, 933); other sons of Matthias were (7) Jan (q.v.), a Mennonite minister, and (8) Jacob (1769-1834), first a physician at Groningen, then the founder of a bank in Amsterdam.

A son of Stevens Jans (4) was (9) Jan Stevens (1722-80), an iron dealer in Groningen, warmly interested in his home church (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 677), father of the Mennonite minister (10) Matthias van Geuns (q.v.) and grandfather of (11) Cornelis Sytze van Geuns (q.v.) and (12) Bartel van Geuns (q.v.), and great-grandfather of (13) Matthias C. van Geuns (q.v.), all three Mennonite ministers. A large number of members of this family were noted physicians, lawyers, and businessmen. Mention should be made of (14) Jan van Geuns (q.v.), medical professor at the University of Amsterdam, (15) Matthias van Geuns (1802-?), director of the Associatie Kassa at Amsterdam, (16) Albert van Geuns (1806-79), founder of the Banking Company Luden en van Geuns at Amsterdam, all three sons of Jacob van Geuns (8); (17) Jan van Geuns, son of Pastor Matthias van Geuns (10) (1799-1865), at first apothecary at Amsterdam, whose daughter Margaretha was married to Pastor Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.). This Jan van Geuns founded the first rubber factory in the Netherlands at Haarlem about 1828 (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 650); (18) Isak Matthias van Geuns (1772-1804), son of Matthias van Geuns (5), studied law and afterward entered diplomatic service (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 648); (19) Jacob van Geuns (1847-1909), son of Jan van Geuns (14), physician at Amsterdam, one of the first scholars to study the medical questions connected with life insurance (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 649). Many of his descendants emigrated to the United States at the end of the 19th century; (20) Steven Jan Matthijs van Geuns (1795-1849), son of Steven Jan van Geuns (6), was a lawyer at Utrecht and a member of the city council and of the provincial States of Utrecht. vdZ.

"Geslachtslijst van de familie van Geuns," manuscript now in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, Catalogus Amst., 45; A. M. Cramer, Brief betr. den stamvader der familie van Geuns hier te lande (n.p., n.d.); Ned. Patriciaat XIV (1924) 89-107.

Geuns, Bartel van, the son of Matthias van Geuns (preacher at Haarlem), b. Aug. 5, 1805, at Haarlem, was called in 1828 as minister to serve the Mennonite congregation at Akkrum, and to West Zaandam in 1830. The addresses given on the occasion of the union between the Frisians and the Flemish in 1841 by C. Leendertz and van Geuns have been published. Van Geuns retired on Aug. 7, 1870, and died at Arnhem on Feb. 24, 1873. He published a description of Zaandam and also a catechetical booklet, Gods Openbaringen (Zaandam, 1851). He was married to Hermina Juliana ten Cate of Enschede. K.V.

Biogr. Wb. III, 236 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 600; Catalogus Amst., 323, 326; ML II, 105.

Geuns, Cornelis Sytse van, brother of the foregoing Bartel, b. 1794 at Haarlem, d. 1827 at Leeuwarden. After finishing his studies at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary he served as a pastor for the congregations of Nijmegen in 1819(?)-22 and Leeuwarden 1822-27. He wrote a paper entitled "Over den Oorsprong der Doopsgezinden van de oude Waldenzen," which was published after his death in Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, 1829. He was married to Barbara van Hees. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 237; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 600; Naamlijst 1829, 43; Catalogus Amst., 10, 323, 325; ML II, 105.

Geuns, Jan van, b. 1764 at Groningen, son of Matthijs (Matthias) van Geuns, studied at the University of Harderwijk in 1780-89, obtaining his Ph.D. degree on April 21, 1789, on the same day as his brother Steven Jan. Soon afterward appointed ministerial candidate, he served the Mennonite churches of Leiden 1789-1814, and Amsterdam 1814-29. He seems to have been a man of warm piety and great learning, but of poor eloquence, so that his services, especially in Amsterdam, had low attendance. He died at Nijmegen in 1834. He published a large number of philosophical, historical, and political writings and papers, such as Brief aan het Committé ter regeling van de Grondvergaderingen der Gemeente van Leyden (Leiden, 1795) and Over den Slaavenstand (Leiden, 1797). He generously contributed to the Mennonite hymnbook Uitgezogte Liederen (Leiden, 1810). He was married to Geertruida van Heukelom of Amsterdam. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 237 f.; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 649; DB 1901, 24; 1897, 169; 1898, 111-12, 116; 1901, 24; Catalogus Amst., 298, 311, 312, 319, 325, 329.

Geuns, Matthias C. van, b. 1823 at Leeuwarden, son of Cornelis Sytse van Geuns (q.v.), d. there 1904, was a Mennonite pastor at Noord-Zijpe 1845-50, and Leeuwarden 1850-88. He had a large sphere of influence, not only by his preaching, but also by his secretaryship of the Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, 1875-97. In Leeuwarden he was so highly respected and beloved that during a socialistic disturbance, when a large number of windows were broken, the leaders of the uprising emphatically warned their following not to damage the house of Pastor van Geuns. At first he followed his father as a moderate evangelical; about 1860 he successively turned to modernism (liberalism) and a rather radical rationalism. In this movement he became an influential leader. He published a number sermons and a volume of lectures, entitled Ondeugende Scherts (Leeuwarden, 1871). His portrait is found DB 1903 and DJ 1906. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 238-39; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 600; DB 1903, 119-23; 1904, 239 f.; DJ 1906, 23-27; Catalogus Amst., 315, 321.

Geuns, Matthias Jansz van, son of the iron dealer Jan Stevens van Geuns at Groningen, b. there 1758, d. 1839 at Haarlem, served the following Mennonite congregations as a pastor: Makkum 1783-87, Harlingen 1787-92, and Haarlem 1792-1828. He published Kort Verslag aangaande den Toestand van het Doopsgezind Kerkgenootschap (Utrecht, 1793). He was married to Tryntje Cornelisd. Sytses of Leeuwarden. Two of his sons, Cornelis Sytse (q.v.) and Bartel (q.v.), were also Mennonite ministers (Naamlijst 1829, 25; Catalogus Amst., 152.) vdZ.

Geuns, Matthijs (Matthias) van, son of Steven Jansz (van Geuns), b. Sept. 2, 1735, at Groningen, d. Dec. 9, 1817, at Utrecht. His wife was Sara van Delden of Groningen. He was a student of the noted Professor Petrus Kamper at the University of Amsterdam, and in 1761 began to practice medicine at Groningen. His call to the University of Amsterdam could not be accepted, because he was a Mennonite. Five years later he became professor of medicine, chemistry, and botany at the University of Harderwijk. His work during the epidemic of 1783 was outstanding. In 1791 he was called as professor to the University of Utrecht. K.V.

N.N.B.Wb. I, 931; DJ 1840, 113; DB 868, 94; 1898, 116; 1900, 119; ML II, 105.

Geuns, Pieter van, who in the first decades of the 18th century was a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation at Norden, East Friesland, Germany, belonged to the large van Geuns family, but the degree of relationship could not be determined. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2824, 2827, 2836, 2838.) vdZ.

Geur van geestelijke Specerijen, a Dutch Mennonite songbook, containing 57 songs without notes. It was published at Haarlem (n.d., obviously early 17th century). DJ 1837, p. 65, mentions an edition at Haarlem in 1701, but no copy of this edition has been found. Among the composers of the songs are Achior van den Abeele (q.v.), Frans Hoefnagel, Jacob Jansz Kat (q.v.), and Anna van der Smisse. vdZ.

Geurts, Marten, an elder of the Flemish Mennonites in Holland in the middle of the 17th century. He died shortly before 1687. He lived at Veenendaal (also called Rijnsche Veen), was an opponent of the Collegiant innovations. In the conflict of the conservative Mennonites at Utrecht (q.v.), and the Galenists in 1661 and the following years, the conservatives refused to accept him as an intermediary, because he was too moderate. He wrote the following: (1) Tractaet dienende tot beweeringe der sichtbare Gemeynte Gods tegen alle die hedensdaechsche Nieuwigheden en Dwalingen (Utrecht, 1662); (2) Aenmerckingen over den

Handel en Mislagen van eenige Mennoniten binnen Utrecht (Utrecht, 1662). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 452; DB 1916, 161, 166, 174; ML II, 105.)
NEFF, vdZ.

Geuzenvragen, the designation by the Dutch Mennonites of the 12 questions which the magistrates of Utrecht, Deventer, Middelburg, and other towns in several cases laid before Mennonites to examine their faith and to check on possible Socinian (q.v.) or other heresy. The Mennonite ministers usually refused to answer these questions (see Adriaan van Eeghem), arguing that the government had no authority in matters of faith and no right to examine the consciences of its subjects. It is assumed that the questions were drawn up about 1655 by the Reformed clergyman Cornelius Gernman. vdZ.

Gex, a district of the French department of Ain, which was ceded by Switzerland to France in 1601. In the 20th century a congregation with name "Pays de Gex" was formed there in the town of Thoiry, eight miles from Geneva, by Swiss Mennonite emigrants under the leadership of Abraham Geiser. The congregation joined the Swiss Mennonite Conference in 1925; in 1926 it numbered about 50 souls; in 1955 it had 64 baptized members. (Zionspilger, March 9, 1924, 39; Almanach-Mennonite, 1951, 14; ML II, 105.) HEGE, H.S.B.

Geyersbühler, Nikolaus (Niklas Geyersbichler), a Hutterite Anabaptist, named for his birthplace, Geyerbühel in the district of Kitzbühel, Tirol, Austria, a miller by trade, therefore also called Müller. He was received into the Hutterian brotherhood by Peter Riedemann at Freischütz on the Hungarian border (Sobotiste), and was persuaded by his brother Wolf to emigrate with his wife to Moravia. He settled on the estate of the nobleman Sigmund Helt of Kement, near Seelowitz, Moravia. On Epiphany 1563 he was one of four brethren chosen as deacons. Three years later, though he was illiterate, he was sent to the Tirol to lead Anabaptists from there to Moravia. He dedicated himself to his task under difficult circumstances in the vicinity of his home town, but was seized with seven other Anabaptists in 1566 and transferred to Innsbruck.

His statements, which have been preserved in a Hutterite codex under the title, "Bruder Nikolaus Geyerspichlers Verantwortung vor besetztem Gerichte zu Innsbruck gründlich und peinliche Besprechung verfasst 1567, 29. Tag Aprilis," describe the circumstances of the Anabaptists in Moravia and also of the migration of the Tirolean Anabaptists to Moravia. In the case of the former, the conditions are less favorably presented than in other sources. He stated, of course, that he was not familiar with all the places in which Anabaptists lived, for some places were as much as 29 miles apart; furthermore, the Anabaptists were often driven from place to place. The routes to Moravia usually followed the Inn and the Danube. Boatmen accepted them without question if they merely paid the fee.

Geyersbühler lay in the Kräuterhaus (Innsbruck) and was often admonished there by priests to recant. After a final examination on the rack on forty-seven questions he still persisted in his faith. The principal points of questioning concerned obedience to the state, confessions of faith, and infant baptism. He defended himself against the assumption that his coreligionists were a sect; he did not believe in total depravity; unbaptized children (he believed) are saved. The sacraments are baptism (of adults), communion, and marriage. He rejected oral confession, adoration of images, and the intercession of the saints. He stated that Sunday was kept holy, that communion was held in Moravia in the large Bruderhofs, whereas in Tirol they were limited to the services held in woods and fields. They did not render an oath. This was his confession, and he would stand by it. Then, say the chronicles, the Jesuits treated him mildly and rudely, but he did not permit himself to be moved from his faith. Condemned to death, he was beheaded and then burned (1567).
LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 249-51; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 324; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 213 f.; Mart. Mir. D 345, E 703, where he is called Nic(h)olas Geyer; ML II, 110 f.

Gezangen, Christelijke, two volumes of hymns usually called Oude Amsterdamsche Bundels were published at Amsterdam in 1848, and were used by the Amsterdam Mennonite church until they were replaced (1871) by the Christelijke Liederen (q.v.) or Nieuwe Amsterdamsche Bundels. The Christelijke Gezangen also were in use in a number of other Mennonite churches. (Catalogus Amst., 329.)
vdZ.

Gezangen, Christelijke, voor de openbare Godsdienst-oeffeningen; ten dienste der Mennonite Gemeente te Hamburg en Altona. This hymnbook, also called Altonasche Gezangboek or Hamburgsche Liederen, printed at Amsterdam in 1802 with 666 pages without music, contained 254 hymns, including a number of Psalms, and a suffix of 19 hymns composed by P. Beets, elder of the Hamburg congregation, all in Dutch. Some of these hymns were inserted in the new hymnbook of the Haarlem congregation in 1851. vdZ.

Gezangen op de Christelijke Feesttijden. This small volume, containing only 15 hymns, was put in use in the Mennonite Zonist congregation at Amsterdam on Oct. 16, 1762, and later was also used in a number of other Dutch congregations. There are at least three editions, two in 1762 and one in 1775. vdZ.

Gezangen, Christelyke, ten gebruike der Doopsgez. Gemeente . . . te Amsterdam, a Dutch hymnbook: see Bundel, Kleine.

Gezangen, Christelyke, voor de openbaare Godsdienstoefening, a Dutch hymnbook: see Bundel, Groote.

Gezangen en Liederen, Christelijke, is the title of a Dutch hymnbook adopted in 1804 or 1805 by the Haarlem Mennonite congregation and some other congregations. There are two editions, both of 1804. It was used in Haarlem until 1851, when it was replaced by the Christelijke Kerkgezangen (q.v.). (DB 1861, 159; 1900, 102, 110.) vdZ.

Gezangen en Liederen der Vereenigde Doopsgezinden te Rotterdam, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook. On May 28, 1775, at the dedication of their new church, the Rotterdam congregation introduced the Psalms in the rhymed version of the Reformed Church; in 1776 it adopted the new hymnbook, Gezangen en Liederen, which was published in 1775 and contains 27 hymns, for a large part borrowed from the old songbook Lusthof des Gemoeds by Claes Stapel (q.v.). (DB 1900, 94.) vdZ.

Gezangen, Opwekkende. The Mennonite congregation of Haarlem re-edited the Amsterdam hymnbook Oude Liederen (q.v.) of 1684 under the new title Opwekkende Gezangen (1st ed. about 1712; 2nd ed. Haarlem, 1763). In 1776 a third edition of this hymnbook was published at Haarlem, entitled Liederen en Gezangen op de Chr. feesttijden, bij de Gemeenten der Doopsgezinden en Remonstranten te Haarlem en elders in gebruik. The next year a supplementary volume appeared under the old title Opwekkende Liederen, Tweede Stuk (Haarlem, 1777). (DB 1900, 88.) vdZ.

Ghatula, a village 41 miles southeast of Dhamtari, Madhya Pradesh, India, at the edge of a rich agricultural valley, was a Mennonite (MC) mission station established in 1916 under the direct management of George J. and Esther E. Lapp. The Bible training school for Christian workers was moved from Rudri (q.v.) to Ghatula the same year. Ultimately on the station ground of seven acres living quarters were built for missionaries, employees, Christian workers, and Bible school students, as well as a Bible school, a medical dispensary, and nurses' quarters; on an adjacent plot was built a primary school for village children with Christian teachers. The Ghatula field covered more than 2,000 square miles. There were opportunities for Indian Christians to obtain employment and purchase land in Ghatula and surrounding villages, with the result that a substantial Christian community with a well-organized church was established, which in 1955 had 81 members.

In 1929 the Bible school was merged into the Bible department of the Christian Academy at Dhamtari, from which time Ghatula was more particularly an evangelistic and primary educational center. In 1929-39 a girls' industrial school was operated, giving instruction in handwork, homemaking, field work, and elementary subjects. The industrial school was under the management of Minnie Kanagy and Gladys Weaver. G.J.L.

Gheerardyne Ryckelmans, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of the martyr Adriaen van Daele (q.v.), was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Peryne de Corte on June 6, 1573. She was charged with the crime of having been rebaptized and having attended Mennonite meetings. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 122 f., 178; XIV, 92 f., No. 1033.) vdZ.

Gheertsz, Jan, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Geerts.

Gheese Aelbrechtsdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of Lambrecht Duppijns (q.v.) of Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, was arrested there on May 23, 1539, when a meeting of Anabaptists in their home was surprised by the officials. She was severely tortured and was executed by drowning on May 29, 1539. Like her husband and the group meeting with them, Gheese was probably a follower of David Joris (q.v.), for in their home were found about 500 copies of a book by David Joris. vdZ.

Bijdr. en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap te Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 201, 208-10.

Gheestelijck Bloem Hofken, 'T, beplant met veel lieflijcke Bloemkens van verscheyden coleuren, tot dienst van alle Liefhebbers der Cantijcke Soetgeurigheydt, a Dutch Mennonite songbook, published at Haarlem in 1637, containing 128 songs without notes, arranged alphabetically. vdZ.

Gheestelijck Kruydt-Hofken, 'T, inhoudende veel schriftuerlijcke Liedekens by verscheyden Autheuren ghemaeckt ende nu tot stichtinge van een yegelijck t' samenghestelt, a Dutch hymnbook, which was very popular among the Dutch Mennonites of the 17th century. It contains 159 hymns without notes. Copies of the following editions have been preserved: 3rd edition, Amsterdam 1637; 6th edition, Haarlem 1647; 8th edition, Saerdam (i.e., Saandam) 1669; 9th edition, Saerdam 1683; 9th (should be 10th), Saerdam 1693. The edition of 1637 contains an appendix called Kleyn-Achter-Hofken, Beplant met verscheyden Gheestelijcke Liedekens tot stichtinge der Jeugt, containing 22 hymns. In the following editions this appendix is called 't Vermeerderde Achterhofken, containing 47 hymns.

There is also a 1664 edition of the Kruydt-Hofken, published at Alkmaar under a somewhat modified title and containing an appendix entitled Groot Achter-Hofken (containing 90 hymns). This Alkmaar edition of 1664 is said to be the 9th edition, which must be a mistake. vdZ.

Ghele Hame, a native of Friesland, was beheaded at Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, on Feb. 15, 1535, after having renounced his faith. His confession before his judges is very informative. He had received (re)baptism in 1534, two weeks before Christmas. He did not believe in the Catholic doctrine of the Mass, did not accept fasting as a Christian doctrine, and believed, as Melchior Hofmann and also Menno Simons taught, that Jesus did not receive His flesh from Mary (see Incarnation). (DB 1875, 60.) vdZ.

Gherlandi, Giulio (Guirlando, also Julius Klemprer), an Anabaptist martyr, born ca. 1520 at Spresiano near Treviso in Venetian territory, Italy, was intended by his Catholic father for the priesthood but fell into evil ways. He was troubled in conscience at the contradiction between his Christian pretensions and the actual character of his life, and his reading of Matt. 7:15, 16 led him to break with the Roman Church. Around 1549-51 he joined that group of evangelicals in Venetia who are commonly called Anabaptists but who at that time were veering in the direction of anti-Trinitarianism. He was baptized by Nicolo of Alessandria, a member of he anti-Trinitarian community in Treviso, and later he baptized several persons himself. When the renegade Pietro Manelfi (q.v.) exposed the evangelical movement to the Inquisition in 1551, leading to its near-destruction, Gherlandi left the radicals and looked about for more compatible society. With Francesco della Sega (or Saga, q.v.) he learned about the Hutterites sometime in the 1550's and was admitted to the brotherhood at Pausram, Moravia. He was not required to be rebaptized. In Moravia he engaged in his craft of making lanterns, but soon asked for and was granted permission to bring word of the Hutterites to his former associates in north Italy. In March 1559 Gherlandi went to Italy bearing a letter from Sega to a fellow believer in Vicenza, as well as a general letter of introduction from the Moravian brotherhood to the Italian evangelicals. This letter explains the occasion of the trip, i.e., to make known the nature of the Hutterite community to other Italians, but stipulates that only those Italians would be welcomed as new members whose minds were not contaminated with false doctrines about the nature of Christ, the resurrection from the dead, angels, devils, or other matters (obvious references to the doctrines approved by the Venetian council of 1550; see Manelfi). The letter also contains a statement of the Hutterite articles of belief. Gherlandi also bore a list of names of more than one hundred Italians living in over sixty localities in north Italy and the Grisons. On March 21, 1559, he came to official attention because he refused to swear to port authorities near Venice that he had no disease. He was soon released and we find him a few days later in Treviso publicly criticizing the Roman Church. This led to his arrest and examination at Treviso and transfer to prison in Venice, from which he managed to escape and return to Moravia. He was in Italy again at Christmas of 1560, and in October 1561 was captured once again at Treviso and imprisoned more securely in Venice. From his prison he wrote on Oct. 4 or 14, 1561, a letter (never delivered, and now in the archives of Venice) to Leonhard Lanzenstiel, bishop of the Moravian Hutterite community. This document explains his predicament, but shows a courageous spirit and a firmness in the faith that testify to the genuinenes of his religious conviction: "Do not for a moment doubt that there will be given to me in that hour, according to the true divine promise, wisdom, against which all the adversaries shall not be able to resist." A few days later (Oct. 23) Gherlandi prepared a comprehensive confession of faith in which he explained the circumstances surrounding his departure from Catholicism and his joining of the Hutterites, and described the beliefs and practices of the latter. He closed with these moving words: "That is my simple confession. I ask that it be accepted with indulgence, for I am no orator, writer, or historian but only a poor lantern-maker—I am however not truly poor, since I am indeed content with my fate." On Nov. 16, 1561, Gherlandi was examined by three theologians, who, after lively discussions, concluded that the prisoner remained "obstinate in the crime of heresy." The issue between the two parties rested squarely on the question of authority of the church, with Gherlandi holding steadily to the Scriptures. During the ensuing several months he was left to languish in the prison but occupied himself with efforts to convert his fellow prisoners. When admonished by a priest concerning this he refused to beg pardon from the court, saying, "To God alone ought I to bend the knee and not to worldly men" (Sept. 19, 1562). During this same month Gherlandi was joined in his prison by his old associate Sega; the renewed contact strengthened both in their faith. On Oct. 15, 1562, the court sentenced Gherlandi to be drowned; it informed him of his fate on Oct. 23, and he was executed soon thereafter. His last word was a greeting to the Hutterite community which Sega managed to record in a letter that paid glowing tribute to Gherlandi's splendid martyr example.

DeWind.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 239-40; V. Bellondi, Documenti e aneddoti di storia veneziana (1810-1854), Tratti dall' Archivio de' Frari (Florence, 1902); K. Benrath, "Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen um die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts," in Theol. Studien und Kritiken LVIII (1885) 9-67; idem, Gesch. der Reformation in Venedig, No. 18 of Schriften des Vereins für Ref. Gesch. (Halle, 1887); E. Comba, I nostri protestanti II, Durante la riforma nel Veneto e nell' Istria (Florence, 1897) 555-87; H. DeWind, "Italian Hutterite Martyrs," MQR XXVIII (1954) 164-71; ML II, 112.

Gherwen, Abraham van, compiler of a Dutch Mennonite songbook entitled Tot des Heeren Lof heb ick U (Ghod-vresende Zanger) dit Liedboecxken ghejont, ghenaemt: De Ghulde Fonteyne waer duer ick wensche dat veel fonteyntjes (dat zijn ghelovige harten) mede ghewonnen mochten worden . . . (Ghoude, i.e., Gouda, 1618). This songbook, containing 144 songs on 288 pages, was not intended for use in the public services but for private and family use. Of the compiler van Gherwen nothing further is known. vdZ.

Gheryt, a Dutch Anabaptist from Deventer, who took part in the Anabaptist revolt and assault on the town hall at Amsterdam, May 10-11, 1535. He was executed on May 14 in a bestially cruel way. Gheryt had been baptized by Jacob van Campen (q.v.) in the fall of 1533 in his own house at Amsterdam. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 62-64.) vdZ.

Ghesangen, Het Boeck der, the title of three Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks. (1) A hymnbook used by the Waterlander congregations, compiled by Hans de Ries. This hymnbook went through at least seven editions under different titles. The oldest edition, 1582, is entitled Lietboeck (see Hans de Ries). (2) A hymnbook containing the Psalms in the rhymed version of Petrus Dathenus (q.v.) and Lof-sanghen ende Geestelijcke Lieden, an anthology of hymns from the Lietboeck (1582) of Hans de Ries (q.v.), followed by the Confession of de Ries and Lubbert Gerrits. It was published in Hoorn in 1618. This edition was formerly called the Hoornsche Gesanghboeck.

(3) A hymnbook containing the Psalms in the rhymed version of Petrus Dathenus (q.v.), parts 2, 3, and 4 of the Liedtboeck (1582) by Hans de Ries (q.v.), followed by the Confession of de Ries and Lubbert Gerrits; it was published at Amsterdam (B. Otsz, voor Claes Jacobsz in de Rijp) in 1624. Later editions of (2) appeared under the title Gesangh-boeck, vervaet in vier Delen, . . . ; there are known editions of 1648 (de Rijp), 1658 (de Rijp; printed at Hoorn), and 1684 (de Rijp). The edition of 1684 does not contain the Psalms. This hymnbook was usually called the "Rijper" songbook. (Catalogus Amst., 267 f.) vdZ.

Gheylliart (Gheillyart), Jan, a printer of Dutch Bibles at Emden, East Friesland, Germany: see Mierdemann (Mierdman), Steven.

Ghysbert Jansz, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Amsterdam on March 20, 1549. He was a native of the town of Woerden, province of South Holland, and had been baptized by Gillis van Aken. Together with Ghysbert seven other martyrs, five men and two women, were put to death. They are celebrated in a song, "Tis nu schier al vervult ons broeders getal" (The number of our brethren is now almost complete), which is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556, 1566, and later editions. (Mart. Mir. D 82, E 483 f.; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 308.) vdZ.

Gibson (Miss.), Old Order Amish community, now extinct, was established in the winter of 1895-96 when nine Amish families from Newton Co., Ind., settled in western Monroe County and eastern Chickasaw County. Families from other Amish communities later moved into the settlement, so that with those who were married in the congregation the number reached approximately 25 families. Several families moved away before the last settlers arrived. In 1903-5 the settlement disintegrated, the families moving to Arthur, Ill.; Indiana; Custer Co., Okla.; Anderson Co., Kan.; Reno Co., Kan.; and to Michigan. J.J.Y.

Gichtelianer, a brotherhood founded by Johann Georg Gichtel (1638-1710). He was educated at the University of Strasbourg, studying theology and jurisprudence, became a lawyer in Speyer, Germany, and later in Regensburg, where his receptive religious sense was deeply stimulated by the Hungarian Baron Justinian Ernst von Weltz. He accompanied Weltz to the Netherlands, and in Zwolle made contact with Friedrich Breckling, a mystical Lutheran pastor. This was the turning point of his life. He became involved in extreme, mystical, theosophist thought. He waited in prayer for hours to find God's will. Outward religious services he considered a hindrance to inner communion with God. He felt himself called to denounce the false worship of the Lutheran Church, in which he felt a lack of earnest self-denial. He was in consequence barred from practicing law in Regensburg, deprived of his citizenship and possessions, and expelled from the city.

After a short residence in Gernsbach, Baden, Germany, and in Vienna, Austria, Gichtel returned to Zwolle. Here he was also banished and, at odds with Breckling, went to Amsterdam via Kampen. He became acquainted with Jakob Boehme's writings and lived entirely in the world of Boehme's ideas, which he sought to develop in speculation and to transfer into practical living. He developed a rigid asceticism, rejecting marriage.

Peculiar to Gichtel was the idea of the priesthood of Melchizedek. "God had given him and his followers the power to present one's soul to God as a sacrifice for other lost souls through prayer and concentration on the blood and death of Christ." To him this was a continuation of the high-priestly work of Christ, "the evidence of full communion with Him, the highest point of experience of the love of God, and the symbol of the most intimate contact with wisdom" (HRE VI, 660). Gichtel's adherents were scattered through Holland, Hamburg-Altona, Berlin, and South Germany; but they were not numerous and soon died out. He himself had not intended to form a separate group and took no part in related religious phenomena. He sharply attacked the Mennonites, and was answered by Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and other Mennonites (Hylkema, 125, 428). Conrad Beissel (q.v.) had some contacts with Gichtel.

Among the Mennonites of Russia a brotherhood was organized in Felsenthal (q.v.), who had some peculiar points of contact with the Gichtelians. The famous Jan Luiken (q.v.) must also have been influenced by Böhme and Gichtel (ML II, 700). NEFF.

C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs (Haarlem, 1902) 125, 428; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 133; Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 153, 169; ML II, 112.

Giebelstadt, a village in Bavaria, Germany, 12 miles south of Würzburg, where a Mennonite congregation was established about the middle of the 19th century. The first families settled on leased estates around Zell (Hettstädter Hof in 1803) and Rottenbauer near Würzburg. In Rottenbauer a congregation was organized in 1810, which grew rapidly. After the 1830's religious services were held alternately there and in Giebelstadt, and the congregation was named Rottenbauer-Giebelstadt. The members came originally exclusively from the Sinsheim district of Baden. The most common names were Bachmann, Bähr, Borkholder, Bühler, Fellmann, Heer, Hege, Hodel, Horsch, Hunsinger, Landes, Lichti, Mosemann, Musselmann, Schmutz, and Zeiset. In 1867 a meetinghouse was built in Giebelstadt at a cost of 2,000 guilders, for which Preacher Jakob Horsch and his sons Johannes and Jakob donated the land. It seated 100 persons. A list of 1881 states the number of souls in the congregation as 172. In the following years the congregation declined heavily through emigration to America and southern Bavaria; in 1927 only five or six Mennonite families were living in Giebelstadt out of a total of 122 souls in the congregation.

Since most of the members were then living in Würzburg, regular services were begun there in a rented hall. In consequence the congregation became known as the Giebelstadt-Würzburg, (q.v.) congregation (ML II, 112). In 1941 the congregation had only 51 souls, with a meeting in Würzburg every Sunday and at Giebelstadt on the first Sunday of the month. In the 1951 Gemeinde-Kalender the name had become Würzburg-Giebelstadt, and the meetings were held in Würzburg on the first and third Sundays of the month and at Giebelstadt on the second Sunday in the home of a Landes family. In 1955 the number of members in the congregation was 61. Almost from the beginning the Giebelstadt congregation regularly had two elders. The list of elders includes the following (with terms of service in the office): Jakob Horsch (?-1888), Johannes Landes (1839-?), Jakob Fellmann (1876-1905), Jakob Hege (1880-?), J. Hunsinger (1894-1910), G. van der Smissen (1894-1914), M. Fellmann (1907-36), J. Landes (1907-18), J. Hege (1914-29), Johannes Schmutz (1933-). In addition there were usually two other preachers and one deacon. The noted Ingolstadt elder, Michael Horsch, was earlier a member here and was ordained preacher here in 1909, moving to Hellmannsberg-Ingolstadt in 1913. (ML II, 112 f.) Hege, H.S.B.

Giekerk, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland. Forty-five Mennonites living here in 1947 formed a Mennonite circle (kring), attending the church services at Veenwouden (q.v.) and Dantumawoude (q.v.) by bus. In Giekerk itself the members of this circle meet regularly, and there is also a ladies' circle with 11 members. Giekerk kring is a part of the congregation of Veenwouden. In 1955 the membership of the circle was 33. vdZ.

Gielis van Aerde, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Lier (Belgium), was taken prisoner together with Govert Mertens, Marie Vlaminx, and Tanneken van Roosbroecke. After a severe cross-examination on the rack, in which he publicly confessed his faith, he was hanged and burned at Lier on Jan. 31, 1551 (not 1550; see Offer 569, note). Hans de Vette, who witnessed their execution, composed a song about these four martyrs of Lier, that starts with the words: "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert" (Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 17). vdZ.

Offer, 568-77; Mart. Mir. D 96 f., E 1, 111 (van Braght calls these four martyrs Gilles, Govert, Mariken, and Anneken); Wolkan, Lieder, 63; Wackernagel, Lieder, 126; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 393; XIV, 18 f., No. 196; ML I, 73.

Gielis Bernaerts, an Anabaptist martyr: see Michiel Beernaerts.

Gielis van Gent, an Anabaptist martyr, executed by beheading at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1559. His name (No. 46) is found in "Aenhoort Godt Hemelsche Vader," printed in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, 1562. Particulars are lacking, unless he is identical with Michiel (Jelis) Bernaerts (q.v.). Gielis van Gent is not found in van Braght, Mart. Mir. (Offer, 566.) vdZ.

Gielis de Gusseme, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gillis de Gusseme.

Gielis (de) Hevilé (Heville), an Anabaptist martyr, put to death at Antwerp on Feb. 17, 1573, with four other victims. Gielis had been rebaptized, but refused to name the elder who had baptized him. He remained steadfast and loyally suffered his cruel death. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 104 f., 173; XIV, 90 f., No. 1008.) vdZ.

Gielis (Gilles, Jelis) Mattysz (Matthijsz), an Anabaptist martyr, a surgeon at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, who was put to death there with Willeboort Cornelisz on Oct. 26, 1564. He said he lay imprisoned over two years. The execution took place at night for fear of the populace. The Offer des Heeren and van Braght print three of his letters. One is addressed to the congregation whose pastor he was. It is a pastoral letter of unusual beauty, urging his members to be faithful and walk uprightly. The others were written to his wife, to comfort her and encourage her to have patience and perseverance in a pious life, well-pleasing to God. The Offer des Heeren celebrates him in a song, "Mijn jock is soet, mijn last is licht" (eight stanzas). (Offer, 448-77; ML III, 60; Mart. Mir. D 306, E 671-80; Wolkan, Lieder, 68.) Neff.

Gielt Eelckezoon, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on March 5, 1555. He had been rebaptized and sharply denounced the Catholic doctrines, saying that all that goes on "in the Catholic Church is idolatry." vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaar uit de Gesch. der Hervorming in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746.

Giesbrecht (Giesebrecht), a Mennonite family name, which is first found in West Prussia in 1607, Heinrich Giesebrecht being listed in Scharfenberg and Peter Giesebrecht in Reichenberg, both of which were Dutch villages in the Danzig Werder. In that year Peter Giesebrecht, a carpenter, received from the council of the city of Danzig the commission to build two sluices near Pasewark in the Danzig lowlands. He was promoted to the position of mill-builder, settled on a farm in the lowland, sold the farm two years later to a Mennonite named Bestvater, and moved up the Vistula into the neighborhood of Mewe. In 1612 an Abraham Giesebrecht was Schulze of the village of Scharfenberg in the Danzig lowland. His descendants can be traced in the village until 1763. The name was also found in other villages in the Danzig lowland. In 1623 a Peter Giesebrecht is one of a group of Mennonites arraigned before the Danzig city council by the Protestant pastor of Schönbaum for refusing to pay the required fees.

In 1680 an Abraham Giesebrecht of Schöneberg in the Gross-Werder entered the German preparatory school of the Elbing Gymnasium. Other Mennonites with this name were members of the Flemish Mennonite congregations in Danzig, the Gross-Werder, and Elbing. There were also isolated occurrences of the name in the Frisian congregation of Montau-Gruppe. In 1789, before the great emigration to Russia, the Giesebrechts are listed in the Mennonite register. In 1936 there was no longer a bearer of this name in West Prussia.

In Russia a Jacob Giesebrecht was one of the first members of the newly established Mennonite Brethren Church. His name is found as signatory of the applications to the government in Odessa and St. Petersburg. He later emigrated to the Kuban and in 1875 became Oberschulze of the Kuban Mennonite settlement.

Some bearers of this name emigrated to Canada and South America. This name is not found among the Mennonites of the United States. H.P.

G. E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940).

Gieseler, Johann Karl Ludwig (1792-1854), a church historian, professor of theology at the University of Göttingen, author of Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (Bonn, 1840-53), English translation, A Textbook of Church History (N.Y., 1868), which contains a treatise on the Anabaptists (III, Part I, 196-200) and one on the Mennonites (Part II, 90-102), stating in terse and objective terms what was known by scholars at the time, and citing an amazing number of sources, including even the works of Menno Simons. He does not, of course, give a true picture. He traces the rise of the Mennonites to Thomas Müntzer. In the divisions of the Dutch Mennonites he sees the "repulsive picture of raw piety, crossed by vanity and self-assertion of the most petty kind," and concerning the Swiss Anabaptists he says, "Among them remnants of their original fanaticism continued a long time, and they differ in this from the Mennonites, who nevertheless regarded them as their brethren in faith and frequently had letters of intercession written by the States General to the cantons, as to Zürich in 1660, and to Bern in 1718." On the whole, this history shows clearly what great progress research had made in the field of Mennonite history. (ML II, 113.) NEFF.

Giethoorn, a town in the Dutch province of Overijssel, pop. about 2,500, of whom about 500 are Mennonites, since olden times the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Between 1563 and 1565 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) visited this congregation and baptized five persons. It is striking that many family names at Giethoorn consist of two syllables and end in a silent e: Doze, Haxe, Gorte, Hase, Kleine, Wuite. Blaupot ten Cate (Groningen II, 220-21) was of opinion that the congregation descended from the Flagellants. (The Flagellants were a medieval sect, which laid much stress upon asceticism and mortification of the flesh; in the 14th century they marched in large groups through Western Europe, flagellating their bodies; a number of them are said to have been directed to Giethoorn by the Bishop of Utrecht in order to break up the peat-moors here.) This is not very likely, but it is a fact that the congregation of Giethoorn, a picturesque village situated in a lake district, with its canals, its numerous small and high bridges, its old-fashioned houses, both by its history and the characteristic manners and customs still in use in this town, takes an exceptional place among the Dutch congregations. In former times Giethoorn was a predominantly Mennonite town. As late as 1838, 50 per cent of the population was Mennonite, but now (1955) only 20 per cent.

By the end of the 16th century the congregation of Giethoorn was divided in two congregations, South Giethoorn and North Giethoorn. The smaller North congregation then belonged to the conservative Huiskopers (q.v.); in the 17th and 18th centuries it belonged to the Danzig Flemish Mennonites (q.v.), and maintained close connections with the church of Danzig. Sometimes elders came from Danzig to Giethoorn to perform baptism and the Lord's Supper. This North congregation maintained the old practices of the ban and the simple life and clothing and never admitted trained and salaried ministers. In 1631 and again in 1646 its members were exempted from serving in government offices on paying a fee.

It maintained some contacts with the conservative congregation of Balk. In 1834 its membership numbered about 60. It possessed a small meetinghouse, which was damaged in 1825 by a flood of the Zuider Zee. The last elders were Hendrik Sijmens Bakker (?-1852) and Gerrit Sijmens Bos, elder from 1838 until his death Jan. 14, 1875. From then on the pulpit was vacant, and the remaining members, only nine, joined the congregation of South Giethoorn in 1890. The meetinghouse, restored in 1854, was torn down in 1894.

The congregation of South Giethoorn always was the larger one. It belonged to the Flemish branch, and was sometimes called the New Flemish Church. It was less conservative than its sister congregation, but in the 18th and early 19th centuries more conservative than other Dutch congregations. Silent prayer was in use until about 1780, and in 1811 the congregation adopted the principle of strict nonresistance, asking absolute freedom from military service. The last unsalaried preacher was Harm W. Dam (1778-1873), who served ?-1850, assisted by K. Hovens Greve, preacher of Zuidveen (q.v.), who served from 1826 to 1851. In this year Greve's son A. K. Hovens Greve became the first trained pastor of South Giethoorn. He was followed by W. Jesse 1858-62, A. van Gulik 1863-66, J. A. Oosterbaan 1866-76, J. F. Bakker 1877-81, H. Koekebakker 1881-86, A. van der Goot 1889-92, H. Schuurmans 1894-1910, T. O. M. H. Hylkema 1911-29, M. J. Kosters Gz 1929-33, A. J. van der Sluis 1936-39, Abr. Mulder 1941-46, and F. H. Sixma from 1948.

Concerning the meetinghouse not much is known. The old meetinghouse was remodeled in 1856. A new one, still standing, was built in 1871 and dedicated on Christmas Day of this year. Statistics of membership were not available before 1834, when the membership numbered 314. It must, however, have been much more numerous in the 17th and 18th centuries. In 1861 the membership was 468, in 1900, 490, in 1955 about 365. About 1870 modernism (liberalism) entered the church. Most members of the church are farmers, but the farms are usually small. Besides the farmers there are a larger number of farm laborers, who formerly were often unemployed in winter. Hence the congregation had to take care of them; in 1915 it spent 4,000-5,000 guilders for the care of the poor. About 1920 the church board at the instigation of Pastor Hylkema carried out some plans of providing work, e.g., poldering swampy fields. Now conditions are much better because of the government unemployment benefits. Near Giethoorn are found two Mennonite recreation centers, "Samen Een" and "Kraggehuis," both situated on the lake.

Church life is very active here. Giethoorn was among the first Mennonite congregations to start a Sunday school for children, opened in 1895. Now there are two, one in South Giethoorn, one in North Giethoorn, comprising 200 children. A choir, founded 1914, now consists of 40 members; Bible circles, both in South and North; youth clubs; a gymnastic club (300 members), a basketball club, etc. The number of catechumens in 1955 was 177. T.O.H., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1736; DJ 1850, 40 f.; DB 1861, 173; 1872, 195; 1873, 196; 1878, 2, 10, 14 ff., 23, 27; 1890, 142; 1892, 79, 81 f.; 1897, 83; 1898, 71; 1901, 2, 16, 47; F. A. Hoefer, "Historische Aanteekeningen omtrent Giethoorn," in Verslagen en Meded. Overijssels Regt en Geschiedenis XXX, 33-53; ML II, 113-14.

Giger, Gabriel, an Anabaptist of St. Gall, Switzerland, who joined the newly established brotherhood in Zürich in its earliest days. In the cross-examination of Feb. 25, 1525, he said that when the Spirit of God came upon him he hastily ran to Felix Manz's house, and there he was baptized by Conrad Grebel. Upon promising the court to desist and paying the costs he was dismissed. Soon afterward he was arrested again. In the trial of March 16, 1525, he stated that infant baptism was introduced by the pope; for this reason he had let himself be baptized by the godly baptism. He himself had never baptized, but would do so upon request. . . . He was not his own; what God commanded he would do.

Giger's letter written in August 1525 to the Swiss Brethren in Zollikon says, "Peace and grace be with you from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for our sins, that He might redeem us from this present awful world. . . . Do not take it ill of us that we did not write for so long; for there is not a week when we do not have to appear before the wolves. But we want you to know, dear Brethren, that God is working in a wonderful manner among the common people. I believe that there are many who have been baptized in Christian baptism in St. Gall, in the canton of Appenzell, and in the abbot's jurisdiction. . . . Pray to God for us that He may not withdraw His grace. Amen. Greet Uli Meyer, Heini Gigli, Jörg Schad, Ruotsch and Jakob Hottinger, and all the Brethren at Zollikon. There are probably 500 persons baptized in the Christian faith in the city and the canton." In December 1525 he was greeted in a letter by Niklaus Guldi. NEFF.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer . . . (Zürich, 1878) 26, 29; J. K. Füsslin, Beyträge . . . (Zürich, 1741) 369; TA Zürich, 49, 52, 62, 73-75, 80, 120; ML II, 114.

Gijsbrechtsz (Gijsbertsz), Hendrik, an elder of the Dutch Mennonite congregation of Gouda who adhered to the strict Mennonite principles; in 1660 he was present at the Flemish conference held at Leiden (see Leidsche Synode), which appointed him and three other ministers to visit Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), preacher at Amsterdam, to ask him to change his opinions or to suspend his ministerial duties. In 1665 we find Gijsbrechtsz with the Zonist wing opposing the Galenists (or Lamists), and traveling to Zeeland with the Zonist leader Samuel Apostool (q.v.) to persuade the congregations in this province to join the Zonists. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 74, 106 f.

Gijselaar (de) (de Gyselaer), a family found from the 16th century on in Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland; they were prominent citizens of Dordrecht, well-to-do and usually cloth merchants. Since the end of the 16th century the members of the family have belonged to the Reformed Church. This may be the de Gyselaar family to which several Mennonite martyrs belonged: Cornelis Cornelisz (q.v.), a cloth-shearer from Dordrecht; Michiel Gerritsz (q.v.) of Prinsenhage, Dutch province of North Brabant, an uncle of Cornelis, who had married the widow of Valerius de Schoolmeester (q.v.); and Adriaen Jacobsz (q.v.), the son of Jacob Cornelisz of Dordrecht, a weaver at Dordrecht and owner of a farm near Klundert (q.v.), in the neighborhood of which all three were arrested in 1572, while attending a Mennonite meeting. (Ned. Patriciaat IV, 1913, and XVIII, 1928-29, 78 f.; DB 1912, 30-48.) vdZ.

Gillis van Aken (not identical with Giesbert van Ratheim or Gys van Rotheim, who was also called Giesbert von Breberen for his birthplace; see Ratheim). Gillis van Aken was born about 1500 in or near Susteren in the Jülich district of Born (now Dutch province of Limburg), a gathering point of the recent Protestant movement. The Jülicher Erkundung says of Born, "One named Herr Gillis, a neighbor child, also preached here." In the examination (Verhandlung) before the magistrate of Born on June 16, 1533, one Gielis van Dilsen admitted that he had consented to having "Heer Gilis" preach in Susteren, and had heard him. Since he is addressed with the title "Heer" he may, like Menno Simons, have been a priest. In 1531 he was already traveling as an Anabaptist preacher through Limburg and must also have worked in Aachen, from which town he received his name. For a long time he was on the side of Menno Simons and became "a head and bishop of the Anabaptists." Two sisters of Illekhoven on the Maas testified at a trial in 1540 that Gillis was pale, of average height, with a pointed brown beard and large eyes. At times he wore his hair long, at other times cut. At a meeting in Goch in 1542 Menno Simons confirmed (ordained) him as an elder at the same time as Adam Pastor and Antonius of Cologne.

From this time on, Gillis was one of the outstanding Mennonites, took part in various important meetings of the elders, and traveled over a large part of Holland and Germany. He must have baptized a great many, for no other is named so frequently by the martyrs as the one who baptized them. In 1552 he was "banned" by Menno and his followers at a meeting in Mecklenburg because of adultery, but was reinstated in 1554 upon confession. Subsequently the Mennonites were frequently reproached (not without some justification) with this. On the occasion of the division in 1555 on the question of the shunning of banned marriage partners, he appears to have been very rigid and thus was a factor in the separation of the Waterlanders and High Germans from the main body.

Gillis was captured in 1557 while preaching in Willeboortsveld near Antwerp. For fear of death he recanted and offered to promote Catholicism in the very places where he had formerly preached, but he escaped only the stake thereby. On July 10, 1557, he was beheaded, his right hand cut off, and his body broken on the wheel. Because of his recanting, van Braght did not include him in the Martyrs' Mirror. His son Gillis was a preacher in Amsterdam, and the well-known Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.) was his grandson.

K.V., W.N.

K. Vos, "Gillis van Aken," in De Tijdspiegel (August 1905); K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 95-99 (Vos attempted to prove that Gillis van Aken was identical with Ghielis von Ratheim or Rotheim); Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 339-42; Redlich, Jülich-Berg, Kirchenpolitik II, 1, pp. 92 and 314. W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht I (The Hague, 1937) 52-57 et passim (Bax also identifies Gillis van Aken with Gys van Rothem); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 435, 438, 440; XIV, 22 f., No. 251; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 354, 361, 367, 370, 392, 399; DB 1918, 138 f.; ML I, 2 f.

Gillis (de) Graet (Jelis de Groot), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium, on Feb. 18, 1559 (Mart. Mir. erroneously 1558, without exact date). He was a native of Lendele, Flanders. After he had been arrested the officers considered transferring him to the Doornik prison, because they were afraid that the populace of Kortrijk would try to liberate him. But the transfer did not take place. Gillis was kept in prison for 13 months. Then he faithfully suffered martyrdom. There were also other Mennonites in the de Graet family. A Jan de Graet of Kortrijk was charged with Anabaptism as early as 1538. Syntgen de Graet (see Jozijne Steeghers), an old woman, and her son Steven de Graet (q.v.) died for their faith at Gent, Belgium, in 1564.

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 367, E 616; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 33, No. 6; ML II, 187.

Gillis de Gusseme, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was arrested at Merelbeke, Flanders, where he was taken prisoner with other Anabaptists, including Jacob (van) Curick of Cleve and Willem de Brouwer of Leiden, and imprisoned at Gent. Both Jacob and Willem recanted and were beheaded at Merelbeke on July 11, 1551. Gillis and also Lysbeth Piersins (q.v.) remained steadfast. Gillis, Lysbeth, and Jacob Curick had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). Gillis was a native of Merelbeke. He and Lysbeth were sentenced to be executed there, but because the Council of Flanders feared that en route to Merelbeke they would address and stir up the people, they were burned at the stake on the Veerleplein at Gent, on July 21, 1551. A song commemorating the death of Lysbeth and Gillis, "Alsmen schreef vijftien hondert jaren en een en fijftich daertoe voormaer," is found in the Liedtboecxken vanden Offer des Heeren (1562), No. 8. Gillis's wife and his 17-year-old son Lievin were also examined, but, though it became evident that they were only halfhearted Catholics, they were obviously not Anabaptists and were set free. (Mart. Mir. D 105, E 502; Verheyden, Gent, 17, No. 32; Wolkan, Lieder, 63.) vdZ.

Gillis van Havre (Havere), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on May 9, 1571, at Antwerp, Belgium. Gillis van Havre, who is said to have been a young man, was sentenced to death because he was (re)baptized, and because he was not willing to recant. Apparently this martyr is the same person as Jelis Claversz (q.v.) and Jelis de Metselaer (q.v.), who are listed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror as different persons. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 201, E 872; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 53, 63; XIV, 76 f., No. 899.

Gillis (Gieles) Outerman(s), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jelis Outerman.

Gillis Rooze, an Anabaptist martyr, b. at Bellegem, near Kortrijk in Flanders, belonged to the congregation at Brugge, Belgium, which was led at this time by Jacob de Rore (q.v.). Several times he had taken part in the meetings held in the house of Maillaert de Grave. He was arrested in Brugge in February 1568 and between April 13 and July 28 of this year he was executed here at the stake. His wife Jacquemyne de Wilde (q.v.) died as a martyr a short time after him. Whether this Gilles Rooze belonged to the well-known Mennonite Roose (Roosen, q.v.) family is not certain, but it is probable that he did. (Verheyden, Brugge, 53, No. 50.)

vdZ.

Gillis Schrijver, a Mennonite elder of Flanders, Belgium, came several times in 1566-67 to Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, in order to settle the Flemish-Frisian quarrel (DB 1893, 26-51, passim). In the 17th century a Schrijver family is found in the Netherlands, one of whom was Pieter Schrijver (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher at Hoorn and Amsterdam. vdZ.

Gilse, van, a Dutch Mennonite family. As early as 1415 Jan van Gilse is found in the neighborhood of Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant. Obviously he or one of his ancestors received his name after the village of Gilse (now Gilze), situated in the same area. After the Reformation the van Gilses are found in Rotterdam and Schiedam. In the 17th century they are said to have been Remonstrants (q.v.).

The first Mennonite of this family seems to have been (1) Cornelis van Gilse, b. 1717 at Schiedam, d. 1796 at Rotterdam. He was a surgeon, married to Geertruy van Maurik from Utrecht, and a deacon of the congregation of Rotterdam in 1749-53. His son was (2) Jan van Gilse, b. 1756 Rotterdam, d. 1782 at West Zaandam, who was trained for the ministry by Pieter Beets (q.v.), the preacher of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church, and appointed ministerial candidate in 1774 by the church board of this congregation. In December 1774 at the age of only 19 years he was called to the ministry by the congregation of West Zaandam, where he served until his early death in 1778. He was married to Agatha Middelhoven. His philosophical essay, Over Gods Voorzienigheid, was given an award by the Teyler Theological Society. He also published a sermon, preached July 8, 1781, on I Thess. 5:12, 13, Redevoering over de Agting . . . (Amsterdam, 1781). (Biogr. Wb. III 253 f.; DB 1864, 105 f.; Catalogus Amst., 253 f.)

His only son, (3) Jacob van Gilse, b. 1779 at Zaandam, d. there 1835, was a lumber dealer and owner of a sawmill, married Jannetje van Neck, and was the father of (4) Jan van Gilse (q.v., 1810-59), Mennonite preacher and professor at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Of the children of this Jan we name (5) Jacob van Gilse (q.v., 1836-1917), Mennonite minister, and (6) Alexander Gerard van Gilse, b. 1847 at Amsterdam, d. 1928 at Hilversum, served as Mennonite pastor of Wormer-Jisp 1871-72, Westzaan-Zuid 1872-78, Leer in East Friesland 1878-90, and Zwolle 1890-1922. In 1922 he resigned. He was married (1880) to Henriette J. Brouer of Leer. Jacob's children were (7) Jan van Gilse (1861-1935), a lawyer and member of the Tweede Kamer (House of Representatives), (8) Johan Adam van Gilse (1863-1931), a grain merchant at Groningen, and (9) Jacob van Gilse (1868-1946), police inspector at Rotterdam. A son of Alexander Gerard (6) is (10) Peter H. G. van Gilse, who was born at Leer, May 13, 1881. He was for many years professor of medicine at the University of Leiden, until he resigned in 1951, and a member of the church board of the Mennonite congregation at Leiden, and curator (governor) of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1941-51; his son (11) Alexander Gerard, b. 1923 at Haarlem, was the Mennonite pastor of Joure 1947-51 and Amersfoort 1951-53, and since Nov. 1, 1953, director of the Mennonite International Center of Heerewegen (q.v.) at Zeist. (For the van Gilse family see Ned. Patriciaat XXXIX, 1953, 87-99; ML II, 115.) vdZ.

Gilse, Jacob van, b. Jan. 25, 1836, at Koog aan de Zaan, d. June 8, 1917, at Groningen, educated at the Gymnasium at Amsterdam, the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam, and the University of Leiden. After the death of his father Jan van Gilse (q.v.), he discontinued his studies to become a ministerial candidate in 1860. In January 1861 he delivered his sermon of installation as pastor of the Mennonite congregation at West Zaandam, and on Feb. 26, 1870, he became pastor of the united Mennonite congregation at Groningen. On May 27, 1906, he resigned in order to devote more time to the study of Hebrew and to social work. For a number of years he was on the board of directors of the A.D.S. and curator of the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. For more than 30 years he served as secretary of the Sociëteit (Conference) of Groningen and East Friesland. In 1906 he was knighted. In his youth he was an ardent promoter of modernism, which had made its appearance in 1860, and with the Reformed preacher B. J. C. Mosselmans of Groningen he became a founder of the weekly Hervorming. The results of his studies in Hebrew and the Old Testament he published in a number of studies and articles which appeared in the Theologisch Tijdschrift. Besides this he published Tien Preeken (Groningen, 1871). He was married to Anna Petronella Meelboom, daughter of Jan Adam Meelboom, Lord of Kockingen, and Engelina Craandijk. K.V.

Biogr. Wb. III, 257 f.; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1918, 183-90 with portrait; Catalogus Amst., 286, 300, 315, 356; ML II, 115.

Gilse, Jan van, a son of Jacob van Gilse and Jannetjen van Neck, b. Oct. 19, 1810, d. May 25, 1859, at Amsterdam. He was twice married, his first wife being Jannetje Brester, the second Alexandrina Geertruide Craandijk. In 1834 he became the minister of the Mennonite congregation of Koog and Zaandijk. Two years later he received his doctor's degree with the thesis, Commentatio exegetica et critica in caput XVII Vaticiniorum Ezechielis. In 1837 he was called as pastor to Amsterdam and on May 5, 1849, as professor at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, entering upon his duties on Oct. 9. As a student he had twice won a prize with studies on Obadiah and Sirach. He wrote many articles for periodicals such as Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, De Gids, and Godgeleerde Bijdragen. After his death his writings, including a number of sermons, were published in five volumes with a biography by Professor P. J. Veth (Verspreide en Nagelaten Schriften van Dr. J. van Gilse, Amsterdam, 1860-61). He was a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. He was the second president of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society and a warm promoter of missions. His premature death prevented his full development, and his influence on the education of young Mennonite preachers was too suddenly removed. His work concerns chiefly the field of Biblical exegesis. W. Steelink engraved a beautiful portrait of him. K.V.

Biogr. Wb. III, 254-57; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 657; DJ 1850, 184-90; DB 1886, 75-82; 1887, 47; 1898, 153; Catalogus Amst., 283, 315; ML II, 115.

Gingerich (Gingrich, Guengerich, Gingery), a Mennonite family name of Swiss Bernese origin. The name Gündrich, which likely became Güngerich, is found in the Bern records as early as 1389. The family, it appears, originated in the county of Konolfingen, canton of Bern. By 1559 the name was spelled Günderich but did not yet appear in Anabaptist lists. In 1692 the Anabaptist preacher (Lehrer) Christian Güngerich escaped from the prison in Schwarzenegg, where he had been imprisoned because of his religion. In 1709 the records of the Palatinate indicate that Barbara Güngerich Tschantz had been involved in Anabaptism. The name is again found in the Palatinate Mennonite census lists of 1744, and appears rather frequently in the 18th century. Hans Güngerich is mentioned around 1711 as one of the Amish leaders seeking reconciliation with the Mennonites. In 1765 Christian Güngerich was mentioned as a leader among the Amish in Waldeck and a year later Preacher Christen Güngerich of Steinseltz near Weissenburg (Wissembourg) in Alsace was among the church leaders visiting the Amish in the Netherlands. At Huninghausen in Waldeck the "Schweitzer Christian Güngerig" rented a dairy farm in 1743. In 1792 the lease to this farm was passed on from Christian to Peter Güngerich, who was the ancestor of many of the Iowa Mennonites bearing this family name. A letter of 1781 mentions a Hans Güngerich who had been serving as preacher in the Weissenburg congregation for more than 50 years. In the 1940 Mennonite census lists of Germany, the name Güngerich appears both in south and east Germany. Paul Güngerich of Remscheid, Germany, gathered Gingerich family records for many years, but unfortunately these were destroyed during World War II. Josef Gingerich (d. 1953) was the last president of the Königsberg, East Prussia, Mennonite Church.

The first mention of the family in America is found in the Conestoga Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., assessment list of 1724, where the name William Gingerick appears. Johann Gingerich appears in the Warwick Township list eleven years later. Michael Gingerich from Alsace migrated to Lancaster Co., Pa., in 1747. His son Abraham with his wife and ten children moved to Waterloo Co., Ont., in 1801. Numerous descendants of this Abraham are numbered among the Ontario Mennonites. The Gingerichs of Dauphin and Juniata counties, Pa., are very likely descendants of Gingerich immigrants who settled in Lebanon Valley before or in 1747.

In 1831 Johannes Jüngerich and family and his brother Daniel were given a letter of recommendation by a Hesse state official, who wished them happiness in America. This Johannes is the ancestor of Amish Gingerich descendants in Daviess Co., Ind., and in the Arthur, Ill., Amish community. Jacob Güngerich, born near Kassel, Germany, came to America in 1833 and settled in Holmes Co., Ohio. Numerous Amish descendants of Jacob live in Ohio, Illinois, and other states. About the same time Amish Gingerichs settled in Waterloo Co., Ont., among whose descendants is the present Bishop Orland Gingerich of the Steinman Church.

In 1833 Daniel P. Güngerich of Waldeck emigrated to America. He was the father of Samuel D. Guengerich (q.v.). Two years later his half brother, Amish preacher Johannes P. Güngerich, son of the Peter of Waldeck mentioned above, and family arrived in Pennsylvania. Both of them finally settled in Iowa. Johannes is the ancestor of Simon Gingerich, Mennonite bishop of Wayland, Iowa, as well as of a considerable number of other Mennonite ministers and church leaders, including Bishop Fred Gingerich of Canby, Ore., Preacher J. C. Gingerich of Dagmar, Mont., Preacher Amos Gingerich of Parnell, Iowa, and Professor Melvin Gingerich of Goshen College.

Among the representative church leaders have been Michael Gingrich (1792-1862), first Mennonite bishop in Lebanon Co., Pa.; his nephew Isaac (-1892), the third bishop in Lebanon Co.; Abraham Gingerich (1856-?), Mennonite bishop in Ontario; Jacob Gingerich (1840-1920), Mennonite minister in Ontario; John Gingrich (-1845), Mennonite bishop who emigrated to Illinois in 1839; Christian Gingerich (1820-1908), bishop of the South Danvers Mennonite Church; his son John Gingerich (1856-1931), bishop of the Danvers Church; and S. D. Guengerich (1836-1929), lay leader in the Amish Church.

The Gingerich family is widely scattered in America and evidently descended from a considerable number of immigrants not closely related to each other. Twenty-nine obituaries in Mennonite periodicals between 1866 and 1915 show that they lived in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Ontario, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska. In 1954, 46 ordained Gingerichs were serving in the Amish and Mennonite churches of America. M.G.

Nettie Beachy, Family Record of Daniel J. Gingerich and His Descendants (Wellman, Iowa, 1930); Mrs. David R. Bontreger, Family Record of Jacob Guengerich and Barbara Miller and Their Descendants (Millersburg, Ind., 1949); Simon H. Irick, Descendants of John Gingerich II (Frankfort, Ind., 1952).

Gingrich Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located a few miles south of Annville, Lebanon Co., Pa., on a beautiful knoll, with a walled cemetery near by. The first church, built in 1792, served the congregation until 1920, when the present larger brick church was built on the same site. Lebanon County had some of the overflow from Lancaster County in the latter half of the 18th century and again in the last ten years, almost replacing the descendants of the earlier settlers. The first Sunday school was held in 1893. In 1954 the congregation was under the care of Simon G. Bucher as bishop, Daniel D. Wert and Elmer Showalter as ministers, and Harold Frey as deacon; the church membership was 64. I.D.L.

Girls' Homes, also called Girls' Centers, are centers of fellowship and spiritual ministry, sometimes with rooms for rent and boarding facilities, for Mennonite young women who come to the larger cities for employment, especially as domestics. Four of these homes have been established by the Canadian Mennonite General Conference—Mary-Martha Girls' Home (q.v., founded 1935) at Vancouver, B.C., "Ebenezer" Girls' Home, Winnipeg, Man., the Saskatoon Girls' Home, Saskatoon, Sask., and the Calgary Girls' Home at Calgary, Alta., under the leadership of J. J. Sawatzky, the local minister, founded approximately in 1945 (see Scarboro Mennonite Church). The Mennonite Brethren Church has three such homes—the Mary-Martha Girls' Home (q.v.) of Winnipeg, founded in 1925, the Bethel Girls' Home (q.v.) of Vancouver, founded in 1931, and the M.B. Girls' Home of Saskatoon. In the Mennonite Church (MC) there are two such homes—the Mennonite Girls' Home, founded in 1935 at Reading, Pa., and the Mennonite Girls' Center at Goshen, Ind., founded in 1948. The girls' homes commonly are operated by a matron under either a district mission board (as in M.C. homes), a district conference (as in M.B. homes), or a local committee (as in G.C.M. homes). Usually a local pastor is assigned as spiritual adviser. H.S.B.

Gisbert Dircusoen, the author of the martyr hymn, "Ghy Broeders al tesamen," as proved by its acrostic. He is otherwise unknown. The hymn is found in Veelderhande Liedekens (1580) folio 104, verso. (Wolkan, Lieder, 79; ML I, 449.) vdZ.

Gladbach: see München-Gladbach.

Glade Mennonite Church (MC) near Accident, Md., had its origin about 1890 as a mission Sunday school established from the Casselman Valley district under the leadership of Preacher Henry H. Blauch of the Springs congregation, although Amish people had moved into this region as early as 1776. Early settlers were Brenneman, Bender, and Ash. Sunday school was begun in the Beachy Schoolhouse, later known as the Forks, but the meetinghouse (26 x 40 ft.) was not built until 1908. At first there was no resident ministry, the congregation being served by the Springs ministers. Bishop Isaac K. Metzler moved into the congregation in 1935 and still serves (1954) as pastor, with Sherman Tressler (ordained 1932) as deacon. The membership in 1953 was 59, about the same as for the past 40 years. H.S.B.

Gladwin (Mich.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, had its beginning in 1914, when a group of German Baptists and Mennonite Brethren who had moved there asked to unite with the M.B. Church Conference. Elder Heinrich Voth of Minnesota organized them into a local congregation, with P. E. Penner as its first pastor. For some time the church grew and then began to decrease, and discontinued in 1947. Other ministers of the church were D. F. Strauss, Ewald Rohloff, and J. J. Reimer. H.E.W.

Gladys (Va.) Conservative Amish Mennonite Church, with a membership of 20 in 1953, originated in 1944, when the D. K. Yoder and C. L. Ressler families moved into the area and soon began to hold regular religious services in Ressler's home. In 1955, now called Bethel, the church had 20 members, with C. L. Ressler and M. Hostetler as ministers. C.L.R.

Glait (Glayt, Glaidt, sometimes also called Oswald von Jamnitz after his last place of sojourn), Oswald, an Anabaptist martyr. He was born in Cham, Upper Palatinate, Germany, and was originally a monk or priest. Early in the 1520's he joined the Lutheran Church, went to Austria, and became for a while a minister in Leoben, Styria. Expelled from there and "from all of Austria for the sake of the Word of God," he turned to Nikolsburg (q.v.) in 1525, where the Lutherans had organized a church under the protection of Leonhard von Liechtenstein, led by Hans Spittelmaier (q.v.). Glait now became the assistant minister of this congregation. Nikolsburg was at that time a real haven for all kinds of non-Catholic groups such as Bohemian Brethren (formerly Hussites), Lutherans, and the more spiritualistic minded "Habrovans." In 1526 Glait supported an attempt by the Moravian nobleman Jan Dubčansky, to unite all these "evangelical" parties. With the consent of several Moravian noblemen Dubčansky called a "synod" to Austerlitz which Glait also attended. The latter's report of this event was printed with the title, Handlung yetz den XIV tag Marcij dis XXVI jars, so zu Osterlitz in Merhern durch erforderte versammlung viler pfarrer und priesterschaften, auch etlicher des Adels und anderer, in Christlicher lieb und ainigkeyt beschehen und in syben artickeln beschlossen, mit sambt derselben artickel erklärung. I. Cor. I. (only known copy in the National Library in Vienna). This synod was certainly a great event: on the one side were more than one hundred "Utraquist" ministers (Bohemian Brethren), on "our" (Lutheran) side were many more. At the center sat the nobles, Dubčansky and other manorial lords of the area. Appointed commissioners called attention to the differences of doctrine and requested a comparison, so that the poor populace might not be bewildered. The decision must be left to the clear Word of God; human rank and descent should play no role. Of the seven articles discussed (Wiswedel, 553-5) the fourth might be mentioned: "No one should be admitted at the Lord's Table unless he be born again before, through the Word of God." In general, the type of faith defended was closest to the Zwinglian. Agreement was finally reached, and every participant added his signature (date: March 19, 1526).

A few weeks later Hubmaier arrived in Nikolsburg as a refugee. His reputation must have preceded him, for he found a great following right from the beginning. The town now became to the Anabaptists "what Emmaus was to the Lord. . . ." Apparently Glait also received believer's baptism. In Glait's room Hubmaier finished (July 1526) his book, Der uralten und neuen Lehrer Urteil, dass man die jungen Kinder nit taufen soll bis sie im Glauben unterrichtet sind. Hubmaier set to work to replace the former Lutheran congregation by an Anabaptist brotherhood, with the approval of the Lord of Liechtenstein. This stimulated Glait to do more writing. In 1527 he published his second tract, Entschuldigung Osbaldi Glaidt von Chamb . . . etlicher Artickel Verklärung so ihnen von Misgönnern fälschlich verkehrt und also nachgeredt worden ist (printed at Nikolsburg by Simprecht Sorg, called "Froschauer," who printed all the Hubmaier tracts). In this tract Glaidt sought to answer the many calumnies of the Barefoot Friars of near-by Feldsberg who had spread all kinds of stories about the "evangelicals" of Nikolsburg and about Glait in particular. "Everyone knows that these things were not true," Glait asserts, "but I would rather be called a 'heretic' with Christ than a 'holy father' with the pope." Since they had charged him with false doctrines, which might confuse the common man, he would now discuss the articles in question. The following points are taken up in the booklet: (1) Faith and its demonstration in good works, (2) the saints and their worship, (3) the giving of alms, (4) and (5) the differences in food and days, (6) the celibacy of the clergy, (7) images, (8) altars, (9) giving offense (i.e., giving up Catholic customs, such as celibacy, eating meat on Friday), (10) burial, (11) the sacraments, (12) baptism, (13) the Lord's Supper, (14) freedom of the will.—It should, however, be admitted that in skill and clarity Glait's book cannot be compared with the writings of Hubmaier.

In 1527, when a dispute broke out in Nikolsburg concerning the use of the sword (defended by Hubmaier) or the practice of absolute nonresistance (defended by Hans Hut), Glait sided with Hut. Dissatisfied with the outcome (Liechtenstein decided in favor of Hubmaier), Glait followed his fugitive friend Hut to Vienna in Austria. Here we find Glait in the Anabaptist meeting in the Kärntnerstrasse, and here it was that Glait baptized the former Franciscan friar Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), who was soon to seal his faith with a martyr's death. From now on Glait found no place of rest. Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), another well-known Anabaptist martyr and former priest, had contact with him in Regensburg, Bavaria, and testified later to Glait's pious Christian life.

Very little is known about Glait's work in the following years. After Hubmaier's death he turned to Silesia where Caspar Schwenkfeld and his collaborator Krautwald had been working for the Reformation (as they understood it). Around 1530 Glait seems to have published a tract, "Concerning the Keeping of the Sabbath," of which, unfortunately, no copy has been preserved. We learn of its contents only through Schwenckfeld's refutation, dated Jan. 1, 1532, and entitled Vom Christlichen Sabbath und Unterschaidt des alten und newen Testaments (the only print known is one of 1589, reprinted in Corpus Schwenckfeld. IV, 452-518). Apparently Glait presented the idea that an observance of the Sabbath is binding on the Christians in the new covenant just as it was on the Jews of the old, because it is enjoined in the Decalog. Since Glait and his companion Andreas Fischer promulgated this idea in the area of Liegnitz (Silesia), Krautwald, at the insistence of the Duke of Silesia, wrote a critique entitled Bericht und anzeig wie gar ohne Kunst und gutten verstand Andreas Fischer vom Sabbath geschrieben (a copy in the State Library in Berlin).

Glait tried now to work for his faith in Prussia, but an order of Duke Albrecht in 1532 brought about his expulsion also from this territory, together with his friends Oswald of Grieskirchen (an Anabaptist) and Johannes Bünderlin (formerly of Linz, a "spiritual reformer") (q.v.). It is supposed that Glait now went to Falkenau in Bohemia, for we find here "Sabbatarians" as late as 1538. This Sabbatarian movement seems to have also encroached into the Nikolsburg district, for Leonhard von Liechtenstein asked both Wolfgang Capito and Caspar Schwenckfeld for an opinion in this matter (1531). Since Capito was preoccupied with other affairs, Schwenckfeld undertook the task of judging the booklet of Glait, "with whom I had once pleasant discussions at Liegnitz" (see the above noted tract by Schwenckfeld). Schwenckfeld rejected Glait's main argument for the Sabbath observance (the reference to the Decalog) because logically all the Judaic law would have to be reinstated including circumcision. "The true observers of the Sabbath are those upon whose hearts the law of the Spirit has been written by the fingers of God." In conclusion, Schwenckfeld presented a Summarium etlicher Argument wider Oswald Glaids Lehre vom Sabbath, with 18 arguments. But he emphasized that he was careful not to do any injustice to Oswald (Corp. Schw. IV, 515-18).

Later Glait must have become the leader of an Anabaptist group around the city of Jamnitz in Moravia, but no particulars are known. The Hutterite Chronicle gives only an account of his death of which the Hutterites learned through several brothers who shared Glait's fate (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 259 f.): "In 1545 Brother Oswald Glait lay in prison in Vienna for the sake of his faith. The citizens came to him in his prison and asked him kindly and earnestly to renounce it, else they would have to execute him. But say what they would, they could not move him. Two brethren also came to him, Antoni Keim and Hans Staudach [Hutterite Brethren likewise in prison in Vienna for the sake of their faith, and in 1546 martyred], who comforted him. To them he commended his wife and child in Jamnitz. After he had been in prison a year and six weeks, they took him out of the city at midnight, that the people might not see and hear him, and drowned him in the Danube" (autumn of 1546).

A song by an unknown author praises Glait's death as a martyr. It begins, "Ihr Jungen und ihr Alten, nun höret das Gedicht" (Lieder, 121 f.). Of Glait himself two hymns are known: one found in a Hutterite manuscript book and still unpublished, "O sun Davidt, erhör mein bitt, und lass dich des erbarmen" (mentioned by Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 161, note), and the other called "Die Zehn Gebote," which begins, "Es redet Gott mit Mose: ich bin der Herre dein," printed 1530 as a pamphlet, reprinted once more in Magdeburg in 1563, and now also to be found in Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 465 f. (No. 524).

Just as Glait was honored in song after his death, so his services to the Brethren were willingly recognized during his life. Balthasar Hubmaier in his Ainfeltiger Underricht (1526) gives him the praise that he "proclaimed the light of the holy Gospel so bravely and comfortingly, the like of which I know at no other place." LOSERTH, R.F.

W. Wiswedel, "Oswald Glait von Jamnitz," in Ztscht f. Kirchengsch., 1937, 550-64; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum IV (Leipzig, 1914); also the excellent study by Loserth, ML II, 117-19.

Glanzer, a family name found among the Hutterian Brethren, which stems from Carinthia (q.v.). Among the exiles who were expelled from Carinthia and taken to Transylvania because of their refusal to return to the Catholic fold was Christian Glanzer, who was settled in Romos, a village west of Hermannsstadt, in October 1755. From here the group went to Alwinc, where they came in contact with the Hutterian Brethren and later united with them. D.D.

Glarean (Heinrich Loriti of Glarus, Switzerland) (1488-1563), able humanist scholar, an important teacher of Conrad Grebel (q.v.) during his humanist years in Basel (1514-15) and Paris (1518-20), and along with Vadian (q.v.) a major influence on him. Under the influence of Erasmus in Basel (from 1514 on), Glarean became an enthusiastic humanist and opponent of the Reformation. After three years in Basel (1514-17), where he operated a student bursa or boarding house with private lessons, he transferred to Paris, where he operated a similar bursa 1517-22. Grebel studied Latin and Greek and humanistic studies one year with him in Basel and a short time in Paris (October to December 1518). Through him Grebel was introduced to the outstanding French Humanists in Paris, Faber Stapulensis, William Budé, William Kop, and Nicholas Beraldus. Glarean first made Grebel a humanist in Basel; Vadian continued the development in Vienna. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950) 10-17, 29-52; O. F. Fritzche, Glarean, sein Leben und seine Schriften (Frauenfeld, 1890).

Glaser (Hubmayer), Bastel, a Hutterite martyr, one of the Anabaptists connected with Jakob Hutter in 1534-35. His name "Glaser" probably refers to his trade (glazier); the name "Hubmayer," found in the Anabaptist court records in the archives of Innsbuck, is probably the correct one; at any rate he was not related to Balthasar Hubmaier, the Anabaptist apostle in the Black Forest and in Moravia.

We meet Bastel Glaser first in 1534. He was given the task of leading "a people from the Oberland" (Tirol) to Moravia, on the usual route down the Inn and the Danube to Krems, and from there to Moravia. Between Krems and Meissau, in the village of Hohenwart, this group was halted, arrested, and taken to Eggenburg. There they were tortured by "burning the cheeks through." After an extended painful imprisonment, during which Jakob Hutter sent them a letter of consolation (Epistel an die Gefangenen zu Hohenwart), they were released, and may have reached Moravia, where, however, persecution was raging more violently than ever.

After three years, during which he was probably preaching, Glaser, together with Hans Grünfelder (q.v.), the treasurer of the Anabaptists in Lüsen and in the vicinity of Michelsburg and Schöneck, was captured, taken to Imst (Tirol), and tried. Although Gallus Müller (q.v.), noted for his success in leading prisoners to recant, took pains to convert Glaser and his fellow prisoners, Hans Grünfelder and the aged Oswald, he did not succeed. In his cross-examination Glaser confessed that he had not come to this country until Michaelmas. He stayed in the woods most of the time and proclaimed his teaching to several brethren, but baptized nobody.

The report of the death of the above Brethren was written by Griesinger to the brotherhood in Moravia: "Out of sincere love we cannot refrain from reporting on our brethren, Bastel Glaser, Hänsl Grünfelder, and the aged Oswald from the Oetztal. These have with great joy proclaimed the Lord's holy Word and truth, as you probably know. . . . I cannot adequately describe their joy. When Bastel and Hänsl were executed about 1,000 persons were present. Hänsl cried to the people, admonishing and warning; and Bastel too—until their death together with old Oswald." "The people were horrified. . . . It is true, as the wise man says, They will spare neither the aged nor the gray. Their bones could not be entirely burned; they were afterward thrown into the water, and we hope that this witness was not made in vain. The heart of one did not burn; without doubt this was a divine testimony." The date of the execution is unfortunately not given anywhere. Since Gallus Müller wrote on April 4, 1538, that his efforts were not taking effect, the date was probably 1538 (not 1537).

Bastel Glaser is the author of two hymns: (1) "Herr Gott in Deinem höchsten Thron" (15 stanzas); (2) "O Herr Gott, wend mir meine Schmerzen" (23 stanzas). LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 105, 132 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 116, 181 f.; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I (Vienna, 1892) 530; II, 149 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 171, 255; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 71-74; ML II, 119.

Glasgow Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located in Uxbridge Twp., Ontario Co., seven miles northeast of the Wideman Mennonite Church in York Co., Ont. In 1930 a Mennonite family moving into the Glasgow community organized prayer meeting among several homes. In 1932 Sunday school was begun in a local church with occasional preaching by York County ministers. In 1937 Gordon Schrag of Zurich was ordained as pastor. In 1938, 15 baptized members organized into a congregation. With some shift of interested families and a transfer of the pastor to another field regular services discontinued in 1943. J.C.F.

Glasius, Barend (1805-86), Dutch Reformed pastor at Slijk-Ewijk 1828-36 and Geertruidenberg 1836-79, author of an important biographical dictionary of Dutch theologians, the Godgeleerd Nederland (3 vv., Hertogenbosch, 1851-56), which includes articles on a number of Mennonites. Of his numerous historical writings mention should be made of Galerij van Nederlandsche Geloofshelden . . . (Tiel, 1853-54), a 120-page book written in collaboration with H. M. C. van Oosterzee, in which the (unfinished) 9th chapter deals with the Mennonites. (Biogr. Wb. III, 262-69.) vdZ.

Glasmacher (also Huisman), Peter, of Telgte, Westphalia, Germany, was an Anabaptist bishop who was active in Liege in 1533 and later in Unna, Westphalia (Keller, 261 ff.). In 1537 he was arrested by the Bishop of Münster with a group of Anabaptists. Among them was Johannes Hasenvot (q.v.), whose testimony has been preserved. Hasenvot had come from the Anabaptists in Soest to establish contact with the brethren in Telgte and Wesel. The Münsterite Peter von Noerich (also Gerhard Eilkeman) named Peter Glasmacher in a trial in 1544 as one of his associates who was also known as "Beichtvater" and had lived for a while in Ibbenbüren. C.K.

L. Keller, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer nach dem Untergang des Münst. Königreichs," in Westdeutsche Ztscht für Gesch. und Kunst, 1882, No. 4; J. Niesert, Münsterische Urkundensammlung I (Coesfeld, 1826) 303.

Glaubensstimme: see Hymnology of the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia.

Glen Allen, a small village in Peel Township, six miles west of the northern boundary of Waterloo Co., Ont. In the fall of 1892, according to the Herold der Wahrheit, a meeting (MC) was organized here with Waterloo County ministers serving every four weeks. Resident families were Ernst, Reist, Selts, Weber, and Groff. A few years later a church came into use in the village. In 1893 Joseph Nahrgang and Noah Stauffer filled the appointments, the meetings alternating with those in the adjacent Maryboro Township. Communion was served for several years. By 1905 most of the families returned to Waterloo County and meetings discontinued. Since 1945 through summer Bible schools and resettlement by Mennonites a strong Sunday school of 80 and a membership of 35 (1955) has arisen, cared for in a stone parsonage close to the former church and operated under the Mennonite Mission Board of Ontario, with Amos Brubacher as the resident pastor. J.C.F.

Glenbush Mennonite Brethren Church, located near the village of Glenbush in northern Saskatchewan, a member of the Canadian Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was organized on July 15, 1928, under the leadership of N. H. Pauls, with a membership of 17. Its membership in 1954 was 136, and the congregation was still served by its first pastor, N. H. Pauls. The church building was erected in 1930 and has been enlarged four times. J.H.E.

Glencross, a village with the address of Morden, Man. Here is located one of the 12 meetinghouses of the Rudnerweide Mennonites in Manitoba. H.H.H.

Glendale Hutterite Bruderhof, established in 1949 near Frankfort, S.D., had a population of 97 in 1950. M.G.

Glendale Mennonite Church (GCM), of Lynden, Whatcom Co., Wash., a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized in 1945. In that year a building was purchased and remodeled for a meeting place, and articles of faith were adopted. F. D. Koehn served as pastor until 1947, when his place was taken by Dan Toews. In 1954 the pastor was Myron D. Hilty, and the membership 90. D.T.

Glenlea Mennonite Church (GCM) is located 18 miles south of Winnipeg, Man. Organized in 1945, its 18 families had formerly belonged to the Schoenwiese Mennonite Church of Winnipeg. In 1954 the pastor was J. C. Friesen, and the membership 55. J.P.

Glick (Glueck, Glück), a Swiss Mennonite family which migrated to the Palatinate. In 1731 there was a Jost Glückli in the Streigenberg congregation near Eppingen (now Baden). In 1940, 24 Glücks were members of four Mennonite congregations in South Germany. In 1954 three Glück ministers were serving in that area, one of whom was Theo Glück of the Durlach congregation, chairman of the Youth Commission of the South German Conference.

Peter Glick, the ancestor of the Amish Glicks, arrived in Pennsylvania in September 1748. Other members of the Glick family no doubt landed in America during that century. Large numbers of their descendants live in eastern Pennsylvania, among them eight Old Order Amish ministers. Five additional Mennonite and Amish Mennonite ministers serve in Pennsylvania and Virginia. Obituary records from 1894 through 1913 show that the family was represented in Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Indiana. Holmes Co., Ohio, also has representatives of the family. M.G.

Glock, Paul (sometimes called Jung Paul to distinguish him from his father, who had the same name), a poet, and from 1577 a preacher of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia, born at Rommelshausen near Waiblingen, Württemberg, Germany. According to his own confession he lived frivolously in his youth (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, p. 727, stanzas 6-8), then appealed to two Lutheran theologians to "teach him Christian morals," but they referred him only to faith (op. cit., p. 710, stanza 15). It is not known who won him to Anabaptism, but it is well known that Württemberg was an active mission field of the Hutterian Brethren.

At the end of December 1550 Glock lay imprisoned in Cannstatt with his father, mother, and wife Else. In January 1551 the leading theologians of the region, Valentine Vannius, at that time pastor in Cannstatt, Matth. Alber, preacher in Tübingen, and M. Martin Cless (Ubinger), preacher at St. Leonhard's Church in Stuttgart, were commissioned to counsel him with kindness; this they did four or five times; but the prisoners rejected the instruction of these preachers, for they (the prisoners) were on the right road, and declared that if the church would practice what it preached, repent and forsake evil living, they would also go into the church, and remain steadfast. Nothing is known of their fate. Very likely they were expelled from the country.

The following years are dark. In 1558 we hear that the wife of the Anabaptist Peter Stürmer told another woman in Rudersberg near Schorndorf, "Your husband helped to capture the pious preacher [meaning Paul Glock]. He would therefore have a difficult position before the Almighty" (Bossert, Quellen, 172). This reveals that Glock worked in the vicinity of Rudersberg for the Anabaptists. He himself says that he could proclaim God's Word for just half a year (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, p. 734, stanza 4). After 1558 he was kept in jail continuously. Whether it was during that time that he was painfully racked and much tried by doctors, clergymen, and false brethren, as he states in one of his hymns (the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, p. 708), is not certain. Because he remained steadfast in his conviction, defending it with vigor, he was sentenced to life imprisonment in the castle of Hohenwittlingen near Urach (Württemberg). But he was apparently in the prison of the Urach castle for some time too (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, No. 5, stanza 3, p. 722).

At Easter he was given a fellow prisoner, Adam Hornikel or Horneck, called Beck because he was a baker by trade, of Heiningen, with whom he wrote (in 1563) hymn No. 3, "Gott haltet, was er verspricht"; also No. 4, "Herr Jesu Christ in deinem Reich" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, pp. 714-18, and 718-21). In September 1559 Duke Christoph learned that these imprisoned Anabaptists were weak with age and ill, and therefore ordered the castle bailiff when he could do so to take them from the prison for three or four hours daily and let them walk in the "Springer" (probably the courtyard of the fortress) and occasionally in the house, but to keep the gates well barred so that they could not escape nor any friend come to them, and not permit them to dispute with the servants and lead them astray, thus spreading their doctrines. In February 1564 Hornikel was taken to Stuttgart, where, after another trial, he was expelled from the country; with two daughters he moved to Moravia.

Now Glock was alone in his cell, but he used his time well in writing hymns and letters to his wife, his brother-in-law, and especially to Peter Walpot, the leader of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia. Sixteen lengthy epistles (1563-76) full of a fine Christian spirit are known from his pen and two remarkable confessions of faith (1563-73), well preserved in several Hutterite codices and now published in full in G. Bossert's great source publication, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer I; Herzogtum Württemberg (Leipzig, 1930), 334-477 and 1049-1102. The confessions are contained in letters to Peter Walpot in which Glock reports in lively detail his disputation with several theologians, and show Glock as a very skillful debater, fully certain of his stand and well versed in the Scriptures.

These letters had great influence on the life of the brotherhood (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 270). In 1562 Glock and Adam Hornikel had jointly drawn up a Rechenschaft of their faith before the court in Wittlingen, and in 1573 another. Probably in Wittlingen the court chaplain Lukas Osiander had with some others approached him, and when they were unable to move him, said he did not deserve to be at large, but must be imprisoned for life. (The conversation is reported in the Geschicht-Buch, 376 ff.) Otherwise his treatment was humane. The fact that he was able to get paper for letter-writing and to find carriers indicates this. His food was good. Lukas Osiander said that in 1584, when there was talk of persuading the Anabaptists to recant by means of starvation rations, Glock had as good a diet as if he were in possession of a noble prebend, with good wine and roast meat, and a warm bed, with two small rooms, and if one supposed he was in his room, he had been sent as a messenger over the fields; he was also used for other work in the fields. Indeed as early as 1566 he had acquired the confidence of the bailiff to such an extent that he was sent miles away as a messenger if he merely promised to return (Lieder d. Hutterischen Brüder, p. 708).

In 1574 Glock again received a companion in prison—Matthias Binder (q.v.), a tailor of Frickenhausen near Neuffen, who had been a preacher of the Hutterian Brethren since 1569, was sent back to his home village as a missionary of the Brethren, and was then imprisoned in Neuffen and tried in Stuttgart. When he refused to promise to leave the country and make no more converts, he was taken to the prison of the Maulbronn monastery in June 1573, where Blasius Greiner (q.v.) had lain, and where Binder was now held on short rations and was to be visited frequently by the abbot to discuss his doctrine with him. Binder refused to enter into these discussions, for he had already defended his position before the theologians in Stuttgart. In vain the abbot, the bailiff, and the caretaker showed him how unsuitable prison was for him and that it offered no security against kidnaping. Finally in 1574 he was taken to Hohenwittlingen, where he found his brother in the faith, Paul Glock. In 1574 Glock wrote the hymn, "Kommet her and tut hie losen (hören)" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 726), and in 1576 another, "Preisen will ich den Herren" (op. cit., 734), and "Wie lieblich ist gezieret" (736).

In late autumn 1576 a fire broke out in the Hohenwittlingen castle which both Binder and Glock helped to extinguish. When Duke Christoph heard of this he commanded that they be given the fare for the trip to Moravia. This happened after 19 years of captivity. They reached the brotherhood on New Year 1577, "with good conscience, with peace and joy." On Feb. 12 Glock was chosen as a Diener des Wortes (preacher), to serve the brotherhood. Jan. 30, 1585, he died at Schädowitz, Moravia. The Hutterites kept his letters with great care, and the many copies extant prove their great appeal to the Brethren. G.Bo.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 374-81, bases its story of Glock on his epistles, excerpts from which Wolkan prints in footnote 378-81; Bossert, TA I: Württemberg; G. Bossert, Jr., "Aus der nebenkirchlich-religiösen Bewegung der Reformationszeit in Württemberg (Wiedertäufer und Schwenckfelder)," in Blätter zur Württembergischen Kirchengeschichte, 1929 (esp. 28-31); Mart. Mir. D 714, E 1024; Wolkan, Lieder; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 709-37; ML II, 123 f.

Glückstadt, a town on the right bank of the lower Elbe near Hamburg (now Germany), was founded in 1616 by Christian IV of Denmark to compete with ambitious and thriving Hamburg, which then no longer belonged to his realm. To attract desirable settlers he gave the city a charter of religious freedom.

The citizenry were divided into three nationalities, which brought about some friction; there were Germans (Lutherans and Catholics), Dutch (Remonstrants, Reformed, and Mennonites), and Portuguese (Jews). Glückstadt was then, besides Friedrichstadt a.d. Eider (q.v.), Altona (q.v.), and Rendsburg, the only place in North Germany and Denmark with religious liberty, with the exception of several German settlements in Polish territory, like Danzig.

The Dutch and Portuguese enjoyed complete civil and religious liberty, as well as freedom from all military obligations; they had their own judges in civil and commercial matters, and their own arrangements for weddings, baptism, burial, and costume. They could carry on commerce and trade, and exercise any vocation without joining the guilds, which was generally compulsory at that time; and what was most important, they could practice their religious convictions without hindrance.

Very little is known about the Mennonites in Glückstadt, for there are no church records. It is thus not known when the first Mennonites moved into the city; but it is recorded that in March 1623 citizens were accepted without requiring an oath of them. These must have been Mennonites. In the new charter of 1631 the "Mennonists" are specifically mentioned; "They shall live their religion and conscience freely, and not be burdened with any oath, use of arms, or the baptism of their children." For release from military service they had to pay "a suitable annual fee," the amount of which is not known; and at the same time the Mennonites, Calvinists, and Remonstrants together received two acres of land outside the city for burial sites for 50 talers. (The former Mennonite cemetery is now a Catholic cemetery, with no reminders of former times.) The Calvinists and Remonstrants had a church, preacher, and a school in common. There probably never was a Mennonite school; according to a regulation of 1692 they were to send their children to the (Lutheran) city school. The Mennonites of course also bore their share of the common civic expenses, such as in building the city hall in 1642-43. They had to request the renewal of their charter every 10 or 20 years until 1700.

The Mennonites of Glückstadt were considered part of the Friedrichstadt (q.v.) congregation, as is shown in the archives of the Friedrichstadt congregation. Gert Henriks, the elder at "Frederikstad," was repeatedly in Glückstadt in 1633-39, to receive new members by baptism. In this connection names like the following are recorded: Albrantz, Ariens, Clasen, Cornils, Hardelop, Jacobs, Jansen, Müllienz, Peters, Siletz; and Christian names like Clas, Dirk, Gerrit, Jan, Jakob, Altje, Gritje, Maartje, Trien—all of them Dutch Frisian names. Discipline was apparently strict; for example, in 1633 a member was excommunicated for misconduct, and in 1645 a woman was expelled for marrying a non-Mennonite. On May 12, 1639, a resolution was passed at a conference in Hamburg to separate Glückstadt from Friedrichstadt; from now on it was a part of the Hamburg (-Altona) congregation, which was much nearer to them, and where Mennonitism could now develop much more freely than formerly. But Glückstadt had its own minister at least at times. In 1641 the Mennonites requested for their preacher freedom from the burden of quartering troops, and refer to a former royal mandate granting this freedom to "one who serves religion." Through visiting preachers connections were maintained with the homeland for a long time; for example, in 1663 Bastiaan van Weenigem, the minister of the Rotterdam congregation, stayed there for a short time when he visited several Low German churches.

The contribution of the Mennonites to the city's progress was probably not slight. In 1635 a Jakob Berentz of Hamburg settled here, whose "people and workers belonged to the Mennonite religion." He was probably a factory owner or a shipper and himself a Mennonite. In 1643 Gysbert van der Smissen II (b. 1620 in Haarlem in Holland, and had been a journeyman baker in Friedrichstadt) moved from Friedrichstadt to Glückstadt with his mother, the widow of Daniel Gysbert van der Smissen. He is said to have organized the guild of cake bakers there. But his chief importance to the city lay in his commercial activities. His ships went to Norway and France; in favorable seasons they penetrated to Greenland to catch seals and whales, an industry which he founded with other wealthy citizens. In the middle of the 17th century Glückstadt was probably at the peak of its importance as the trade center of the lower Elbe, largely through the activities of the van der Smissens. But soon thereafter a rapid decline set in, in consequence of the disturbances of war involving the city (Spanish trade was, for example, constantly disturbed by the outriggers of Dunkirk), for in spite of the urgent advice of the colonists to the contrary, the Danish king had made a fortress of the city.

Gysbert van der Smissen II and probably many others emigrated to Altona, where the family continued to prosper, especially in his son Hinrich (q.v.), called "founder of cities" because of his activities in construction and building in Altona. In 1678 Gysebrecht Daniel van der Schmissen (probably Gysbert Daniel) sold his farm at the Kremper Tor. The desire of the colonists to emigrate was strengthened by repeated disregard for their charter, which declared them free for all time from military burdens in the time of war; they sent several complaints and appeals to the king. (In petitions for release from these obligations, they pointed to the beautiful "liberty" in Hamburg and Altona, as a threat of emigration.) These conditions also led to differences between the "privileged" persons and the city government (president, mayor, and council), who belonged to the "unprivileged" German population. To look after their interests the several nationalities or confessions had appointed deputies; it is not known when this was begun. The deputy appointed by the Mennonites in 1685 was Daniel van der Smissen. He also represented the brotherhood in the conflict with the guild of silk and cloth dealers, who were naturally interested in limiting the free trade of nonmembers. The relations of the Mennonites with other religious groups were probably, on the whole, good; only one exception is known. In the winter of 1684-85 the relations were disturbed by a dispute with the Reformed about the cemetery keys, for the income from the cemetery was connected with the possession of the keys. The keys had hitherto been in the possession of the deputies of the nation, who were for a long time two members of the Reformed Church. When, after the death of one of these deputies, Daniel van der Smissen was appointed co-deputy, the Reformed claimed that the keys belonged to them. The president and council sided with the Reformed, but the chancellery, to whom van der Smissen and Lambert Gerts as leader of the Mennonites appealed, decided essentially in favor of the Mennonites. (After the Mennonites died out the cemetery was left in the hands of the Reformed.)

The Mennonites in Glückstadt also took the usual Mennonite position of tolerance toward other faiths. In 1660-61, when many English dissenters fled the Anglican reaction of Charles II and sought protection on the shores of the North Sea, Frederick III issued mandates for his entire realm, forbidding the reception of "banished Quakers or fanatics." The Mennonites were especially mentioned, and were threatened with loss of their privileges if they disregarded the mandates.

Emigration and the dying out of families reduced the number of Mennonites more and more. About 1740 the last one died. The chapel passed into the possession of the Altona congregation; it was remodeled into a dwelling and rented out. In 1792, when royal permission was granted to sell the house, it was already quite dilapidated. Although the charter remained in force in Glückstadt, there were no more Mennonites there afterward. R.Do.

Familienchronik der Familie van der Smissen (Danzig, 1875); Detlefsen, "Die städtische Entwicklung Glückstadts unter König Christian IV.," in Ztscht der Gesellschaft für Schleswig-Holsteinische Gesch. XXXVI, 196 ff.; B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg-Altona I, II (1886 f.); Blaupot t. C., Holland I; Menn. Bl., 1858, 35 ff.; DB 1891, 94; ML II, 124-26; R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930).

Glyaden, a Mennonite settlement in Siberia, between Pavlodar, Slavgorod, and Barnaul, about 75 miles east of Slavgorod and 150 miles west of Barnaul. It was founded in 1907-8 by J. N. Dück and K. K. Willms, who were sent by a conference of landless Mennonites (see Anwohner) of the Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld (Molotschna) districts to Siberia to look for land. The meeting was held in Lichtfelde; hence the settlement was often called the Lichtfelde settlement. Dück and Willms accepted a tract of about 16,200 acres from the government; it was intended for 95 families with a population of 384; it was divided into villages with 24 farms each; later another farm was added to each village. After the Revolution the land was redistributed, each person receiving 15.4 acres. In 1927 the population was about 1,000.

The settlement had a difficult beginning because most of the settlers were poor and had been manual laborers and day laborers. But their economic life as well as their spiritual life developed rapidly. They attacked their problems with hope and with vigor; in the course of a few years the steppes had been changed into fertile fields, the houses and cottages were lost in gardens, woods were laid out, and each village had a school.

Glyaden had acquired a reputation by the products of its unceasing toil and its social arrangements. Then came World War I. Most settlers were of military age and were drafted; the women stayed at home alone to meet the new difficulties. Money had to be raised to maintain the men in the service. Horses and wagons were levied for military use. The settlement was nearly brought to ruin. For a few years all life was dormant, and all energy and hope had disappeared. At long last the inhabitants found a way to adapt themselves, and now there was a visible revival. The settlement had its own council and two government schools. Two additional schools functioned but received no support from the state. The settlement had a co-operative, a dairy, a cattle and seed association, and a machinery association; a tractor worked the fields. Two thirds of the inhabitants belonged to the Mennonite Church; they rented a hall in which they conducted services every Sunday. Jakob Warkentin was the elder in 1927. The Mennonite Brethren had their own meetinghouse. Jakob Peters was the elder in 1927. Little is known about the fate of the settlement under the Soviets.
D.H.

D. Harder, "Einst und Jetzt," A. A. Friesen Collection, Bethel College Historical Library; ML II, 122.

Gmünd, Schwäbisch, a city (pop. 30,748) in Württemberg, Germany, 28 miles east of Stuttgart, in the Rems Valley. It belonged originally to the domain of the Staufers, then became a free imperial city, and in 1802 it was made a part of Württemberg. It was rich in industry, in the Middle Ages strong ecclesiastically, with three monasteries of Augustinians, Dominicans, and Franciscans. The first stirrings of the Reformation took place here in 1523 under the influence of Hans Schilling, a Barefoot Friar in Rothenburg on the Tauber, whose stormy preaching roused the populace to such an extent that he was banished from the city by the council. He then went to Augsburg, where he also called forth a powerful movement; this brought about his expulsion from Augsburg, whereupon he went to Blaufelden and won the people there to the Reformation. Later he was pastor in Grosshaslach until 1549, then preacher in Heilsbronn, 1553-58 superintendent and pastor in Uffenheim. Andreas Althamer (q.v.) appeared as assistant to the city pastor in 1524, probably at first with cautiously reformatory sermons, then as the city preacher whom the people paid and whom they accompanied to and from the pulpit to protect him. He performed his own marriage to a young lady of Gmünd. On July 4, 1525, he was, however, forbidden to preach in the city or its territory. Soon afterward he had to flee from the city in a night attack on it by troops of the Swabian League.

The Protestants now met in secret to pray together, sing hymns, and read from the Bible. On Feb. 27, 1527, the council felt it necessary to warn the people of Anabaptism, which had reached its full strength in Augsburg and Esslingen. In Gmünd Martin Zehentmayer, a painter of Langenmoosen near Inchhofen in the district of Aichach, was a significant Anabaptist leader. He is said to have baptized over one hundred persons from the city and vicinity in chapels and private homes and to have celebrated the communion service with them. On the basis of the imperial mandate the council in mid-February 1528 arrested Zehentmayer and 40 of his adherents, including 19 girls and women. They were given only bread and water to make them recant the sooner. The obstinate ones remained in the towers 42 weeks. Among the people there was much sympathy for them. Some women and children climbed the city wall to reach the towers and talk to the prisoners or read and sing to them. This was then strictly forbidden. Zehentmayer was examined on the rack about his faith and his plans. He confessed, according to information given by the city council to the Augsburg city council in November, that he had hoped to secure community of goods. The charge of immoral conduct made by the chaplain Nikolaus Thoman, the author of the Weissenhorner Historie, is an unfounded defamation, and is probably based on the provost Aichele (q.v.). The Gmünd court records give no suggestion of such a charge, charging the Anabaptists only with their attitude toward the established church.

The prisoners, only two of whom are known by name, i.e., Wolf Esslinger (q.v.) and Bamberger, occupied themselves with writing hymns, which are printed in the collection, Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale) pp. 48-59, together with the songs written about them by their fellow prisoners. The very conservative council did not venture to take the responsibility of judging and condemning the Anabaptists. The mayor Egen secretly appealed to the Swabian League, to send 200 horsemen and 50 footmen to Gmünd to support the council in the punishment of the Anabaptists. The government of Württemberg also received the commission to send well-armed persons, unspotted by the Lutheran faction and loyal to the powers in authority. Scarcely had the armed men arrived when the prisoners were put on trial. But one of the councilors, the glazier Huber, ventured to voice an objection to the court procedure. The prisoners were sentenced to die by the sword, but if they would recant, they would receive mercy. Zehentmayer and four men, a woman, and a 15-year-old boy remained steadfast, and they were executed on Tuesday, Dec. 7. When they were again urged to recant and return to their families, they declared that they had commended their families to God, and He would provide for them. When the first article was read Esslinger said: "As you judge today so shall God judge you when you come before His face; God shall well know you." When the third article was read, they said: "You stain your hands with our blood; God shall certainly not remit it to you, but require it at your hands." When the fourth article was read, they said: "Today we will testify with our blood, that that wherein we stand is the truth." When the fifth article was read Wolfgang Esslinger said: "Forsake your sins and unrighteousness, and repent, and God shall never remember it to you."

The people, especially the women, cried encouraging words to those who were to die. Some efforts were made at the last hour to induce them to recant. A nobleman rode into the ring to the boy and said to him, "If you will desist from your error, I will give you a stipend and keep you always with me." The boy refused and said, "God forbid! O God, I commend to Thee my spirit. May Thy Son's suffering not be lost in us." All went courageously to their death.

The popular mood was so excited and rebellious against the council that the council did not dare to dismiss the troops of the Swabian League or to execute more Anabaptists. A number of neighboring nobles interceded for them, as well as a part of the community, and the captains and soldiers of the Swabian League who lay in the city besought the council to show mercy to the Anabaptists. The council now summoned Franz Kircher, called Stadian, pastor in Göppingen, a Humanist and an old friend of Melanchthon, to convert the Anabaptists. He cannot have been a Lutheran preacher, as asserted by Debler and Vogt, the Gmünd chroniclers, for under the Austrian government and the strict Catholic spirit of the Göppingen chapter a Lutheran preacher could have asserted himself no more than had the Lutheran preacher Martin Cless, who had been compelled to flee from Göppingen (Hermelink, 211). Kircher was probably an Erasmian. A considerable number must have recanted, for on Dec. 14 the council proclaimed slandering and insulting those who had recanted to be a punishable offense. Calm returned to the community, the troops of the Swabian League were dismissed.

The attempt to win the Anabaptists to the old faith must gradually have succeeded. At least the council had no more trouble from Anabaptists, though it had to combat the Lutherans until the end of the 16th century. On the other hand we hear of several women who fled from Gmünd and its territory to Württemberg and were arrested there for Anabaptist practices: Barbara, the wife of Bonaventura Bopf in Gmünd, who was in prison in Nürtingen on July 2, 1530, and was converted by the Tübingen professor Balthasar Käufelin; Barbara Schleicher, wife of Veit Beck, a smith of Gmünd, who was in prison in Kirchheim early in July, and was converted by experienced and learned men; Ursula Harthmann of Mögglingen, who was in prison in Kirchheim early in July 1530, and like Barbara Schleicher was instructed and recanted; Ursula Spanner of Gmünd, who had married the Anabaptist Konrad Lemlin of Sindelfingen, who was burned in Vaihingen, still lay in prison. Since she was pregnant they did not punish her, but let her swear an oath (Dec. 23, 1531) that she would at once leave the principality and never return.

The Anabaptists were deeply concerned by events in Gmünd. This is shown by the five hymns about them, printed in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, pp. 48-59. One of them is also in the Ausbund. G.Bo.

Blätter für württemb. Kirchengesch., 1902, p. 4; Uffenheimer Nebenstunden I, 1287; Beiträge zur bayerischen Kirchengesch. XVI, 234; Weissenhorner Historie, published by Fr. L. Baumann in Quellen zur Gesch. des Bauernkriegs, Bibliothek des Literarischen Vereins CXXIX (1876); H. Hermelink, Die theologische Fakultät in Tübingen 1477-1534 (Tübingen, 1906); E. Wagner, "Die Reichsstadt Schwäbisch-Gmünd in den Jahren 1526-1530," Württemb. Vierteljahrshefte für Landesgesch., 1881, pp. 81 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 32, E 439; ML II, 126-28.

Gmunden, a town (pop. 10,000) in Upper Austria on Lake Gmunden at the foot of the Traunstein, known for its old salt refineries, was in the late 1520's the seat of an Anabaptist congregation. It is often confused with Gmünd, but neither the Gmünd in Lower Austria nor that in Carinthia was ever the seat of an Anabaptist congregation or the scene of Anabaptist martyrdom. But the Hutterite table of martyrs (Geschicht-Buch, 182) shows that in Gmunden two Anabaptists suffered a martyr's death. In Gmunden on Nov. 29, 1529, Peter Riedemann was captured and held in chains; Beck therefore calls him the "martyr of Gmunden." Christoph Gschäl worked here, setting in order the brotherhood in Austria, which had become disorganized (see Austria). LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 65, 73, 178, 182; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 88; Wolkan, Lieder, 24; ML II, 128.

Gnadenau (Kan.) Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church (see Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church) was organized Sept. 21, 1869, in the Crimea, Russia, when 18 were baptized on their faith. To preserve the tenets of their faith this entire group of about 40 members emigrated to America in 1874 and settled in Marion Co., Kan., and named the settlement Gnadenau. They continued to hold their services in the homes or in school. The first church was a small sod building with thatched roof. In 1876 a frame building was constructed and a little later another wing was added, making the building T-shaped. In 1895 this building was torn down and a more modern building was constructed two miles south of Hillsboro, which is still in use by a congregation of 155 members.

Jacob A. Wiebe was the first elder, serving 1874-1900. An outstanding minister was Johann J. Harder 1874-99. Wiebe was followed by Heinrich Wiebe 1900-10, J. J. Friesen 1911-34, F. V. Wiebe 1935-45, Ezra P. Barkman 1946-47, George L. Classen 1948-50, Edward Epp 1950-52, D. V. Wiebe and P. R. Lange 1952-55. In November 1954 the Lehigh Mennonite Brethren Church and the Gnadenau K.M.B. Church consolidated and have since then worshiped as one brotherhood as Gnadenau Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). The combined membership in 1955 was 155, with D. V. Wiebe as leader. D.V.W.

A. Pantle, "Settlement of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren at Gnadenau, Marion Co.," The Kansas Historical Quarterly (February 1945).

Gnadenau Mennonite Brethren Church, Marion Co., Kan., was organized in November 1954 by the merger of the Lehigh Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.) and the Gnadenau Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). Its membership in 1955 was 155, with D. V. Wiebe as leader. D.V.W.

Gnadenau Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Flowing Well, Sask., a member of the Herbert District Conference, was organized in 1910 under the leadership of J. F. Harms, with 38 members. In 1913 they built a church. The congregation has sent out workers both to home and foreign mission fields. J. F. Harms was followed in the leadership by S. L. Hodel, Isaac Toews, John E. Priebe, and W. Buller. The leader in 1954 was William Buller and the membership was 39. J.I.R.

Gnadenberg (or Grace Hill) Mennonite Church (GCM), which is located 8½ miles east and one mile south of Newton, Kan., was founded as a congregation in 1811, near the city of Berditchev, in the province of Kiev, Polish Russia, and was known as the Michalin (q.v.) church and settlement, organized under the leadership of David Siebrandt. In the great movement to America the Michalin congregation also chose to emigrate, and arrived in three groups—two late in 1874, and the third in 1878. In 1875 the group was incorporated under the name Gnadenberg. Their church, dedicated in 1882, was still in use in 1953, with the distinction of being the oldest Mennonite church building in continuous use west of the Mississippi River. It was replaced by a new church dedicated in August 1954.

Gnadenberg was a charter member of the Kansas Conference when it was organized in 1877 and took part in the conference sessions of the General Conference at Halstead in 1881. From 1811 to 1941 Gnadenberg was served by three elders: David Siebrandt (minister 1811 and elder 1816), Johann Schroeder (minister 1848 and elder 1852), and Gerhard N. Harms (minister 1888, elder 1901). J. J. Voth served the group in 1937-49, and on May 1, 1949, Herbert E. Miller was installed as pastor of the congregation. The membership of the church in 1955 was 197. J.F.S.

Gnadenfeld, a common Mennonite village name, found in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Russia; Auli Ata Mennonite settlement, Central Asia; Barnaul, Siberia; Alexanderwohl, Kan.; and East and West reserves, Man. C.K.

Gnadenfeld, a Mennonite village and district (volost) of the Molotschna settlement, province of Taurida, Russia, established in 1835. This settlement originated when Wilhelm Lange, elder of the Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) and Franztal Mennonite Church of Brandenburg, Germany, led his congregation of 40 families to Russia in 1834, where Mennonites of the same background had settled a few years before (see Alexanderwohl). Wilhelm Lange, who was of Lutheran background, and his congregation brought new spiritual life and a higher cultural level to the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement. Soon Gnadenfeld became a center of higher aspiration in the realm of education and a progressive religious life. Wilhelm Lange's (q.v.) correspondence, dating back to the time of the immigration to Russia, presents a picture of the religious and cultural life of that day. (The letters have been preserved in the Bethel College Historical Library.)

From the beginning, the town of Halbstadt (q.v.) had been the seat of the civic administration of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. In 1870 Gnadenfeld became the second seat of administration (volost), which included 28 of the southeastern villages of the Molotschna settlement. The administrators (Oberschulze) who served this district during the first decades were Wilhelm Ewert 1870-71, Franz Penner 1871, Peter Ewert 1871-76, 1877-78, Gerhard Fast 1876-77, David Unruh 1878-87, and Gerhard Dörksen 1887.

A very significant factor in the life of the village and community was the establishment of a Bruderschule (parochial secondary school) which was a continuation of a school which the group had in Brenkenhoffswalde. In 1859 this school acquired the right to train teachers. David Hausknecht (q.v.) and Heinrich Franz (q.v.) were the first teachers of the school, which under their leadership made a lasting impression far beyond the village. The pietistic spirit of the Gnadenfeld community, which had been fostered in the old country through Moravian influence, found new nourishment in the South German evangelist, Eduard Wüst (q.v.), of a neighboring Lutheran village. Gnadenfeld became, next to Ohrloff, a center of progressive, somewhat pietistic-revivalistic Christianity. Fr. W. Lange was a personal friend of Eduard Wüst, and officiated at his wedding. By background the Gnadenfeld group had received influences unknown in most of the other Mennonite communities. They were sometimes referred to as "Lutheran Mennonites." The consecration of children, mission festivals, emphasis on temperance, and other practices generally unknown among Mennonites were adhered to in Gnadenfeld. Wüst was a frequent speaker at their mission festivals.

The Bruderschule, established in 1857, which acquired the right to train teachers in 1859, became one of the testing grounds on which it was decided in which direction all these influences were to lead. August Lenzmann and N. Schmidt were progressive spiritually minded leaders and sponsors of the school. Jakob Reimer and Johann Claassen were also leaders, but with a different emphasis; they did not approve of Heinrich Franz as a teacher because they thought he lacked the required "piety." Therefore they withdrew and became leaders in a separation movement which resulted in the founding of the Mennonite Brethren Church (1860). Nicolas Schmidt and others had introduced another foreign element by supporting a certain Johann Lange as teacher, who had graduated from a chiliastic school in South Germany and was now promoting the ideas of the "Templers" or "Friends of Jerusalem." This led to another division (1863) and a temporary closing of the school. In 1873 the school was reopened as a Zentralschule (q.v.), which before World War I was changed into a school of commerce (Handelsschule). In 1907 a Mädchenschule (see Gnadenfeld Mädchenschule) was added.

The religious life of Gnadenfeld (see Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church), in spite of these disrupting early developments, continued without further disturbance. Because of its strong evangelistic, progressive background, disruptive elements caused little dissatisfaction. Gnadenfeld furnished the Mennonites of Russia with their first missionary, Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), who went to Sumatra in 1869 and later returned to serve the congregation as elder and promoted the cause of missions among the Mennonites of Russia and Europe. His oldest son, Heinrich Dirks II (q.v.), was the last elder of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite church. When in the 1870's a general conscription law was passed, 17 families with 141 persons emigrated to America, a few to Palestine.

Economically, the colony made good progress. Orchards and windbreaks were planted. Until 1881, all the land was considered crown land; it was then sold for a nominal sum to the respective farmers. In 1908 the district of Gnadenfeld had, in addition to the land of the villages which was 1,900 dessiatines (about 5,000 acres), 75 large privately owned estates with a total of 26,537 dessiatines of land or approximately 72,650 acres. In 1926, 632 of the 671 inhabitants were Mennonites. At that time Gnadenfeld constituted a civic unit with the Mennonite village of Paulsheim and the Russian villages of Mokrostrav, Semostye, and Seyony. The former elementary school and Zentralschule (Handelsschule) had been changed to a seven-class Arbeitsschule. The buildings of the former Mädchenschule were used as a training center by the tractor brigade. For a while Gnadenfeld had an agricultural school. It had a hospital, a flour mill, a bank, and a cattle breeding association. The land was very productive. The raising of grain and cattle predominated.

The Gnadenfeld Mennonite church was closed by the government in 1933 and used as a granary and later as a motion picture theater. Of the 550 to 600 members, only some 100 remained members because of the great pressure exercised by the government. Elder Heinrich Dirks perished in exile. Over 50 persons were exiled. When the Germans occupied Gnadenfeld in October 1941, the former way of life was again resumed as much as possible. An 80-year-old minister, Heinrich Boldt, who had survived concentration camp, preached again in the old church, instructed the youth, and baptized 28. On Sept. 12, 1943, the Gnadenfeld Mennonites left their home on more than 100 wagons to flee the approaching Red army, and the village was destroyed by fire. The majority of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite refugees were forcibly returned to Russia. The rest have found new homes in Canada and South America. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 79 ff.; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950); H. Dirks, editor, Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (Berdyansk, 1908) 33-46 1911-12, 28-40; 1913, 38-44; Franz Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); ML II, 128 f.

Gnadenfeld Agricultural School, Molotschna, Russia, was organized in 1923 by the Verband Bürger Holländischer Herkunft. In 1925 the school was taken over by the district. The school had an experiment station for which some 300 acres of land were at its disposal. The course of the school was two years. C.K.

Der Praktische Landwirt (August 1926) 20.

Gnadenfeld Mädchenschule, Molotschna, Russia, was founded and originally sponsored by C. J. Reimer. It was started in 1907 and was forced to close in 1911, but was later reopened. One of the teachers of the school was Katharina C. Reimer, a daughter of the sponsor. The school had a three-year course. After the Revolution it was merged with the Handelsschule of Gnadenfeld (see Gnadenfeld and Gnadenfeld Zentralschule). C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 627; C. Reimer, "Die Gnadenfelder Mädchenschule," in Menn. Jahrbuch 1913, 114-17.

Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church was located in the province of Taurida, South Russia, about 60 miles from the seaport at Berdyansk on the Sea of Asov. In 1835 the congregation as a whole immigrated to Russia from the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, under the leadership of Elder Wilhelm Lange. From the very beginning the congregation was known for its advanced spiritual life. During the middle of the last century the Gnadenfeld congregation became the center of a revival movement which culminated in the founding of the Mennonite Brethren Church in 1860.

The meetinghouse was built in 1854 and was one of the finest older Mennonite churches in the Molotschna settlement with a seating capacity of 500. In 1895 it installed a pipe organ, the only one in a Mennonite church in Russia. The membership was around 300, mostly from the village of Gnadenfeld and some surrounding villages. Prominent elders were Wilhelm Lange, Friedrich Lange, August Lenzmann, Heinrich Dirks, Sr., the first missionary of the Russian Mennonites, Gerhard Nickel, and Heinrich Dirks, Jr.

In 1887 the membership numbered 405 baptized members. The Berdyansk congregation was a subsidiary of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church. The interest in education and Christian work was demonstrated by the congregation in many ways. Fifteen of its members went abroad for theological training or a higher education; among them were Heinrich Dirks, father and son, Heinrich Franz, Hermann Lenzmann, W. Neufeld, Abr. Klassen, and Peter Nachtigall.

In 1933, after arresting the last minister, the Bolshevik authorities closed the church and so the existence of the congregation was brought to an end. (See also Gnadenfeld.) H.G.

Gnadenfeld Zentralschule, Molotschna, Russia, was preceded by a Bruderschule established in 1857, which in turn was a continuation of a school which the settlers had had in Prussia. Because of differences of opinion the school was closed in 1863. When it reopened in 1873 it became known as a Zentralschule (q.v.). The first teachers of the Bruderschule were David Hausknecht, Heinrich Franz I, Johannes Lange, and Friedrich Lange; it was sponsored by a group of progressive and pietistically inclined individuals, such as Johann Claassen, Jakob Reimer, Nikolai Schmidt, and August Lenzmann, and supported by voluntary contributions. The aim was to train workers for home missions according to the pattern of the Rauhes Haus, Hamburg.

The first teachers of the Zentralschule were Hermann Lenzmann and Wilhelm Neufeld. They were followed by Abraham Braun 1875-84, P. H. Heese 1877-78, A. Hausknecht 1878-80, D. J. Dück, F. W. Teneta, B. Ratzlaff, J. H. Unruh, Jakob Rempel, Johann Sudermann, and Nikolai Ediger. The school had a three-year course with the usual Zentralschule subjects.

Before World War I the school was reorganized as a school of commerce (Handelsschule), patterned after the Alexanderkrone Business School (q.v.). The teachers at this time were K. K. Martens, Abraham Bergen, and Isbrand Rempel. After the revolution of 1917 the school went through another transformation. First it was combined with the Gnadenfeld Mädchenschule and later, in combination with an elementary school, it was turned into a seven-class Arbeitsschule (see Gnadenfeld). C.K.

H. Dirks, ed., Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, 1911-12, pp. 28-40; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 86 ff., 621 ff.

Gnadenheim, a Mennonite village name of the Molotschna settlement, Russia; Barnaul settlement, Siberia; Menno and Fernheim settlements, Paraguay. C.K.

Gnadental Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Colony Neuland of the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized provisionally in an MCC refugee camp in Berlin and after emigration to Paraguay in 1947-48, officially established on April 8, 1948, in Gnadental, Neuland, Chaco, under the leadership of Wilhelm Löwen and adopted the name Gnadentaler Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde. Its members are largely recent immigrants from Russia and Poland via Germany through the MCC and are farmers. The current membership is 317. Church services are held regularly in the school building, as are also Sunday schools, choir work, young people's programs, and Ladies' Aid meetings. Footwashing is not practiced to date but planned for the near future. Church discipline, both excommunication and ban are practiced when necessary. Songbooks are the combined Heimatklänge, Glaubensstimme, and Frohe Botschaft, and the Evangeliums-Lieder. Wilhelm Löwen is still the leader of the group assisted by two ministers and two deacons. W.L.

Gnadenthal, a common Mennonite village name found in the Molotschna settlement, Russia; Baratov; Auli Ata, Central Asia; Barnaul, Siberia; Alexanderwohl, Kan.; West Reserve, Man.; Swift Current, Sask.; Mexico; and Sommerfeld settlement, Villarrica, Paraguay. C.K.

Gnadenthal, a village (pop. 200) situated about seven miles southwest of Plum Coulee, Man., is one of the most progressive of the Mennonite villages west of the Red River, with conveniences such as electrification and telephones. There are two Mennonite churches, one G.C.M. and one M.B., and a two-room public school with qualified Mennonite teachers. The village dates back to 1874-75, when it was settled by Old Colonists from South Russia, who vacated the village in 1923-25 with about 15 other villages in this area, because the Department of Education required the use of the English language in the schools. However, this proved to be a godsend for some of the 21,000 Mennonites who immigrated from South Russia to Canada in 1924, and who now took possession of the land and buildings, most of whom are now well-to-do farmers. Other villages in the vicinity have their own churches, which also belong to the Blumenort Mennonite Church (q.v.) as well. H.H.H.

Gnadenthal Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Gnadenthal, Man., was organized on June 14, 1929, under the leadership of Elder Wilhelm J. Dueck. In 1943 an old house was remodeled into a church with a seating capacity of 200. In 1953 the membership was 28, with Heinrich P. Harder the minister. One missionary, Helen Harder, has gone from this church to the foreign field. H.P.H.

Gnapheus, Guilhelmus (Fullonius or Willem van Hage), b. 1493, at The Hague, Netherlands, d. 1568 at Norden, East Friesland, Germany, was appointed rector of the Latin School at The Hague in 1522 but already in 1523 was forced to leave because of anti-Catholic ideas. In 1525 he was for some time in prison at The Hague, but was later released. After much wandering he settled at Elbing, West Prussia, in 1531, where he became rector of the Gymnasium (Latin School) in 1535. But in 1541 there was a conflict and Gnapheus moved to Königsberg in the duchy of Prussia (later East Prussia); here he became a schoolteacher and a preacher, but he was dismissed and even excommunicated on June 9, 1547, by the Lutheran government, charged with Anabaptism and fanaticism. After some years he was reinstated, the charges having been proved false. By that time he had already moved to Norden in East Friesland (about 1560), where he became burgomaster. Besides numerous other books, he wrote a fine evangelical treatise, Een troost ende spiegel der siecken ende derghenen die in lijdn zijn, first edition in 1531. Gnapheus, who was not an Anabaptist but a humanist, Sacramentist, and adherent of Bullinger (q.v.), may by his ideas of toleration have prepared the opportunity for Anabaptists and Mennonites to settle in East Prussia. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 269-72; ML III, 322; F. Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tyd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 62-65, 78, 81-84, 192-95.

Gnieden-Blumenheim Mennonite Brethren Church, located 20 miles from Schönfeld, district of Alexandrovsk, in the province of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, was organized probably in the 1880's by Mennonite families from the Molotschna settlement. The church took its name from a nobleman, Gnieden, from whom the land was purchased.

Tobias Voth, who after the Russian Revolution died the death of a martyr in exile, was the first minister of the congregation. In 1892, the church had a membership of 15. Until 1898, when the membership had risen to 28, the congregation held its meetings in the farm homes of its members. When one of the settlement moved away, his house was used as a meeting place.

At the turn of the century five families purchased land at Neu-Samara, in the province of Samara, and the Gnieden church began to dissolve. Voth soon thereafter moved to the Memrik settlement, and in 1908 he too moved to Samara. The other families scattered to various parts of the country, some eventually emigrating to Canada after 1923. Several families have settled near Coaldale, Alta. Heinrich Dueck, one of the younger members of the Gnieden church, is now a minister in the Mennonite Brethren Church at Boissevain, Man. I.G.N.

"Go Ye," the official publication of the "Go Ye" Mission, Inc., of Choteau, Okla., published as a 4-page 6¼ x 9½ in. monthly (bimonthly 1946-47), edited in 1954 by Homer Mouttet. The "Go Ye" Mission was organized and directed by Solomon Mouttet to work particularly in the field of "Child Evangelism." H.S.B.

Gobschitz (Gopschitz) is a village near Kromau (q.v.) in Moravia; here Matthiasch, the captain of Kromau, leased a house to the Hutterites, and they set up a Bruderhof, which is mentioned in the Geschicht-Buch for 1547 with other Bruderhofs. They lived here until 1602. The Geschicht-Buch comments, "In 1602 the Brethren at Gopschitz (where they lived 49 years) moved away with the Lord's good will on account of the high taxation and trouble with soldiers, which they could not endure." (ML II, 129.) LOSERTH.

Goch, a city (pop. 11,798) in the Rhine Province, government district of Düsseldorf, Germany, on the Dutch border. Here the conference was held in 1547 at which Adam Pastor was banned by Dirk Philips and Menno Simons for his anti-Trinitarian views. It is said that Adam Pastor, whose principal field of activity was at Cleve, had also "brought many to rebaptism" in Goch. Theunis van Hastenrath, put to death in 1551 at Linnich, was a preacher in Goch about the same time, but did not baptize there. In the second half of the 16th century there was already a congregation of Anabaptists here, but little is known about its history. Most of the members were weavers; in 1607 the schoolteacher of Goch was a Mennonite. The van Heukelom family, many members of which later lived in Amsterdam, belonged to the congregation at Goch. The membership was always small, but was augmented in the last quarter of the 17th and the first quarter of the 18th centuries by an influx of refugees from the Palatinate. The congregation was supported by that of Amsterdam and in the last part of the 18th century also by Rotterdam. In 1736 it contributed 75 florins to the Dutch Fund for Foreign Needs. In the 18th century it had two (untrained and until 1747 unsalaried) ministers, both of whom served for a long period: Pieter Wendels 1712-60, and Abraham Alders 1729-ca. 72. The first educated minister of the congregation was Gerrit Schimmelpenninck, serving from 1774 until his death in 1792. He was followed by H. van Hinten from 1793 (?) until his death in 1799, and Evert Akkeringa 1800-15, in whose time the membership greatly decreased and the finances collapsed. About 1790 the membership numbered 100, in 1840 only 20. In 1815-18 Jan van Hulst of Cleve also served at Goch. The last minister of the congregation was Hidde Wybe van der Ploeg, 1819-55. After his death (1855) until 1898 it was served by Pastor Leendertz of Cleve. Services were still held in the Dutch language. In 1885 it is said that church and parsonage were in good condition, and there was a considerable property, but no church board (DB 1885, 8-9). In 1898 there were 15 members; in 1904 a church board was chosen, and once a month Pastor Kraemer of Crefeld conducted a service, but soon after the congregation became extinct.

Jacob Gottschalk (q.v., ca. 1666-1763), the first bishop of the Mennonite Church in America, was a member of the Goch congregation; he received a church letter on June 11, 1701, and presumably emigrated to America in the same year, settling first in Germantown. K.V., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1538; II, Nos. 2571, 2769-87; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 416, 485, 496, 500; W. Niepoth, "Jacob Gottschalk and His Ancestry," MQR XXIII (1949), 35-47 contains valuable information on the Gottschalk family and the congregation in Goch; DB 1864, 121; 1885, 8 f.; 1895, 184, 1898, 112 f.; 1904, 232; 1906, 191; 1909, 116, 124; Naamlijst 1829, 69; ML II, 129 f.

Godevaert van Holaer, an Anabaptist martyr, a mason and a native of Mechelen, Belgium, was burned at the stake on the market place at Antwerp on March 3, 1535. Particulars are lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 318, 366; XIV, 12 f., No. 136.) vdZ.

Göding (Czech, Hodonin or Godonin), a city (pop. 5,000) in Moravia, situated five miles southeast of Brno on the old highway to Hungary along the right bank of the March. It has a long history, for the village, mentioned in the 11th century, belonged to several successive noble Czech families, of whom the barons of Lippa are most prominent in Anabaptist history. From 1762 to World War I it belonged to the Hapsburg family estate. The inhabitants of the city were mostly Protestant in the 16th century. The first Catholic priest was appointed in 1640.

There were Anabaptists in Göding and Tscheikowitz (q.v.), which also belonged to this estate, as early as the 1540's. On July 25, 1545, they bought a house there with all its appurtenances and arranged it as a Bruderhof, though of course, under great difficulty, for in that very year, in consequence of the decision of the Diet that only those Anabaptists would be tolerated who did not practice community of goods, the "great tribulation" began which lasted five years. They were driven from Moravia to Hungary and Austria and back again. In 1564 Hans of Cologne, a mason by trade, was a deacon in Göding. A generation later, Nov. 11, 1593, the brotherhood bought the "Konventshaus" there.

But soon the period of unrest and trouble due to war set in, and frequently struck Göding as a border city. In 1605-6 the Konvent was destroyed in the struggles of the Hungarians against Jörg Basta; it was not rebuilt until 1612. Greater damage was done in the Bohemian revolt, which led to the complete dissolution of Anabaptism in Moravia. Thus on Feb. 7, 1620, the Poles attacked Göding and plundered it so rapidly that no one could withstand them. Three Bruderhofs, Göding, Schädowitz, and Watzenobis (q.v.), were plundered and about 20 brethren and sisters seriously injured. Soon the consequences of the battle at the White Mountain were visited upon the Moravian Anabaptist households. The Hutterites at Göding were again sorely pressed and attempted to flee over the border. Three brethren who were sent to Göding the following years were killed by the Poles, and on Aug. 8 Göding was plundered by the Walloons. The Brethren suffered very severely in the struggles against Bethlen Gabor (q.v.). They finally withdrew from Moravia so completely that scarcely any reminders of the period of Anabaptism remained in Göding. (ML II, 130.) LOSERTH.

Godschalks (Godtschalcx), Jan, of Elten: see Elten, Jan Godschalks van.

Godshalk (Godshall, Gottschall, Gottshall, Gottschalk, Godtschalch, Gaedtschalck), a family name found especially in the Franconia Mennonite Conference (MC) in southeastern Pennsylvania, the progenitor of the family having been an immigrant of 1701 from Goch, Germany, named Jacob Gottschalk (Gaedtschalck), preacher in the Germantown congregation 1702-12 and later at Skippack 1713-63, and first Mennonite bishop in America.

Two Godshalk family histories have been published: The Godshalk Family History by Abraham Godshalk (Harrisburg, Pa., 1912), and The Gottshall Family by N. B. Grubb, 1924. The family includes a number of bishops, ministers, and deacons. Worthy of mention are the preacher-author Abraham Godshalk (q.v., 1791-1838), Bishop Moses Gottshall (1815-88) of the Eastern District Conference (GCM), and his son, Elder William S. Gottshall (q.v., 1865-1941) of the same district. J.C.W.

W. Niepoth, "Jacob Gottschalk and His Ancestry," MQR XXIII (January 1949) 35-47.

Godshalk, Abraham (b. Dec. 29, 1791, d. Aug. 19, 1838), Mennonite author and minister in the Doylestown Mennonite Church (MC) of the Franconia Conference (q.v.). His wife was Sarah Shrauger, whom he married Oct. 17, 1815. The union was blessed with seven children. Godshalk wrote of himself: "I am a farmer, who was at a pretty early day [about 32] called to be a preacher of the Gospel, and who has not even had the advantage of a good common education." He was ordained as a preacher in the Doylestown congregation in 1824. Shortly before his death at the age of 46, Godshalk wrote a book entitled Eine Beschreibung der Neuen Creatur (Doylestown, 1838). He then translated it into English, making "such amendments and additions as to me seemed good." Godshalk wrote in opposition to the perfectionism in certain revivalistic preaching in his day: "Many preach up a kind of regeneration in our day that is not well founded in Scripture; namely, that the change is at once so perfect, that no growth is necessary, or that the regenerated man is at once free from sin" (p. iii). It is believed that the group Godshalk had in mind was the Evangelical Association. Godshalk's treatise takes up the following points on regeneration: its necessity, the means, its nature, and the subject who has been regenerated —what kind of person he is. In his German booklet he spelled his name Gottshall. This was the spelling he used in 1837 when he published a 16-page booklet entitled Wahre Gerechtigkeit (Doylestown). J.C.W.

Goebel, Max, German church historian, b. March 13, 1811, at Solingen, d. Dec. 13, 1857, at Coblenz, studied theology at the University of Bonn, served as pastor in Siegburg and Coblenz, where he made friendly contacts with J. G. Lübke at Neuwied and Johannes Molenaar at Monsheim, who later became Mennonite preachers. He is the author of the important book, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westfälischen evangelischen Kirche (Vol. I, 1849; Vol. II, 1852; Vol. III edited by Th. Link in 1860 from papers left by Goebel). In this work the Mennonites, especially those of the Rhineland, are given extensive, sympathetic treatment; much new material is presented, making the book an important source for the study of Mennonite history in the Rhineland. Never before had the Anabaptist movement received so thorough a presentation, based on study of the sources, or so just a characterization of its nature (see the excellent analysis of Anabaptism, Vol. I, 134-39, which is still of great value). Of especial interest is the attempt of the author to prove that Pietism in the Rhineland can be traced back to the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century (Menn. Bl., 1858, 9). The Monatsschrift für die evangelische Kirche der Rheinprovinz, which Max Goebel edited with C. F. Kling, contains an interesting article from his pen in Nov. 4, 1848, pp. 228-40, "Die oberländischen Mennoniten" (erroneously called Hutterites). They are Amish Mennonites, whom the author describes at first hand. Though some of the material is incorrect and has been superseded by later investigations, on the whole this article has considerable historical value. (ML II, 130.) NEFF.

Goechjen Jans (Ghoechgen Jans van Slubich), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, originally from Lubik near Gouda, Dutch province of South Holland (not Lübeck in Germany), was arrested at Amsterdam and drowned there on April 21 or 22 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously April 15) together with 10 other Anabaptist women. Particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 67, 70; idem, Bijdrage, 62, 305.) vdZ.

Goedereede, Jan Joosten van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Joosten.

Goeree (Goederede), a Dutch island belonging to the province of South Holland, seat of a Mennonite congregation which since the 18th century is called Ouddorp (q.v.). (ML II, 131.) vdZ.

Goering (Göring, Gering, Gehring), a Mennonite family name. The earliest known record of the name is that of the Swiss printer Ulrich Gering (b. ca. 1440; d. 1510, in Paris), who set up the first printing press in France with the assistance of Michael Friburger and Martin Crantz under the direction of Guillaume Fichet, rector of the Sorbonne. Virtually complete genealogical records are extant for the family since issuance of a passport to Moses Gering of Montbéliard, France, on Feb. 8, 1791. Moses Gering is known to have been a member of a group of Mennonites that emigrated from Palatinate, South Germany, to France near the Swiss border about 1673. Moses Gering apparently was born in Montbéliard about 1760. It is also known that his immediate ancestors lived for a time in the canton of Bern, Switzerland. In 1791 Moses Gering moved to Einsiedel, Galicia (Austria), with his family. In 1797 he again moved to Michelsdorf (near Warsaw), Poland. In 1817 the entire family moved to Eduardsdorf (near Dubno), Russia. Some members of the Moses Gering family participated in the founding of the Horodish and Waldheim villages northeast of Eduardsdorf in 1837. In 1860 Eduardsdorf dissolved and Kutuzovka was founded. Included in this group were the majority of Gerings who had remained in Eduardsdorf. In 1874 the Kutuzovka, Horodish, and Waldheim Mennonite settlements dissolved and emigrated to America. The Gerings settled in central Kansas and South Dakota, and subsequently in other states. C. J. Goering was long elder of the Eden Church at Moundridge, Kan., and J. C. Goering was long elder of the First Church of Christian at the same place. S. J. Goering was a missionary in China and business manager of Bethel College. Gering and Gerig have a common source. (D. J. Goering, Goering Genealogy, 1940.) R.L.G.

Goerz (Geerts, Gerrits, Gerritsen, Gerts, Gertz, Gerzen, Goertz, Görts, Görtz, Görz), a Mennonite family of Dutch descent, whose members moved from the Netherlands to West Prussia in the 16th and 17th centuries. Many of them served as preachers in Prussian congregations, e.g., in Montau-Gruppe: Dirk Gerts, until his death in 1706; Franz Gertz 1725-d. 57 (elder 1756); Hans Gertz 1756-d. 67; Cornelis Gertz 1773-d. 96; Abraham Gertz 1776-ca. 81; Claas Görtz 1782-86; Peter Görtz 1801-d. 13; Franz Gertz 1806-d. 14; Dirk Görtz 1819-d. 42; Hans Goertz (1795-1830), preacher after 1814, elder 1821; Jacob Goertz (1827-98), preacher after 1856, elder in Gruppe 1880; Jacob Goertz (b. 1849), preacher at Gruppe 1879, elder 1900; Johann Goertz (b. 1852), preacher 1897-1934; Gerhard Goertz, preacher 1924-45; Albert Goertz, preacher 1932-45. In the congregation of the Culmsche Niederung, Andries (Andreas) Gertz was a preacher about 1750-65 and Jacob Gertz 1775 until after 1810. In Lithuania, East

Prussia, there were also found some members of this family; in 1732, when a number of them were expelled, among those who migrated to the Netherlands there was Abraham Geerts (Gertz); he soon after returned to Prussia and may have been the same person as Abraham Gertzen, who was a preacher of the Lithuanian congregation 1762-ca. 65. P. S. Goertz was long dean of Bethel College, Newton, Kan. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1669, 1687; II, 2 Nos. 779, 784; Dutch Naamlijst; L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe, ein Gedenkblatt (1918) 83-87; Gem.-Kal.

Goerz, Abraham, for many years a Mennonite elder in Russia, b. 1840 at Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna, d. Jan. 29, 1911 (1913?), was a pupil of Elder Fr. W. Lange (q.v.), in 1865 accepted a teaching position at Hochfeld, Melitopol district (South Russia); in 1867-72 he taught in Altonau. For the sake of his health he had to give up teaching, and bought a small farm with a treadmill in Altonau. For two years he served as village mayor and three years as district judge of the Halbstadt district. In addition he was active in various commissions of the community. He was also chosen a member of the committee that in 1874 negotiated with Adjutant General von Totleben concerning military service. He was repeatedly sent to St. Petersburg as a delegate to negotiate with the government. Two weeks before his death he was in Simferopol to call on the governor on the matter of a law forbidding worship periods in Mennonite schools. He succeeded in arranging it in favor of the Mennonite practice. His personality inspired respect and brought him courteous attention even in the highest circles.

On May 5, 1875, Goerz was chosen as preacher of the Orloff Mennonite Church (q.v.). After the death of Elder Johann Harder (q.v.) he was called as elder of the Orloff-Halbstadt-Neukirch congregation on Dec. 29, 1875, and was ordained in the Neu-Halbstadt church on Jan. 6, 1876. He filled this office until his death. He was an outstanding speaker with many gifts, including tact and foresight. He was the representative of the Molotschna Kirchenkonvent (q.v.) in the school council 1876-96. Then he resigned, but in 1906 was recalled to this position by the Halbstadt civil and church authorities. His influence on and services to the educational program of the Mennonites in Russia were outstanding. He succeeded in preserving the church character of the Mennonite common schools, and religious instruction according to Mennonite principles, as well as consideration of the German language, in the face of a government policy of Russianization. From 1906 on he was a manager of the old people's home in Halbstadt. In the last years of his life he was a member of the Glaubenskommission (KfK) of the Mennonites in Russia. In addition Goerz was also often engaged as a surveyor. He was skilled in the use of tools. By his versatility, always mindful of the welfare of his people, he rendered great, unforgettable services to Mennonitism in Russia.† A.B.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950); ML II, 131.

Goerz, David (1849-1914), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and leader, was born on June 2, 1849, to Heinrich and Agnes Goerz, Neu-Bereslav near Berdyansk, South Russia. He attended the Vereinsschule at Ohrloff in the Molotschna settlement. At the age of 18 he was baptized and began to teach school at Berdyansk, where he married Helene Riesen (in 1870 or 1871). He was a close friend of Bernhard Warkentin, who traveled to America on June 5, 1872, and on the basis of the letters which he received from Warkentin spread information about America among the Mennonites of the Ukraine, who had become alarmed by an impending conscription law.

On Nov. 4, 1873, David Goerz arrived in New York and proceeded to Summerfield, Ill., where he taught a Mennonite school. In 1875 he moved with a group of Summerfield Mennonites to Kansas and settled at Halstead, where he served as editor of Zur Heimath, manager of the Western Publishing House (q.v.), and secretary of the Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.), the American Mennonite agency set up to aid the newly immigrated Mennonites from Russia. In 1877 Goerz was instrumental in organizing the Mennonite Teachers' Conference (q.v.), of Kansas, which led to the organization of the Kansas Conference (q.v.) and later became the Western District Conference (q.v.). For years, Goerz was secretary or chairman of this conference. He also promoted home and foreign mission work among the Mennonites and organized the Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Company (q.v.) (Newton) in 1880 (now Midland Mutual Fire Insurance Company). In 1900 he made a trip to India to distribute 8,000 bushels of grain among the starving population, which led to the beginning of the General Conference mission work in India.

David Goerz was one of the founders of the Bethel College Corporation and served as its first business manager until 1910, when his health compelled him to relinquish this work. Under his influence the Board of Directors of Bethel College in 1903 organized the Bethel Deaconess Home and Hospital Society (q.v.), which later became an independent institution. In 1878, the Halstead Mennonite Church ordained him as minister and in 1893 he became the pastor of the Bethel College Mennonite Church. He was also instrumental in promoting better music among the Mennonites of the prairie states.

David Goerz was a great organizer, inspirer, and leader in the various realms of cultural, educational, missionary, and relief enterprises of the Mennonites of the prairie states in the pioneer days. What has been realized on a large scale in our day was visualized and planned by him at the turn of the century. In 1910, because of ill health, he made a trip to Palestine and tried to improve his health by retiring to Colorado and later to California, where he died on May 7, 1914.† C.K.

Dictionary of American Biography VII (1931) 353-54; Menn. Life, October 1952, 170-75; Der Herold, May 14, 1914; Bethel College Monthly, May 1914, 2-4, 12-16; D. Goerz Collection, Bethel College Historical Library; P. J. Wedel, History of Bethel College (North Newton, 1954); ML I, 131 f.

Goerz, Franz, elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite congregation, Molotschna settlement, Taurida, South Russia, was born in 1820 at Rudnerweide, when that village was only one year old. In 1841 he married and after that lived at Gnadenfeld. In 1850 he became minister and in 1861 was ordained elder of his native Rudnerweide congregation. After the death of Elder August Lenzmann (1877) Goerz for five years served also as elder of the Gnadenfeld congregation. In 1891 he retired from his duty as elder because of ill health. He died in 1901 at Gnadenfeld, having served his large congregation 30 years as elder and 10 additional years as minister. In the 1870's during the crisis brought about through the introduction of universal military service in Russia, Goerz was several times one of the delegates sent to St. Petersburg to plead the Mennonite cause. H.G.

Goes, a town (1947 pop. 12,833, with 63 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Zeeland, seat of a Mennonite congregation. Though no authentic records are available it is a fact that already in the 16th century a Mennonite congregation was found here, which belonged to the Flemish branch. In the 17th century some difficulties arose concerning Socinian (q.v.) doctrines. In 1665, when a conflict had arisen in the Flemish Mennonite congregations of the Netherlands (see Lammerenkrijg), the municipal government of Goes compelled the preachers, the precentor, and the deacons of the Mennonite Church to sign 12 articles (see Geuzenvragen), in which Socinianism was repudiated. Both Joos Baroen, the preacher, and Jan Baroen, the precentor of the congregation, refused to sign, and consequently were dismissed from their office by the magistrates. A quarrel broke out in the congregation, some of the members supporting Joos and Jan Baroen, who were inclined to the ideas of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), a rather progressive Mennonite leader. But the majority of the members took the side of Samuel Apostool (q.v.), and were not willing to invoke the help of outside church leaders (buitenmannen), especially of those who adhered to "the new doctrine of Galenus." Peace was not restored in the congregation until 1680; unfortunately the old book of records, containing the account of these quarrels, was then intentionally destroyed.

On Nov. 17, 1703, the Mennonites of Goes obtained the privilege of performing marriages of their members in their own meetinghouse. As a gift of gratitude the deacons of the Mennonite congregation presented the municipal orphanage with 28 gold ducats. But not many marriages were performed in the Mennonite church, since the membership rapidly decreased. In 1684 the congregation numbered 242 members, in 1721 only 47; in 1733, when an offering was taken for the benefit of the Prussian Mennonites, 115 guilders were collected. The church board apologized for this small amount on the ground of their small number and their poverty. During the 18th century the congregation was served by the following preachers: Pieter Affet 1720-47, Nicolaas Knopper 1748?-52, Klaas van der Horst 1753-57, Gerrit Schimmelpenning 1757-74, and Abraham Staal 1779-87. After the departure of Staal no new preacher was chosen. In 1796 only three members were left, and the Naamlijst of 1815 (p. 107) states that the congregation of Goes had died out. But this is not the case; during the first half of the 19th century the ministers of Ouddorp, Middelburg, and Vlissingen occasionally held church services at Goes. In 1837 the membership had increased to 13. In 1859 a communion service was held and in 1864 a baptismal service, but in 1868 the administration of the property of the congregation as well as the care of church services was given over to the congregation of Middelburg. It was largely due to the assiduity of Tj. Kielstra (q.v.), minister of Middelburg, who regularly visited the Mennonites at Goes, that the congregation there was restored to new life; on Oct. 24, 1889, 17 new members were admitted to the congregation by the only deacon left. The old meetinghouse of 1660, situated in the Korte Vosstraat, had been transferred to the Walloon (French Protestant) congregation about 1800. In 1892 the Mennonites acquired a new church, built at the Westwal; it was dedicated on Sept. 27, 1892, by Pastor Kielstra. This building because of its dilapidated condition was torn down in 1934; the present meetinghouse, built on the same place, was dedicated on Sept. 9, 1934.

After its re-establishment in 1889 the congregation was served by Pastor Kielstra of Middelburg; in 1899 it obtained its own minister, together with the congregation of Vlissingen, and was served by S. Spaans 1899-1908 and T. H. Siemelink 1908-19. The assertion (DB 1919, 222, 240) that because of lack of finances the congregation was dissolved on Nov. 30, 1919, is not quite true. The fact is that in the spring of 1920 the agreement with Vlissingen was terminated, but in 1921 a new alliance was made with Middelburg, the pastors of Middelburg from that time also serving at Goes. The congregation owes much to A. R. Breetveld, who was (until 1927) for more than 30 years president and treasurer of the church board.

The membership, numbering 26 in 1889, was 36 in 1896, 51 in 1899, 20 in 1919, 29 in 1926, 50 in 1953. The members live partly in the town of Goes, partly in neighboring towns.

The archives of the congregation from 1677 to 1928, described by Abr. Mulder (in Inventarissen van Rijksarchieven, Vol. II, sub XIX), are now found in the State Archives at Middelburg.

A.R.B., Abr. M.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1176, 1180, 1996; II, Nos. 1276, 1737-53; II, 2, Nos. 44, 590, 599; DJ 1837, 8.25; 1935, 92; DB 1861, 175-76; 1865, 170; 1876, 66; 1889, 11; 1890, 142; 1892, 143; 1893, 137; 1898, 242; 1899, 210; 1919, 222, 240; B. J. H. van Dale, "Bijdrage tot de Gesch. der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Goes," in Cadsandria (Schoondijke, 1858); ML II, 132 f.

Goes, Antoni Jansen van der, and his wife Magdalena Steenaerts lived in the Dutch town of Goes, province of Zeeland, until about 1651. Then they migrated to Amsterdam. Antoni Jansen was a poet of devotional hymns and moralizing poems of rather mediocre quality. A volume entitled Zederymen, bestaande in Zangen en Gedigten, Verciert met Nieuwe Muzyk door S. Lefevre was published (Amsterdam, 1656). Both Antoni and his wife were members of the Mennonite Church. Their son was Johannes Antonides (q.v.). (Catalogus Amst., 273; DJ 1840, 113.) vdZ.

Goes, Maeyken van der, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maeyken Janssens.

Goessel, Kan., a town (pop. 261) located in east-central Kansas in the southwestern part of Marion County. Approximately 2,000 Mennonites live in the shopping area. In or near Goessel are six Mennonite congregations: three General Conference Mennonite churches—Alexanderwohl, Tabor, and Goessel (the latter is in the town); the Spring Valley Mennonite Church (MC), the Springfield Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, and the Meridian Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church. Mennonites have lived in the region since the establishment of the first immigrant house in 1874. Other Mennonite institutions in the town include the 26-bed Bethesda Hospital and the 27-bed Bethesda Home for the Aged. A unique situation exists in the town's Class A public high school in that during most years the enrollment of slightly over 100 is entirely Mennonite. J.W.L.

Goessel (Kan.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, formerly known as the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Brethren Church, was begun in 1880 and was for some time an important congregation of the M.B. Conference. In 1888 its membership was 20 and in 1896, 70. Then it decreased and in 1926 discontinued, and the church building was sold. Its presiding ministers were Elder C. P. Wedel, Peter Richert, H. P. Schroeder, J. S. Foth, and J. D. Reimer. J.D.H.

Goessel Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Western District Conference, located in Goessel, Kan., was founded by members of the Alexanderwohl (q.v.) (Kan.) Mennonite Church, descendants of Mennonite immigrants who came to Kansas in 1874 from Alexanderwohl (q.v.), Russia, on April 15, 1920, with 177 members, because the Alexanderwohl Church had become overcrowded. Meetings had been held for some time in the Goessel Preparatory School. The church building was erected in 1920. P. P. Buller and Peter Buller came into this congregation as ministers when it was organized. P. P. Buller was immediately named leader and served the congregation as elder 1924-50, succeeded by Orlin F. Frey 1950-54 and Leo L. Miller 1954- . The membership in 1953 was 317. Of the 585 who have been members, 278 were baptized here and 307 were received from other congregations. O.F.F.

Goessel Preparatory School (Gemeindeschule), located at Goessel, Kan., was established by the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church in 1906. The school was responsible to a board composed of members of the congregation. When the Tabor and Goessel Mennonite churches were founded they had representatives on the board and joined in the support of the school. The first teacher was P. P. Buller, 1906-24. In 1912 he was joined by J. J. Banman, 1912-26. In 1925-26 O. K. Galle was principal. The aim of the school was to teach Bible and German, and to stimulate the talents of the pupils. The curriculum was similar to that of the preparatory schools (q.v.) in general. In 1926 the school was changed to Goessel Rural High School, a public school religious instruction is continued in the high-school program.

The enrollment of the Gossel Preparatory School ranged from 40 to 50 pupils. A total of 260 pupils was graduated from the two-year course. Its building was later moved to the Bethel College campus for use as a dormitory, where it is known as Goessel Hall. (Jahresheft Goessel Vereinsschule, 1906-26.) C.K.

Goethals, a Mennonite family which emigrated from Flanders, Belgium, to the Netherlands about 1630, and joined the congregation of Aardenburg and Middelburg. The martyrs Joos(t) Goethals (q.v.) and Barbelken Goethals (q.v.), both executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1569 and 1590, may have been members of this family. vdZ.

Goetze, Georg Heinrich, superintendent of the Marienkirche in Lübeck, Germany, author of a polemic against the Mennonites entitled Catechetische Prüfung der Mennonistischen Lehre, welche in Acht Catechismus-Predigten unter Göttlichen Seegen den 12., 13., 15., 16., 19., 20., 22., 23. September An. 1707 in St. Marien Kirche deutlich und erbaulich anzustellen gedenket George Henrich Götze. Following the five main articles of the small Lutheran Catechism in the form of questions and answers, he tries to refute Mennonite doctrine, and gives expression to some very odd ideas. The whole is a remarkable specimen of the type of material used at that time in the struggle against one's theological opponents. (Menn. Bl., 1880, 85 ff.; ML II, 134.) NEFF.

Goldbach, a village in St. Gall, Switzerland, where the Anabaptist movement found a considerable following in the first years after its origin. (ML II, 134.) HEGE.

Golden Rule Bookstore, 187 King Street East, Kitchener, Ont., a branch bookstore of the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pa., was purchased of A. J. Schultz in April 1938. In November 1951 it was moved from 256 King Street East to a new building on 187 King Street East. Managers have been J. C. Fretz 1938-53 and J. W. Snyder since Oct. 1, 1953. A second Canadian branch bookstore by the same name and under the same manager was established at 320½ Dundas Street, London, Ont., in 1955. H.S.B.

Goldschmidt, Georg: see Steiner, Georg, a goldsmith.

Goldschmidt, Heinrich. In spite of the severity of the persecution to which the Anabaptists were subjected in the late 1520's, the movement continued its remarkable growth, as Luther once said, "through the glow of the living and the courage of those dying in fire and water," so that the populace and even the executioners marveled. The zeal of the Anabaptists was quite strong in the district of Sterzing (q.v.; formerly Austria, now Italy), where citizens, peasants, and squires were baptized, and the prisons were never empty. Here on Feb. 1, 1528, a number of Anabaptists were pardoned upon recanting, having first been placed on the whipping post and beaten with rods. In addition they had to repeat their recantation on three successive Sundays before the assembled congregation in the church, and to pay the costs of their trial. Heinrich Goldschmidt was one of the Sterzing prisoners, but none of the sources give any further information about him. It is assumed, however, that he was an important person, for he was excluded from the pardon mentioned above, "to make some distinction in the treatment of persons" (Innsbruck Statthaltereiarchiv, Causa Domini II, p. 163 f.). He is probably identical with the Goldschmidt mentioned in a letter written by the Innsbruck government Dec. 7, 1527, to the Landrichter at Freundberg, "This Goldschmidt recently came to Schwaz and escaped from there with others. The spring of 1529 (Goldschmidt died on April 6) brought him the bloody rose his heart longed for."

LOSERTH.

J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol II (Vienna, 1892) 51; ML II, 134.

Goldschmidt (Rüdiger), Ottilia, an Anabaptist martyr from Mühlhausen in Thuringia. She was seized early in October 1537 with 13 other women and 3 men, including Jakob Storger of Koburg, the preacher of the Anabaptists at Mühlhausen. Upon orders of Duke George of Saxony all the prisoners were to be executed, even if they recanted. If they recanted they were only to be granted instruction and absolution before their execution. But the girls, including Ottilia, were to be shown mercy, for they had in their innocence been persuaded to accept baptism and now desired mercy. Eight women and two men, including Storger, resisted all the attempts of city council and the Catholic clergy to induce them to renounce their faith, and were drowned in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern, Nov. 8, 1537.

Ottilia, who had been baptized by Georg Köhler, had at first, in terror of the rack and of a violent death, offered to recant; but she conquered her fear, and remained steadfast in spite of the pleas of the council and the officers. She kept replying that she could not turn back, and was therefore drowned Jan. 17, 1538, at the spot where the others had met a martyr's death. Before she was pushed into the water, a young man stepped up to her and three times offered her marriage if she would recant, but she answered not a word. The promise she had made at her baptism was binding to her.

Ottilia's mother, Katharina, who was also one of the prisoners but had not yet been baptized, recanted and after more than four months in prison was released upon the pleas of her husband.

HEGE.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913); idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML II, 134 f.

Goldsmith (Goldschmidt), a Mennonite family of Swiss origin. More than 200 years ago two (maybe three) Goldschmidt brothers migrated from Richterswil, Switzerland, and settled in the region of Markirch (Sainte-Marie-aux-Mines), Alsace. All of the present Goldschmidts living in Alsace, France, and Switzerland descend from these brothers. One branch of the family settled in the region of Basel, Switzerland, more than a century ago. Fritz Goldschmidt, elder of the Basel Holeestrasse and the Schänzli Mennonite congregation, is a member of this family. Charles Goldschmidt, elder of the Hang congregation, Alsace, is a nephew of Fritz Goldschmidt. Henri Goldschmidt is a preacher in the Pfastatt congregation, Alsace. The great-grandmother of J. S. Gerig, Smithville, Ohio, was Mrs. Christian Gerig, nee Elizabeth Goldschmidt, of Markirch, and therefore the Ohio Gerig families are descendants of the Markirch Goldschmidts.

Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), the fourth child of Konrad Goldschmidt, Markirch, emigrated to America in 1819 and after residences in Pennsylvania, Ontario, and Ohio, moved to Iowa, where he served as a bishop of the Amish Mennonite churches in Lee and Henry counties. M.G.

Goldsmith, Joseph (1796-1876), was born in Alsace, the fourth child of Konrad and Katharine (König) Goldschmidt. In 1819 he landed in Philadelphia. He was married to Elisabeth Schwarzendruber in 1824. Shortly after this marriage they moved to Waterloo Co., Ont. That same year he was ordained a minister of the newly organized Amish Mennonite church in Wilmot Township. In 1831 he and his family moved to Butler Co., Ohio, where he was ordained bishop in 1838. Because of his financial reverses in Ohio, the Goldsmith family moved to a new frontier, Lee Co., Iowa, in 1846. Here he served the Amish church as bishop, and also assisted the churches in Davis, Henry, and Johnson counties in organization, communion, marriage, and ordination services. In 1855, when the Lee County settlement began to break up because of faulty land titles, Goldsmith moved his family to the Amish Mennonite community in Henry County, where he served the church as bishop until paralysis incapacitated him in 1867. He attended the Amish ministers' conference (Diener-Versammlung) in 1862 and 1866, participating actively in the deliberations of that body. Among his 12 children were Veronica, wife of Joseph Gingerich, an Amish minister in Johnson Co., Iowa, and Magdalena, wife of Sebastian Gerig (q.v.), a bishop of the Sugar Creek Amish Mennonite Church near Wayland, Iowa. Three of Goldsmith's great-grandchildren were in 1954 serving in the ministry of the Mennonite Church and two others on the faculty of Goshen College.

M.G.

Goller, Balthasar, a Hutterite physician in Nikolsburg, Moravia, around 1600 (d. 1619). It is well known that the Hutterite brotherhood held its physicians and barber-surgeons in high esteem; in fact, at the turn of the 16th century one could hardly find adequate medical care in Moravia outside the Hutterite brotherhood (see Physicians, Hutterite). It is known that Hutterite physicians were employed by most noble lords of that area, even Emperor Rudolphus II consulted such a doctor twice, and the head of the Catholic Counter Reformation in Moravia, Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.), used these men himself and recommended them to his friends, in spite of the fact that he otherwise worked violently against these "heretics."

It seems that Goller was a real doctor (not only a barber-surgeon as most other brethren in this field had been). He lived in Nikolsburg, the manorial estate of the Dietrichsteins, and most likely was for a while the assistant to Georg Zobel (q.v.), another outstanding Hutterite physician (d. 1603). Goller distinguished himself as the personal physician of the imperial ambassador to Turkey on the latter's mission to Constantinople in 1608-9. From this trip we have five letters from him to the brethren at home, still extant in one of the Hutterite codices.

From a letter of Dietrichstein of 1618 we learn that he was "chief physician of the brethren." Dietrichstein dispatched him to his friend "even though I needed him badly myself." In 1619, Goller was to meet his tragic fate in the first upheavals of the Thirty Years' War. He was slain by some soldier or officer, and the pharmacy of the brethren in Nikolsburg was likewise destroyed and confiscated. It was but a few years before the entire brotherhood was expelled from Moravia altogether (1622), mainly due to the urging of the Cardinal Dietrichstein. (See also Dietrich, Sebastian.) R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Hutterite Physicians and Barber-surgeons," MQR XXVII (1953) 129-30.

Golos (Voice), a periodical in the Russian language, was published 1905-12 by the Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, printed monthly at Hillsboro, Kan., and edited by Hermann Fast, Sask. The contents were of a devotional character and the purpose of the periodical was to strengthen the spiritual life of the Russian Christians, and also to fill a need for spiritual literature in the Russian language. The approximate number of copies of each edition was 1,500. The first number appeared in 1905. The paper was discontinued in 1912 with a credit balance of $475.75, which sum was donated toward the building of a church of the Russian Christians. H.H.J.

Gom(m)er de Metser (Gomer the mason), in the records called Gommare de Clercq, was an Anabaptist martyr, a mason by trade. He was a native of Lier in Brabant. He was arrested in Antwerp and put to death there on Feb. 1, 1560, together with Pedro de Soza and Jacob Schot. They were executed by drowning in a tub, a method ordinarily used only for women. Gommer remained steadfast. He is celebrated in the song "Aenhoert Godt hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 567; Mar. Mir. D 270, E 640; Antw. Arch.-Blad, IX, 6, 11; XIV, 28 f., No. 311; Wolkan, Leider, 63, 72.

Good, a German Mennonite family name, originally Guth (q.v.). Among the pioneers of the Good family in America were Jacob and Christian Good, who immigrated from the Palatinate in the early 18th century and settled in eastern Lancaster Co., Pa. In this region there is both a village named Goodville in the western part of the county near Elizabethtown, and a Good Mennonite Church (MC). Christian Good (1772-1839), grandson of the first Christian, served as minister at Bowmansville, Pa. Jacob Good, son of the first Jacob, moved to the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, where his descendants have been active, including Bishop Daniel (1781-1850) and Bishop Christian (1842-1916). Descendants of both Lancaster and Virginia Goods have moved to Mennonite congregations in Ontario, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. Among the latter were Bishop John S. Good (1811-99) of Page Co., Iowa, Bishop A. C. Good (1881-) of Sterling, Ill., Deacon Sol R. Good of Sterling, Ill., and Bishop Kenneth Good (1910-) of Morton, Ill. Preacher Noah G. Good (1904-) is dean of the Lancaster Mennonite School, I. B. Good (q.v.) was a prominent Lancaster County preacher, and Andrew Good (q.v.) and C. N. Good (1869-) were outstanding elders in the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (UMC).

Some Amish Mennonite Guths who immigrated from Alsace-Lorraine in the 19th century to Illinois and Iowa have retained the spelling Guth. H.S.B.

Good, Andrew, elder and missionary of the Brethren in Christ Church and the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, was born Feb. 6, 1838, in Fairfield Co., Ohio, the son of Samuel and Catherine Good. He taught school several years; musically gifted, he also taught singing school. He married Dinah Hendricks on Oct. 4, 1866. Converted at the age of 20, he entered the ministry of the Brethren in Christ Church in 1870, and transferred to the M.B.C. Church in 1885, continuing his ministry. Though most of his ministerial life was devoted to home missions and evangelistic work, he served as presiding elder in the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church for three years, and pastor for one year. Having lived for a few years in Illinois, the Good family located at New Carlisle, Ohio, in 1882. Their children are Jenny Florence (Mrs. W. J. Huffman), Mary Catherine (Mrs. McHessel), John Wesley, Joseph Hendricks, Lloyd Andrew, and Bertha Elizabeth (Mrs. John Koch). He died at New Carlisle on Oct. 3, 1918. J.A.Hu.

Good, Israel B., an influential minister in the Weaverland district of the Lancaster Conference (MC), born Oct. 2, 1861, in Brecknock Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., and died April 17, 1945, at East Earl, Pa. He taught school for 26 years, beginning at 18 and ultimately serving as a high-school principal at Terre Hill, Pa. Among his pupils were John M. Sauder, later a Mennonite bishop at Weaverland, and the local historian M. G. Weaver of New Holland. On Sept. 8, 1885, he was united in marriage with Hettie Witmer. In 1899, then a man of about 38, he and his wife were baptized into the Weaverland congregation by Martin Rutt (1840-1905), who cared for the Weaverland district for a time following the secession of Bishop Jonas Martin (1839-1925). On Dec. 17, 1903, Israel Good was ordained as a preacher. Although he was not a fluent speaker, especially in his early years, he was a deep thinker and a good teacher. He wielded a tremendous influence in Lancaster County, and held a large number of effective evangelistic meetings (one thousand converts). All through his life he read widely; as an aged man he was still reading both philosophical and theological works. During World War I he was very active in behalf of the Mennonite young men who had been drafted, interviewing Congressman W. W. Greist, General Crowder, and even Secretary of War Baker. He was impatient with some of the new influences which he saw entering the brotherhood during his lifetime such as premillennialism, and frequently made statements which caused some criticism, probably mostly by being misunderstood. He was a fast friend of Bishop Benjamin Weaver (1853-1928), his senior ministerial colleague at Weaverland and Conference moderator. J.C.W.

Good, Solomon R. (1871-1933), a leader in the Illinois Mennonite (MC) Conference, was born at Dale Enterprise, Va., March 3, 1871, the son of Bishop Christian and Anna (Heatwole) Good; died at Sterling, Ill., May 17, 1933; married Jan. 27, 1898, to Martha E. Burkholder (3 children); deacon of the Science Ridge Mennonite (MC) Church 1923-33, he was active in district and general church work. For many years he was a member of the Mennonite Board of Education, and its treasurer for some time. He was also long a member of the General Conference Music Committee, and for some years president of the Illinois Mennonite Mission Board. H.S.B.

Good Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, built its first meetinghouse about 1815 between Falmouth and Elizabethtown, Pa., four miles from the latter, on land given by Melchior Brenneman, who had moved into the community from New Danville. This meetinghouse was replaced by the present church in 1879. Sunday school was opened here by D. N. Gish and S. E. Ebersole in 1890, following a community union effort. In 1953 the membership was 175. Since 1936 the congregation has conducted a mission Sunday school at Cedar Hill and supported the Steelton mission work, opened the same year. Noah W. Risser and Clarence E. Lutz are the bishops in charge, with Ira Z. Miller as minister and Walter W. Ebersole and Joseph H. Nissley as deacons. The congregation operates a summer Bible school at Cedar Hill. I.D.L.

Good Tidings was published monthly by the "Defenseless Mennonite Brethren in Christ of North America" (now Evangelical Mennonite Brethren) at Chicago, Ill., as a 4-page 9 x 12 in. journal from July 1919 to August 1921. In September 1921 it was merged with Zion's Call (q.v.) of the Defenseless Mennonites (now Evangelical Mennonites) to become Zion's Tidings (q.v.). G. P. Schultz was the editor. H.S.B.

Good Tidings, "A Religious Message, published quarterly by the Reformed Mennonite Church for the Disseminating of Spiritual Knowledge," was issued from July 1922 to July 1932 as a 32-page 6½ x 10 in. quarterly. Editors were John K. Ryder to October 1926, Frank E. Eshleman to the end. H.S.B.

Good Works: see Works.

Goodrich Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located at Goodrich, N.D., a congregation of the Central District Conference, was organized with 18 members in 1925 by Ludwig Seibel, who served as the first pastor. Later John Siemens ministered to the church for three years. A church building 28 x 36 ft. was erected and served the congregation for a number of years. Most of the members moved away, and the congregation was dissolved. A.A.D.

Good's Mennonite (MC) Church was established in Clarence Center, N.Y., in 1824 by Mennonites from Lancaster Co., Pa., among them the Leibs, Lehmans, Sherers, Martins. The first minister was Jacob Lapp, who (according to the Hartzler-Kauffman Mennonite Church History) came in 1828. John Martin was the first deacon (according to Cassel's History of the Mennonites, p. 169). In 1831 Jacob Krehbiel, a Mennonite minister, moved in from Germany. He became bishop in 1839. His son Frederick and Abraham Leib were ordained deacons with the growth of the congregation. They soon built a stone church a few miles west of Clarence Center known as the Good's Church. The congregation prospered both by immigration and by accessions. John Lapp (1798-1878) was ordained as minister in 1828 and as bishop about ten years later. Peter Lehman and Abram Lapp were also ordained ministers. Jacob Krehbiel, Jr., became minister at this place in 1872 but withdrew about 1875, becoming affiliated with the General Conference of Mennonites by the time of their 1884 conference. Jacob Hahn became minister in 1866; he was the father of Sarah Lapp, missionary to India. The Herald of Truth in 1872 reported German Sunday school and preaching held every Sunday. John Strickler of the Miller Church near Clarence later identified himself with this flock. Following the active years of Bishop John Lapp the church dwindled, and with the loss of the Krehbiel followers became very weak. The Ontario Conference supplied the ministers for a number of years until about 1920. New families moving in from various states gave rise to a revived congregation in a more easterly location (see Clarence Center). The Good cemetery is still the burying grounds for the Clarence Center congregation. J.C.F.

Goodville (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC) was organized in 1900 by a number of retired Mennonite farmers as a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. It is located in the strong Weaverland (q.v.) district of the beautiful fertile Weaverland Valley on Route 23. The first meetinghouse was greatly enlarged in 1924. In 1953 the total church membership was 113 with A. G. Martin as minister and J. Paul Graybill as bishop. An outstation summer Bible school was held at Bender's Church near Bangor in 1952. I.D.L.

Goodville Mutual Casualty Company, a mutual automobile insurance agency, was incorporated Jan. 4, 1926, with head office at Goodville, Lancaster Co., Pa. It is in effect a Mennonite organization, all its officers and 12 of its 15 directors being Mennonites and 85 per cent of the 18,000 policyholders being Mennonites. It also serves related groups, in addition to cases assigned to it by the State of Pennsylvania. It area is Pennsylvania and Virginia. It is closely related to Mennonite Mutual Aid, Inc., of Goshen, Ind., an agency under the Mennonite General Conference (MC). It paid approximately $200,000 of losses in 1954.

The company's motto is "Insurance at Cost." It returns the unused portion of premiums to the policyholder at the end of the policy year. This is determined by taking the losses, expenses, and reserves off the premiums collected. The percentage of dividend is then determined. The average dividend is 35 per cent. H.S.B.

Goor, a town (pop. 4,996) in the Dutch province of Overijssel, with 16 Mennonites, was formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. In early times Anabaptists were found here; in 1544 Davidjorists (q.v.) were said to be living here (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 242). Later on most of the Mennonites were weavers of the Old Flemish wing. The congregation of Goor apparently was a part of the Twenthe (q.v.) congregation. Prominent members (deacons?) at Goor in 1610 were Arend ten Cate, Andries Ollenvanger, Hindrik Willemsen, and Willem Hermans. In 1728 the Mennonites living in this town belonged to the congregation of near-by Hengelo (q.v.). Whether there was an independent congregation in the course of the 18th century or not, is not clear; in any case it was dissolved by 1787, when a few remaining Mennonites joined the Hengelo congregation. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 224; II, 58-60; G. Heeringa, Uit het Verleden der Doopsgez. in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 132, 134.

Goos was the name of a Mennonite family which played a significant role in the Friedrichstadt and Hamburg Mennonite congregations in Germany. Abraham Goos and his son Isaak (1696-1769) were deacons of the Mennonite church at Friedrichstadt. Another Isaak Goos studied theology and served as the minister of the Mennonite church (1798-1845) of Hamburg, under whom the change from the Dutch language in worship services to the German took place. His son Berend (1815-85) was a well-known artist in Hamburg. C.K.

R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930).

Goossen (Gosen, Gossen, Gooss), a Mennonite family found in West Prussia. Near Doornik in Belgium a hatmaker Goossen died for his faith in 1558. Four decades later, Sept. 30, 1598, an Abraham Gooss of the Netherlands entered the preparatory school of the Elbing Gymnasium. In 1658 a Heinrich Goossen was living in Elbing. As early as 1621 a Gert Gosen was one of a number of Mennonites living in Beyershorst in the very low Scharpau in the Gross-Werder.

In the Elbing and Danzig congregations, as well as in several Gross-Werder congregations there were once members with this name. In 1789 the Gosens were listed in the Mennonite directory, a number of whom emigrated to Russia; just before World War II there were no Gosens left. This name was transplanted from Prussia and Russia to the United States (e.g., Beatrice, Neb.) and Canada. H.P.

G. E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940).

Goossen, Helena, b. 1889 at Nicolaifeld, Russia, came in 1911 as a nurse to the Dutch Mennonite mission field in Java (q.v.). She soon became matron of the hospital at Margaredjo, which office she held until 1922, when she married the medical missionary K. P. C. A. Gramberg (q.v.), the director of the entire medical service. At that time the Grambergs lived at Kelet, the site of the principal hospital. Mrs. Gramberg excellently assisted her husband and the medical provision became exemplary; another hospital at Tajoe and a number of polyclinics in the neighborhood were opened and the number of patients rapidly increased. In March 1942, when the Japanese occupied the Dutch East Indies, a trying time began for the mission field. The medical care came to a standstill in August 1943, when the Gramberg family was interned; Helena Gramberg-Goossen died in the camp on Aug. 23, 1945. The Grambergs not only took care of the medical work, but also participated in the spiritual work. So they took part in organizing the Javanese Christians into 10 independent Mennonite congregations (1940). vdZ.

Goossen de Hoedemaecker (hatter), an Anabaptist martyr, was taken prisoner with five brethren during a service in the Obignies Forest near Doornik, Belgium. They were all sentenced to death and burned at the stake in Obignies in 1558 (see Egbert; Mart. Mir. D 203, E 584; ML II, 136). vdZ.

Goossen (Gosen) of Winterswijk, a Dutch Anabaptist leader, is identical with Jacob van Antwerpen (q.v.).

Goot, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally of Akkrum, province of Friesland. Here (1) Jacob Synnes (1703-65), a butter merchant, was a (untrained and unsalaried) preacher of the Mennonite congregation. His son (2) Synne (1740-1818) in 1811 adopted the family name of van der Goot. Sons of Synne were (3) Jacob (1769-1844) and (4) Hidde (1771-1840), both butter merchants like their father and grandfather, and both deacons of the Akkrum congregation. (5) Sine Hiddes van der Goot (1799-1889), son of Hidde (4), was minister of the congregations of Workum 1825-27, Warga 1827-33, Blokzijl 1833-39, and Berlikum 1839-71.

Two sons of Jacob (3), viz., (6) Gerben and (7) Pieter van der Goot in 1806 moved to Westzaan, province of North Holland, where their father had bought an oil mill, but in 1813 they returned to Friesland to hide in order to avoid military service. In 1814 they returned to North Holland and lived at Zaandam. A son of Pieter v.d. Goot (7) was (8) Pastor Pieter v.d. Goot (q.v.).

(9) Arnold Hiddes van der Goot (1863-1945), a grandson of Sine (Synne) Hiddes (2), was a Mennonite pastor serving the churches of Giethoorn 1889-92, and Middelie 1892-1930. His son (10) Benjamin van der Goot (b. 1893) was also a Mennonite pastor, serving at Zijpe 1919-24 and Borne 1930-39. vdZ.

Goot, Pieter van der, b. 1817 at Zaandam, Mennonite preacher at Wormer and Jisp 1841-42, Rotterdam 1842-51, and at Amsterdam 1871-75, where he died in 1877. In Rotterdam he was closely associated with the Dutch Mission Society (founded in 1797) and especially with J. van Oosterzee, one of the best-known Reformed preachers of the time. His interest in mission work, which was later shown in his service as secretary of the Mennonite Mission Society founded in 1847, was aroused here and his spirit, which found no satisfaction in the current hyperrationalism, was completely at home here. When he came to Amsterdam the Reveil movement had already passed its prime, but he felt its influence, and many of its leaders, especially da Costa, were often among his audiences. He was a man of warm eloquence, not a strict dogmatician, but rather pietistically inclined. His colleague A. Loosjes, who delivered his funeral sermon (Amsterdam, 1877), especially praised van der Goot's delivery, which was borne by a spirit of warm love that moved his hearers. "The love of Christ constrained him." The memory of his personality is still alive in the Amsterdam congregation, which he served for 24 years. He lamented the critical trend of liberalism which at that time exerted a profound influence on the Dutch brotherhood.

As secretary of the Mennonite Mission Society van der Goot was able to stir up interest in its cause when such interest was as yet quite feeble. He lived with the missionaries, prayed for them in public services, and kept them in his home when they were on furlough. His appeal also reached the Mennonites of other countries, especially Germany and Russia (Menn. Bl., 1854, 46; 1855, 1; 1862, 3; 1865, 6). The mission work in Java and Sumatra owes much to him.

He was also deeply interested in home missions. At this time the Zetten institutions were just being established by O. G. Heldring. Van der Goot was a member of the Amsterdam committee that supported this work. He was also an outstanding philanthropist, deeply moved by the lot of the poor; and with the support of wealthy friends he assisted whenever he was able.

All these activities consumed van der Goot's strength. In the prime of life, at the age of 58 years, he was compelled to resign, and in two years he died. The only writings he left were Geloofsbeproeving en Geloofskracht bij Christelijke martelaressen (Amsterdam, 1858, and Opwekkingsrede bij het verslag van de 35ste Openlijke Vergadering der afdeeling Rotterdam van het Ned. Bijbelgenootschap, 18. Oct. 1849 (Rotterdam, 1849). His plan to publish a book of Pastorale Herinneringen was unfortunately never carried out. A.Ku.

Biogr. Wb. III, 306; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 265-68; DB 1878, 132; 1886, 73 f.; 1895, 128; 1898, 51; 1901, 21, 26; ML II, 136.

Gorinchem (or Gorkum), a city on the Merwede in the Dutch province of South Holland, pop. (1947) 15,321, 34 Mennonites, was an Anabaptist center about 1538, and later the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 56 persons there in 1563-65. The congregation later joined the Flemish group; Jacob van der Heyde Sebrechts and Jan Jansz van de Kruysen from here signed the Dordrecht Confession in 1632. In 1649 it was represented at the conference of the Flemish at Haarlem. Soon after, the congregation, which was a very small one, had no preacher of its own. It was for more than 40 years served by preachers of other Flemish congregations, especially of Utrecht. The congregation of Gorinchem is not mentioned in the first Naamlijst of 1731; hence it must have died out before this year.

Since 1948 there has been a Mennonite circle at Gorinchem, now 21 members, in charge of the congregation of Dordrecht. Together with the Remonstrant group some services are conducted (7-10 each year) in the city orphanage. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 93, 200, 207, 215; DB 1863, 96, 102; 1917, 122, Nos. 155-58; ML II, 136.) W.Ko., vdZ.

Goris, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Antwerp in 1560: see Joris Leerse.

Goris (Joris) Cooman, an Anabaptist martyr, of Lier in Brabant, Belgium, was burned at the stake on April 11, 1551, at Antwerp, with Naentken (Bornaige), Grietgen (Margriete van den Berghe), and Wouter (van der Weyden). These martyrs are celebrated in a hymn, "Doemen vijftienhondert schreve, daertoe een en vijftich jaer," found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 4). vdZ.

Offer, 516-21; Mart. Mir. D 106, E 503; Verheyden, Gent, 13, No. 21; Wolkan, Lieder, 61.

Gorkoya Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the province of Akmolinsk in the vicinity of Omsk, Siberia, was organized in 1903 as a subsidiary of the Tchunaevka Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). Jakob Friesen was the leading minister. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 444-45.) C.K.

Gorkoye: see Friesenov and Gorkoye.

Gorkum (Gorcum): see Gorinchem.

Gormley United Missionary Church, an appointment of the Ontario conference, located at Gormley, Ont., was organized about 1878. The present church was built in 1931 and the parsonage in 1953. Pastors have been A. T. Gooding 1929-34, H.

Shantz 1934-38, I. B. Brubacher 1938-42, W. M. Shantz 1942-43, F. G. Huson 1943-47, P. R. Barley 1947-49, L. K. Sider 1949-52, and C. E. Hunking 1952- . The membership in 1954 was 90. E.R.S.

Gorredijk, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, seat of a Mennonite congregation, which already before 1700 had united with a congregation at Lippenhuizen (q.v.), so that they are always referred to as the Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen congregation. The congregation had two meetinghouses, one in Gorredijk, and the other in Lippenhuizen. The latter was in use until September 1947 and was then sold. Gorredijk acquired a new church in 1940, dedicated April 7.

The origin and early history of the congregation is unknown. Very likely the Mennonite congregation at Gorredijk came into being during the 17th century. The Mennonite settlement at Lippenhuizen may have had its origin in the 16th century. The definite existence of a combined congregation of Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen in 1686 is proved by an entry in the church archives. But there are no records before 1739, with the exception of a few contracts of purchase. From 1739 the records have been preserved, and from 1748 the names of the preachers and members. In July 1711 a number of Swiss Mennonite refugees from the Emmental, Switzerland, a total of 18 persons, with the aid of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs, were located near Gorredijk, but they did not feel at home here, and in May 1712 they moved to Kampen (q.v.). But the Swiss Mennonites living here were Amish and the Gorredijk Swiss brethren were Mennonites (Rheydtvolk, i.e., followers of Hans Reist q.v.). The latter group in the fall of 1713 emigrated to the Palatinate.

In 1748 the congregation numbered 110 members, in 1838, 118, in 1861, 195, reaching its highest membership of 210 in 1882, then decreasing; in 1900, 166, in 1953, 165.

Not all the members live in Gorredijk; some are scattered over several villages in the southeast of the province of Friesland. A few years ago the members living in Oosterwolde (q.v.) organized a Mennonite circle (Kring).

The last untrained preachers of this congregation were Pieter Ymes, who in 1810 assumed the family name of van der Woude, a farmer at Lippenhuizen, serving 1782-1805, and Dirk Gerbens Visser 1806-24. During the last decades the congregation was served by the following ministers: J. G. Appeldoorn 1889-1904, J. Koster 1905-9, C. C. de Maar 1910-15, G. A. Hulshoff 1916-27, Miss C. Boerlage 1928-33, A. F. L. van Dijk 1936-38, Miss W. C. Jolles 1938-49, and J. G. van der Bend 1951-56. The pulpit is now vacant.

The congregation owes much to Eesge Ubeles Veenland and Pieter Ymes Veenland, who were treasurer (1868-1915) and president (1915-) of the church board respectively. Church activities include a youth group, children's club, ladies' circles. G.A.H., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1868 f., 1872, 1881-83; DB 1861, 133 f.; 1906, 95; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 189, 200, 247, 254, 306; ML II, 137.

Gortchakovo Mennonite Brethren Church near Davlekanovo, province of Ufa, Russia, was founded in the year 1898. Its first leader and cofounder was Wilhelm Baerg of Karanbash. The first ordination, involving two ministers, Heinrich K. Siemens and Heinrich Thiessen, and presided over by Elder De-Fehr of Orenburg, took place in 1907. Baerg soon after this resigned from the leadership and Johann Heinrichs was elected leader. When Heinrichs moved to Siberia in 1909, Jacob J. Martens, superintendent of the Armenschule at Berezovka, became leader. After Martens' death in 1922 Heinrich K. Siemens took over. In 1925 Siemens emigrated to Canada and settled in Gem, Alberta. After that the leadership went to G. G. Friesen. During his administration the second and last ordination of ministers of this church took place on Dec. 2, 1927, when H. B. Friesen and H. H. Siemens, son of H. K. Siemens, were ordained. About this time all preachers were disfranchised by the Soviets. H. B. Friesen and H. H. Siemens fled. Friesen found his way to Paraguay, while Siemens managed to join his parents in Canada. The last minister of the Gortchakovo Mennonite Brethren Church was P. Dück, who died in 1932.

In the course of its development this church had branched out into the neighboring localities: Karanbash, Berezovka, Davlekanovo, and Yurmakay. All of them, with the exception of Yurmakay, had their ministers and meetinghouses. Membership of the combined churches grew to approximately 300 souls. Each local church had representatives in the Vorberat (preliminary council). Matters of lesser importance were settled by the local church, while questions of wider range were brought before the Vorberat and the Hauptversammlung (general assembly). Local churches had the following preachers: Gortchakovo—G. Friesen, Sen., B. Friesen, Johann Heinrichs, H. K. Siemens, G. G. Friesen, Jun., H. B. Friesen, and H. H. Siemens; Berezovka—Jacob J. Martens, David Thiessen, J. Isaak, and P. Dück; Karanbash—Wilhelm Baerg and Gerhard Wiens; Davlekanovo—K. G. Neufeld, Heinrich Thiessen, Peter Thielmann, Jacob Friesen, and David Isaak. (ML II, 138.) J.P.R.

Gorter, a common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. Not all the bearers of this name are related. Foeke Wiglers Gorter (q.v.) was, e.g., not of the same family as Simon Gorter (q.v.) and his descendants. A large number of Gorters have been Mennonite preachers. The first one mentioned is Tys Oenes Gorter (1670-?), a preacher at Alkmaar (DB 1891, 5, 8). Feiko Wybes Gorter served as a preacher in the congregation at Stavoren in the first quarter of the 18th century. Jan Gorter was the preacher at Bolsward from 1761 to about 1788.

Klaas Oenes Gorter, not a preacher, was treasurer of the Friese Sociëteit from 1788 to 1805, in which year he died. K. Tigler dedicated a Funeral Song (Grafdicht) to him (DB 1895, 30).

A number of preachers of this name were descendants of Simon Gorter (1778-1862, q.v.), who lived in the Zaan district (Dutch province of North Holland) as had his ancestors. Two of his sons, Douwe Simons and Klaas Simons, a grandson Simon Gorter (son of Douwe), a great-grandson Klaas Gorter (1849-89, minister at Borne 1875-79, Zijpe 1879-85, and Hoorn 1885-89), and two great-great-grandsons, S. H. N. Gorter and Klaas Gorter (b. 1911 at Uithuizermeeden, minister at Ternaard 1937-39, Texel 1939-41, Groningen 1941-45, naval chaplain 1945-47, Hengelo since 1948) are Mennonite pastors. (ML II, 137.) K.V., vdZ.

Gorter, Douwe Simons, the son of Simon Gorter (q.v.) and Tiete van der Zee, was born at Hindelopen on Aug. 3, 1811. In 1834 he was called as Mennonite minister to Stavoren and Warns, in 1854 to Balk, the first trained minister of that congregation, died there on Aug. 27, 1876. He was married to Tryntjen Koopmans. He was the author of the following books: Onderzoek naar het kenmerkend beginsel der Doopsgezinden (1850); Brief aan J. Visscher over de waardeering van den kinderdoop (1851); De Christelyke Doop (1854); Vruchten van onderzoek en strijd (1874). He was one of the most erudite preachers of his time. He was also the editor of the Doopsgezinde Lectuur (q.v.) (1854, 1856, and 1858), to which he contributed many articles, including a study on the martyr Hans van Overdam. K.V.

Biogr. Wb. III, 310 f.; DB 1901, 23 ff., 145; Catalogus Amst., 304-7, 310, 327; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 202, 213; ML II, 137.

Gorter, Foeke Wiglers, one of the last untrained Mennonite ministers (leekeprekers) in the Netherlands, became preacher at Knijpe in 1783 and in Sappemeer on Feb. 14, 1790. Here he died on May 8, 1836. In 1790 he served as one of the four commissars who supported Wolter ten Cate as manager of the Groninger Sociëteit of the Old Flemish, and after the death of ten Cate (in 1796) he became the manager. He wrote several booklets of religious instruction. K.V.

Biogr. Wb. III, 311; Catalogus Amst., 233, 265, 325; ML II, 137.

Gorter, Klaas Simons, a brother of Douwe Simons Gorter (q.v.), b. May 19, 1822, at Oosternielend near Zijldijk, became preacher at Den Ilp in 1850, and the first trained preacher at Ameland in 1852. Two years later he managed to bring about a union between the two congregations on this island. He worked here at Hollum until 1895, and died on June 25, 1901. He was married to Tryntje Kat. He published an important study of the Mennonites on Ameland in DB 1889-90. (ML II, 137.) K.V.

Gorter, Simon, b. March 16, 1778, at Westzaan, Dutch province of North Holland. The family had lived at Westzaan since the time of his great-grandfather Jan Gorter, b. March 13, 1669, whose son Jans, b. Sept. 4, 1705, and grandson, b. Feb. 15, 1741, had been living at Westzaan. He was at first a miller's aid and was educated for the ministry in his evening hours by Gerbrandt Valter. Shortly after the mill known as "De Ruiter" burned down, including all his equipment, he was called as minister of the Zonist congregation at Joure, delivering his first sermon on Sept. 6, 1808. Here he married Tiete van der Zee. He was a man of enormous figure. In 1808 he moved to Hindelopen at Molkwerum, and in 1813 to Zijldijk. He is the progenitor of the numerous Gorters in the province of Groningen. On Sept. 7, 1851, he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ministry. Through his zealous efforts the congregations of Huizinge, Leermens-Loppersum, and den Hoorn were kept alive and at the last-named place a parsonage was built. In addition he was the founder (1835) and the first chairman of the Groningen fund (q.v.) for ministers' widows. On July 6, 1856, he retired and on Sept. 11, 1862, he died. His son Douwe Gorter (d. March 17, 1921) was a pillar of the small Zijldijk (q.v.) congregation, which he served many years as deacon and treasurer. The sons of Douwe Gorter were also deacons at Zijldijk. (DB 1864, 170 f.; ML II, 137.) K.V.

Gorter, Simon, b. 1838 at Warns, became the minister at Aalsmeer in 1861 and at Wormerveer in 1863. Because of a long ailment from which he had been suffering for some time, he retired with his family to Arcachon (France) in 1864-66. His excellent articles in the periodical De Gids gave him great fame as an author. In 1869 he was compelled by his health to resign from his office, after which he became the editor of the newly founded Amsterdam daily newspaper Het Nieuws van den Dag. Here he published a series of excellent editorials which were published after his death in a book, Een Jaar levens voor de Dagbladpers (1872). De Hoop Scheffer published his articles in the Gids in a booklet Letterkundige studien, as well as several sermons under the title, Ik geloof, daarom spreek ik. He died June 5, 1871. His wife Johanna Lugt died in 1924. (Biogr. Wb. III, 312 f.; Catalogus Amst., 315; ML II, 137.) K.V.

Gorter, Simon Henri Nicolaas, b. June 25, 1885, at Hoorn, son of Pastor Klaas Gorter and a descendant of an old family of Mennonite preachers, studied at the University of Amsterdam and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam. He served the congregation of Zijldijk 1910-12, Twisk 1912-14, Sappemeer 1914-16, Rotterdam 1916-46, and Apeldoorn 1946-51. Gorter was a well-known Dutch Mennonite leader, a member of the A.D.S. (General Conference), editor of the Doopsgezinde Jaarboekje (q.v.) 1932-43, and of the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad 1946-50. He was a popular radio speaker. During a number of years he was a coeditor with C. E. Hooykaas, a Remonstrant preacher of Rotterdam, of De Stroom, a religious liberal weekly. He was a delegate at the Mennonite world conferences held at Basel 1925, Danzig 1930, and Amsterdam 1936.

His name is gratefully remembered among hundreds of Mennonite emigrants who passed from Russia via Rotterdam to Canada and Brazil in 1928 and following years when he was president of the Hollandsch Doopsgezind Emigranten Bureau (q.v.). Besides reports published in the records of the Mennonite world conferences of 1930 and 1936, and a large number of articles in various issues of the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje, Zondagsbode, and Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad, he published Waarom zijn wij nog Doopsgezind (Rotterdam, 1921); Doopsgezinde Emigratie (1934); Medewerkers, a farewell sermon, Rotterdam, 1946); Levende Steenen, a sermon preached at Apeldoorn in 1946 to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the congregation; Langs de Vloedlijn (sermons, Zeist, 1941), Voor de Oude Dag, a volume of addresses given on the V.P.R.O. broadcast (Amsterdam, n.d., 1953); and Waarom zijn wij Doopsgezind, issued by the A.D.S. in 1954. vdZ.

Gortner Union Church, a congregation in Garrett Co., Md., was organized in the spring of 1893 by the people of the Gortner community. They had a Sunday-school attendance of approximately 40, and some preaching appointments in the schoolhouse by United Brethren and Mennonite (MC) ministers.

In 1898 the Gortner Union Church was built (26 x 42 ft.). Labor and material were donated, and the building was completed at a cash cost of approximately $600, and dedicated Oct. 16, 1898, three different denominations taking part. In the forenoon, D. H. Bender conducted Mennonite services; afternoon, Tobias Fike, German Baptist; and evening, Franklin M. Glenn, United Brethren. During the first year several denominations conducted revivals. S. G. Shetler conducted the first revival by the Mennonites in 1899. The church was remodeled in 1937. In 1954 it had a membership of 17 Mennonites, with D. L. Swartzendruber as pastor. D.L.S.

Görz, Franz, an elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church, Molotschna, South Russia. He was ordained as elder in Prussia in 1819 and when the Rudnerweide church was organized in 1820 he became its first elder. He died in 1835. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 706.) C.K.

Göschl, Dr. Martin, one of the notable personalities of Moravia in the early years of the Reformation, provost (from 1524) of the Himmelsrose Nunnery at Kanitz, Coadjutor Bishop of Olomuce (from 1509), who joined the Reformation in 1525. In the spring of 1526 he moved to Nikolsburg, having been forced to surrender the ecclesiastical property and income, which he had tried to retain. He supported the reform efforts of Baron Johann Dubzansky, who had called the synod of March 11, 1526, at Austerlitz, of which Oswald Glait (q.v.) wrote a report.

Göschl gave vigorous support to Balthasar Hubmaier when the latter arrived at Nikolsburg later in 1526, who then dedicated two tracts to him. In the foreword he declared Göschl to be the only bishop concerning whom he knew that he had "so manfully and bravely yielded himself to God and His holy Word in this world." The second pamphlet was written at Göschl's express request. It was to be a "catechism or summary" of those articles in which the youth were to be instructed. Göschl participated in person in the disputation held at Nikolsburg between Hubmaier and Hans Hut (q.v.) and his followers in 1527, hoping to eradicate the dissension that was developing among the Anabaptists. Göschl is reported to have threatened to deliver Hut to King Ferdinand (q.v.) because Hut had wanted to create disturbance in Nikolsburg; this information caused Hut to flee from Nikolsburg.

According to the Hutterite Chronicles Göschl died in the tower at Kremsier as a martyr to his convictions regarding "the Christian faith and baptism," but he can scarcely be reckoned as a real Anabaptist. He was too much interested in material finances to follow Hubmaier's teaching on the "crucifixion of the flesh." He was imprisoned in 1528. LOSERTH, H.S.B.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 55; J. Loserth, "Bilder aus der Reformationszeit in Mähren: Dr. Martin Göschl," in Ztscht d. Ver. f. Gesch. Mährens und Schlesiens I, 65 ff.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 51; ML II, 138 f.

Gosen Heymans, an Anabaptist martyr, native of Bunschoten, Dutch province of North Holland, had attended a Mennonite meeting in the home of Steven Pietersz (q.v.) at Amersfoort. Later he was also at a meeting in the house of Reyer Rutgersz at Bunschoten. For this he was arrested with his brother Jacob (q.v.) on Sept. 20, 1568, and beheaded at Utrecht on July 5, 1569. Whether he was a member of the church cannot be ascertained. vdZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, Onze Martelaren, in Ned. Arch. v. Kerkgesch. (n.s. I, 1902) 82 ff.; Gosen is listed here as No. 87.

Goshen, Ind. (pop. 13,000), county seat of Elkhart County, founded in 1831, the seat of five Mennonite churches with a total membership of over 1,600, and shopping center for an area including at least 3,000 more Mennonite and Amish members, hub of a larger area of 20-mile radius with over 11,000 members.

The first Mennonite congregation in the city was the Brenneman Memorial (UMC, 1885), the second the College Mennonite (MC, 1904), the third the Eighth Street (GCM, 1920), followed by North Goshen (MC, 1935) and East Goshen (MC, 1948). Goshen College (MC) was established here in 1903, the Bethany Christian High School (MC) one mile south in 1954. The headquarters of Mennonite Mutual Aid (MC) and Mennonite Aid, Inc. (MC), has been in Goshen since 1947. Here are also located the Mennonite Research Foundation (since 1947), the Mennonite Historical Society (since 1925), the Archives of the Mennonite (MC) Church (since 1940), the Mennonite Quarterly Review (since 1927), and the Gospel Book Store (MC), one of the retail stores of the Mennonite Publishing House of Scottdale. See articles on all the above organizations and institutions. H.S.B.

Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., founded in 1903, was a continuation of the Elkhart Institute (q.v.). To induce the school to move to Goshen, the city pledged ten thousand dollars, provided the Board would name the institution "Goshen College" and purchase certain plots in the southern part of the city for a campus. Building operations began in a wheat field at the end of South Eighth Street in June 1903. East Hall, the first campus building, completed in September, served as women's dormitory, dining hall, and lecture rooms until the completion of the administration building in January 1904.

N. E. Byers (M.A. Harvard, 1903), principal of the Elkhart Institute (1898-1903), continued as president of the new Goshen College and C. Henry Smith as librarian and instructor in history, English, and debating, and later as the first dean of the College. Byers served not only as chief administrative officer but also at first as academic dean, registrar, personnel dean, and religious counselor.

Until 1905 the governing body of the College was a self-perpetuating board, but in 1905 ownership of the property was transferred to the Mennonite Board of Education (q.v.), whose members are the elected representatives of the district conferences, Mennonite General Conference, and the alumni associations of the Board's schools. The Board was incorporated in Indiana on Jan. 27, 1906.

When the school moved to Goshen in 1903 the curriculum included junior college, academy, normal school, Bible school, school of business, school of music, school of oratory, summer school, and Bible correspondence department. The college enrollment was less than 20, academy about 60, and the total enrollment in all departments 210. The four-year college course was offered for the first time in 1909 and the first A.B. degree graduates completed the course in 1910. By 1913 college students outnumbered those in the academy, but in 1922 college enrollment was only four times as large as that of the academy. The latter was discontinued after 1933 as an organized department.

In 1913 President N. E. Byers, 1903-13, Dean C. Henry Smith, and Prof. B. D. Smucker resigned to accept positions in the newly reorganized Bluffton College. J. E. Hartzler was elected president to succeed Byers, serving 1913-18. Seconded by J. S. Hartzler, the new president embarked on a program of expansion by purchasing and equipping a farm for agricultural courses and building Science Hall. In January 1918, a heavy debt having accumulated, both J. E. Hartzler and J. S. Hartzler resigned because of the financial difficulties of the school. George J. Lapp, missionary on furlough from India, succeeded J. E. Hartzler as president 1918-20 and the college property was mortgaged to satisfy the creditors. I. R. Detweiler, assisted by G. L. Bender, collected more than $120,000 to meet the more immediate obligations of the Board and the College. In 1919 H. F. Reist succeeded Lapp and early in 1920 secured the accreditation of the College by the State of Indiana. When Reist's health failed in February 1920 the Board elected Detweiler acting president, who served 1920-22. By this time the College was recovering from the effects of World War I, student enrollment was increasing, the financial condition of the College was improving, the curriculum was being expanded, and extracurricular activities reached a high peak of student interest. But the College was still laboring under the burden imposed by various critical charges leveled at the College administrators in the earlier years, and I. R. Detweiler, the acting president, failed to gain the necessary confidence.

When the Board in 1922 elected Daniel Kauffman president, many students and a few faculty members left the institution. At the end of the year 1922-23 the Board, fearing that the next year's student body would be very small and wishing to take time for reorganization, closed the College for one year.

In 1923 the Board elected its president, S. C. Yoder, to serve as president of the College, and continued him in the office 1923-40. The College reopened in September 1924 with Noah Oyer, former dean of Hesston College, as dean, C. L. Graber business manager, and a faculty including only three former faculty members of the institution. Dean Noah Oyer rebuilt the prestige of the College and determined to carry out the Board's earlier directive to build up a strong liberal arts college and a central graduate Bible school. After Oyer's untimely death in 1931 H. S. Bender was elected acting dean and in 1932 as dean. He and Silas Hertzler, registrar and director of teacher training, continued efforts toward accreditation. But always there loomed the apparent impossibility of raising the necessary $500,000 endowment, a prerequisite to admission into the N.C.A. Finally as a result of the depression of the early thirties when endowments no longer were a reliable guarantee of steady income and the N.C.A. made stable income instead of an absolute endowment figure the norm for N.C.A. membership, Dean Bender began a campaign for admission into the North Central Association with the strong support of President Yoder and the faculty.

Other achievements of President Yoder's administration were a gradual winning of the confidence of the constituency, resulting in growth of the student body and in contributions for college expenses and a building program—a large program for that day. With the help of Mennonite Educational Finance, Inc., the Mennonite Board of Education erected John S. Coffman Hall (1929), a dormitory for men; rebuilt Kulp Hall (1930), and erected the Health Center (1939) and the Memorial Library (1940). When President Yoder resigned, he was succeeded in June 1940 by Ernest E. Miller, who served until August 1954.

The president of the College since Aug. 9, 1954, is Paul Mininger (B.D., M.R.E., Ph.D.), a 1934 graduate of Goshen College, past moderator of the Mennonite General Conference (1951-53).

The College was granted membership in the N.C.A. in March 1941. Full-time student enrollment rose from 326 in 1939-40 to 636 in 1948-49 (680 in 1956-57). New buildings, including the annex to Coffman Hall, the College Union Auditorium-Gymnasium, and Westlawn Residence Hall for Women, were erected at a cost of more than $850,000. The campus added about 27 acres and some valuable building lots between 1940 and 1953, and in 1954 the Board added a farm of 77 acres adjoining the campus. In 1954 a further donation of 20 acres of a lake-woods area in Southern Michigan increased the college holdings to 170 acres.

The College furnished significant leadership to other peace colleges in postwar rehabilitation and relief efforts. The president helped to organize the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges and served for four years as its first president. He also furnished leadership and support in the foreign student exchange program, both in bringing foreign students to study in Mennonite colleges in America and in arranging for Mennonite students to study and travel abroad.

Very significant in this period was the expansion of the curriculum. The years since 1944 witnessed the development of a graduate Biblical Seminary (q.v.), an accredited School of Nursing (q.v.), and the accreditation of the program of teacher education by the American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education. The faculty increased greatly both in number and quality of advanced training. The personnel services of the College were rated superior by the AACTE examiners in 1954. With the growth of the College a system of counseling was developed that furnished intimate personal guidance to the student in campus adjustments, curricular problems, and religious life. A strong campus religious program was developed with emphasis on the Mennonite heritage.

Equally outstanding as its work in the professional field as a Mennonite educational institution was the leadership that the College rendered during the past quarter century in serving the church through research, publication, and the promotion of various types of conferences, such as nonconformity, evangelism, Christian life, foreign missions, and peace. Members of the faculty reorganized the Mennonite Historical Society in 1925 and founded the Mennonite Quarterly Review in 1927, recognized among scholars as one of the outstanding religious historical magazines in the United States. The Society is publishing a series of monographs under the general title Studies in Anabaptist and Mennonite History. It is also active in building a Mennonite Historical Library of over 12,000 volumes and a serial list of over 200 current publications. Members of the faculty are receiving recognition in the councils of the Mennonite Church (MC), where they are asked to accept positions of major influence and responsibility. A spirit of evangelical Christianity and Christian discipleship on the campus is growing in fervor and intensity.

Over 10,200 students have matriculated in Goshen College and the Elkhart Institute since the founding of the latter in 1894. Because Goshen for many years was the only accredited four-year liberal arts college in the Mennonite Church (MC), students have registered from every section of the United States and Canada and from many foreign countries. Alumni of the College and the seminary are serving in many walks of life and in most of the major areas of the world, their principal fields of service being teaching, preaching, church work, relief work, nursing, medicine, and rural life.

Of the 59 members of the instructional staff in 1954, 26 had a doctor's degree. Of the others only three had less than a master's degree. Eleven had been instructors in the College for more than 25 years, four for 30 years or more. In addition to doctoral dissertations ten members of the faculty had produced 30 major books and numerous pamphlets besides contributing scholarly articles to a variety of magazines in the fields of history, religion, and folklore. Twenty-nine faculty members have studied, lived, or traveled in foreign countries and had been engaged in foreign relief, rehabilitation, and missionary service for periods of one to three years. Dean Carl Kreider was on a four-year leave of absence as dean of the college of liberal arts of International Christian University in Japan.

In a statement adopted on May 5, 1949, the faculty presented its "Concept of Christian Education." This pronouncement says in part: "The guiding principle in determining the values which the faculty considers worth striving for in personal and group living is the concept that the essence of Christianity, as set forth in the Scriptures, is discipleship, the transforming of the whole life after Christ. This Christian discipleship is to be expressed in human relations, in the use of time, energy, material resources, and in devotion to the church and its mission. . . .

"The whole of life is lived in the context of commitment to the will of God; and therefore, every activity, whether work, recreation, social fellowship, prayer, or meditation, has spiritual significance. The highest expression of faith in Christ, who is the way, the truth, and the life, will be found in loving, sacrificial service to one's fellow men. . . . The entire program of Goshen College is planned to help students to know Christ as Saviour and Lord and to become effective witnesses for Him." . . .

The contribution and influence of Goshen College and the Biblical Seminary not only in the field of Mennonite higher education in America, not only in its own direct constituency in the Mennonite Church (MC) but in the Mennonite brotherhood as a whole, has been oustanding in character and far-reaching in effect. It has been without doubt a major influence in directing the course of the life and service of the Mennonite Church into progressive evangelical channels. By its conservative course, its clear theological line, and its staunch Mennonitism, it has done much to mold the thought and action of the brotherhood. It has aided in a strong revival of the historical Anabaptist heritage, and in a strengthening of the nonresistant peace witness. It has been a strong center of missionary spirit and has furnished a large number of the missionaries of the church, as well as leaders in all fields of the church's ministry. (†ME I) J.S.U.

Elkhart Institute Memorial (Goshen, 1904); Fiftieth Anniversary Addresses—Goshen College 1895-1945 (1945); Goshen College Bulletin (1903-), contains Alumni News Letter, President's Annual Report, annual Catalog, and Golden Anniversary Alumni Directory (1951); Goshen College Record 1903- ; The Maple Leaf 1915- ; "Report of Annual Meeting of Mennonite Board of Education" in Herald of Truth, 1903-8, and Gospel Herald, 1908- ; J. S. Umble, Goshen College 1894-1954 (Goshen, 1954).

Goshen College Academy (1894-1935). The Goshen College Academy (MC) had its beginning in the Academic Department of the Elkhart (Ind.) Institute, which offered its first diploma in 1898, and which was continued when the Institute moved to Goshen in 1903 and was called Goshen College. The name "academy" was first used in 1905-6 (academy was commonly used for private high schools). The Goshen College Academy was a standard high school as was common in those days. Although the Junior College was added in 1903-4 and Senior College in 1908-9, the Academy remained the largest department in enrollment until 1913-14, when it was outdistanced by the College. The largest enrollment was 100 in 1907-8, the average for many years being 75-85. A total of 373 students were graduated. It finally died for lack of patronage, since by 1935 most Mennonite communities had public high schools available. Principals were N. E. Byers 1898-1906, D. A. Lehman 1906-26, Silas Hertzler 1926-27, U. Grant Weaver 1927-33. The Goshen College Academy served a very useful purpose in furnishing a good high-school education under church auspices for many Mennonite young people who would otherwise have had no opportunity for higher education and it opened the door for a larger life and service for many. In some cases also parental opposition to education compelled young people to wait to attend high school until reaching their legal majority at 21, when they were too old for the local high school. H.S.B.

Goshen College Biblical Seminary is the direct continuation of the Bible School, first organized in 1900 as a division of the Elkhart Institute, Elkhart, Ind., at that time an academy. With the removal of the Institute to Goshen in 1903 and its reorganization first as a junior college, then as a senior college (1910), the Bible School continued to grow. However, until 1933 it actually served only as the Bible department of the college. From the beginning to 1933 the only special curriculum offered was a two-year Bible course leading to a diploma. In 1933 a four-year curriculum leading to the Th.B. (Bachelor of Theology) degree was added, with two years of required advanced Biblical and theological courses based upon two years of Liberal Arts. In 1942 this curriculum was expanded into a five-year course requiring three years of advanced Bible and theology. In 1946 the B.D. (Bachelor of Divinity) degree was added as a graduate degree requiring four years of Liberal Arts and three years of Bible and theology. In 1949 the B.R.E. degree was added as a four-year degree in Christian Education. In 1946 the name "Biblical Seminary" was instituted. In 1955 the Th.B. degree was discontinued and the Seminary program organized into Graduate (B.D.) and Undergraduate (B.R.E.) divisions. In 1944 the school was organized as a separate school within the college, with its own dean. H. S. Bender, who had served as dean of the college and the Bible School since 1931, has served continuously as dean of the Seminary. In 1953-54, 67 students were enrolled. The total number of degree graduates in 1934-56 has been 190, with a total of over 380 students matriculated, almost all members of the Mennonite Church (MC).

The largest number of Seminary graduates enter the pastorate, although a considerable number enter the foreign and home mission fields, and serve in church institutions as teachers, administrators, and writers. The faculty consists of nine fully theologically trained professors. In 1954 these included, besides the dean, Paul Mininger, J. C. Wenger, J. H. Mosemann, H. H. Charles, J. L. Burkholder, C. N. Kraus, P. M. Miller, and J. W. Miller, some of whom were serving part-time in the college proper, in addition to four special lecturers.

The Seminary seeks to fulfill its special calling as a school of the Mennonite Church by appreciation and propagation of the historic heritage of faith and life of the church, by a primary devotion to its contemporary needs for able and faithful workers and sound scholars, and by throwing its aggressive support into a program whereby the church may more effectively serve the modern age and its needs. H.S.B.

Goshen College Bulletin, an official publication of Goshen College, first issued in May 1904. Since 1907 one volume has been issued per year, except in 1923 when the college was closed. The number of issues per volume has varied, but is now 12 or more. The Alumni Newsletter, formerly a separate publication, is now issued as a Bulletin six times annually. Other issues include reports, announcements, promotional pamphlets, and the annual catalog.
N.P.S.

Goshen College Record, formerly Elkhart Institute Monthly, published by the students of Elkhart Institute and then Goshen College. The first issue appeared in October 1898. The name changed to Goshen College Record with June/July 1903 issue. It was issued monthly, except for certain summer months, as a literary magazine with some news items, until the late summer of 1937. It changed its form to a 4-page news journal with some literary features in October 1937, since when it has been issued biweekly, except in summer months. It was not published July 1923-September 1924.
N.P.S.

Goshen College School of Nursing, Goshen, Ind., opened in 1951 with a four-year curriculum leading to a B.S. in Nursing degree. Beginning with the sophomore year the students commute to the nearby Elkhart General Hospital for part-time clinical experience. Seventy-two Goshen College students were enrolled in the School of Nursing in the 1954-55 school year. Orpah Mosemann is the director of the School of Nursing. M.G.

Goshen Old Order Mennonite Church, located on the Centre Sideroad near the Sixth Concession of Peel Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont., began in a building purchased a few years ago for the benefit of the large number of families moving into this area where farms were still available. In 1955 a large white frame church was built with a seating capacity of 500. The congregation still receives ministerial help from the organized O.O.M. churches of Woolwich. J.C.F.

Gospel Banner is the organ of the United Missionary Church, which was known as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church until 1947. The Gospel Banner was founded in July 1878 and was published in Goshen, Ind., until 1885, when it was moved to Kitchener, Ont. From 1909 to the present it has been published in the United States, since 1924 under the auspices of the Bethel Publishing Co., the official publishing house of the church, located at 1819 South Main St., Elkhart, Ind. From 1878 to 1880 it was an 8-page monthly, 1880-85 a semimonthly, and in 1885 was increased to 16 pages. In 1892 it was made a 16-page weekly publication. For almost 20 years, beginning in 1879, a German edition was also published under the title Evangeliums-Panier (q.v.). In 1954 it had a circulation of approximately 3,000. The following have served as editors: Daniel Brenneman 1878-82, T. H. Brenneman 1882-85, Joseph Bingeman 1885, J. B. Detwiler 1885-88, H. S. Hallman 1888-1908, C. H. Brunner 1909-12, J. A. Huffman 1913-24, A. B. Yoder 1925-43, R. P. Pannabecker 1944-51, Everek Storms 1952- . J.A.Hu.

Gospel Bookstore, 119 E. Lincoln Ave., Goshen, Ind., a branch bookstore of the Mennonite Publishing House (MC) of Scottdale, Pa., was established in 1942. Managers have been Joe Garber 1942-46, Russell Krabill 1946-55, Marion Lehman 1955- . H.S.B.

Gospel Herald, the official organ of the Mennonite Church (MC) began publication April 4, 1908, as a merger of the Gospel Witness (q.v., Scottdale) and the Herald of Truth (q.v., Elkhart). It is published weekly, 16 pages until 1947 and then 24 pages (occasionally 32), 11¾ x 9 in., at Scottdale, Pa., by the Mennonite Publishing House for the Mennonite Publication Board. The circulation in 1954 was approximately 19,000. It contains articles. news, and promotional matter of special interest to the Mennonite Church. It carries advertising only for the Mennonite Publishing House. There are editorials, pages devoted to missions, schools, church music, peace, church history, and Christian education, a family circle page, a monthly page for shut-ins, a devotional column, a guide to the Sunday-school lesson, book reviews, comments on the world religious scene, poems, prayers and prayer requests. It prints official reports of conferences and boards. Its purpose is to inform, instruct, and inspire in Christian life and work. This periodical has had only two editors: Daniel Kauffman 1908-43 and Paul Erb 1944- . Levi C. Hartzler, director of publicity for the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (Elkhart), edits the missions section. John L. Horst and Millard C. Lind are consulting editors.

From April 1916 to the end of 1947 a monthly Mission Supplement to the Herald appeared, at first 8 pages, then 16, first edited by J. S. Hartzler, after 1944 by J. R. Mumaw. A Christian Doctrine Supplement of 16 pages appeared from October 1925 to the end of 1947, first quarterly, then bimonthly, edited until 1943 by Daniel Kauffman, then by Paul Erb. The Peace Problems Committee has supplied a monthly Peace Page for many years, first edited by Edward Yoder, Ford Berg, and since 1955 by Paul Peachey. P.E.

Gospel Herald Chapel (MBC), Trenton, Mercer Co., N.J., is a mission station of the Gospel Herald Home Missionary Society of the Pennsylvania Conference. The first service was held in a tent Aug. 8, 1937. L. W. Dinge was pastor in 1953. Jo.D.

Gospel Hill Mennonite Church (MC) is located on the western foothills of the Little North Mountain, 2½ miles south of Palos, and 5 miles south of Genoa in Linville District, Rockingham Co., Va. This is the oldest local mission congregation in the Middle District of the Virginia Conference. Services were held first in the White Hall Schoolhouse. A Sunday school was organized in 1907 and the church was built in 1909. In 1956 the congregation had a membership of 79, under the direction of J. Early Suter and Daniel Suter as ministers and D. W. Lehman as bishop. H.A.B.

Gospel Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Mountain Lake, Cottonwood Co., Minn., started about 1878 as "Wall's" Church. In 1889 the name was changed to Bergfelder Church. Since 1943 it has the present name. It is a member of the Northern District Conference. The first settlers arrived in 1875 from Molotschna settlement in South Russia. Aron Wall was the first elder. Other ministers have been his brother Henry Wall, Theodor Nickel, and Jacob Harms. Aron Wall was also an able bonesetter (Knochenarzt). About 1888 Aron Wall left the church with a group to found the later E.M.B. Church of Mountain Lake. The Bethel Church of Mountain Lake, with H. H. Regier and later J. J. Balzer as leaders, is also a daughter of the Gospel Mennonite Church. The first church was built in 1878, and remodeled in 1913. The church has a beautiful location overlooking the lake. The members are mostly farmers. Preaching is at present in the English language, with occasional German services. In the homes mostly Low German is spoken. The membership in 1953 was 259, with John P. Sudermann as pastor. A.A.P.

Gospel Messenger appeared in one issue in 1877 as a private venture to serve the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church. It failed for lack of support and was succeeded a year later by the Gospel Banner (q.v.). H.S.B.

Gospel Teacher, a four-page monthly, 7 x 12 in., was edited by P. J. Kaufman, a former Mennonite of Wakarusa, Ind., from January 1891 until May 1931. It was published at Foraker, Ind., until 1903, thereafter at Wakarusa. L. S. Hostetler was publisher until 1901, thereafter the editor. In its earlier issues it was quite polemic against the Indiana Mennonite (MC) and Amish churches. There is an extensive file in the Goshen College Library. No issues were published 1893-96. W.R.

Gospel Tidings was the name given in 1942 to the Evangelisationsbote (q.v.), the 4-page, semimonthly (1947-51, 8 pp.) official organ of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (founded in 1921). Until 1951 a small part of the journal remained German. Beginning in January 1951 it was a 16-page English monthly with about 900 subscribers. From January to June 1953 it was published jointly with Zion's Tidings (q.v.), the organ of the Evangelical Mennonite Church, as a 24-page monthly, last issue June 15, 1953. It was succeeded by The Evangelical Mennonite, the organ of the merged E.M. and E.M.B. conferences. Editors 1942-53 were H. P. Wiebe, H. F. Epp, and Arnold Wall. H.S.B.

Gospel Truths, a monthly (8¾ x 11 in.) Mennonite (MC) religious journal published for a short time at Belleville, Pa. (first issue September 1901, last known issue December 1902), edited by Oliver H. Zook of Allensville, Pa., later of Roaring Spring, Pa., assisted by Pius Hostetler of East Lynne, Mo., and Joshua B. Zook of Allensville, Pa. H.S.B.

Gospel Witness (1905-8) was a weekly (MC) journal published at Scottdale, Pa., by the Gospel Witness Publishing Co. for three years beginning with April 4, 1905, after which it was merged with the Herald of Truth published by John F. Funk at Elkhart, Ind., to form the Gospel Herald. First published in 8 pages, 11 x 16 in., it was enlarged to 12 pages, 9¼ x 12 in., on Nov. 2, 1905, and increased to 16 pages with the second volume. Daniel Kauffman, the editor, became the editor of the merged journal. The paper was established because of widespread dissatisfaction with the Herald of Truth, and financed largely by the Loucks family, in which Aaron Loucks was a leading figure. H.S.B.

Gospel Witness Company (MC) was organized in 1905 by Jacob S. Loucks, Aaron Loucks, and A. D. Martin at Scottdale, Pa., in order to publish a weekly religious periodical, the Gospel Witness (1905-8). At first the business of the company was carried on in the home of Aaron Loucks. Soon a two-story frame building, 30 x 70 ft., was constructed, and two years later an additional three-story brick building 40 x 70 ft. When the Gospel Witness was merged in 1908 with the Herald of Truth to form the Gospel Herald, the assets of the Gospel Witness Company were sold to the Mennonite Publication Board, and the company was dissolved. P.E.

Gospel Witness to Israel Mission (MB) at Winnipeg, Man., was founded January 1948 by Jacob Pankratz and his wife, who had done mission work among Jews in Toronto, Ont. In September 1948 the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America took over the responsibility for this mission and delegated the work to its City Mission Committee for supervision and financial support. The chief work the Mission is doing among the 20,000 Jews of Winnipeg is house to house visitation, and distributing New Testaments and other literature. Jo.A.T.

Gosper County (Nebraska) Old Order Amish settlement, 1880-1904. The settlers came from Mifflin and Juniata counties, Pa., in the hope of maintaining their distinct nonconformed church and family life. The settlement at the most consisted of 13 families, mostly Yoders. Yost H. Yoder was the bishop until he died Dec. 11, 1901. The ministers 1900-4 were Yost D. Yoder, Moses D. (E.) Yoder, and Jacob Yoder, brother of Yost H. Yoder.

The address of the Amish settlement was Bertrand, which is located across the line in Phelps County. A few families lived north of the Platte River near Lexington. After several years of pioneering it became apparent that the colony would not survive. As children grew up many left for other Amish settlements. There were only three weddings among the Amish in Gosper County between 1880 and 1904. Jacob Yoder moved to Colorado, then to Custer Co., Okla., where he served as the first minister of the Amish church there. Those who returned to Mifflin Co., Pa., were Mose E. Yoder, Christ Speicher, Yost B. Yoder, Albert Kauffman, and one or two single persons. Minister Yost D. Yoder and family moved to Oscoda Co., Mich., in 1903. The few remaining families in the spring of 1904 moved to North Dakota and to Pennsylvania. There is a small Amish cemetery in Gosper County.

Yost H. Yoder came from Gosper County to Mifflin Co., Pa., in 1881, at the request of the "Samuel King" congregation to assist in a serious church dispute. He ordained David L. Hostetler and Menno L. Yoder to assist Jacob Zook, who was the only remaining church official (deacon) of the one faction. Many families of the Nebraska settlement returned to Mifflin County to join the newly organized group. This Mifflin County congregation has since 1881 been known as the "Nebraska Church," and it is the "oldest order" of the Old Order Amish in America. Its membership in 1955 was 130 baptized members. In 1945 another rupture occurred within the Nebraska group so that there are now two kinds of Nebraska churches in Mifflin Co., Pa. J.A.H.

Gossau, a village in the canton of St. Gall, Switzerland, in which the Anabaptist movement had a large following in 1525-27, the first years of its existence. On May 16, 1530, an Anabaptist was executed here (see St. Gall). Balthasar Hubmaier, who was arrested in the canton of Zürich in 1525, was to be brought to Gossau upon the wish of the magistrate Berger, to recant "in the largest church." Gossau was also the home of Jakob Falk (q.v.), the second martyr in the canton of Zürich, who was drowned on Sept. 5, 1528. HEGE.

L. von Muralt and W. Schmid, Quellen zur Gesch. der Täufer in der Schweiz I (Zürich, 1952) 89, 143, 187, 257, 278, 289, 290; ML II, 145.

Gossner, Johannes Evangelista (1773-1858), a Lutheran writer, born Catholic, studied Catholic theology in Dillingen under Sailer who was in much contact with Protestants. Like Martin Boos he served as a Catholic priest in the same spirit in Dirlewang, Munich, and Düsseldorf. Persecuted here by the Jesuits, he found a field of service by preaching in St. Petersburg, 1820-24. As a fugitive he stayed briefly in Berlin, Altona, Leipzig, and Silesia. After preaching justification through faith for a long time, he joined the Protestants (1826). He founded the Berlin Missionsgesellschaft, which he led actively until his death.

Widely known as a writer of devotional literature (tracts, hymnals, collections of sermons, etc.), Gossner was a guest in many Mennonite homes (Gem.-Kal. 1896, 92 f.). Here two of his books were highly regarded:

(1) The Herzbüchlein oder das Herz des Menschen, ein Tempel Gottes oder eine Werkstatt des Satans in 10 Figuren sinnbildlich dargestellt zur Beförderung des christlichen Sinnes, published in 1812. Only the text was written by Gossner; the engravings are older.

(2) Schatzkästchen, enthaltend biblische Betrachtungen mit erbaulichen Liedern auf alle Tage im Jahre zur Beförderung häuslicher Andacht und Gottseligkeit. This work is Gossner's best-known and most widely read book, the mature fruit of his life of faith, remarkably inspired by the medieval Mystics (Thomas à Kempis and Johann Tauler), by Tersteegen and Zinzendorf, its evangelistic character tested in the struggles with the Catholic Church, a warmly appealing testimony of "Christ for us and in us."

The Schatzkästchen came into being during Gossner's stay in Leipzig, the residence of Karl Tauchnitz (q.v.), who printed many of his books. Dalton suggested (p. 276 f.) that its beginnings lay in the country home of the van der Smissens, the Mennonite merchant family, where Gossner is said to have resided in 1824 during his months in Altona, a surmise that the Gem.-Kal. (1896, 92 ff.) has taken up.

Gossner's relations with the Mennonite van der Smissens are significant. From them and the Wichern family he first sought counsel when he came to Altona (Prochnow II, p. 13); with them he took his first residence (Prochnow II, 29). The van der Smissens were leaders in religiously awakened circles, which were centered in the Moravian Brethren there (Dalton, 266). The head of the family was at that time Jakob Gysbert van der Smissen, and not the son, as Dalton (p. 266) supposes, but the father of Jakob van der Smissen, the pastor of the Mennonite church in Danzig 1826-35 (Mannhardt, 162). The family chronicles report that Kissling, Jung-Stilling (q.v.), and Lavater frequented his home; he was a cofounder of the Basler Sammlungen (Sammlungen für Liebhaber christlicher Wahrheit und Gottseligkeit), the organ of the Christentumsgesellschaft, which had also gained a footing in Altona; there a society known as the Particulargesellschaft had been formed (Ostertag, 34). The van der Smissen family already appears in Gossner's letters to Spittler, the business manager of the Christentumsgesellschaft in Basel in his Munich period (Prochnow I, 186, 208, 244). At the van der Smissen home Gossner met Merle d'Aubigné, the French Reformed pastor there (Dalton, 267 f.). Dalton names the family as the first recipient of the circle letter which Pastor Huber of Katharinenstadt (a member of the Christentumsgesellschaft) sent to Germany (Beiträge IV, 111). Gossner's writings were widely read by the Mennonites of Europe, as well as those of America, particularly those who came to America during the 19th century. W.F.

J. D. Prochnow, Johannes Gossner (2 vv., Berlin, 1864); H. Dalton, Johannes Gossner (Berlin, 1874); idem, Beiträge zur Geschichte der evangelischen Kirche in Russland (4 vv., Berlin, 1905); RGG II, Col. 1311-12; Gem.-Kal. 1896, 92-100; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); A. Ostertag, Entstehungsgeschichte der evangelischen Missionsgesellschaft zu Basel (Basel, 1865); Familien-Chronik der Familie van der Smissen (Danzig, 1875); ML II, 145 f.

Gostal (also erroneously called Grosstal, Czech Kostl) was very early in the history of the Anabaptists an important town, ranking with Nikolsburg, Austerlitz, and Auspitz. Kostl, located near Ludenburg, became a possession of the Ludenitz family in the 16th century, and later passed into the hands of the Zierotin family.

The Hutterite chronicles relate that when the Brethren were expelled from Moravia they began to assemble in Gostal and in Rohrbach near Seelowitz, the God-fearing coming with great joy, courage, and zeal, by day and night, wind and rain, cold and snow, to hear the Word of God. In small quarters they thankfully brought their children together and entrusted them to God-fearing sisters. These words indicate the importance given to Gostal in the Hutterite letters. In 1537 Hans Amon was preaching here. In 1557 the "great Haushaben" was begun here. Klaus Felbinger (q.v.) sent sincere greetings to the brotherhood here from prison in Landshut before his execution. In 1558 Kaspar Hueber and Hans Zwinger were ordained as elders. In 1559 Melchior Wall and Ambrosi Pfeiffer were chosen to the ministry. In 1593 they opened a ceramic (q.v.) shop, the best of its kind in Moravia, which produced some outstanding wares (A.R.G., 1931, p. 286). Paul Glock, a member of this Bruderhof, sent some coat material to Gostal for distribution.

The Gostal Brethren frequently suffered violence. Since they could not do anything to aid in warfare, Johann Zierotin in 1576 took eight of their best horses. Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.) charged the Brethren, who refused to comply with his wishes, with a deterioration of their former dependability. In the disturbances of war in the first decade of the 17th century they fared badly because of excessive taxation. Soon after came the Bohemian Revolt with its terrible consequences. In 1621 the Bruderhof was plundered three times. Finally the cardinal expelled them "with empty hands" from Gostal as well as the other Moravian Bruderhofs. The fleeing Brethren settled in Kesselsdorf (q.v.) in Hungary. (ML II, 146 f.)

LOSERTH.

Gotebo (Okla.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, had its beginning in 1902, when a number of families of the M.B. Church settled in that locality and organized a church. The first pastor was Peter Richert; he was succeeded by Benjamin Wedel. A church was built in 1903. Since most of the early settlers left the community, the church was for some time almost completely dissolved, but in 1916 a number of German Baptists joined it, and John Geis became its presiding minister. The church continued as an M.B. congregation until 1942. J.H.L.

Gotebo Preparatory School (Vorbereitungsschule), Gotebo, Okla., was erected in 1910 with H. Riesen as superintendent, to give instruction on the preparatory level, with emphasis on German and Bible. The school was closed about 1917. C.K.

Gotha, a city (pop. 57,639) and former duchy in Thuringia, Germany, where the Anabaptist movement attained a considerable strength soon after its origin. The events that took place here are of particular interest, because here the reformers for the first time advocated the death penalty in religious matters. The first official records date from 1526; in that year a member of the brotherhood had been baptized. But the movement apparently did not attain any great significance in the duchy, because it was nipped in the bud by the extraordinary severity of the measures used against the new brotherhood.

The suppressive measures began in 1529. Near Gotha, in Reinhardsbrunn near Friedrichsroda, ten persons were arrested "on account of unchristian error toward God, also seriously offensive and seditious plans against their proper government and its subjects," but were released when, after instruction, they gave up their doctrine. Nothing more was said about their "seditious plans." The instructions, however, did not hold, for they soon returned to their brotherhood. Early in 1530 they were therefore again arrested. The cross-examination revealed that they had been conscience-stricken for recanting. Thus Christoph Ortlep, who had been first taught by his cousin Balthasar at Gräfenhain, a village in Sachsen-Gotha, and who had been baptized by an elder named Michael of Uettingen, a village near Marktheidenfeld in Lower Franconia, stated that the doctrine of his brotherhood was the most thorough truth, and that he would give his life for it. He did not regret having to endure the punishment imposed upon him as shame for the sake of Christ; but he did regret recanting and denying what he recognized to be the truth.

After examining each prisoner separately, the judges tried to influence them with admonitions and threats. Out of unusual sympathy—says the court record—the council advised the prisoners "to consider what great danger and ruinous harm would visit them both in body and soul against God and their government out of their obstinacy and unchristian intentions, and also that they were bringing God's judgment, wrath, and anger to their hearts, which would not, like temporal punishment, affect only the body for time, but soul and body for eternity." They were given two or three hours for reflection; then new attempts were made to convert them, with the result that three prisoners recanted, while Christoph Ortlep and Andreas Kolb, as well as four women, Elsa Cutz, Barbara Unger, Katharina König, and Katharina Kolb, declared that they would persevere in their faith. There is no mention in the record of the trial of any offense against civic order. Nevertheless the six who did not recant were executed a week later, Jan. 18, 1530.

The execution caused a great stir, for it was not a matter of sentencing common criminals to death, but of using the death penalty against dissent in matters of faith in a Protestant country. The leading theologians found it difficult to calm people's minds. Superintendent Justus Menius in Eisenach tried to remove the doubts in a book, Der Widdertauffer lere und geheimnis (Wittenberg, 1530), for which Martin Luther wrote a foreword. He asserted in it that these people "were sentenced not alone because of manifold and abhorrent blasphemy and seditious articles of these mobs, but also because they created a public tumult among the people in one of the churches by trying to stone one who was about to renounce their doctrine; and several other transgressions through which they fell into government hands." Any statement describing the nature of the blasphemies Menius omits; nor does he give any information about the civil offenses. From his further discussion it is, however, clear that the latter would not have been stressed if they had recanted. They were simple people, who could not express or defend their faith in learned terms. As the record states, they did not enter into an analysis of their faith, and Menius says of the attempts to convert them, "They found nothing to criticize in our instruction . . . . They also permitted themselves to be instructed. But what shall I say? Before one was aware of it, they fell again and said that although they were unable to show sure Scriptural foundation for their doctrine, there were others who knew it."

Nor did Philip Melanchthon hesitate to sanction the sentence. He wrote in February 1530 to Friedrich Myconius, the superintendent of Gotha, who had some qualms of conscience concerning these executions, that he regretted that he had not advocated the death sentence for Nikolaus Storch, "from whom all these sects of Anabaptists and Zwinglians emanated." He even suggested to Myconius that he intimidate the people with new examples of punishment.

Seven years later at the duke's command, a woman of Gotha, Christina Strobel, was executed by drowning in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern on Nov. 8, 1537, with seven other women from Mühlhausen and Frankenhausen, when they refused to recant.

Anabaptism was unable to propagate itself further in the vicinity of Gotha. HEGE.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML II, 147 f.

Gotthard of Nonnenberg, an Anabaptist martyr, a deacon in the Jülich-Berg, Germany, Anabaptist group, was beheaded about 1558 with Peter Kramer after a long imprisonment. Van Braght relates, "When all saw their boldness, and perceived that they were upright, pious persons, . . . nearly everyone wept; the steward, the judges, deputy, and executioner, as well as the common people." Gotthard and Peter are commemorated in a hymn, "Merckt auff jhr völker überall," found in the German Mennonite hymnal Ein schön gesangbüchlein geistlicher Lieder of about 1580. (Mart. Mir. D 207, E 590 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 101; ML II, 148.) vdZ.

Göttingen, a city (pop. ca. 78,000, about one third of whom are refugees) in the former Prussian province of Hanover, since 1945 the seat of the first Mennonite congregation of refugees in West Germany (so named because of the residence of Ernst Crous, its founder-elder, and of Gerhard Hildebrandt, pastor since 1953), since 1948 also the seat of the Mennonite Research Center (Mennonitische Forschungsstelle) whose director is Ernst Crous. In 1947, in the ancient Göttingen town hall, the Mennonite relief organization for the whole of the British Zone of Germany was started, in co-operation with the MCC. The new Göttingen congregation served 193 locations in an area of ca. 80 miles square, then comprising 1,271 Mennonites (souls), most of them refugees, about two thirds of them baptized members: 675 from Russia, 58 from Poland, 538 from West Prussia. Later most of those from Russia and Poland and some of those from West Prussia left for America. In 1955 the congregation had 325 baptized members with circuit meetings in the following places: Göttingen, Braunschweig, Salzgitter-Bad, Lebenstedt, Bad Hersfeld, Kassel, Hildesheim, Bad Lauterberg. E.C.

Ernst Crous, Mennonitenbrief aus Göttingen (periodical 1947-50); Elfrieda Franz Hiebert, "With the Mennonites in Göttingen," Menn. Life XI (1956) 73 f.; Kurt Kauenhoven, "10 Jahre Mennonitengemeinde Göttingen," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 60 f.

Gottschalk (Gaetschalck), Jacob (1666-1763?), b. at Goch in the Duchy of Cleve, Lower Rhine, Germany, immigrant to Germantown, Pa., in 1701, outstanding leader and first bishop of the Mennonite Church in America. Recent research has demonstrated that Gottschalk was born at Goch about 1666, was baptized there on April 7, 1686, that he married Aeltien Hermans there on Feb. 20, 1689, and that he secured his church letter on June 12, 1701. Since his father's name was Gottschalk Theunissen (or Thonis) it is apparent that the name Gottschalk is merely a patronymic, which in America became a family name. The paternal ancestors of Jacob Gottschalk came from München-Gladbach which belonged to the Jülich domain; they apparently migrated from Gladbach when the Elector Palatine ordered all Mennonites to leave in 1654. Besides being a farmer Jacob was also a turner. He had five children: Godschalk, John, Herman, Ann (m. Peter Kuster), and Magdalene (m. Peter Nash).

From a brief sketch of the early history of the Mennonites in America (to 1712) written by Jacob Gottschalk, it is clear that he was ordained preacher at Germantown Oct. 8, 1702, and after the death of Wm. Rittenhouse (q.v.) in 1707 served as the sole minister until March 22, 1708, when others were ordained, and from 1708 on as the first bishop of the Germantown Mennonite congregation. In the absence of a bishop to ordain him, Gottschalk assumed the function of bishop at the request of the congregation and conducted the first baptismal and communion services in America at Germantown in May 1708.

When the new settlement was established at Skippack in 1712 Gottschalk joined it, locating in 1713 on a farm in what is now Towamencin Township, Montgomery Co., where he spent the remainder of his long life. On this land the first Towamencin Mennonite meetinghouse was erected in 1728. Gottschalk remained active in his ministerial work at least until 1753, since his signature appears on the Skippack Alms Book annually until that date. He died in May 1763. J.C.W.

W. Niepoth, "Jacob Gottschalk and His Ancestry," MQR XXIII (January 1949) 35-47; H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown 1683-1708," MQR VII (1933) 227-50.

Gottschall's: see Eden Mennonite Church (Schwenksville).

Gottshall, William Shelly (1865-1941), an outstanding Mennonite (GCM) leader and long-time minister—1884-1941, was born near Schwenksville, Pa., the son of Bishop Moses and Mary (Shelly) Gottschall. He married Anna K. von Nieda. He attended Perkiomen Seminary and Ursinus College and graduated from Ursinus Theological Seminary in 1889. He was ordained preacher Oct. 15, 1884, and elder Nov. 24, 1886. He served as pastor in the following churches: Schwenksville, Pa., 1884-1905; Allentown-Upper Milford, Pa., 1905-9; Bluffton, Ohio, the three Swiss churches, 1909-24; Salem, Freeman, S.D., 1924-30; East Swamp, Quakertown, Pa., 1930-38.

Gottshall was widely active in district and general conference work. He was a member of the Home Mission Board for 42 years (1896-1938), serving 22 years as chairman and 12 years as secretary. He was widely known as a Bible expositor and effective preacher and served much in Bible conference work, and was strictly conservative in his theological position. H.S.B.

Götzke (Goetzke, Goetzki, Jetzke, Goetz) was a Mennonite name of Prussia, Germany. Before World War II there were 48 persons by this name in the Memelniederung (q.v.). Arthur Goetzke was a minister of the Prussian Mennonite refugees of Northwest Germany after World War II, and Bruno Götzke was a pastor of the Mennonite refugee congregation at Backnang (q.v.). C.K.

G. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der Westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940); Fr. Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl., 1940, 26 f.

Gouda, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, pop. (1947) 37,283, with 89 Mennonites. Anabaptism was found here as early as 1534, and in 1542 the Anabaptist Marijtje Simons (q.v.) from Gouda was executed at The Hague. In 1571 Jan Dirksz (q.v.) suffered martyrdom at Gouda, and other citizens who had received their baptism on faith were hunted as heretics but escaped. Did a congregation exist here at that time? We cannot be sure, on account of lack of records. The oldest evidence of a congregation dates from 1626; in this year Adriaen Meyndertsz and Adriaen Jacobsz signed the confession of Outerman (q.v.). They may be supposed to have been deacons. In 1645 Cornelis Born was a preacher. This congregation, which seems to have been rather prosperous about the middle of the 17th century, belonged to the Flemish wing. Its preachers also took care of the congregations of Boskoop and Schoonhoven. The congregation, of which the strict Hendrik Gijsberts (q.v.) was an elder after 1649, and which during the Lammerenkrijg (q.v.), the conflict between the more spiritualistic Galenists and the rather dogmatic followers of Samuel Apostool, took the side of the "Apostoolsen," joined the conservative Zonist Sociëteit. In the second half of the 17th century the membership rapidly decreased. In 1674 there were found about 50 brethren. So the total membership could be estimated at about 120; they numbered only 50 in 1690. In this year a union was made with the Waterlander congregation.

This Waterlander congregation at Gouda, perhaps older than the Flemish, was always smaller than the Flemish church. In 1675 the membership numbered 20 or 25. Robbert Dam was its preacher about 1650, Isaack van Vrede(n) 1677-80. It joined 1674 the Waterlander (South Holland) Sociëteit. At the time of the union in 1690, the membership numbered about 30. Both the Flemish and the Waterlander churches of Gouda were often supported by other congregations, especially by those of Rotterdam and Amsterdam, as was also the united congregation.

At the time the two congregations united, the minister was Abraham van Loon (q.v.), who had first served the Waterlander congregation. Gijsbert Antwerpen was a deacon, first of the Waterlander church (after 1682), then of the United congregation until his death in 1731. He was an influential man, with a warm love for the church, and contributed liberally as did his daughters after his death. Yet the congregation did not flourish. The membership, 44 in 1725, had fallen to 14 in 1770, and in 1795 there were only 10 left. In 1798 the congregation was dissolved and the meetinghouse sold for 800 guilders. This money was given to the Lamist church at Amsterdam, which had given so much support and which assumed the care of a few poor members until their death. So the congregation has died out.

In 1921, 75 Mennonites (baptized) were living in Gouda, in 1947 about 50. A number of years ago these Mennonites formed a circle which organizes church meetings four times a year. The congregation of The Hague (q.v.) is in charge of this circle, which numbered 52 members in 1955.

K.V., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 109, 247, 613, 708, 778, 781, 846, 907, 1058, 1180, 1248; II, Nos. 1404, 1755-1823, 2063-64, 2224, 2710-12; II, 2 No. 336; DB 1864, 121; 1872, 67; 1892, 103, 108, 124; 1896, 48; 1918, 50, 52; De Zondagsbode XXXV (1921-22) Nos. 13-17; ML II, 150.

Goudeken (Aldegonde) de Jonc(k)heere, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on July 21, 1562, at Gent, Belgium. She was 28 years of age, a daughter of Gherolf and a native of Merendree in Flanders. She was burned at the stake together with four other women, among whom were her sisters Vijntgen (q.v.) and Janneken (q.v.), because they "persisted in their rebaptism." Concerning these martyrs van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, relates: "They confessed their faith without fear and remained steadfast until death." Their names are included in the song "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Besides these three sisters, a brother Pieter de Jonckheere (q.v.) was executed on March 12, 1562, at Gent.

vdZ.

Offer 650; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 29, No. 92; ML II, 432.

Goudie, Henry (1851-1942), organizer and first district superintendent of the Canadian Northwest Conference of the United Missionary Church. He was born near Hespeler, Ont., on Jan. 16, 1851, a son of David and Nancy Goudie. In 1870 he was converted and in 1874 became a charter member of the Reformed Mennonites, a group which later united with other groups to form the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (now the UMC).

Goudie began to preach in 1877 and was stationed at Port Elgin in 1878, being ordained by the Ontario conference in 1881. He served as pastor at Port Elgin, Breslau, New Dundee, Stayner, Markham, Kitchener (Bethany), Hanover, Shrigley, Toronto (Bethel), Aylmer, and Hespeler in Ontario; and at Mayton and Markham in Alberta. For 14 years he served as district superintendent: five years in Ontario (1900-5) and nine years in Alberta (1907-13, 1916-19). He retired in 1926 after a service of 50 years.

In 1872 Goudie married Sarah Wildfong. They had two sons and five daughters. Following Mrs. Goudie's death he married Mrs. Susannah Lageer in 1923. He died Jan. 19, 1942, just three days after his 91st birthday. He was buried in the Wanner cemetery at Hespeler. E.R.S.

Goudie, Samuel (1866-1951), a minister and leader of the United Missionary Church. He was born in Waterloo County, near Hespeler, Ont., on Aug. 11, 1866, a son of David and Nancy Goudie. On March 20, 1889, he married Eliza J. Smith. Converted at the age of 17, he joined the church in 1885, preached his first sermon that fall, and was ordained by the Ontario conference in 1891.

Goudie gave 54 years of active service to the church. He spent 26 years in pastoral work at Port Elgin, Maryboro, Vineland, Kitchener (Bethany), Toronto (Bethel), and Toronto (Jones Ave.). For 28 years he served as a district superintendent (1905-33). He served well, not only his own conference, but also the church as a whole. For 17 years (1922-39) he was president of the United Missionary Society, and for 31 years (1912-43) was chairman of the executive board. A member of eight general conferences, he was chairman of the 1912 general conference at Bethlehem, Pa. Goudie retired from the active work in 1940 and took up residence in Stouffville, Pa. He died July 2, 1951.

E.R.S.

Goudschaale, de Geestelijke, a Dutch hymnbook: see Geestelijke Goudschaale.

Government, Mennonite Historic Position on, and Office-Holding in: see State.

Government of Mennonites in Russia had two aspects, viz., the administration of all foreign settlers by the Russian government in Russia, and the self-government of the Mennonite settlements.

Administration of Foreign Settlements. On July 22, 1763, the Russian government established a Bureau of Guardianship (German, Pflegschaftskanzlei) of the foreign colonies with its center in St. Petersburg. This office was established long before any Mennonites considered migrating to Russia and was intended for all foreign settlers. On April 20, 1782, when Russia was divided into provinces, the foreign settlements were placed under the jurisdiction of the provincial and local authorities. On March 4, 1797, a government Department of Economy (Expedition der Staatswirtschaft . . .) was created in St. Petersburg to supervise the settling of foreigners and help them become successful. In 1800 a Bureau was created in the Ukraine with its center at Novorossisk (later Ekaterinoslav). The "Instructions" of this bureau were to give the settlements suggestions for self-government and for their economic life.

On March 22, 1818, the Bureau was changed to "Guardians' Committee" (Fürsorge-Komitee) of the Foreign Colonists in the Southern Regions of Russia and was subordinated to the Ministry of the Interior. The seat of this Guardians' Committee was at first at Kherson and later at Ekaterinoslav with branch offices at Ekaterinoslav, Kherson, and Bessarabia. In 1821 the seat of the Guardians' Committee was transferred to Odessa, where it remained until its dissolution in 1871. In 1837 the Guardians' Committee became subject to the Ministry of the Royal Estates newly created at St. Petersburg. In 1871, when the Guardians' Committee was abolished, the Mennonite settlers became directly subordinated to the local and provincial Russian authorities. The maintenance cost of these various institutions was placed upon the settlers themselves in 1845, each one having at first to pay twenty-one kopeks and later thirty-three kopeks.

Self-Government. According to the Manifesto of 1763 all foreign settlers in Russia were to enjoy complete autonomy in the administration of their own internal affairs forever. In 1800 Paul I issued a series of measures which included the introduction of uniform forms of local self-government based on Prussian forms of local government. Every village had an assembly consisting of a Schulze (mayor), two Beisitzer (assistants), and a clerk. Schulze and Beisitzer were elected by majority vote of the village assembly for a period of two years. Originally only landowners were eligible to vote and to occupy these offices. The clerk was a hired official. The functions of a constable were performed by several dyessiatski. The Schulze represented the village in the district assemblies and before higher government officials. He was responsible for the economic and the cultural welfare of the village. It was his duty to bring about peaceable settlement of disputes between the settlers, or, if this was impossible, to impose public work or fines. He was to prohibit the sale of liquor to villagers who were addicted to drunkenness and he was to enforce simplicity of life, i.e., to prevent the outlay of too much money for the household and entertaining visitors too frequently. The "Instructions" of 1800-1 include a large number of detailed prescriptions which he had to enforce. With the right to interfere in every sphere of the settlers' activity and private life, he could easily become a dictator if the assembly failed to check him. However, since the Schulze was a servant of the assembly, his power was held in check wherever the assembly used its authority effectively. The assembly elected village and district officials, levied taxes, elected schoolteachers, maintained a fire department, regulated the organization of fire insurance and fire prevention rules, matters of inheritance, the care of the aged, etc. All village elections had to be ratified by the Guardians' Committee.

A number of villages comprised a district or volost. A district assembly or volost consisted of one or more representatives from each village. The competence of this body was quite the same as that of the village assembly except that it applied to a larger area. The district office consisted of the Oberschulze (district mayor), several assistants (Beisitzer), and a clerical staff. The Oberschulze received a token salary. He was responsible for all meetings and for the maintenance of peace and order and exercised police power in the district, and imposed sentences, such as fines, incarcerations, or public labor, but only with the consent of the local Schulze. With the consent of the Guardians' Committee he could even inflict corporal punishment. He and his assistants formed the court of second instance for the prosecution of civil cases.

During their first decade (1874-84) the Mennonites of Manitoba followed exactly the pattern of self-government established in Russia. It was gradually adjusted to the Canadian environment and practices until it finally disappeared. The Mennonites of Paraguay still follow the same old practice which was developed and established among the Mennonites of Russia.

In self-government the problem of nonresistance was lifted out of the realm of theory and principles and put into practice in daily living. It is one thing to believe in these principles and when an extreme case turns up hand it over to a "worldly" authority to settle and wash one's hands of it, and another thing to have to handle it. Here it was thrown right into their laps. They had to solve their own problems. This chapter of Mennonite history furnishes an opportunity for Mennonites everywhere to make a case study as to how workable the principle of nonresistance has been and is, if tested in this manner.

Another aspect which is worth examining is the relationship between this Mennonite self-government and the local church authority. There is here within the Mennonite fold an example of solving the problems pertaining to the relationship of "state" and "church" within the group. Usually there was intimate and harmonious co-operation between the two authorities. At times there were great difficulties. Sometimes the church seemed to be dominating and again the "secular" authorities seemed to be leading. This again brings to light the question regarding the relationship between spiritual and secular authorities even in a Mennonite community based on its traditional principles of separation of state and church. C.K.

A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland (Berlin, 1932); D. G. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Stanford University, 1933); Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908).

Govert (Godevaert Mertens), an Anabaptist martyr, born at St. Peters near Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, living at Lier in Brabant, Belgium, was burned at the stake on Jan. 31, 1551, at Lier with Gillis, Anneken, and Mariken. He testified to his faith with great joy, and strengthened his fellow sufferers, while earnestly warning and admonishing his judges and the spectators. On their death Hans von Overdam wrote the hymn, "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert En daer toe noch vijftich Jaer," which is found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 17, reprinted in Wackernagel, Lieder, 126. NEFF.

Offer 568-77; Mart. Mir. D 96, E 495; DB 1869, 1, 8; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 393; XIV, 18 f., No. 198; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 78; ML II, 150.

Govert Aertsz, a cobbler, was beheaded at Utrecht in the Netherlands on March 13, 1535, because "he had kept the company of Anabaptists, rejected Purgatory, did not believe in the Holy Sacrament of the Mass, and thought that rebaptism was right." It is not clear that he was rebaptized. Probably he was not. (Berigten Hist. Genootschap Utrecht IV, 2, 1851, 130.) vdZ.

Govert Jaspersz, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed by burning at Brussels, Belgium, on Sept. 20, 1567 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously has 1558, without further date). Govert was a native of Biezelinge, a village in the Dutch province of Zeeland. He was a mason by trade, 40 years of age; he had lived for seven years in Antwerp. During the trial he refused to betray the names of other Anabaptists he knew in Antwerp, Mechelen, Brussels, and in Zeeland. Govert was a preacher; asked by judges why he preached secretly rather than publicly, he answered that Saint Paul also preached in attics. He gave some particulars on the Mennonite baptismal ceremony. Van Braght relates that he formerly had been a lay brother of the Monastery of the Brethren of the Holy Cross at Goes, Zeeland, and that he had been arrested in the field while reading the New Testament. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 200, E 582; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 71, No. 29; ML II, 394.

Goverts (Govertsen, Gowert, Govert), a Mennonite family appearing particularly in Hamburg-Altona and Danzig, usually merchants, ships' chandlers and shipowners, usually of whaling boats. The progenitor of the Altona Goverts family was Peter Goverts of Antwerp (1475-1553). A descendant, Willem Goverts (1531-1608), became an Anabaptist and fled to Fresenburg, Oldesloe, near Hamburg to escape persecution. His son Hans (1578-1639) settled in Altona with other Mennonites and became the ancestor of the Hamburg-Altona Goverts line. He was a successful businessman and a deacon of the Mennonite congregation. His brother Peter was married to a sister of Gerrit Roosen. Peter's son Ernst (1678-1728) was a deacon in the Flemish Mennonite congregation, and caused some disturbance in the congregation by advocating baptism by immersion. He built the Dompelaar (q.v.) church on the Grosse Freiheit (Blaufärber or Goverts Church) in 1708 and supported its famous minister Jacob Denner (q.v.). His brothers Hermann and Gerard Goverts Hermanns, both deacons, were successful businessmen. After their death their business continued under the name "Firma Gerard Goverts Erben." Hermann's two sons left the Mennonite church. Paul joined the French Reformed Church and Hermann's family (11 children) the Lutheran Church. B. N. Krohn (q.v.) was the pastor of this Lutheran congregation and the instructor of Hermann's children. (Krohn mentions this experience in the preface of his book.) The name Goverts still appears as a non-Mennonite name in the Hamburg area, but seems to be extinct among Mennonites.

In the Danzig Mennonite church records the name Goverts appears for the first time in 1674. The name had evidently become extinct before the removal of the Mennonites from this area in connection with World War II. It was apparently not transplanted to Russia and America.

In Holland also the name Govertsz (Govers, Goverts) is found among the Mennonites, but as far as could be ascertained they are not related to the German branch. In Haarlem there were in the 17th century a number of members of the Goverts family, some of whom were deacons and trustees of the Mennonite orphanage there. Joost Goverts of Amsterdam is said to have collected accounts on Anabaptist martyrs in Brabant in behalf of the martyrbooks about 1610. In 1658 Goverts, of Leeuwarden, Friesland, established an old people's home in this city. C.K.

Neues Altona II (Jena, 1929) 228-31; R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930) 86 ff., 146 ff., 170 ff.; Hamburger Geschlechterbuch IV; G. Reimer, Familiennamen, 108; B. N. Krohn, Geschichte der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1758) 4; Wanda Oesau, Hamburgs Grönlandsfahrt (Hamburg-Glückstadt, 1955); B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona (Hamburg, 1886 f.); DB 1899, 103; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 59; ML II, 151.

Govertsz, Joost, a co-worker with Tieleman van Braght in the preparation of the Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.). For the church at Hoorn Govertsz collected records in Brabant. By this comprehensive work the dependability of the Martyrs' Mirror was greatly enhanced; more recent research has frequently confirmed his statements. (DB 1899, 103; ML II, 151.)

HEGE.

Goverts(z), Tobias, a Dutch Mennonite preacher: see Wijngaard, T. G. van den.

Goyen (Gogen, Gojen, Goi), Arnold (1699-1762), son of Gossen Goyen (q.v.) and a member of the Crefeld Mennonite Church, married Susanna von der Leyen. He was an intimate friend of Gerhard Tersteegen. The Crefeld church has 60 letters written by Tersteegen to Arnold Goyen which reveal the intimate relationship of Tersteegen to the Crefeld Mennonites and particularly to Goyen. Tersteegen visited the Mennonites of Crefeld, and the Goyen family visited Tersteegen in Mülheim. According to Nieper (p. 240), Tersteegen or W. Weck furnished the inscription for Goyen's tombstone. The petition which the Crefeld Mennonites addressed to the King of Prussia regarding religious freedom dated April 13, 1737, bears, among others, Arnold Goyen's signature. C.K.

F. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 209, 233 f., 238-40, 380; Dirk Cattepoel, "Das religiöse Leben in der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts," in Beitrage zur Gesch. der rhein. Mennoniten, 1939; ML II, 152.

Goyen (Gogen, Gojen, Goi), Gossen (Gosen, Goessen, Goswin) (1667-1737), married Catharina Lamerts, widow of Herman op den Graeff, in 1696, was minister of the Mennonite Church at Crefeld, Germany, during a time when this congregation was affected by a pietistic revival movement. Among his friends were Johann Lobach (q.v.) and Luther Stetius, who had strong Dunkard leanings. Goyen himself must have been baptized by immersion in the Rhine in 1724, but continued to serve the Mennonite congregation at Crefeld, although his fellow ministers Leenaerdt Ewaldts and Jan Kroes (Crous), and the majority of the members did not practice baptism by immersion. He must also have been a friend of Ernst Christoph Hochmann von Hohenau (q.v.), who preached in the Mennonite church at Crefeld (Nieper, 217). His son Arnold Goyen (q.v.) was a good friend of Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.). His daughter Maria, who was married to Jacob W. Naass, emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1735.

The petition which the Crefeld Mennonites addressed to the King of Prussia regarding religious freedom dated April 13, 1737, bears, among others, the signature of Gossen Goyen (Nieper, 380). Gossen Goyen intermediated in 1715 between the Dutch Mennonites at Amsterdam and the Swiss authorities who kept Swiss Mennonites on the galleys in Italy. In January 1715 he forwarded Dutch money to Torino, Italy, for the purpose of liberating the Mennonite prisoners; and a letter of Oct. 5, 1715, of the French ambassador at Bern, Switzerland, written to Goyen, mentions the liberation of some Swiss Mennonites from the galleys. A letter of Nov. 20, 1715, informs us that more Mennonites were liberated, while still others were to be ransomed. In 1726 (letter of June 4) Goyen was still in correspondence with the board of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. In this letter he calls himself preacher of the Mennonites at Crefeld.
C.K.

Max Göbel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westfälischen evangelischen Kirche (3 volumes, 1849-60); F. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 37, 209, 239-40, 273-74; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1372, 1376, 1378; II, Nos. 2616; ML II, 151.

Goyes, Feycke, elder of the (Flemish) Mennonite congregation at Dokkum, Dutch province of Friesland, who in 1643 caused a division in this congregation; a meeting to settle the quarrel was held at Sneek on May 4 of that year and counsel was asked of the Flemish church at Amsterdam. One of the Amsterdam preachers, Tobias Govertsz van de Wijngaard (q.v.), tried to arbitrate the conflict. Lack of material makes it difficult to determine the nature of this division, which also struck the congregations of Sneek and Bolsward, or to follow its course of the conflict. We know about this quarrel only from some letters found in the Mennonite Archives at Amsterdam. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 607-9). VDZ.

Graaf, Lieuwe Willemsz, born 1652 at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, was at first a skipper to Hamburg. He became a Mennonite preacher serving first in his native town and from 1694 on at Amsterdam in the Old Frisian congregation. He died in 1704. By observing the sky on his voyages and by diligent perusal of pertinent literature he acquired a knowledge of the stars unusual for his time. He translated and printed at his own expense a book by Professor Mathias Wasmuth of Kiel, Kort begrip van de algemeene herstellinge des Tijd. . . . Believing that he had found an exact method of determining east-west distances, he sold his boat in Harlingen and devoted his time and money to promoting his discovery. He applied to the Dutch States-General for a patent and for financial support to publish the discovery in a booklet. Several times he appeared before them, debating with specialists and with his opponents, and also before the council of the city of Amsterdam. He was finally granted a patent and 2,000 guilders. Then he published his book, Eenvoudig, en onvervalscht Verhaal . . . , in which he gives an interesting account of his appearances before the States-General and the city council and presents his astronomical discovery. In the same year (1689) as the above writing, a second book of his appeared: De nieu gepactiseerde oeffening der Stuurlieden, a complete instruction book in the art of steering a boat. Graaf's portrait was engraved by P. Tanjé (published in Schijn-Maatschoen, III, 432), and four short laudatory poems appeared, A. Spinniker (q.v.) writing one for the portrait. In Amsterdam Graaf opened a school, apparently for the instruction of navigators. Of Graaf's significance for the Mennonite Church, nothing can be said. While he was still a preacher at Harlingen, he became involved in 1688 in a quarrel with Balthasar Bekker (q.v.) on some untheological matter. NEFF, VDZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis der Mennoniten III, 433-84; Biogr. Wb. III, 319 f., 400; N.N.B.Wb. III, 485; ML II, 152.

Graaf, Volkert (de), a Dutch Mennonite preacher, serving 1728-37 at Zwartsluis and 1737-64 at Blokzijl. Influenced by Joannes Deknatel (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher of Amsterdam, he became a follower of Count von Zinzendorf (q.v.) and the Moravians, in the Netherlands usually called "Hernhutters." With the Hernhutter preacher Lorenz, a clothmaker, de Graaf traveled through Friesland preaching; as a result a small Hernhutter congregation was founded in Blokzijl, which met for a time in de Graaf's house. De Graaf seems to have entertained the desire to be a Moravian missionary to Surinam, but for some reason this desire was not realized. In 1755 de Graaf left the Hernhutters; a number of members of the Blokzijl Mennonite congregation, among them the deacon Arie Stuurman, however, held to this group. vdZ.

Naamlijst; W. Lütjeharms, Het philadelphisch-oecumenisch streven der Hernhutters in de Nederlanden in de achttiende eeuw (Zeist, 1935) 62, 82, 84, 103 f., 135.

Graber (Greber, Grayber, Gräber), a Mennonite family name originating in Kirchdorf, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The name likely originated in the 15th century with persons whose occupation was that of digging ditches or trenches. The first mention of a person with this name having been a Mennonite was in 1596 when a certain Georg Graber was dealt with by the Bernese council because he was a member of this forbidden church.

Members of the Graber family were in the mass exodus of Mennonites from the Bernese Republic which took place in 1671 and the years immediately following. They settled near Sainte Marie-aux-Mines (Markirch), Alsace. Again exiled in 1708 they found their homes in other sections of Alsace and especially Montbéliard.

In 1791 a Johannes Graber left Montbéliard with other Mennonites for Poland by way of Austria. They lived in several villages in Volhynia before migrating to Kansas and South Dakota in 1874. Various members of this family have become prominent in church and civic affairs in their communities.

Peter Graber (1741-1805) was the ancestor of most of the Graber family living in the eastern part of the United States. A grandson, also named Peter, emigrated from Montbéliard to Stark Co., Ohio. Another grandson, Christian, settled in Washington Co., Iowa, in 1856. His descendants include C. L. Graber, a minister of Goshen, Ind., and J. D. Graber, bishop and formerly a missionary in India, now in Elkhart. Many of the descendants of the first-named Peter are members of the Old Order Amish Mennonite Church. This name remains a common one among the Mennonites living in Montbéliard and Alsace today. André Graber is an elder of the church at Belfort (q.v.). D.L.G.

Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottdale, 1937) 135-36; J. M. and Anna Goering, The Peter Graber Family Record (Galva, Kan., 1948).

Grabill (Graybill, Grebiel, Kraybill, Krabill, Krebill, Krehbiel, Krahenbühl, Crayenbühl, and thirteen other minor variants), a Swiss Mennonite family originating in the parish of Grosshöchstetten in the canton of Bern, later prominent in the Palatinate and America. In 1682 Peter Krehbiel emigrated to the Palatinate settling on the Weierhof, where the family is still represented. (See the article Krehbiel for the history of the family in Europe and America carrying this form of the name.)

When the first member of the family came to America is not clear. An Eva Grabiel was married to a Christian Wenger in Lancaster Co., Pa., about 1728. The first known male immigrant was a John Krehbiel who arrived about the mid-18th century in Lancaster County. His grandson John Grebel moved to Juniata Co., Pa., becoming the first Mennonite minister and bishop there and the progenitor of a large number of descendants who have consistently spelled the name Graybill. Bishops Jacob (1816-92), William (1833-1902), and William W. (1880-) are among his descendants. His family who stayed in Lancaster County have largely adopted the spelling Krahbill. That part which moved to Virginia uses the spelling Grabill. Families moving westward to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois betray their provenance by the form of spelling. The Krabill family in Stark Co., Ohio, and Washington Co., Iowa, is of Amish background, coming direct from Europe, not from Pennsylvania. The family has no connection with Conrad Grebel, the founder of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in Zürich, Switzerland, although the pronunciation is similar. Among the currently serving Mennonite ministers of the family are Bishop J. Paul Graybill of East Earl, Pa., Bishop William W. Graybill of Richfield, Pa., preachers J. Silas Graybill of Doylestown, Pa., Russell Krabill of Goshen, Ind., and Martin K. Kraybill of Elizabethtown, Pa. H.S.B.

Grabill Mennonite Church (EM), Grabill, Ind., had its beginning in 1866 when Bishop Henry Egly withdrew from the Amish Mennonites in Adams Co., Ind., and formed a new church. He influenced similar withdrawals in other communities, among which was one in Allen Co., Ind. These groups became known as the Egly Mennonites and formed a conference body which in 1908 took out a charter in Illinois designating themselves as the Defenseless Mennonite Church of North America. In 1948 the name was changed to the Evangelical Mennonite Church.

The church in Allen Co., Ind., built its first meetinghouse one and one-fourth miles east of Leo on the Leo-Harlan Road, about the year 1875 and was known as the Leo Mennonite Church. In 1912 the congregation built a new structure one and one-half miles further east in the town of Grabill. This building was remodeled in 1938 and was then designated as the Mennonite Church of Grabill. Here it attained an active membership of about 135 members. J.H.S.

Grace Bible Institute, Omaha, Neb., was organized for the purpose of training Christian workers in the Mennonite denomination. The organizational meeting was held on June 1, 1943. The Board of Directors includes leaders from six Mennonite conferences. The student body has increased from 23

(1943) to 325 (1955). The present enrollment consists of young people from 20 denominations, 24 states, and 5 foreign countries. Sixty-five per cent of the student body is Mennonite.

The Grace Bible Institute is accredited by the Accrediting Association of Bible Institutes and Bible Colleges—Collegiate Division. It offers the degree of Bachelor of Arts with a Bible major. The liberal arts courses are fully accredited by the University of Nebraska. The Institute is classified as a professional school in that it is primarily devoted to the training of young people for full-time Christian service. Grace Bible Institute, being an inter-Mennonite school, affirms its stand as true and loyal to the time-honored Mennonite doctrines. H.D.B.

Grace Chapel United Missionary Church, Toronto, Ont., was organized in 1901. The membership in 1953 was 71 with Henry Good serving as pastor. He.G.

Grace Children's Home, Henderson, Neb., was founded Aug. 1, 1936, and incorporated 1938 as a nonprofit corporation and reincorporated in 1942. It is licensed by the state of Nebraska to care for 35-40 dependent children. The present plant, on the south side of Henderson, was completed in 1948. It is the only home in Nebraska operating on the family system of having no more than seven children per family group, and each family in its own residence. Children of all faiths are admitted, but raised in evangelical Christianity. The home, supported by freewill offerings and private contributions, has as its purpose to minister to the spiritual, social, mental, and physical needs of the child. The president in 1954 was J. R. Barkman and the superintendent Paul F. Barkman, both ordained ministers of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference. J.R.B.

Grace Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located one mile west of Halstead, Harvey Co., Kan., was organized in 1877. A church was built in 1896 northeast of Halstead, and the congregation was called the "Halstead" congregation. In 1915 this building was moved one mile west of Halstead and was enlarged in 1921. In 1939 a new church building with a seating capacity for 600 was built one mile south of the old site. The past residing ministers Henry A. Schmidt and Henry A. Koehn were ordained in 1882. The latter served the congregation for 24 years. Jacob Dirks was ordained to the ministry in 1896 and served the congregation until his death in 1945, a period of nearly 50 years. Jacob P. Unruh moved here in 1920 ministering to the church until his death in 1947. Carl J. Dirks, the present minister in charge, is assisted by Paul Becker, Kenneth Smith, and Arnold Wiggers. In 1954 the membership was 230. (†ME I) C.J.Di.

Grace Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, located in Reading, Berks Co., Pa., was organized in 1882 under the leadership of W. B. Musselman. In 1953 the membership was 418 with A. G. Woodring serving as pastor. In 1955 a new brick and stone church was dedicated, with P. T. Stengele as pastor. A.G.W.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM), located at 4221 South Rockwell St., Chicago, Ill., began in 1917 as the Mennonite Bible Mission, under A. F. Wiens. In 1937, when Wiens died, John T. Neufeld became the leader. In 1940 the Home Mission Board began to help in the support of this work, and the church joined the Middle District Conference. The work is among people of many nationalities, mostly of Central European background. In 1955 the membership was 68, with John T. Neufeld still serving as pastor. A number of its members have served in foreign mission work. J.T.N.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Enid, Okla., was begun as a mission project by the Western District Conference in 1934, when J. B. Frey was instructed to explore the field. H. N. Harder was called to the work in September 1935, and in 1938 the church was organized with 20 charter members. On July 16, 1939, the new church building was dedicated. H. N. Harder left in May 1943 and was succeeded on June 1, 1944, by Ben Rahn, who served until June 1, 1947. Albert J. Unruh has served since then. Membership has grown from 37 in 1940 to 126 in 1955. On Jan. 1, 1954, the church became self-supporting. J.F.S.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Pandora, Putnam Co., Ohio, a member of the Middle District Conference, was organized May 12, 1904, under the leadership of F. S. Sprunger, pastor of the First Mennonite Church of Berne, Ind., with 206 charter members, the great majority of whom had withdrawn from the St. John Mennonite Church near Pandora. The church building, which is still in use, was completed in 1905 with a seating capacity of 750. In 1954 the total baptized membership was 415. Ministers who have served the congregation are Peter P. Hilty, Albert R. Shoremann, Peter W. Penner, Otto Lichti, Albert Schumacher, John T. Moyer, John M. Regier, Paul E. Whitmer, Forrest Musser, and Ernest J. Bohn. E.J.Bo.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Albany, Linn Co., Ore., a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized June 29, 1931, with 21 charter members, led by John M. Franz, P. R. Aeschliman, and A. J. Neuenschwander. The membership of 117 in 1954 worshiped in a frame meetinghouse which had previously been a Presbyterian church. Ministers who have served the congregation are W. Harley King, William Augsburger, John M. Franz, P. A. Kliewer, Henry U. Dalke, E. J. Peters, and Herbert King, 1955. The Pacific Conference held its session here in 1947. P.A.K.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Dallas, Polk Co., Ore., a member of the Pacific District Conference, is an outgrowth of the Zion Mennonite Church (MC), having been organized in 1932 with a membership of about two dozen, under the leadership of Gerhard Bergen, who served as the first pastor. The congregation, with 314 members in 1955, worships in a modern church building which seats about 300. Ministers who have served this congregation are H. E. Widmer, Homer Leisy, John Hiebert (supply pastor), Jacob J. Regier, Earl M. Peterson, J. M. Franz, and H. D. Burkholder (from Aug. 1, 1955). W.W.J.

Grace Mennonite Church (GCM) of Lansdale, Pa., began in 1928 as a mission work with Thursday evening meetings in private homes for Bible study and prayer. In 1929 this group purchased and renovated an abandoned church on Mount Vernon Street, which is still in use. In 1930 the congregation was organized and the first Sunday school and worship meeting was held in the church.

Most of the 45 charter members were members of the Deep Run church who were living in Lansdale. In 1954 the membership was 290. Ministers have been D. J. Unruh 1930-36, Olin A. Krehbiel 1937-46, J. J. Plenert 1946-53, and Elmer Friesen 1954- .

Over the years the congregation has had a healthy spiritual and numerical growth. A number of the young people have entered Christian service. A larger meetinghouse was built in 1956 at York and Mitchell Avenues. J.H.F.

Gracevale Hutterite Bruderhof, established in 1948 near Winfred, S.D., had a population of 71 in 1950. M.G.

Graef, Elise (Riemenschneiderin), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned in the Unstrut, Nov. 8, 1537, with seven other Anabaptists, between Mühlhausen and Ammern in Thuringia, Germany.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526 bis 1584 (Jena, 1913); ML II, 152.

Graeff, op den (Opdegraf, Updegrave, Updegrove), an old Crefeld Mennonite family, which turned Quaker in part ca. 1679-80, four members of which emigrated to Germantown with the first 13 immigrant families in October 1683. Some of their descendants continued in or returned to the Mennonite faith and were found in the Montgomery County congregations of Skippack and Boyertown until modern times. The grandfather of the first Germantown immigrants, Herman, a linen weaver and merchant, was born Nov. 26, 1585, of Mennonite parents in Aldekerk, about 12 miles from Crefeld, moved in 1609 to Crefeld, m. Grietjen Pletjes of Kempen in 1615, died Dec. 27, 1642, leaving 18 children. This Herman op den Graeff was one of two delegates of the Crefeld Mennonite Church to sign the Dordrecht Confession in 1632 and served as preacher in the congregation there.

One son of Herman, Isaac Hermans op den Graeff, b. in 1616, married Grietjen Peters (d. 1679), was converted with his family to Quakerism. His widow, who died in Philadelphia Oct. 19, 1683, his three sons Derick (Dirk) Isaacs, Herman Isaacs, and Abraham Isaacs, and a daughter Margrit (m. later to Peter Schumacher, immigrant from Kriegsheim who arrived in 1685) emigrated to Germantown as part of the 13 famous first families on the Concord, arriving at Philadelphia, Oct. 6, 1683, settling in Germantown soon thereafter. Dirk was married in a Quaker ceremony in 1687 in Crefeld, to Nölken Vijtten, probably a daughter of Veit Scherkes, one of the 13 family heads. Herman had been previously married to Liesbet Isaacs, a daughter of Isaac van Bebber, another of the 13 first families. The op den Graeffs were a family of linen weavers in Crefeld and continued this occupation in Germantown, although the three brothers purchased jointly 2,000 acres of land in Germantown from William Penn's agents in Rotterdam, Jacob Telner and Benjamin Furley.

Dirk op den Graeff was the leader of the 13-family immigrant group and remained prominent in Germantown civic life. He with his brother Abraham signed the famous first petition against slavery in America in 1688. In 1689 he was one of the 11 charter members of the Germantown corporation, in 1692 he was one of the town's six "committeemen," and in 1693-94 he was the bailiff or chief executive (burgomaster). He died childless in 1697. Herman op den Graeff, like his brother Dirk, was a member of the Germantown Quaker meeting, one of the 11 charter members of the corporation, and died childless May 2, 1704, after having moved to Delaware County.

Abraham op den Graeff, the youngest of the three brothers, married to a Catharine (last name unknown), the most skilled as a weaver, was the only one of the family to return to the Mennonite faith, which he did sometime after 1708. (His name is not in the Morgan Edwards list of the Germantown members of that year.) He was also the only one to have children. He died March 25, 1731, leaving four children, Isaac, Jacob, Margaret, and Anne, and was buried in the Evansburg Mennonite cemetery. Since his brothers died childless he inherited their land, but sold his house and 828 acres in Germantown sometime after 1704 and moved to Perkiomen, where he laid out the remaining 1,200 acres of the op den Graeff land. His son Jacob appears as a signer of a petition of 1728 to the governor of Pennsylvania for protection against the Indians. H.S.B.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Die Heimat (periodical) (Crefeld, 1927) 23; W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore College, 1835) 209-18 with biographies of the three sons; ML II, 152-54, with separate articles on Herman op den Graeff and each of his three sons; S. W. Pennypacker, "Abraham and Dirck op den Graeff," Penn Monthly VI (1875) 679-92, reprinted in idem, Historical and Biographical Sketches (Philadelphia, 1883) 201-21.

Graess, Heinrich: see Grass, Heinrich.

Graet, de, a family, originally from Kortrijk (q.v.), Flanders, which had three martyrs: Gillis (q.v.), Sijntgen (q.v.), and Steven (q.v.) (see Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 33). The real name of this family seems to have been not de Graet, as the martyrbooks call them, but Segaert. (Verheyden, Gent, 30.) vdZ.

Grafeneck (Graveneck), Klaus von (1502-75), a frequently named magistrate of Württemberg; in Blaubeuren 1539-42, in Kirchheim below Teck 1543-50, in Urach 1551-75. He wrote the report of Michael Sattler's (q.v.) death in Rottenburg, Ayn newes wunderbarliches geschicht von Michel Sattler zu Rottenburg am Neckar sampt 9 mannen seiner lere und glauben halben verbrannt und 10 weyber ertränkt (1527; there is a copy of this book in the Wolfenbüttel library). He suffered at the hands of both opposing parties in the Peasants War. Klaus von Grafeneck is said to have arisen at midnight every night for prayer and Bible reading in his later years. He died on Jan. 16, 1575.

His two sisters, who had been nuns in Königsfelden, left the convent to marry. It is very likely that Klaus von Grafeneck sent his account of Sattler's martyrdom to one of his brothers-in-law, Balthasar Maler, a printer in Zürich, who had it printed in 1533. In 1533 Grafeneck married Margarethe, the daughter of Peter Scher of Schwarzenburg. She became a devoted follower of Schwenckfeld as was her entire family. She was a sister of A. Blaurer's (q.v.) brother-in-law, Peter Scher, Jr. She was the channel for the sending of Paul Glock's (q.v.) letters to Moravia. Her daughter Christine also apparently aided Glock. A report given by his nephew Josua Maler (d. 1599) indicates that the Grafeneck home was open to Zwinglians, Schwenckfelders, and Anabaptists. It is very probable that Paul Glock received kinder treatment than was customary because of Grafeneck's intercession for him. Grafeneck employed him in gardening in Dettlingen and sent him on errands to distant places. This freedom ended when Glock engaged in conversation on religious matters with the peasants. G.Bos.

Urkunden des Staatsarchivs Stuttgart. Oberamtsbeschreibung Münsingen, 532, 610, 632, O.A.B. Rottenburg 1, 410; O.A.B. Urach 630; Reutlinger Geschichtsblätter XII (1901) 27, 32, 95; XIV (1903) 54 f.; Hefele, Diözesanarchiv 1884, 74 f., 81 f.; E. Egli, Aktensammlung zur Gesch. der Zürcher Ref. (Zürich, 1879) No. 1100; Württembergische Jahrbücher f. Statistik und Landeskunde 1911, 51 ff.; T. Schiess, Briefwechsel der Brüder Thomas und Ambrosius Blaurer II (Freiburg i.B., 1910) 266, 273, 316; III, 38, 227, 547, 712, 801; V. Ernst, Briefwechsel Herzog Christophs I, No. 879; III, 198; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 379; W. Köhler, Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation II (Leipzig, 1908) 292; Blätter f. württemberg Kirchengesch. 1891, 85; Gabelkover, Collektaneen im Staatsarchiv Stuttgart; Ztscht. f. Gesch. des Oberrheins XIX, 591; ML II, 154 f.

Graft (Noordeind), a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, between Alkmaar and Hoorn, which has from a very early date been the seat of a Mennonite congregation. In the middle of the 16th century, according to J. A. Leeghwater, the Mennonites of that area met for worship on an island in Schermer Lake called Matten. The congregation was closely associated with the neighboring De Rijp congregation, and is often called the congregation of Graft en de Rijp. The congregation belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch, and existed before 1581, in which year its representatives were present at the meeting of Waterlander churches at Amsterdam. In 1654 De Rijp was completely burned down, and with it the Mennonite church with its archives. Strangely the archives of the Graft congregation have nothing before 1654. Since that date the lists of members and preachers are intact. In 1655 the membership numbered 211, in 1658 even 232. Then it decreased: 1671, 188; 1724, 101; 1730, 77; 1757, 39; 1824, 17. Since then there is again a rapid increase: 1836, 50; 1861, 75; a standstill, 1898, 73; 1928, 75, and a new decline to about 50 in 1953. The small congregation contributed liberally to the Fund for Foreign Needs in 1733, 1736, and 1744.

Formerly the congregation had a large wooden meetinghouse, which was torn down in 1809 and replaced by a smaller one, also of wood. A brick church was built in 1874 and an organ acquired in 1897. Since 1921 the congregation of Graft has been united with that of Oost- and West-Graftdijk. The last pastors of the independent congregation of Graft were C. Nijdam 1909-12, J. Dirkmaat 1912-14, and Miss J. L. de Eerens 1918-19. C.N., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 474; II, Nos. 1824-27; DB 1875, 129; 1877, 80; 1878, 111-19; 1882, 108; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim; ML II, 155.

Graftdijk. Oost- and West-Graftdijk are two small old villages in the Dutch province of North Holland, situated on the great canal between Amsterdam and Helder, nine miles southwest of Alkmaar. Their combined population is about 600, with 44 Mennonites. There was in each of the villages once an old Mennonite congregation. Both congregations belonged to the Waterlander (Rijper) Sociëteit, but turned rather conservative in the second half of the 17th century and also joined the Zonist (q.v.) Conference. There was a meetinghouse in both villages. The one in West-Graftdijk, built in 1648, burned down in 1758, and was replaced by a new one, dedicated on Dec. 3, 1758. This typical small frame church, remodeled in 1855, was sold in 1921. In Oost-Graftdijk a brick church was built in 1856, and both the churches of Oost- and West-Graftdijk acquired organs in 1901. The congregations were separate until 1921, but since 1773 had been served by one pastor. Since the two villages are less than a mile apart, it was decided for financial reasons to unite the congregations and to use the small church at West-Graftdijk. It is now called the Graftdijk congregation. In 1921 the congregation of Graft-Noordeind (q.v.) was united with the Graftdijk congregation. The membership of the Oost- and West-Graftdijk congregations must have been very large in the 17th century (figures are not available). In the 18th century it declined; in 1833 the two congregations together had 67 baptized members. In 1947 Oost-Graftdijk had 91, and West-Graftdijk 42 members; in 1898 the corresponding figures were 54 and 43; in 1953 the total membership was about 65. Since 1900 the congregation had been served by the following ministers: R. J. de Stoppelar 1900-11, Y. S. Buruma 1912-17, A. Keuter 1917-20, J. H. van der Giessen 1929-34. Since the death of van der Giessen the pulpit has been vacant. Graftdijk has a women's circle. Y.S.B., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 896; II, Nos. 1828-30; DB 1861, 158; 1917, 47, 61, 62; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim; ML II, 155.

Grafton Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located near Grafton, N.D., dates back to 1891 when Isaac N. Mastre was converted and baptized. He was ordained to the ministry in 1892. At first he held meetings in different schoolhouses but later a mission hall was erected. The enrollment has varied greatly; in 1953 there were eight members, with Clifford Mastre as pastor. C.M.

Grahe, Jakob and Wilhelm, had themselves baptized by the Dompelaars (q.v.) of Crefeld in the Wupper River with four other members of the Reformed Church in Solingen, Johannes Lobach (q.v.), J. Fr. Henckels, W. Knipper (or Kneppers), and Luther Stettius, and were therefore arrested two years later and taken in chains to Düsseldorf, Feb. 26, 1717. They remained in prison here until autumn. On Dec. 1 they were taken to Jülich, where they spent two years and ten months in damp prison cells at hard labor during the day. Two Mennonites of Rotterdam, Johannes de Koker and his brother Gillis, visited them in prison and drew the attention of the Dutch States-General to this case; on the intercession of Casper Fagel, Grand Pensionary of this body, they were released on Nov. 20, 1720; but they had to leave the country and promise never to return. Wilhelm Grahe wrote a detailed account of this period of suffering, which was published in DB 1861, 51-85.

Other Mennonites who visited them in prison were Jan Kroes (Crous), Gossen Goyen, and W. von der Leyen; after their release they found shelter with Hubert Rahr of Crefeld. The most complete account of the Dompelaar movement is given by Friedrich Nieper. NEFF, VDZ.

M. Göbel, Gesch. des christlichen Lebens III . . . (Coblenz, 1849) 238 ff.; Die Heimat (Crefeld, 1877) 188 ff.; Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Einwanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 201-22; ML II, 155 f.

Gramberg: see Goossen, Helena.

Gramestetten (Grametstetten in the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch), where three Anabaptists met a martyr's death, is a village in Upper Austria three hours from Linz. (ML II, 156.) LOSERTH.

Gran, a city in Hungary: see Esztergom.

Gran, Primatial Library of. Since 1001 Gran (see Esztergom) has been the seat of an archbishop, who is at the same time a prince and primate of Hungary. When the great Anabaptist persecution set in under Maria Theresa in 1757, which ended in a complete liquidation of Anabaptist groups, all their books of instruction or dogma, as well as their private and public correspondence were confiscated (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 578 ff.). On Nov. 8, 1578, order was issued that all suspicious books were to be taken from the brethren in Sobotiste and presented to the authorities for investigation. A similar order was given Dec. 14, 1759, to the Pressburg Komitat: a careful search was to be made among the Anabaptists in Gross-Schützen. The confiscated books were not returned to their owners. On April 9, 1760, the government was informed that the orders had been followed and the books and writings taken from the leaders. In the same year a directive was issued to baptize all infants according to Catholic rites; committees were sent out to convert the Anabaptists. With some they succeeded; most of them accepted the Catholic forms, but remained true to their convictions. These conversions mark the beginning of the end of Anabaptism in Hungary; in contrast to former times, the conversions were now to be accomplished by gentle means. Details are found in the court records, some of which Joseph Beck has published in the appendix to the Geschichts-Bücher. The reports state that many books were successfully hidden by the Hutterites before the coming of the officers. One of these books was, of course, the official Geschicht-Buch.

Most of the confiscated books were put into the Primatial library in Gran, some to the Domkapitel library in Pressburg, some to the Protestant Lyzeal library there, and a relatively large number to the university library in Budapest. The manuscripts in the Primatial library are listed by Beck in his summary of the sources from which he compiled his Geschichts-Bücher. Since his edition is no longer to be found in bookstores, the most important of the manuscripts will be listed here with signatures. The following manuscripts contain exclusively matter in the Geschichts-Bücher.

(1) Codex G—Graner Chronikel (signature G. J. VI. 27), once the property of Andreas Ehrenpreis, one of the leaders. (2) Codex J—Codex Breitmichl (signature G. J. VI. 25), begun in 1591, extends to April 5, 1668. (3) Codex L—Schad'sche Chronik (signature G. J. X. 11), once the property of Mathes Helm, who headed the brotherhood in 1701. (4) Codex O—Codex Artolf (signature G. J. X. 8), once the property of the weaver, Kaspar Artolf. (5) Codex Q (signature G. J. X. 4) without further designation. (6) Codex R—Codex Dreller III (signature G. J. X. 5) was written by the bookbinder Isaak Dreller in 1647 at Sobotiste. (7) Codex T—Codex Ehrenpreis with Hubmaier's motto, "Die Wahrheit ist untötlich." This codex contains a number of brotherhood regulations. The present signature is G. J. VI. 26.

A further list of manuscripts has a mixed content: (1) G. J. X. 9, written in 1574. (2) G. J. VI. 31, containing a defense of the Anabaptists against the charge that they despised government and the ownership of property, and the important letter to the lords of Moravia with a vindication of the faith of the Brethren and their institutions. (3) G. J. X. 33, containing part of an epistle from the Moravian brotherhood to the Swiss Rausenberger in 1601 and a doctrinal statement of the brotherhood. (4) G. J. X. 12 contains an epistle by Andreas Ehrenpreis (also printed in 1652) and the five articles of the great struggle between us and the world: baptism, communion, community of goods, government, and divorce (likewise by Ehrenpreis). (5) G. J. X. 28 contains a report by Hans Schmidt about his imprisonment in Württemberg, then 16 questions on baptism, and a letter by Andreas Ehrenpreis to Daniel Zwicker in Danzig. (6) G. J. X. 14 contains the epistle of Andreas Ehrenpreis (see No. 4) and his discussion on baptism. (7) G. J. X. 27 contains a hymnbook of the brethren in Sobotiste. (8) G. J. XI. 29 contains Riedemann's Rechenschaft. Beck adds that he took some documents from the archives in Gran.

From the above it is clear that in spite of Beck's meritorious work a new systematic research of the archives and of the bishopric of Gran according to the sources is necessary to the history of the Anabaptists. (ML II, 156.) LOSERTH.

Grandidier, Philip Andreas (1752-87), an abbot, historian of Alsace. He died on a journey to study the archives in Lucelle (Sundgau). In a posthumously published work, Oeuvres inédites de Grandidier (Colmar, 1865-68, 6 vv.), he discusses the Mennonites with pleasant objectivity, thus making his book a notable source for Mennonite history, especially in Alsace (q.v.). (ML II, 157.) NEFF.

Gran(d)velle, Antoine Perrenot, Lord of Granvelle (1517-86), Roman Catholic bishop of Utrecht 1567, Archbishop of Mechelen and a cardinal, was one of the most influential advisers of Margaret (q.v.), Duchess of Parma, since 1559 Regent of the Netherlands (both the present Netherlands and Belgium). He was an opponent of William of Orange and an ardent fighter of "heretics," both Calvinists and Anabaptists, and influenced the regent to maintain the imperial decrees and to take to drastic action. In a letter of 1566 he wrote: If we should give freedom . . . to everyone to believe whatever he wishes, we would have not only 'Hugenots' (Calvinists) . . . but also several kinds of Anabaptists, whose intentions are very pernicious for the Republic (common cause) as one might see by what has happened during our memory at Münster and Amsterdam, and a hundred thousand other monstrous sects." vdZ.

A. A. van Schelven, Willem van Oranje (Haarlem, 1933) 67-99; P. Besson, Edits de Persécution contre les Anabaptistes des Pays-Bas . . . (Bern-Neuchatel-Buenos Aires, n.d.) 25-27.

Granger United Missionary Church, located in Yakima Co., Wash., has a seating capacity of 100. In 1955 the membership was 35 with John Detwiler as pastor. Er.B.

Grant (President) and the Russian Mennonite Immigration into the United States. Negotiations of the Russian Mennonites (and Hutterites) with the American government (1873) during Grant's second administration centered about two requests in particular: the acquisition of land (interpreted in the U.S. Senate as a million acres in ten or less solid pieces at a moderate cost) and exemption from military duty. The assumption underlying the former request was that the entire group of Russian Mennonites would transplant their several closed colonies to America to perpetuate their own religious life and culture and the use of the German language, but the main cause for the desire to migrate was not economic opportunity but the abrogation of the long-standing exemption privileges in Russia; and it was hoped that they could secure a "written grant" of privileges and immunities signed by the President similar to the one which had been granted "in perpetuity" to their forebears in Prussia by Catherine of Russia. The following steps of negotiation were taken by representatives of the Russian Mennonites:

(1) A petition for land and exemption was submitted to a U.S. diplomatic officer at St. Petersburg during the middle of 1872. A temporary reply was given to encourage emigration, but later directions from Hamilton Fish, Grant's Secretary of State, were to refrain from making any promises that could not be binding in any event without Senate ratification.

(2) In August 1873 the Hutterites Paul and Lorenz Tschetter, and the Mennonite Tobias Unruh secured a personal interview with President Grant at the White House. Grant was very much in favor of granting the Mennonites some sort of written assurance concerning military service and asked Secretary of State Fish about the possibility of preparing such a statement; but Fish, a man of caution and integrity, warned Grant in a long letter against signing a promise that might later have to be broken in the event state or national legislatures enacted general military conscription laws.

(3) Later in the same year Mennonite Cornelius Jansen secured an interview with Grant; and probably because of Jansen's great diplomatic abilities Grant's interest in the Mennonite request was revived. This time Grant contacted his Secretary of Interior, Columbus Delano; and his concern centered not on military exemption for the Mennonites but on securing for them the land that they desired. The Grant-Delano proposal was submitted to Congress in Grant's 1874 "State of the Union" address, and a bill was subsequently introduced into the Senate which was designed to authorize Delano to withdraw from sale or entry such lands as the Mennonites may have desired to occupy upon arrival, up to 500,000 acres. This bill was debated over a period of several months by prominent legislators, but failed ultimately to come to a vote. The main argument in favor of the bill was not the plight of the Mennonite people in Russia but the advantage of obtaining a large group of what were considered to be high-class agriculturalists. Arguments against the bill were: opposition to the closed community and autonomous Mennonite culture; refusal of the Mennonites to help defend the common country; objection to monopolizing the land together with the possibility of fraud on the part of land agents.

(4) A petition from Mennonite representatives John F. Funk and Amos Herr on behalf of the Russian Mennonites was submitted to the House of Representatives, but was "pigeonholed" for lack of time and support.

Thus the Russian Mennonites received no official encouragement from the United States government to immigrate; and Grant's own personal sympathy with the Mennonite requests must not be interpreted without reference to his general lack of sound judgment on many issues of his administration, which competent historians record had become corrupted with graft and fraud. L.Ha.

Leland Harder, "The Russian Mennonites and American Democracy Under Grant," From the Steppes to the Prairies, edited by Cornelius Krahn (Newton, Mennonite Historical Series, 1949); E. H. Correll, "President Grant and the Mennonite Immigration from Russia," MQR IX (1935) 144-52.

Granum (Alberta) Hutterite Bruderhof (Dariusleut, q.v.) near Granum, 18 miles northwest of Macleod, founded in 1930. Their preacher Michael Tschetter, who was chosen to the ministry in the Spink (S.D.) Bruderhof in 1910, led the Spink brotherhood into Canada in 1918 to found the Stand-Off Colony near Macleod, Alberta. From here he went with several families to found the Granum Bruderhof. Michael Tschetter died in 1940. Jakob Hofer was chosen preacher here in 1934 and confirmed in 1938. In 1947 the Bruderhof had 50 baptized members in a total of 125 souls. D.D.

Grassy Lake Mennonite Brethren Church, located 12 miles south of Grassy Lake in southern Alberta, was founded in 1927 with a baptized membership of seven. From 1936 to 1948 a church basement was used for worship services. A new church was built in 1948 (58 x 28 ft.). In all these years the church has been affiliated with the Coaldale M.B. Church. The first leader was P. Neufeld and the present leader is David Penner, Sr. Ministers who have served the congregation are A. Neumann and David Dyck. The membership in 1954 was 40. D.P., Sr.

Grass (Graess), Heinrich (also Johann), a native of Borken, Westphalia, Germany, and a teacher, was a "prophet" in the Anabaptist "kingdom" of Münster, who left Münster in October 1534 as an ambassador of Jan van Leyden, and was arrested at Iburg by the Bishop of Münster. He saved his life by promising to investigate and betray their military secrets to the bishop. He returned to Münster, leaving it a second time on Jan. 2, 1535, to give the bishop the information, through which treachery a number of military projects of Jan van Leyden were prevented. The supposition that the "unknown messenger from Münster" who read Rothmann's book Van de Wrake before a meeting of Dutch Anabaptists in Waterland near Amsterdam is identical with Heinrich Grass (DB 1892, 11, note) is not very tenable. vdZ.

DB 1896, 10, 12; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 128, 149 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers; C. A. Cornelius, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853) 115-18.

Graudenz, a city (pop. 36,805) of former West Prussia, now Grudziadz in Pomorze, Poland. After the devastating floods of the Vistula River about 1560, large areas of the territory of Graudenz were depopulated. This stricken territory was then largely taken over by Dutch settlers, usually Mennonites, who were granted the privileges of freedom of religion, their own schools, and transporting their products on the Vistula free of taxes. In the 17th century Mennonites predominated in the following villages: Parsken, Kommerau, Klein-Lubin, and Dragass; they were very numerous in the villages of Klein-Wolz, Tresch, Gross-Lubin, and Klein-Lubin.

In Graudenz and its vicinity there were until 1945 numerous Mennonites, especially in the congregations of Montau, Gruppe, and Schönsee. In the "Consignation" of all Mennonite families living in "West Prussia" in 1789 (thus outside the city of Danzig and the region of Thorn, both of which were ceded to Prussia in 1793 in the second partition of Poland) only one locality, Parsken with 20 Mennonites, is listed for the Graudenz area. But according to publications of the Prussian census there were in 1861, 67 Mennonites; in 1871, 77; in 1880, 96; 1890, 108; 1900, 159; and in 1910, 230. Of the 230 Mennonites counted in 1910, 164 lived in the city's domain, and 66 in the country.

This conspicuously strong and promising growth was caused by these factors: the development of the city in general; Graudenz was the "city of schools," and centrally located for the three congregations. It thus seemed that in a few years a separate congregation would be organized with its own preaching service. They began by holding services on the second Sunday of every month in the hall of the inn "Zur Heimat." The first conjoint service was held Nov. 11, 1897. Communion was also observed. The congregation was served by the preachers of the three country churches, occasionally supported by guest preachers. The idea of forming an independent congregation and building a church (Menn. Bl., 1905, p. 8, 27, and 34) was never carried out. In consequence of impoverishment many members moved out.

Graudenz was the scene of the memorable meeting between Frederick William III of Prussia and Abraham Nickel (q.v.) of Jamrau, the deacon at Culm (Schönsee), Oct. 8, 1806, in the "gouverneur" house, later a school, Nonnenstrasse 5 at the Luisenbrücke. W.K.

Xaver Froelich, Geschichte des Graudenzer Kreises (2 vol., 2d ed. Danzig, 1884-85); F. Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913) 132; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 31-33; ML II, 159 f.

Gravenhage, 's: see Hague, The.

Gravensteen, Het, a medieval castle at Gent, Belgium, parts of which are still preserved, including the dungeons in which Anabaptists and Mennonites were imprisoned during the 16th century, as well as the courtyard in which a number of them were beheaded or drowned. vdZ.

Graz, a city (pop. 226,721) in Styria, Austria (also called Bairisch-Grätz to distinguish it from Windischgrätz, as in the Anabaptist chronicles), the capital of the three territories of Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola, all possessions of Archduke Charles of Hapsburg, the youngest son of Emperor Ferdinand I. It enters into Anabaptist history in the 1530's and 1540's, not because it was an Anabaptist center, but because the Anabaptists seized at other places were usually tried and executed there. In the second half of the 16th century the local authorities were more intent than the national or church authorities in keeping Anabaptists out of the country. The famous "Pacification" concluded between these three reluctant duchies and Archduke Karl III at Bruck on the Mur in 1578 granted toleration to the Lutherans, but obligated them not to tolerate "any bookdealer who . . . distributes all kinds of sectarian tracts and books."

In the 1530's and 1540's the great Anabaptist movement came from Upper Austria, chiefly Linz, to Styria; the thorough church inspection of 1528 revealed that the country was no longer free of Anabaptists. There were already some Anabaptists in Graz; one of them, from Upper Austria, was cross-examined. It was learned that they met in the house of a painter named Kasper (q.v.) above the new parsonage. The house was ordered to be razed; but the painter's wife appealed to the authorities that the house was her inheritance from her father, and she herself was not an Anabaptist. The judges and the council reported on Aug. 22, 1530, that one baptism had taken place in the house. The artist himself had been baptized there two years before by a priest named Bernhardin. The house was destroyed.

Seven Anabaptists in the Kapfenberg district were seized there and transferred to Graz. But the cross-examinations did not yield the results desired by the government; therefore Hans Ungnad requested Stubenberger on Jan. 26, 1526, to send him the statements of these Anabaptists and the books in their possession. These Anabaptists were then kept imprisoned in Graz three full years. They refused to be converted, and stressed some of their most important doctrines. The governor, as Michel Meixner wrote to the Cardinal-Bishop Bernhard of Trent, Jan. 24, 1534, "had them taken to the castle . . . and had a preacher preach to them, but none of them would be converted. They stopped before the door and said they would not enter a house of idols; nor did they listen to the sermon, but talked to each other, and comforted and strengthened each other." "The governor then requested the clergymen assigned to the task by the Archbishop of Salzburg to deal with them; he wanted to have nothing more to do with them; he calls them pious, simple people." "Now the provost of Pöllau and the other clergy worked with them two days. If one tries to instruct them in the pure Word of God and convince them of their error, they say they do not need it, for they have been convinced by God. If one says they should call upon God to be enlightened by Him, they do not need that either, for they are already enlightened; in short, one accomplishes nothing with them. If one wishes to apply a serious penalty, it is best to let them go and to expel them from the country."

In another letter—it is the supplement to a report of Jan. 21, 1534—Meixner also states that "no punishments are inflicted on the Anabaptists." It is a burden to him that he must deal with the governor concerning them, who always thought they were simple and pious people. "Recently the Anabaptists who have been so long in prison, have been taken out and preached to. None of them wanted to enter the chapel and when they were admonished and the officers tried to correct them they spoke sacrilegious words against the holy sacrament." Meixner advised that if they were not to be punished, they should at least be expelled, to rid the ruler of the expense.

Unfortunately they were very severely dealt with. The Geschichts-Bücher say, "In 1534 Brother Daniel Kropf was one of three seized in Graz in Styria and executed with the sword. At this time four sisters were executed for the sake of divine truth. All seven of them bravely testified to the divine truth." "Of this Daniel there are still some letters in the brotherhood, concerning baptism and other points, also four Christian songs that he wrote."

Beck mentions one of these writings, the "Confession of faith that he . . . presented to the council at Graz, 1534, . . . why we, having left wife or husband, children, possessions, house and home, were imprisoned as criminals by you, and have now been long imprisoned and tortured." Kropf rejects water baptism and infant baptism. Communion is not "physical but spiritual." In water baptism he sees only a symbol of the covenant God has made with man through Christ. He does not believe that salvation lies in it. Salvation lies in faith in Him whom God sent. Ungnad's letter shows that he was a statesman and friendly to the Reformation; indeed, two decades later he lost his position for the sake of it.

From this time on there is no mention of Anabaptists in Graz except when they are taken through the city, as when the prisoners of Falkenstein are dragged from Falkenstein in Lower Austria to the sea, having been condemned to die as galley slaves. Only occasionally does one remember an Anabaptist who still lies in Graz in prison, like Brother André Keller, of whom the letter of Amon to the brethren at Falkenstein is mindful.

LOSERTH.

J. Loserth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," Mitteilungen des Hist. Vereins für Steiermark XLII and L, and Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Steiermark X; idem, Veröffentlichungen der Historischen Landeskommission VI, 22; Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 115, 116, 278; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 48, 158, 182; ML II, 161 f.

Grebel, Conrad (ca. 1498-1526), can be considered the chief founder of Swiss-South German Anabaptism. Much less widely known than Hans Denk (q.v.) or Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.), he is nevertheless historically of much greater significance, for without him Anabaptism in its historical form would probably never have come into existence and he represents original Anabaptism in the form in which it has been perpetuated to the present day, whereas Denk and Hubmaier represent sideward movements from the main stream, both of which diverged significantly on major points and both of which soon died out.

Grebel was viewed as the outstanding leader of original Swiss Anabaptism (properly called the "Swiss Brethren" movement) by his enemies, as well as his followers. Zwingli viewed him as the head of the new heretical faction in Zürich. In January 1525, just after the break with what was destined to become the Anabaptist group, he wrote to Vadian, "Conrad Grebel and a few other less important persons are holding fast to their standpoint." In a letter to Oecolampadius (q.v.) and others in November 1526, shortly after Grebel's death, Zwingli referred to Grebel as "the ringleader (coryphaeus) of the Anabaptists." Johannes Kessler (q.v.) of St. Gall, in his famous Reformation diary, Sabbata, calls Grebel the arch-Anabaptist (Erzwidertouffer). And the records of a very impartant disputation (q.v.), held in 1538 between the evangelical preachers of Bern and the Bernese Anabaptist leaders, the minutes of which still lie unpublished in the state archives in Bern (labeled Unnütze Papiere), indicate that the Brethren counted Grebel as the "first Anabaptist" (der erste Täufer). Conclusive evidence of Grebel's position of leadership in the founding of the Anabaptist movement comes from a highly interesting account of the actual birth of Anabaptism which tells us that Grebel performed the first adult baptism in Zürich on the night of Jan. 21, 1525. The story found its way into the remarkable manuscript chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren, known as the Geschicht-Buch. In that account of the epochal meeting in the house of Felix Manz (q.v.), when 15 brethren were gathered in prayer after the mandate of the Zürich council proscribing the further propagation of their faith, we are told that as they arose from prayer, moved by the Spirit of God, George Blaurock asked Conrad Grebel to baptize him on the confession of his faith, thus recognizing Grebel as the spiritual leader of the little company. This Conrad Grebel did, performing the first adult baptism in Reformation times, the model for millions of similar baptisms since that day.

The attempt to trace the career, theology, and significance of Conrad Grebel is severely hampered by scarcity of sources. His was a short life (ca. 1498-1526) with scarcely three years of public activity of a sort sufficiently important to bring his name into public records or into the private correspondence of contemporary leaders, and all that is said of Grebel in both of these sources could probably be written on less than three typewritten pages. The only writing of any sort which he prepared for publication—a brief pamphlet of less than five thousand words—has been lost, and can with difficulty be only partially reconstructed from the translated quotations found in Zwingli's counterattack in the Elenchus. Three relatively insignificant short poems have been preserved, and one short petition for safe conduct to the Zürich council in 1525. Fortunately, 69 letters written by Grebel (as well as three written to him) have been preserved. They were written between September 1517 and July 1525, two to Ulrich Zwingli (q.v.), one to Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), one to a co-worker named Andreas Castelberger (q.v.) of Zürich, nine to Oswald Myconius (q.v.) of Lucerne, and 56 to Grebel's close friend, former teacher, and brother-in-law, Dr. Joachim von Watt, the reformer of the Swiss city of St. Gall, commonly known as Vadian (q.v.). Most of these letters, however, were written during Grebel's student years at Vienna and Paris, and throw practically no light on the important phase of his life as Anabaptist leader. The three letters to Grebel which have been preserved include one from Benedikt Burgauer (1523), a minor evangelical preacher of St. Gall, one from Erhard Hegenwalt, a young evangelical friend in Wittenberg (1525), and one from Vadian (1524). One book of Grebel's library has been preserved in the state library in Zürich.

Conrad Grebel was born about 1498 as the second of six children to Junker Jakob Grebel and his wife Dorothea Fries. For a century and a half the Grebel family had been one of the leading families of the city of Zürich, one of the small number of wealthy patrician families of the lesser landed nobility who had for years directed the political, economic, and military affairs of the city. The family had always had one or more members in the city council and usually furnished the guild-master for one of the aristocratic merchant guilds. Grebels had frequently served as magistrates, and for two generations before the Reformation no important political event took place in Zürich in which a Grebel did not have part. The most influential of all the Grebels was Jakob Grebel, Conrad's father, a wealthy iron merchant, who reached the peak of a successful career in politics in the first years of the Reformation. From 1499 to 1512 he served a double term as magistrate (Vogt) of the territory of Grüningen, and from that time on served as a representative of the canton of Zürich at practically all of the meetings of the Swiss Confederacy, as well as serving frequently as plenipotentiary in important Swiss and foreign negotiations.

Jakob Grebel's family also played its full part in the patrician social life of the city of Zürich and northeast Switzerland. The daughters married prominent men, one becoming the wife of Vadian, noted humanist professor and sometime rector of the University of Vienna, later burgomaster and reformer of the city of St. Gall. The two sons of Jakob Grebel, one of whom died young, were given every advantage that wealth and prestige could bring them, one (Andreas) becoming a courtier in King Ferdinand's court in Vienna, and Conrad being sent to the best universities of the time, Basel, Vienna, and Paris.

At the height of prestige, fate struck the family heavy blows. The only surviving son, Conrad, became an Anabaptist heretic, dying as an exile in 1526, while the father was executed in disgrace a few months later on the charge of receiving foreign pensions. However, the family name survived, the sons of Conrad being reared by his surviving relatives in the Reformed faith, and Grebels continued to be prominent in the affairs of Zürich. A grandson of the Anabaptist Conrad, also named Conrad, became treasurer of the city in 1624, and the latter's grandson, another Conrad Grebel, became burgomaster in 1669. A recent member of the Supreme Court of the canton of Zürich was Dr. Hans von Grebel. His son, Hans von Grebel, was in 1954 serving as pastor of the Grossmünster church in Zürich.

Perhaps H. Richard Niebuhr is right in asserting in his book The Social Sources of Denominationalism that the Anabaptist movement was a movement of the socially and economically oppressed lower classes, but it is difficult to apply this theory to the founder of the movement, Conrad Grebel, the wealthy, socially elite, university-trained patrician son of an unusually successful father.

Grebel's Education. Conrad Grebel probably grew up in the castle at Grüningen, a few miles east of Zürich, where his father was magistrate during Conrad's boyhood days. His education must have begun in the Latin School of the Grossmünster church in Zürich, known as the Carolina because it was supposed to have been founded by Charlemagne. Here he received the typical Latin training of the time, quite in the old-fashioned scholastic spirit.

His university career began in October 1514, when he matriculated for the winter semester at the University of Basel, which was at that time in a very low state, with an average of 50 new matriculants each semester. The newer humanism was just beginning to come in. Glarean (q.v.) (Heinrich Loriti), the outstanding Swiss humanist of the younger school, had just come to Basel and established a bursa, or boarding academy. Since all the students of the philosophical faculty were required to live in one of the numerous bursae, Grebel joined Glarean's bursa. Fortunately, Glarean was an excellent teacher, and under his tutelage the young Grebel was introduced for the first time into the world of humanist learning and living. Basel was barely beginning to come into its glory as a humanist center. Erasmus (q.v.) had come two months before, in August 1514, to remain through the winter. The great Froben had begun his career as an independent printer the year before. Beatus Rhenanus had been there since 1511, Hans Holbein the Younger came possibly during the winter of 1514-15, Oecolampadius came in 1515, Amerbach, Fonteius, and other lesser humanist scholars were already occupied as proofreaders in the great printing houses. The growing humanist life was just organizing itself, the foreigners gathering around Erasmus and Rhenanus in the famous Sodalitas Basiliensis, while the lesser Swiss group gathered around Glarean. It was in this latter group that Conrad Grebel moved during the first semester of study, probably scarcely aware of the significance of his environment. Before he could enter fully into this new life, his father transferred him to the University of Vienna, where he had secured a four-year stipend for him from the Emperor Maximilian.

A constant stream of young Swiss students, particularly from Zürich and eastern Switzerland, had been flowing to Vienna for the preceding five years, partly under the influence of Ulrich Zwingli, who had himself studied there in 1501. The center of the Swiss student group in Vienna was Vadian, a famous Swiss humanist professor from the city of St. Gall, who took it upon himself to become the friend and patron of the Swiss boys. Vadian had been in Vienna since 1510, had a doctor's degree in medicine as well as philosophy, was a noted humanist poet, crowned poet laureate in 1514 by the emperor, was appointed professor of rhetoric in 1516 as successor to the great Angelo Cospi, and the same year elected rector of the university.

When Conrad Grebel came to Vienna to enroll as a student in the summer of 1515, to remain for three years until June 1518, he naturally became a part of the Swiss group gathered around Vadian. Indeed, he soon became an intimate friend and protégé of the great professor. The warmth and intimacy of this friendship is elquently attested by the 56 extant letters written by Grebel to his "dearest teacher and most faithful friend." Vadian encouraged and promoted the young student in every possible way, recognizing in him outstanding gifts and a splendid personality well qualified for future leadership. He seems to have counted him as the most promising of the Swiss students. Out of this friendship came good fortune for Vadian, for it brought him in the summer of 1519 Conrad's younger sister Martha as wife.

When Vadian suddenly left Vienna in June 1518, partly because of the plague which was raging and partly because he had decided to exchange a professorship in Vienna for the life of a physician and scholar in his native St. Gall, Grebel went with him. However, he remained in Zürich but a short time, for his father had secured a royal scholarship from the king of France for his son—one of the two which were being granted annually by Francis I to each Swiss canton—and in September he set out for Paris on what was intended to be the climax of a successful scholastic career. There he spent two further years, certainly in study, although the rather inadequate matriculation records of the university do not contain his name. He went to Paris with high hopes, being particularly happy again to join the bursa conducted by his former Basel teacher, Glarean, for the latter had conducted a bursa for Swiss students in Paris since 1517.

But the high hopes with which Grebel came to Paris were not to be fulfilled. After three months he became involved in a serious quarrel with Glarean and left him, not to return until an entire year had passed. And in July 1519 a severe plague broke out in Paris which drove Grebel and his friends away from the city for six months. His troubles were further increased when he became involved in several student brawls. He also suffered somewhat from illness due to his loose living, and finally his father, becoming incensed at reports he had received, cut him off from funds. Even Vadian threatened to break off his friendship and practically ceased writing. Under the blows of fate and circumstance Grebel lost heart and returned home to Zürich, his high hopes disappointed, without having completed his studies or secured any kind of degree. It was the end of his student days. He determined to seek a reconciliation with his parents and Vadian, and hoped for some career in his home city, although his self-confidence had been badly shaken and his inner life was full of conflict.

For almost six years Conrad Grebel was a student among the humanists of the universities, and it is of importance to inquire the significance of his training. His chief teachers were Vadian and Heiligmaier at Vienna, and Glarean and Nicholas Beraldus at Paris, of whom Glarean and Vadian alone exerted a significant influence upon him. It is true that in Paris Glarean counted in the circle of his friends the great Budaeus and Faber Stapulensis, but there is no evidence of any sort that Grebel came into contact with them or was influenced by them. Alike in Paris, Vienna, and Basel, Grebel's contacts were primarily with the newer type of transalpine literary humanism, which characterized the better Swiss, French, German, and Austrian humanists. While this humanism was not the immoral, pagan Italian type, it was also not the Christian humanism of the Erasmian type. Vadian and Glarean were solid, stable scholars, whose chief concern in life was to promote the liberal arts, to write poetry, to study geography, mathematics, and natural history, and to enjoy the fellowship of like-minded spirits. They were not greatly concerned about a moral and religious reform of society, for they had not yet been caught in the growing tide of interest in the great Christian Renaissance which Erasmus was promoting with ever-increasing zeal. This is the type of humanism to which Grebel was exposed, and which is reflected in the numerous letters which he wrote to Vadian and Myconius (one to Zwingli) during his student days. At the university he learned Latin, Greek, and probably Hebrew, learned to write Latin well, to appreciate the great classic writers and scholars, but failed to acquire any new religious concerns or attitudes. He did not become a pagan, for he retained his traditional faith in the church and her dogmas, but neither did he become an Erasmian reformer.

If Conrad Grebel ever acquired a humanistic interest in the Erasmian type of reform of religion—which is more than doubtful—it could have come only during the late months of 1520 and 1521 after his return to Zürich. There he sought and found fellowship in the little group of returned students and humanists who gathered with Zwingli to study Greek and Hebrew during the early years of Zwingli's ministry in Zürich; but he found little satisfaction in this activity. At odds with his father, he finally decided to leave home to seek a career as a proofreader in Basel. But this project likewise did not succeed, and after two months in the printing establishment of Cratander in Basel (August and September 1521) he returned to Zürich, hoping to break down the bitter opposition of his parents to his proposed marriage with a girl below his social status. Failing in this, he suddenly went through with the marriage in February 1522, during one of the frequent absences of his father from home. The break with his family was complete, and was only partially restored by the mediation of one of the city pastors, an associate of Zwingli. During this period of stress and strain, lasting a year and a half, Grebel may have been influenced by Zwingli's more religiously motivated type of humanism, but there are no traces of such influence in his correspondence during this period.

As we come to the close of Grebel's humanist period, and see that it made no evident contribution to his religious life or thinking, it may be worth while to point out that this conclusion seriously militates against the theory of the humanist origin of Anabaptism which has recently gained ground. Certainly Conrad Grebel did not become an Anabaptist because he was a humanist. If in the minds of some scholars Anabaptist theology and ethics seem to reflect somewhat Erasmian humanistic Christianity with its emphasis upon Sermon on the Mount ethics, the Erasmian influence certainly did not enter Anabaptism through Conrad Grebel, the founder of the movement.

Grebel as a Zwinglian. The year 1522 marked an epoch for Conrad Grebel which was to lead to a transformation of his entire life. Unfortunately, there is a hiatus in his correspondence for nine months during this vital period, but from the middle of the year 1522 it is evident that Grebel was a changed man. Now he was deeply interested in the progress of the evangelical cause in Zürich; he became an ardent partisan of Zwingli and his reform program. The spirit and atmosphere as well as the content of his further correspondence are so radically different from what they were before that we must believe that a genuine conversion and renewal of life took place during the spring of 1522. The explanation is not far to seek. Grebel was won by the powerful Gospel preaching of Ulrich Zwingli, as many other citizens of Zürich were. From the beginning of his career in Zürich in 1519, Zwingli had carried through a strikingly new program of expository preaching covering many of the books of the New Testament. Like the learned and respected canon, Heinrich Engelhart, who through Zwingli's preaching confessed that he was "changed from a doctor of Roman law to a poor scholar of Christ," Grebel was changed from a loose-living humanist university student to a devout and earnest Christian. Henceforth until his untimely death in the summer of 1526—four short years ahead—he was in the forefront of those who were bringing in the new era, first for a year and a half as an enthusiastic supporter of Zwingli, and then for over two years as the founder of the new Anabaptist movement.

As Zwingli from 1522 on gradually swung into a program of practical reform in Zürich after having laid the foundation through four years of preaching, Grebel went with him. Almost at once he was a leader in the devoted group of younger men who joined Zwingli's side in the conflict. Zwingli recognized and valued Grebel's support and permitted him to publish a vigorous poetic ode hailing the Reformation in his booklet entitled Archeteles which was published in August 1522. In October of that year Melchior Macrinus of Solothurn wrote to Zwingli that he had heard that Grebel had developed into an exceptional promoter of the Gospel, a fact which gave Macrinus great joy, for such gifted and learned young men could render the Gospel and the world a great service. During these months a very close friendship developed between Zwingli and Grebel. Zwingli apparently planned to have Grebel appointed to the university or the theological school which he expected to establish. (The theory that Grebel broke with Zwingli, as claimed by Emil Egli and others, because the latter refused to give him the desired appointment is contrary to fact.) A few years later, after the break, Zwingli was very bitter over the broken friendship and complained of ingratitude on the part of Grebel for whom he had done so much.

The close relationship between Grebel and Zwingli was maintained until the second Zürich disputation of October 1523. In this period the views of the two men must have agreed in all essential respects. For instance, in the matter of tithes, one of the burning issues of the hour, Grebel indicated agreement with Zwingli. During this time he also formed a fast friendship with Felix Manz (q.v.), young Zürich student just returned from Paris, who had joined the ranks of the Zwinglians, and who was to become in January 1527 the first Anabaptist martyr in Zürich.

Beginning, however, with the October 1523 disputation, a cleavage arose between Zwingli and Grebel, which gradually grew wider during the ensuing months, until in the fall of 1524 it led to a complete break. It went so far as to cause Zwingli to condemn Grebel and his friends publicly from the pulpit as "Satans going about as angels of light," while Grebel responded by condemning Zwingli and his assistants as false shepherds not true to the divine calling and the divine Word.

The October disputation was called to put pressure on the city council to institute immediate reforms in the church life of Zürich by abolishing the mass and doing away with images. Zwingli made valiant speeches during the disputation urging this very thing. But when he saw that the slow-moving city fathers were not ready for such a radical step, he beat a strategic retreat. When Grebel observed the change of front, he at once openly protested and demanded that the city council should not be allowed to decide the matter, since all were agreed on what the Word of God required. But Zwingli would not break with the council. As a matter of fact, the mass was not abolished by the council until May 1525, almost two years later. During all the intervening time Zwingli and others continued to officiate at a ceremony which they had publicly condemned as an unscriptural abomination. This strange compromise was a heavy burden on the conscience of many devout Zürichers, not only of Conrad Grebel, to whom it seemed as though the Word of God was being set aside and made subordinate to the action of a political body. Here then was the issue: should the civil state continue to dictate the faith and life and worship of the church, or should the pastors and laity themselves carry through the necessary reform in church life according to their God-given convictions? Fundamentally, the issue was whether the new evangelical movement was to eventuate in a state church under civil control as before, or in a new type of free voluntary organization. Both Luther and Zwingli, as well as the other reformers, faced this fundamental issue, and decided to continue the medieval state church with a predominant control by the civil state in the life and faith of the church. Perhaps it was a wise and statesmanlike decision, but in terms of absolute principle and plain Scripture teaching it was indefensible. At least so it seemed to Conrad Grebel.

Conrad Grebel and his friends went home from the October disputation shocked and dismayed, feeling that they had been betrayed by the leader whom they trusted. Zwingli, on his part, bearing the burden of actual responsibility, sensing the strength of the Catholic opposition, could not help viewing his critics as irresponsible young radicals who had not yet learned the lesson of patience. The difference in point of view cut deep, and during the winter months an earnest and serious debate was carried on between Zwingli on the one side, and his former friends and supporters on the other, particularly Grebel, Manz, and Stumpf. According to Zwingli's own testimony, these men came to him repeatedly with the proposal that he set up a new kind of voluntary Christian church, one composed of true believers only, willing to live a life of true righteousness before God and man according to the teaching of Christ and the apostles, and in which a Gospel discipline would be maintained. This new church would be freed from state control, although its members would endeavor to secure a true Christian membership on the city council so that the latter would support and not hinder the work of the church. For months the struggle continued, Grebel hoping against hope that Zwingli would adopt this program, for apparently there had been some discussion of these principles earlier, with Zwingli not at all averse to them. (In 1523, for instance, Zwingli had been willing to abandon infant baptism.) But Zwingli had made up his mind that he would not follow the new plan. He feared the consequences. Would there be enough true Christians to carry on the church, and what would happen to the unregenerate mass of nominal Christians? Grebel wanted absolute loyalty to the Word of God regardless of consequences. And he was willing to accept the consequences in his own personal experience.

Those who held to Grebel's position and joined him in the break with Zwingli—a small company of not more than 15 men—did not rush into precipitate action. They met frequently for fellowship and Bible study, Grebel and Manz expounding the Scripture from the Greek and Hebrew text. They meditated, prayed, and waited. But while they waited they sought to find allies outside of Zürich. In this seeking Grebel took the lead. In the summer of 1524 he wrote to Andreas Carlstadt, who apparently had broken with Luther on somewhat similar grounds as Grebel had with Zwingli. And in October Carlstadt himself appeared in Zürich for a short time, obviously to see whether he could establish himself with the Grebel group in a new program. But the bitter opposition of Zwingli, together with the evident weakness of the Grebel group, as well as possible differences of program, no doubt convinced him of the impracticability of the move, and Carlstadt faded out of the picture.

Meanwhile Grebel had heard of another Lutheran preacher who had apparently had a break with Luther—Thomas Müntzer of Altstedt in Saxony. Here might be a possible ally. He secured two of Müntzer's booklets, in which he found much that was good, and some that was bad. But on the whole Müntzer seemed promising. So in September 1524 he wrote to Müntzer in the name of his little group, encouraging him to continue in his opposition to Luther, but warning him of several false steps he was making. (The latest and best edition of this exceedingly important document is to be found in H. Boehmer and P. Kirn, Thomas Müntzers Briefwechsel, Leipzig, 1931, pp. 92-101. The only English translation appears in W. Rauschenbusch, "The Zurich Anabaptists and Thomas Münzer" in Amer. Journal of Theology IX, 1905, 91-105.) Before the letter was sent off, a Zürich friend returned from Saxony with the information that Müntzer was apparently ready to use violence to promote his program, and on the other hand seemed to be unwilling to dispense altogether with the ancient forms of worship of the church which had no basis in Scripture. So Grebel added an appendix to his letter, chiding Müntzer and expressing concern lest Müntzer should turn out to be a disappointment to those who were dissatisfied with Zwingli and Luther and wanted a true reformation and reconstruction of the church according to the Scripture alone, doing away with all mere customs and traditions of men. Grebel's fears were only too well founded; Müntzer, too, proved to be a broken reed. However, even the hoped-for contact with Müntzer was never established, for Grebel's letter never reached Müntzer, but returned to Grebel and was apparently turned over upon his death to Vadian in St. Gall, where it is found today among the Vadian manuscripts in the St. Gall library. Some scholars have erred in supposing that this letter proved a community of faith and practice between Grebel and Müntzer; it actually proves the opposite. Müntzer probably died without ever having heard of Grebel and his group in Zürich. Later enemies of the Anabaptist movement, following the lead of Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.), have insisted that Grebel and his friends frequently visited Müntzer during the latter's brief visit to Basel and southern Baden in November 1524, two months after the above-mentioned letter was written. But there is not the slightest evidence of this. Zwingli never mentioned such a visit in his extensive attack on the Anabaptists, and certainly he would not have failed to connect them with Müntzer's revolution if he could have done so. The legend of the connection of the two is a pious fraud, a pure invention on the part of Bullinger, who was anxious to clear the name of his beloved Zürich from the stain of the Anabaptist heresy and was glad to be able to assign the origin of the movement to an outside source in faraway Saxony.

It is worthy of note that Grebel also wrote to Luther in the summer of 1524, receiving no written answer but the assurance through a mutual friend, Erhard Hegenwalt (q.v.), that Luther was not ill-disposed toward Grebel and his group.

Having failed to establish any outside contact, Grebel and his group were forced to rely upon their own resources. The closing months of 1524 were full of increasing conflict for them. Open threats from the pulpit, as well as private warnings, made it all too plain that suffering and persecution awaited them. In a touching letter to his friend Vadian in December 1524, Grebel indicates his fears for the future and his determination to press on unflinchingly upon the course he felt God wanted him to follow. He says, "I do not believe that persecution will fail to come. . . . By their fruits ye shall know them, by persecution and sword. . . . May God give grace; I hope to God that He will grant the medicine of patience thereto, if it is not to be otherwise . . . and may peace, faith, and salvation be established and obtained" (Vadianische Briefsammlung, III, 97).

The final break came over the question of infant baptism, although this was in reality merely a reflection of the major issue, which was that of the character of the church. The issue was whether the church was to be a universal organization including the entire population by birth and infant baptism as heretofore, or whether it was to be an organization composed of adult believers only who were prepared to assume the full obligations of discipleship. It was Zwingli and not Grebel who forced the issue in a bitter determination to root out the opposition to his program. The first refusals to baptize infants occurred in the spring of 1524 in the parish of Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), and were not due to Grebel's influence. However, Grebel certainly sympathized with the objectors and without doubt supported them. Zwingli and the council sought to win the objectors to infant baptism by private discussion, but the objectors asked for Scripture proof that infant baptism was commanded, which of course could not be given, and all the devious and specious arguments which Zwingli and his fellow pastors used could not move these simple-minded Biblicists from their fundamental position. It was clear that only vigorous action, including the use of the force by the state if necessary, would suffice to quell what Zwingli called rebellion (Aufruhr). So the decision was made to hold a public debate on Jan. 17, 1525, to be followed by a decree of the council on the matter. The story of the debate and its outcome is familiar history. As leader of the dissenting group, Grebel played a major part, assisted by Felix Manz and George Blaurock (q.v.). The outcome was two severe council mandates of Jan. 18 and 21, 1525, ordering a complete cessation of activity by Grebel and Manz and their associates, forbidding the Bible study meetings of the group, and ordering immediate baptism of all unbaptized infants on pain of exile from the canton. The final break was at hand. Grebel himself had an unbaptized daughter two weeks old who, as he said, "had not yet been baptized and bathed in the Romish water bath," and whom he did not intend to baptize. No sooner was the issue raised than the answer was given. The Grebel group would not compromise under any circumstance, for their consciences were bound by the Word of God as much as Luther's was at Worms. They felt that they had taken a Scriptural position which had not been refuted from the Word of God by Zwingli and the city council. The Word of God was to be trampled underfoot by the brutal power of the state. Already on the next day after the first mandate Zwingli knew the outcome, for he wrote to Vadian on Jan. 19, "Grebel persists in his stand."

When the little group of Brethren met for counsel to determine their course of action, probably on the evening of Jan. 21, they had no program of introducing rebaptism. In fact, such a thing had never been mentioned in the entire course of the struggle. But in a moment of inspiration by what they confidently believed was divine guidance, adult baptism was introduced in this little meeting, with Grebel performing the first baptism, as related earlier in this article. This was the birthday of Anabaptism.

The story of the Anabaptist movement from this point on is familiar. The little group that had met on the evening of Jan. 21, 1525, went out from their meeting with a sense of divine mission and endowment upon them. Fearing neither Zwingli nor the council, they went from house to house and into the towns and villages of the countryside teaching and preaching and urging men and women everywhere to join them in their new fellowship. The response was remarkable. In spite of repeated arrests and fines and imprisonments, the movement grew. Apparently it was not to be stopped. By Easter time Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and practically his whole parish in Waldshut (q.v.) had been baptized with three hundred adult participants, and in St. Gall Grebel had great success, so that about five hundred were baptized at one time. In consternation the Zürich council called upon the other cantons of Switzerland to help to stamp out the heresy, for it was spreading to St. Gall, Appenzell, Grisons, Aargau, Basel, Lucerne, Bern, in fact everywhere. Despairing of lesser measures, Zürich finally, in November 1526 established the death penalty by drowning for participation in the new movement. This example was followed widely within and without Switzerland. The movement was checked and soon limited to but a small number of families in scattered places, chiefly in the Emmental (q.v.) near Bern, although as late as 1700 there were still a few Anabaptists left in the Zürich countryside.

The strict Zürich mandates made it almost impossible for Grebel to stay in the city, where he was well known, and carry on an aggressive program. Leaving the work in Zürich to less known coworkers, he set out on a mission to surrounding cities to win pastors and leaders to his cause. Several weeks in February 1525 were spent in Schaffhausen (q.v.) where it appeared for a time as though he might win Sebastian Hofmeister (q.v.), the city pastor. Forced to leave the city, he returned to Zürich for a secret visit. Then followed a call to St. Gall about Easter time, where one of his associates, Wolfgang Ulimann (q.v.), whom he had baptized in the Rhine near Schaffhausen in February, was having remarkable success, and where he also perhaps hoped to find at least toleration at the hands of Vadian. After a successful mission there he returned to the neighborhood of Zürich and spent most of the summer preaching with considerable success in the territory of Grüningen just east of Zürich, working much with the village pastors. In October 1525 he was taken captive together with Manz and Blaurock and put in prison in Zürich on an indeterminate sentence; but by good fortune the entire group escaped in March 1526, after six months' imprisonment, and at once resumed their preaching activity.

During the winter in prison, Grebel evidently succeeded in preparing a brief defense of the position of the group on baptism in reply to the arguments advanced by Zwingli. He had tried during the summer before to accomplish this and to find a printer, but was frustrated in his intentions. It seems that after his escape from prison he succeeded in finding a printer and circulating a small number of the booklets. No copy is extant, but Zwingli attempted to refute the booklet in detail in his Elenchus which was published in July 1527.

Worn and weary, in ill health from the long imprisonment and the hardships he had been compelled to undergo, Grebel sought to find a safer field of labor and possibly the rest and quiet which he so sorely needed by going to the region of Maienfeld in the canton of Grisons, where his oldest sister had been living for some time. There is no record of his movements or activities in this region, except for the brief statement in Kessler's Sabbata that shortly after his arrival in Maienfeld he died of the plague. Nothing is known of his burial place, nor of the exact time of his death, although it must have taken place about July 1526. He did not die in prison as Neff and others have claimed.

Grebel's Theology. Zwingli considered his struggle with the Anabaptists in Zürich 1524-27 a desperately serious conflict. As early as May 1525 he wrote his friend Vadian that all previous conflicts (referring to the Catholic opposition) were as child's play compared with this one (Zwingli Werke VIII, 332). The seriousness of the conflict was due not so much to the number of the Anabaptists as to the power of their ideas and the conviction with which they were held. What were these ideas of Conrad Grebel and his associates which Zwingli feared and with which he differed so radically?

In the first place, they were not ideas referring to the major classic Christian doctrines. It can be said without contradiction that on the cardinal points of Christian theology Zwingli and Grebel agreed, for the former declared that the Grebelites differed from him only on unimportant minor points. In his Commentario de vera et falsa religione (Commentary on True and False Religion) written in March 1525 he says, "But that no one may suppose that the dissension is in regard to doctrines which concern the inner man, let it be said that the Anabaptists make us difficulty only because of unimportant outward things, such as these: whether infants or adults should be baptized and whether a Christian may be a magistrate" (Zwingli Werke III, 872). Zwingli was, of course, mistaken in his judgment that the issues involved concerned only unimportant things, but he was right in denying that the issues concerned the inner aspect of Christian faith or experience. Grebel and his brethren were consistent evangelicals. If we take at face value Zwingli's statement that baptism and magistracy were the chief points at issue, we see that the deeper issues involved were those of the nature of the church and the relation of the Christian to the world. These are of course major theological points.

Grebel's doctrine of the church was substantially that held by the modern nonconformist churches, particularly the Baptists and the Mennonites, and he was the first to hold this position. According to Grebel, the church as a local body comes into existence through the preaching of the Word and its voluntary acceptance, and through the consequent conversion and renewal of life of individual believers. By faith the individual members are united together and incorporated into the body of Christ. This church is in truth a fellowship of brethren in life and suffering, a communio sanctorum, which is maintained by the inward bond of faith and the outward bond of love. When a member of the body fails to maintain love toward the brethren or does not order his life according to the Gospel, he breaks the bond of fellowship, and if he will not hear the church and repent and change his life he must be excluded from the fellowship of the believers. New members may be received into the church only upon a confession of faith and separation from sin, upon evidence of a renewal of life and a walk in holiness. The government, ordinances, and activities of the church must be based solely upon the express teaching of the Word of God or the example of Christ and the apostles, with the rigid exclusion of "opinions of men" (a Grebel expression found in his letter to Müntzer, by which is meant a complete break with medieval tradition and a return to the apostolic pattern of the New Testament).

In the second major point, that of the relation of the Christian to the world order, Grebel and his followers occupy a unique position in the history of Protestant doctrine, a position which has not been followed by the nonconformist groups to any extent, and which probably only the modern Mennonites hold. Luther, Calvin (q.v.), and Grebel alike condemned the world order as sinful and in need of regeneration, but the three assumed radically different attitudes toward the condemned world order. Luther held that it was futile to do much to change it, and that since it was a necessary evil which one could not well escape, the Christian must compromise with it, participating as necessary in its life and institutions, and finding solace from the conflict by a retreat to the inner life with its experience of the grace of God and the forgiveness of sins. Calvin took the opposite position, namely, that the Christian must not compromise with the world, but must seek to regenerate the world order and make it Christian and thus make the will of God sovereign in all human life and institutions, even though that might mean the forcible suppression of ungodliness. Unfortunately, Calvin relied too much on the Old Testament in addition to the New for the content of the will of God, from which the pattern for human society was to be drawn, and in so doing compromised with the world unconsciously as Luther did deliberately. Grebel agreed with Calvin that the existing world order needed to be regenerated according to the will of God, but he differed in the method by which it was to be accomplished. He would separate the true Christian from the ungodly world order and its institutions, and resolutely abandon the use of the civil state even in its theocratic form to promote the Christianization of society, rather making the church a light to the world and a salt to the earth. The church should overcome the world by winning members from the ungodly society of the world to the godly society of the church.

According to Grebel, the church has no right to seek to rule society from without or to attempt to control the civil authorities for the benefit of its interests. Rather it should probably expect to continue to be a "suffering church" in the world, as Christ promised His disciples, and never expect the mass of men to enter its portals or to adopt its way of life. However, within the boundaries of the church the will of God as found in the Gospel (not as found in the Old Testament ethic which for Grebel was of inferior value and certainly no longer valid for the Christian) was to have absolute sway. No Calvinist ever taught more rigidly the absolute sovereignty of God over the life of the members of the Christian community than Conrad Grebel and his brethren did. He resolutely refused to make the deliberate compromise with the world which Luther (and possibly Zwingli) made, or the unconscious compromise with the world which Calvin made.

Grebel's absolutism did not make him a social revolutionary, although his program for the Christian was certainly radical for his time, and in fact is still radical for our day. He demanded absolute Christian nonresistance, the complete abandonment of the use of force and of the taking of human life. He was thus the first absolute Christian pacifist of modern times, except for Peter Chilčicky (q.v.) of Bohemia, and most of his followers have maintained this principle to the present day. In taking this position, he found it necessary to deny the Christian the right to participate in the functions of the state, for the magistrates were compelled to use force and to take life since the state is ultimately based upon the sanction of force. Again, Grebel repudiated for the Christian the oppressive and unjust economic practices of his day, rejected tithes, and insisted upon the exercise of Christian brotherhood in economic relationships. It is not true, however, that his program included a communistic social order, although the emphasis upon genuine Christian brotherhood did lead to the establishment of pure Christian communism after a few years in one branch of the Anabaptist movement in Austria and Moravia, that known as "Hutterian Brethren."

Conrad Grebel sought after reality in the spiritual life, a reality that was far removed from any mere externalism or legalism. He sought to generate and maintain a deep inner spiritual life through a living faith in Christ and a personal union with Him. He earnestly sought to make this inner spiritual life effective in the daily experience of the Christian believer, in trust in God for daily needs, in love toward the brethren, in separation from sin and the world, and in the life of holiness. He held that alone through incorporation with Christ and the brethren can the individual receive the strength necessary to live the Word of God, to conquer sin, and to maintain love. But by this strength, he and his martyr followers believed absolutely that the individual believer and the church as a whole would be able to bear victoriously "the baptism of temptation and testing," of persecution, suffering, and death, and "pass triumphantly through the testing by fire into the homeland of eternal rest" (quotations from the Müntzer letter).

The most characteristic feature of Anabaptism, following inevitably from its concept of discipleship, was its insistence upon a new church of truly committed and practicing believers in contradistinction to the prevailing concept of the Volkskirche or inclusive church of the Reformation and subsequent periods held by Catholics and Protestants (Lutheran and Zwinglian) alike and maintained by the powerful patronage of the state, and to which, by birth and infant baptism, the entire population belonged. It was in the months between October 1523 and January 1525 that the battle between the two diametrically opposing views was fought out in the very heart of the Swiss Reformation. Zwingli, as Professor von Muralt has said, deliberately rejected the Swiss Brethren call for a church of true believers only and established "a church in which all professing Christians, the nominal, lukewarm, and indifferent ones as well as the really live and active Christians are kept together, a church to which the entire population belongs and which is not the church of genuine believers but only an imperfect human institution" (L. von Muralt, "Zwingli als Sozialpolitiker," Zwingliana V, 1931, 280). Luther and Calvin made the same basic decision, as did the leaders of the English Reformation, thereby establishing the "Volkskirche" as the official and general pattern for the whole of Protestantism. Only the Swiss Brethren (1525 on) and Dutch Mennonites (1533 on) at this crossroads of Christian history took the road of the free church of committed Christians, thus becoming the fourth major Reformation type.

Grebel's Personal Significance. What personal significance has Conrad Grebel for the historic movement which he founded? The answer is chiefly that he made possible the initial and basic breakthrough. While it is true that during the troubled third decade of the 16th century others longed for and attempted the restitution of the New Testament ecclesia, that attempt became successful only under Grebel's leadership in Zürich. Historically the case is clear. The Swiss Brethren movement did begin in Zürich, and it did spread from there throughout Central and West Europe. It began in Zürich not only because Conrad Grebel and his associates clearly envisaged a voluntary Christian fellowship, a "gathered" free church of believers only, committed in earnest loyalty and holy discipleship to follow Christ under the cross and by His way of love, but because Grebel had the courage to make an unreserved personal commitment to this ideal regardless of consequences. To this commitment he held unflinchingly in the crucial moment when, in bitter determination to annihilate their ideas forever, all the power of church and state thundered down upon him and his small band of followers. Once the great and irrevocable step was taken, other faithful and noble spirits, including ultimately thousands of martyrs, followed in Grebel's train; but Conrad Grebel was the first Anabaptist. He performed the first adult baptism in Zürich in January 1525. He was the first to clearly mark the road away from Luther's and Zwingli's mass church into the free church of voluntary commitment, brotherhood, and full evangelical discipleship, of separation of church and state, and of freedom of conscience. Where others shrank from adoption of the full New Testament ideal because of fear that it could not be carried through in practice, as for instance Luther, Grebel acted. He chose to follow the vision without calculation of possibilities or practicalities, believing that the truth commands, it does not merely advise. For him the kingdom of God is to be built here and now in the fellowship of believers, in the beloved community of the disciples of Christ. This conviction was the sole ground for the existence of the Swiss Brethren brotherhood and later related groups. Unlike the other reformers, Grebel's is not a sharply delineated figure because of the brevity of his career, but his basic view of the essence of Christianity and the nature of the church is clear, and his place in church history is secure.

That Grebel and his Swiss Brethren derived their faith solely and directly from the New Testament without any apparent literary or personal antecedents is one of the most striking things about the new movement. Every attempt to trace connections to earlier sources has failed, whether to the Waldensians or the Hussites as Ludwig Keller believed, or to the Franciscan Tertiaries as Albrecht Ritschl suggested. The Anabaptists were Biblicists and it was from the Biblical fountains that they drank. Having taken altogether seriously the sola scriptura of the Reformation, they were able to break more completely with the ecclesiastical and sociological forms of the Middle Ages and thus to return to the original ideas of the New Testament. In this spirit Grebel's followers once cried out, "You have Zwingli's word, but we want God's Word" (Habend ir Zwingli's, wir wellend Gotts wort haben).

In Conrad Grebel then, the young Zürich patrician humanist turned evangelical under Zwingli's preaching, and become first century Christian as a result of his own devout reading of the New Testament, we have not only the founder of the Swiss Brethren movement and the later Mennonite Church, but also one of the prophetic spirits of Christendom in its great and insistent tradition of reform and revival. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel ca. 1498-1526, The Founder of the Swiss Brethren Sometimes Called Anabaptists (Goshen, 1950), as Vol. I of The Life and Letters of Conrad Grebel by Harold S. Bender, Ernst Correll, and Edward Yoder, of which Vol. II, The Letters of Conrad Grebel is still in preparation. (Since a complete Grebel bibliography is found in the above, only certain items will be listed further here.) H. S. Bender, "Conrad Grebel, The Founder of Swiss Anabaptism," Church History VII (1938) 157-78; idem, "Die Zwickauer Propheten, Thomas Müntzer und die Täufer," Theologische Ztscht VIII (1952) 262-78; Walter Schmid, "Der Autor der sogenannten Protestation und Schutzschrift von 1524/25," Zwingliana IX (1950) 139-49, which seems to prove that the December 1524 Protestation was not written by Grebel as W. Köhler and the editors of Zwingli Werke III, 368 ff., where it was published, assume, but probably by Felix Manz; L. von Muralt und Walter Schmid, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz (Zürich, 1952); G. Meyer von Knonau, "Konrad Grebel," ADB IX (1879) 619-22; C. Keller-Escher, Die Familie Grebel (Zürich, 1884) and Nachtrag (1887); Max Staub, Die Beziehungen des Täufers Konrad Grebel zu seinem Schwager Vadian (Zürich, 1895); E. Arbenz and H. Wartmann, Die Vadianische Briefsammlung der Stadtbibliothek St. Gallen I-VII (St. Gall, 1888-1913); Chr. Neff, "Conrad Grebel, Sein Leben und Wirken" in Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten (Ludwigshafen, 1925) 65-133; idem, article "Konrad Grebel," ML II, 163-99 (appeared in 1928); W. Koehler, "Konrad Grebel" in RGG II (1928) col. 1435; J. Ninck, "Konrad Grebel" in Arzt und Reformator Vadian (St. Gall, 1937) 109-19; L. von Muralt, "Konrad Grebel als Student in Paris," Zürcher Taschenbuch auf das Jahr 1937 (Zürich) 113-36; W. Köhler, "Der Verfasser des Libellus Confutationis (Konrad Grebel)," Menn. Geschichtsblätter III (1938); Hans Wirz, "Der Ratsherr Jakob Grebel und seine Stiefbrüder Wirz, sein Sohn Konrad Grebel und sein Schwiegersohn Vadian," "Der Zwiespalt im Hause Grebel, die Anfänger der Kampfes zwischen Volkskirche und Täufertum," "Die Zuspitzung der Gegensätze 1525-27, der Untergang von Konrad und Jakob Grebel," Zwingliana VI (1936-38) 207-22, 470-86, 537-44; E. Yoder, "Nine Letters of Conrad Grebel, edited with a translation and notes," MQR II (1928) 229-59; E. Correll and H. S. Bender, "Conrad Grebel's Petition of Protest and Defence," Goshen College Record Review Supplement (September 1926, 33-37); E. Correll, H. S. Bender, and E. Yoder, "A Letter of Conrad Grebel to Zwingli September 8, 1517"; ibid., 33-36, "A Letter of Conrad Grebel to Andreas Castelberger May 1525," MQR I (July 1927) 41-53; Ulrich Zwingli, In Catabaptistarum Strophas Elenchus (Zürich, 1527, copy in Goshen College Library), a modern reprint in Huldreich Zwinglis Sämtliche Werke VI (Leipzig, 1936) 1-196 and an English translation in S. M. Jackson, Selected Works of Huldreich Zwingli (Philadelphia, 1901) 123-258, under the title Refutation of the Tricks of the Anabaptists.

Grebel, Jakob (1460-1526), outstanding representative of an old patrician family of Zürich, father of Conrad Grebel (q.v.), the founder of Swiss Anabaptism. He was a prominent member of the Zürich city council, and a frequent ambassador for Zürich at the Swiss Confederation meetings. While he did not agree with his son, he also did not agree with Zwingli's harsh measures toward the Anabaptists and largely because of his opposition to Zwingli was executed at Zürich on Oct. 30, 1526, on the charge of having received illegal stipends from foreign rulers in 1520-22. H.S.B.

C. Keller-Escher, Die Familie Grebel (Frauenfeld, 1884); Hans Wirz, "Der Ratsherr Jakob Grebel und seine Stiefbrüder Wirz, sein Sohn Konrad Grebel und sein Schwiegersohn Vadian," Zwingliana VI (1936) 207-22; idem, "Der Zwiespalt im Hause Grebel," Zwingliana VI (1938) 470-86; idem, "Die Zuspitzung der Gegensätze 1525-1527. Der Untergang von Konrad und Jakob Grebel," Zwingliana VI (1938) 486-99, 537-44; H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); ML II, 162 f.

Gredig, Valentin, of Savoy, one of the members of the early Swiss Brethren congregation in Zürich, was imprisoned on Feb. 8, 1525, with eight other Anabaptists and released on bail of 1,000 guilders. Soon afterward he was again in prison. In his cross-examination on March 16, 1525, he stated that he had been moved to accept baptism only on the basis of the simple Word of God, which clearly says, "Go ye to all peoples, teach and baptize"; but as to attacking the government, or advocating that it be removed, such an idea had never entered his mind, for he well knew that there must be a government. In reply to the question whether a Christian might bear the sword, he said he would leave it to God, and did not want to interfere with His power. Giving tithes and taxes, he considered right. The baptism instituted by the Almighty he held to be the true baptism; but since his arrest he had baptized nobody. In August 1525 he was arrested the third time, and confessed that he had baptized his wife upon her request. Nothing more is known of him. NEFF.

Emil Egli, Actensammlung zur Geschichte der Züricher Reformation (Zürich, 1879) Nos. 636 f., 674 f., 795; L. Keller, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien (Leipzig, 1885) 398; ML II, 169.

Greece: see Thessalonica.

Green Cross, a Dutch organization for the promotion of hygiene and health in the home: see Groene Kruis.

Greendale Mennonite Brethren Church, better known as the Sardis M.B. Church, located at the corner of South Sumas and Sumas Prairie Roads at Sardis, B.C., a member of the M.B. Conference of Canada, was organized in January 1931 with a rather small membership under the leadership of H. G. Dueck. The first meetinghouse, a frame structure with a seating capacity of 250, was erected in 1932 and enlarged in 1940 to seat 600. During the flood in 1948 the church stood in ten feet of water; consequently for two months no meetings were held there. Since 1952 the congregation has had a salaried pastor, H. D. Unger, with H. G. Dueck and Jacob Harder assisting. The membership in 1954 was 345. J.F.R.

Greenfarm Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Greenfarm, originally Bergfeld, near Herbert, Sask., organized in 1913 under the initiative of J. W. Thiessen, belongs to the Herbert District Conference. During the first years the church services were held in the public school. In 1917 a revival took place and 20 members were added to the church. The following year a church building was erected. J. W. Thiessen was succeeded by Johann Thiessen and Isaac P. Penner. Active workers in 1953 were Johann Thiessen, J. J. Thiessen, and George Penner, leader. The 1953 membership was 56. (ML II, 169.) J.I.R.

Greenfield Mennonite (GCM) Church, 13 miles southeast of Carnegie, Okla., was founded Jan. 31, 1914, when a meetinghouse was built, the group having been served for 12 years previously by ministers from the Gotebo congregation. A. W. Froese, the first resident pastor, began his service Feb. 15, 1915. In 1926 the membership was 67 with Froese still serving; in 1955 it was 89 with J. B. Krause as pastor. The congregation belongs to the Western District Conference. (ML II, 192.) De.N.

Greenland Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located five miles southwest of Ste. Anne, Man. The first members moved into the district in 1880, assembling in homes for worship services. The first meetinghouse was built in 1896, and later enlarged; the second was built in 1920, and the third in 1947, which seats 1,100. Martin Penner was the first minister, serving from 1891 until his death in 1928. In 1905 Isaac Penner was ordained as minister, but he with a number of members moved to British Columbia in 1912. Jacob T. Wiebe, a deacon, was chosen for the ministry in 1910 and was the presiding minister 1917-43. John M. Penner, ordained in 1931, has been the leading minister since 1943. The services, formerly held in the German, are now conducted in both the German and English languages. The church had a membership of 285 in 1953. The sewing circle was started in 1935. Young people's meetings are held twice weekly during the winter season. Ministers from this congregation have been holding services at Ste. Anne, Prairie Rose, and Winnipeg for several years. J.M.P.

Greensburg, Kan., is the county seat of Kiowa County, in the south central part of the state, with a population of 1,724 (1952). It is populated largely by retired farmers and small town businesses. In recent years it has also become quite an industrial city with four large gas pumping stations located near town.

There are three branches of Mennonites in the county, C.G.C.M., M.C., and G.C.M., all located south of Greensburg. The Mennonites have been here since 1908 and numbered approximately 186 in 1952. Only about 45 of this group live in town, most of them employed at the Kiowa County Memorial Hospital, which is the only Mennonite institution in the county. This is a 24-bed general hospital operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). S.J.

Greenwood Conservative Mennonite Church, which is located in Nanticoke Hundred, Sussex Co., near Greenwood, Del., and is a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, was organized in 1914 with about eleven charter members. The membership in 1954 was 251, with Eli Swartzentruber and Alvin Mast as ministers, and Nevin Bender as bishop. The first church building was dedicated on July 4, 1920. This was replaced by a larger brick building, which was dedicated on Dec. 14, 1947. The first church building is being used for a junior high school operated by the congregation, which has also had its own Christian day school since 1928. N.F.B.

Greenwood Mennonite School, located at Greenwood, Del., which is operated by the Conservative Mennonite Church, had its beginning in February 1928. The first 4½ years the school was held in the basement of the church, and then in the fall of 1932 a school building was built. In 1943 the board hired a second teacher, and since that time two years of high school have been offered, and for several years three years of high school. Since 1950 three teachers have been employed, with an approximate enrollment of 70 to 80 pupils in grades one to ten, most of them children of members of the congregation.

In 1953 a committee was appointed to study an expansion program and a possible four-year high school. It is the conviction of the brotherhood that this church-owned and operated school has made a profound contribution toward the spiritual life and growth of the church.

The Greenwood Conservative Mennonite Church has grown to have a resident membership of 230. Approximately 90 per cent of her children of school age attend the church day school. L.L.S.

Greif, Hans, an Anabaptist emissary, was a beltmaker and citizen of Salzburg, Austria. He was baptized by Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), and sent out by Hans Hut in 1527 to preach the Gospel. But he was soon captured by the Salzburg authorities. His fate is not known. The frequent and sometimes sharpened mandates of the Archbishop of Salzburg against the Anabaptists lead to the surmise that he died a martyr. Hege.

"Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich und speziell in Freistadt," in 47. Bericht über das Museum Francisco-Carolinum (Linz, 1889); ML II, 170.

Greiff, Cornelius de. On the east wall of Crefeld there has stood since Aug. 22, 1865, a simple monument: a commemorative column in classic form on a square base with bronze bas-reliefs of the goddess of benevolence, an allegory of the city of Crefeld, the coat-of-arms, and the inscription, "In memory of its benefactor, Mr. Cornelius de Greiff, born June 8, 1781, died April 16, 1863, by the grateful native city."

The man thus celebrated was simple, as is suggested by the cap on his head and the stately umbrella under his arm. The contribution he made to the city in unwavering benevolence and the unostentatious generosity of his deeply religious nature is shown by his will of Feb. 25, 1857, which left for benevolent purposes and for the common good a sum hitherto unheard of in Germany: 466,000 talers; i.e., 120,000 talers for the hospital "founded by my mother"; 100,000 talers for a home for needy men and women over 65 years of age; 50,000 talers each for the Catholic and the Protestant orphanages; 50,000 talers for the care of the mentally ill, the blind, and the deaf; 50,000 talers for the support of 50 poor but deserving families having many children to support; 12,000 talers for another mortuary and the beautification of the new cemetery; 26,000 talers to erect a civic building. "I add, as a conclusion to what I have here signed: An Gottes Segen ist alles gelegen. May this blessing of the Father not be lacking for the goals striven after, and may much good proceed from them."

The significance of this bequest for a city of 52,700 needs no comment. But it was even surpassed when the niece and heiress of Cornelius de

Greiff, Mrs. Marianne Rhodius (q.v.), nee de Greiff, found her sole object in life in serving the needy and suffering. In her will, read on Nov. 2, 1902, she supplemented her uncle's bequest with a legacy of 1,800,000 marks, calling the fund "the Cornelius de Greiff Support Fund."

The grandfather (Johann Philipp) of Cornelius de Greiff acquired citizenship in Crefeld in 1744; his father, Isaac de Greiff (1754-1826), married Anna Floh in 1780, and entered his father-in-law's business (Cornelius and Johannes Floh). As part owner of this important velvet mill he acquired a substantial fortune.

Since Cornelius de Greiff remained unmarried and his only brother, Johann Philipp (1786-1862, married to Marianne ter Meer), preceded him in death, he made his niece Marianne Rhodius, the daughter of his brother, his sole heir; she managed the estates carefully in the intention of her grandmother, nee Floh, as well as her aunt Marianne Jordans, nee Floh. (Menn. Bl., 1888, 124; 1904, 23; ML II, 170.) K.R.

Greiker, Hans, of Heppenheim near Worms, Germany, a participant in the disputation at Frankenthal (q.v.). Nothing more is known of him. (ML II, 171.)

Grein, a district in Upper Austria, in which there were numerous Anabaptist congregations shortly after 1530. (Wolkan, Lieder, 24.) vdZ.

Greiner, Blasius, the ancestor of the extensive Mennonite family of the Greiners, and his brother Andreas, who was the master of the glassworks at Walkersbach in Württemberg, Germany, which was a church subsidiary of Oberurbach owned by O. A. Schorndorf, were won to the Anabaptist cause in 1562 by the preaching of a leader in the woods at Oberurbach, who preached at night to ten or twelve persons from a pulpit-like stone; after the sermon they fell on their faces, wrung their hands, and finally said, "The Lord be praised." Blasius Greiner greatly influenced not only his family, but also the Oberurbach community, which contained so many Anabaptists that a general inspection lasting months was conducted here in 1598, in which first individuals, and then when the process was taking too long and getting too expensive, families were examined. The Greiner brothers had razed the chapel in Walkersbach, so that about 1548 the pastor of Oberurbach had to hold his weekly Monday services in the homes.

In March 1567 Blasius Greiner was arrested and taken to the prison in Maulbronn, where he was induced to recant in May 1569. His recantation was adopted in 1571 as the model for all Anabaptists. After he had been released he returned to his early convictions, married again, and moved away, and died not later than 1571. In Maulbronn he had violent arguments with the Hutterian Brethren, who accused the Swiss Brethren of disorderly conduct. The Hutterite's name was Jogl; his family name is not known nor is that of his companion. By disorderly conduct they meant a noncommunal life. Blasius' sons were Anabaptists and Schwenckfeldians; they attended the preaching in the state church, but read Schwenckfeld's books during the sermon. They, however, concealed Anabaptist preachers, such as Bastlin Weber, Veit Gilg, and Hans Büchel (q.v.).

An Ulrich Greiner who appeared in the Mainhardt Forest in 1523 called himself a glazier from Schleusingen (Thuringia). He was presumably related to Blasius. Another relative, Jakob, master glazier of Lautertal (Neulautern) under Duke Albrecht of Löwenstein, whose children were forcibly baptized in Löwenstein in 1586, had to leave the vicinity. He perhaps went to Lauscha, Sonneberg area of Meiningen. In 1525 Hans Greiner had established a glassworks in Langenbach near Schleusingen with Swabian glaziers, the beginning of the still thriving Lauscha glass industry. From there it was taken by the Greiners to Bohemia; the Protestants among them were expelled from Bohemia after the battle of the White Mountain, and moved into the margravure of Brandenburg-Ansbach. From them descended the mother of the famed church historian Albert Hauck. The Greiners remaining in Bohemia have become Catholics. G.Bo.

Karl Greiner, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der Glasindustrie in Württemberg," Württemb. Vierteljahrshefte, n.s. 34 (1928) 70-99; Schwäbischer Mercur, Aug. 6, 1920, No. 359; Bossert, TA I: Württemberg; ML II, 171.

Grellet, Stephen, b. 1773 at Limoges, France, a son of Grellet du Madillier, d. 1855 in Philadelphia. Driven from France by the Revolution, and having lived an eventful life, he joined the Quakers in Philadelphia in 1796, undertook long preaching missions through the United States, and in 1808 visited France. In 1811 he made a second journey to Europe, reaching Munich, where he had a remarkable meeting with King Max I and his son Louis. In Neuwied he visited the Mennonites. More important is his visit with the Russian Mennonites on his third journey to Europe in 1818. On May 23 he arrived at the Mennonite settlement at Chortitz on the Dniepr with Contenius, the chairman of the Fürsorgekomitee. Then he went to the Molotschna settlement, where "they have a great cloth mill." Grellet describes the Mennonites in Russia very favorably in his autobiography.

When at the end of May he returned to the Mennonites after a visit to the Dukhobors (q.v.) and held meetings with them he wrote enthusiastically, "Oh, what a difference in our feeling when we are with these people from when we were with the Dukhobors! There darkness surrounded us, but here there is light as in Goshen. The presence of the Lord was over us; the Gospel stream of life and salvation flowed freely over the difference in circumstances!" NEFF.

A. C. Garrett, "Stephen Grellet," Quaker Biographies IV (Philadelphia, 1916) 131-256; Menn. Bl., 1879, 21 ff., 68; B. Seebohm (ed.), Memoirs of the Life and Gospel Labours of Stephen Grellet (Leiden, 1860); ML II, 171.

Gremser, Hansel, an Anabaptist of whom nothing has been handed down except his confession. He was won to the Anabaptists by Jakob Hutter at Vilnöss, Tirol, in 1531. When the Anabaptist persecutions in Tirol were at their height, he was seized and tried. His statements are found in his confession of July 1, 1533. It is located in the episcopal archives at Brixen, Tirol. He admits having been baptized by Jakob Hutter. Twice he has received communion in the manner of the Anabaptists, the first time in Moravia, the second in Vilnöss. The Brethren take communion as a memorial of Christ, but they do not believe that it contains the true body and blood of Christ. They reject the Mass. . . . The mother of Jesus was a virgin both before and after His birth; they hold her in high esteem, though they know no worship of saints. The images in the church they consider idols; he has himself broken one since becoming an Anabaptist. They reject the oral confessional; sins must be confessed to the entire brotherhood. For his part he would not object to confessing to pious priests. The Anabaptists recognize each other in case of question with the words, "I do Christian works." Their greeting is, "The peace of God be with you." They carry no weapons. All things should be in common. They do not reject the government if it supports the good and punishes the bad. Concerning Gremser's fate nothing is known. Loserth.

J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I (Vienna, 1892) 517; ML II, 171 f.

Gresbeck, Heinrich, a citizen of Münster (Westphalia), a cabinetmaker by trade, had lived outside the city 1530-34, partly as a mercenary, but then returned to the city on Feb. 27, and was baptized on that day. For 15 months he shared the joys and sorrows of the Münster group. He played a subordinate role. During the night of May 23, 1535, he abandoned his post as guard at the Kreuztor and fled. He was seized. Out of pity for his youth his life was spared. In prison he sketched a plan of the fortifications of the city and showed the spot where he had been guard and where the wall could be easily scaled to enter the city. The place he designated was secretly examined, and his assertions were found to be correct. On this basis the attack was planned and executed on the night of June 24. Gresbeck made an essential contribution to the success of this attack. Of particular importance for the history of the Münster revolt is his Bericht von der Wiedertaufe in Münster. This manuscript C. A. Cornelius (q.v.) published verbatim in his book, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster II (Münster, 1853) 1-214. (ML II, 172.) Neff.

Gretna, a village in the Red River Valley of southern Manitoba, two miles from the U.S. (N. Dak.) border, with a population of 608, about one third of which are Mennonites belonging chiefly to two congregations of the General Conference Mennonites, either the Blumenort congregation (largely 1922-25 Russian immigrants) or the local unit of the Bergthal congregation (largely 1874-75 Russian immigrants). The entire surrounding area is peopled largely by Mennonites of the 1922-25 immigration who replaced the older Sommerfeld Mennonites who had emigrated to Mexico and Paraguay. Gretna is the seat of the oldest Mennonite school in North America, the Mennonite Collegiate Institute (q.v.), founded by H. H. Ewert in 1891. The Altenheim (q.v., Home for Aged) of the Bergthal Church, which was operated here 1918-38, is now a girls' dormitory of the school. (ML II, 172.) H.S.B.

Greuel, Hans, the head of the Anabaptists of Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, who took a special interest in his brethren who fled to Augsburg. He was a native of Geltendorf (Bavaria). Among those he baptized were Anna, wife of Thomas Melchinger, who was seized in the Easter meeting at Augsburg in 1528, also the widow Else Knollin in Augsburg about Christmas 1527, and soon afterward in Mindelheim the cobbler Jakob Walch with three other persons, who were for that reason seized by the council of Augsburg. Greuel, who was also being sought by the council, left Augsburg late in the summer of 1528. Nothing more is heard of him. Hege.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (Munich, 1901) 243 and 254; idem, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVIII (1901) 7, 37, 84, 125, and 128; ML II, 173.

Greuwel der vornahmsten Haupt-Ketzeren, So wohl Wiedertauffer, als auch andern (Leiden, 1608), is a translation of a Latin work published in the same year: Apocalypsis insignium aliquot Haeresiarchium, by an unknown author who is indicated by the letters "H.S.F.D.M.D." Besides the Latin and German versions, there are also three Dutch editions of this book: De voornaemste Hooft-Ketteren, Die haer in dese tijden so in Duytslant als oock in dese Nederlanden opgeworpen hebben (Leiden, 1608); Grouwelen der voornaemster Hooft-Ketteren (Leiden, 1623); and a reprint of the latter under the same title (n.p., n.d.). With the exception of this last version, all four editions differ from the original. The Dutch edition of 1623 contains a chapter on Obbe Philips, and in an appendix some information on Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, and their followers. For Mennonite history this book is of no value, but the 17 engravings by Christoffel van Sichem (q.v.) which these books contain (the first Dutch edition has only 9) are valuable. Among these engravings there are portraits of Thomas Müntzer, Balthasar Hubmaier, Hans Hut, Ludwig Haetzer, Melchior Rinck, Melchior Hofmann, Jan Matthijsz van Haarlem, Jan Beukelsz (van Leyden), David Joris, and Adam Pastor. Menno Simons and Obbe Philips are not represented. The portraits of course have no guarantee of historical verisimilitude, since they were all made many years after the death of the subjects, and of all but one there were no contemporary representations. vdZ.

Grevinckhoven, Caspar (1550-1606), b. at Dortmund, Germany, a Reformed preacher at Zaltbommel, Dutch province of Gelderland, in 1573, after 1579 in Rotterdam, where he died. He wrote a violent polemic against the Anabaptists: Grondelijke bericht van den Doop ende Wederdoope (1599), which contains some important information on Hans de Ries. The assertion that in his old age he became a Mennonite (as stated in DB 1908, 27) is an error. (Biogr. Wb. III, 336-38; ML II, 173.) K.V., vdZ.

Greyenburger, Veit, the name used in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror for Veit-Grünberger, a Hutterite missionary, who was arrested in Austria in 1570. (See Grünberger, Veit.)

Greystone Park (N.J.) CPS Unit No. 77, under MCC direction, established Jan. 19, 1943, and closed August 1946, was attached to the New Jersey State Mental Hospital at Greystone Park, N.J., 40 miles west of New York City. With 5,000 patients it was one of the largest mental hospitals in the country. Leaders of the unit were Lawrence Burkholder, Melvin Funk, Wilton Hartzler, and Harold W. Griest. In July 1945 one hundred CPS men were working here. H.S.B.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949).

Gries, Anthony de, a preacher in the Dompelaar congregation in Hamburg-Altona. Beginning in 1661 he argued orally and in writing with Bastiaan van Weenighem, the Mennonite preacher at Rotterdam, but in vain. He also added an appendix to the attack of his friend Johann Arent, Eindelycke verklaringe (1668) against Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.). The gradual decline of the Hamburg Dompelaars seems to have led him to return to his native Holland, where he died in 1696. (ML II, 173.) R.Do.

Griesbach (not Grichsbach) is mentioned in Wolkan's Geschicht-Buch (p. 182) as the place in Styria, Austria, where five Anabaptists gave their lives for the faith. But there is no place with this name in Styria. Beck has correctly placed Griesbach in Bavaria near Passau in his Geschichts-Bücher. It is a market village in the government district of Wegscheid, four and one-half hours from Passau and three hours from Wegscheid, situated on a hill which rises from the Danube Valley. Two of the five Anabaptists executed here, Hans Pranthüber, a preacher, and his wife, are named in Codex Kremser (N), dated 1581, now in the library of the Pressburg Domkapitel. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 278, note 3; Zieglschmid, Chronik 233; ML II, 173.) Loserth.

Griesbacher, Wilhelm, of Kitzbühel, Austria. Like many other Anabaptist martyrs, little is known of him beyond his martyrdom and a letter that he sent from prison to the brotherhood by his companion, Hans Donner (q.v.) of Wels. Griesbacher, a Diener der Notdurft, was seized at Schäkowitz with several of his brethren during the height of the persecution (1536) when Hutter was being sought, and was taken to Brno, Moravia. Here he was cross-examined on the following points: (1) Why did they accept this treacherous faith that was tolerated nowhere? (2) Whether they had an agreement with other sects from whom they received help on occasion (the consequences of the Münster revolt are evident here); (3) Why they would have nothing to do with government; and (4) Why they attacked the king so rudely in Hutter's reply to the governor. The report of the authorities was followed by a command to try the prisoners on the rack, and if they were obstinate, to use the mandates against them moderately. Only one of them (named Loy) renounced his faith. Griesbacher sent the brotherhood the letter mentioned above, in which he admonished them to pray for the backslider. At the trial under torture Griesbacher was also asked how the exiles fared financially. He replied that they had not left home and land and come to this country for the sake of money, but for the sake of their faith. Griesbacher was sentenced to die at the stake and was burned in Brno. Loserth.

The letter mentioned above is in a manuscript of the Pressburg Domkapitel, and extracts of it are printed in Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 119; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 77, 78, 115; ML II, 173.

Griesinger (Griesstätter), Onophrius (Offrus), a Hutterite martyr. Until the death of Jakob Hutter (1536) Tirol was the center of the Anabaptist movement in Austria. This ended now; opposition had become too strong in Austria. Now Moravia became the country from which year after year missionaries were sent out: to Poland and Hungary, into the provinces of Germany, and also to Tirol, where they tried to support their old adherents and win new ones. Not until the "golden age for the brotherhood in Moravia" dawned, did their effort to establish churches in Tirol slacken, for then as many adherents as possible came "down" to Moravia. Hutter's place was taken by Jeronymus Käls and after his imprisonment by Leonhard Seiler. When Seiler also fell into the hands of the executioners the brotherhood in Tirol looked to Onophrius Griesinger, who was then in Moravia, and who had proved his character as an apostle of Anabaptism; he accepted the call.

Griesinger was a native of Frassdorf in Bavaria and before his entry into the Hutterite brotherhood in 1532 had been clerk of a mine in the archbishopric of Salzburg. When he came to Tirol in 1533 he stayed in Weissenbach in the Sarn Valley, and sometimes in the Inn and Puster valleys, where he won many converts and sent them to Moravia.

Soon after being ordained he was captured and taken to Hopfgarten, but managed to make his escape. The government sent out several warrants against him. The warrant of June 8, 1533, describes him thus: "Onoffrus Griesstätter is of medium height, has no beard, wears a rough woolen coat, white trousers, and brown cloth hose. He baptized a considerable number of persons here in Tirol." The warrant of Oct. 8, 1533, describes him thus: "He is wearing a brown tunic . . . and black trousers, and is said to be wandering about in Prixlegg." For his capture a reward of about 100 guilders is offered and the authorities of Sterzing, Gufidaun, Rodeneck, Kitzbühel, St. Petersburg, Ritten, and Linz are required to engage spies to seize him.

But Griesinger eluded his pursuers. At Christmas 1533 he even ventured to hold a large meeting in the Hagau near Rattenberg. He withdrew to Moravia, taking a group (Völklein) with him from Rattenberg, and settled in Auspitz with them. Hutter wrote to the prisoners at Hohenwarth, "Brother Offrus has also come with many other brethren and sisters. The Lord led them marvelously. Not many are left in Tirol." After Hutter's death Griesinger continued Hutter's work and took his place at first in the Puster Valley. Amon writes about it to the prisoners in Mödling, "Offrus has come up and many are becoming Christians." During the Easter week of 1536, Christoph Ochs of St. Michaelsburg and Ulrich Gerlinger undertook an examination of the woods on Schönegg and came upon Griesinger with a number of other Anabaptists; but they escaped "because the authorities were not well enough prepared."

But now sharper measures were taken against Griesinger, and searches were instituted on Lüsen and at Greifenstein, as well as around the pass at Thurn. Amon writes to the brotherhood at Böhmisch-Kromau about this time and these conditions, "God the Lord still works daily, also in the upper country, whither our dear Brother Offrus has withdrawn through the will of God; there are many zealous people there, as Jörg (Walpot) can tell you; he can also tell you how Offrus fared in going up." The combined efforts of his enemies finally succeeded in April 1537 in seizing Griesinger with a small group of Anabaptists and taking him to Bozen. But he managed his escape again. The authorities, angry, now offered a reward of 80 guilders for his capture alive, and 40 dead. His escape evoked great joy among the brotherhood in Moravia.

But Griesinger worked on unswervingly near Imst, in the Pitz and Etz valleys and beyond the Brenner. Moving up and down the mountains he preached and baptized; he even visited prisoners, and in the summer of 1538 he observed a three-day communion service with 72 persons. But finally his decisive hour struck too. Betrayed by spies, he was seized during the night of Aug. 29 in a hut of the jurisdiction of Schöneck and taken bound to Brixen. The authorities were warned to watch him with special care, and examine him kindly and on the rack to find out who else belonged "to their sect," and whether they were planning a new revolt. The court was pleased with Griesinger's capture. Ferdinand I kept himself informed on the course of the trial.

With Griesinger, Lienhart Lochmaier's (q.v.) case also came to an end. The former was executed on Oct. 31, 1538, between ten and eleven o'clock.

Five letters written by Griesinger, the last three in prison, have been preserved. All of them are addressed to the "Gemain Gottes" in Moravia. He also wrote a letter from prison in Lochmaier's name to Bärbel, the latter's wife in Moravia. Griesinger wrote six hymns, all of which except "Loben wöllen wir den höchsten Gott" have been published in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 77-82: (1) "Merkt auf, ihr Kinder Gottes rein" (7 stanzas); (2) "Loben wöllen wir den höchsten Gott" (14 stanzas); (3) "O Herre Gott im Himmelsthron" (4 stanzas); (4) "O Vater im Himmelreich sieh darein" (9 stanzas); (5) "O Gott, erhör mein Klagen" (8 stanzas); (6) "Merk auf, merk auf, o frommer Christ" (11 stanzas).
LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichtsbücher; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol II (Vienna, 1892); Mart. Mir. D 43, E 448, where he is called Greizinger; ML II, 174 f.

Griet, the wife of Rein Edes, was a sister of Geertruydt (q.v.), the wife of Menno Simons. She had been (re)baptized at Witmarsum, Dutch province of Friesland, by Douwe Schoenmaker (q.v.). Afterwards she became doubtful of the validity of the baptism by a Münsterite (q.v.) and asked Menno Simons to rebaptize her. Menno Simons refused to administer this baptism, as did also Leenaert Bouwens. Menno wrote a letter to his sister-in-law (about 1557), which is found in his collected works (Opera Omnia, Dutch ed. Amsterdam, 434; English ed., Complete Works II, Elkhart, 1871, 401 f.).
vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Lectuur 1858, 78 ff.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 434.

Griet Jacobs, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, on April 16, 1540. She was a native of the Langendijk near Alkmaar and confessed to have received (re)-baptism. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 782; DB 1909, 24.)
vdZ.

Grietchen Bildesnider, wife of Aert, an Anabaptist martyr, burned to death Sept. 8 or 9, 1534, on the Vrijthof at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, together with Henrick Rol. With these martyrs the intensive persecution at Maastricht began, which almost exterminated the young, flourishing congregation.
vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantismus in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht I (The Hague, 1937) 98 f., 124.

Griete and Femme, two daughters of Jan Gerroltsma, were executed on April 15, 1535, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, because they had been (re)baptized. Their father had been put to death on the previous day. Particulars are lacking. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.)
vdZ.

Griete Arentsdochter (Grietje Arents), an Anabaptist martyr, was banished from Holland for having been (re)baptized, returned, and was arrested at Amsterdam. In the records she is said to have been an old sick and dull woman, refusing to recant. On Dec. 21, 1534, she was sentenced to death by drowning because of heresy and disobedience to the public authorities. Griete was a native of Limmen near Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, a center of ardent Anabaptism in 1533-40. (Mart. Mir. D 412, E 763; Grosheide, Verhooren, 41-43, 44-45; ML I, 81.)
vdZ.

Griete (Grietje, Margriet) Fransdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced on Feb. 17, 1541, at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, "to be punished to death for the heresy of rebaptism" and for not believing in the Holy Sacrament of the Mass. She had apparently been imprisoned for a long period. Her friends and relatives wrote a letter (May 20, 1540) to the Court of Holland. The Hague, requesting that the sentence and the execution might be held in secret and not, as was usual, in public. This request was granted. The execution took place in May 1541. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 748; DB 1909, 24; Mellink, Wederdopers, 173.

Griet(e) Pieter Mollendochter, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at Amsterdam on May 21 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., May 15), 1535, together with ten other women. She was a native of Amsterdam. She confessed that she had been (re)baptized by Jan Matthysz (q.v.) of Middelburg in the home of Trijn Jans de Bacxter at Amsterdam in November 1534. Griete said that she did not repent her baptism and died willingly. (Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 69, 70; ML III, 147.) vdZ.

Grietgen, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of the martyr Kaerle de Raedt (q.v.), was a Mennonite of Brugge, Belgium. On Ascension Day (May 4) 1570 a meeting of the congregation was held in the woods of Tillegem, near Brugge. This meeting was surprised by the police and a number of attendants were taken prisoner, including Kaerle. Grietgen managed to escape, but she was arrested with her two children on the same night by Maerten Lem, the burgomaster of Brugge. The children, who were young, apparently were taken to a cloister for education. Grietgen, who had not yet received baptism upon faith, was unwilling to recant. So she was sentenced to death for her "obstinacy." About May 20, 1570 (van Braght, Mart. Mir., erroneously 1568), she was burned at the stake at Brugge, with Christijntgen, arrested on the same night. Kaerle had been executed on May 18. (Mart. Mir. D 369, E 725 f.; Verheyden, Brugge, 62, No. 67.) vdZ.

Grietgen, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Belle (Bailleul) in Flanders in 1556 with her aunt Francijntgen (q.v.), and Maeyken Doornaerts (q.v.). In spite of the special efforts to convert her because of her youth, she remained steadfast to the end. (Mart. Mir. D 166, E 553; ML II, 175.) Neff, vdZ.

Grietgen (Grietje van Brussel), an Anabaptist martyr of Brussels, Belgium. Her official name was Margaretha Wynants, widow of Pieter Goossensz. She was burned at the stake at Antwerp on the evening of Pentecost, May 22, 1575, with three fellow believers, with tongue screws. They were put to death, as the sentence states, because they had been rebaptized and had attended Anabaptist meetings. The letters they wrote in prison were destroyed in the Spanish revolt at Antwerp on Nov. 4, 1576. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 693, E 1007; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 193, 201; XIV, 96 f., No. 1084; ML II, 175.

Grietgen (Geertruydt), an Anabaptist martyr, wife of Anthonis van Houtere, of Weert, Dutch province of Limburg, was drowned in Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 31, 1558, together with Lynken Jacops, Stijntgen van Aken, and Tanneken van Cluyten. She is listed in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 16, and No. 39). vdZ.

Offer, 506; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 456, 466; XIV, 24 f., No. 276; ML II, 175.

Grietgen (Margriete van den Berghe) of Lier in Brabant, Belgium, an Anabaptist martyr, was seized with three fellow believers (Goris Cooman, Naentgen Bornaige, and Wouter van der Weyden) at Gent, Belgium, in 1555, whither they had all fled from Lier in Brabant. She had been baptized by Gillis den Dooper, presumably Gillis van Aken (q.v.). Because she steadfastly confessed her faith she was sentenced to death by fire, which she cheerfully endured. The death of these four martyrs is sung in a hymn of 24 stanzas, beginning "Doemen vijftienhondert schreve, daertoe een en vijftich jaer," found in Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 4. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 106, E 503; Offer, 516; Verheyden, Gent, 13, No. 21; ML II, 175.

Grietgen Baets, an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested in Gent, Belgium, in 1569 with Christoffel Buyze, Laurens van Rentergem, and Joost Meerssenier. They paid for their joyful confession and steadfastness with their death, and are celebrated with a large number of martyrs of Gent in a song found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, beginning "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert Jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede." Grietgen is listed here as No. 38. Verheyden (Gent, 56) did not find this martyr in the sources at Gent. (Offer, 653; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; ML I, 110.) O.H., vdZ.

Grietgen Bonaventuers (Margriete van Halle, widow of Willem Eggertink), an Anabaptist martyr, was seized May 20, 1559, in Antwerp, Belgium. In the pursuit of an Anabaptist the bailiffs forced their way into homes where Grietgen and five other Anabaptist women were living. Not finding the man they sought, they imprisoned the women. Neither threats nor torture caused them to forsake their faith. They all died as martyrs. Grietgen Bonaventuers was drowned in Antwerp, Oct. 12, 1559, not beheaded as the Groot Offerboek of 1613 and also van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror erroneously assert (DB 1899, 107). In memory of Grietgen and the women who suffered martyrdom with her a song was written, which begins, "Babels raets mandamenten" (Een liedeken van ses vrouwen), and also in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," both found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (Nos. 16 and 19). O.H., vdZ.

Offer, 566, No. 55, 581-86; Mart. Mir. D. 249, E 623; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 4, 9, 16; XIV, 26 f., No. 300; ML I, 245.

Grietgen Jans, an Anabaptist martyr, was the wife of Adriaen Heynsius, a weaver of Zwartewaal, Dutch province of South Holland. She was burned at the stake at Brielle (same province) on July 25, 1569, together with Maerten Pieters (q.v.). She was found guilty of heresy, "having united with those called Mennists" and having been rebaptized. (Mart. Mir. D 388, E 740; ML II, 391.) vdZ.

Grietgen van Sluys, an Anabaptist martyr according to van Braght (Mart. Mir.), born at Tielt in the Dutch province of Guelderland, was executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1573. According to Verheyden (Gent, 61) she is identical with Beelken (Beliken) de Jaghere, who was burned at the stake at Gent on March 17, 1573. But it seems more likely that she is the same person as Grietken Heyndrick of Hos near 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant, who was 23 years old and married to Martin van der Sluys, who lived at Zomerghem near Gent; this Grietken Heyndrick was burned on the same day as Beliken de Jaghere. (Mart. Mir. D 647, E 968; ML II, 175.) vdZ.

Grietje (Griete) Maes, an Anabaptist martyr, widow of Gerrit, was executed by drowning at Amsterdam on May 15, 1535, together with six other Anabaptist women because "they have been rebaptized, holding pernicious views concerning the sacraments . . . contrary to the laws and decrees of his imperial Majesty . . . without having shown penitence." Their property was confiscated. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764) seems to make two martyrs of this person, calling one Grietje Maes and the other Gerrit's widow. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 58.) vdZ.

Grietken Govaerts, an Anbaptist martyr, charged with rebaptism and the crime of having attended forbidden meetings of the Mennonites, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 20, 1573. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 113 f., 176; XIV, 90 f., No. 1023.) vdZ.

Grietken Heyndrick: see Grietgen van Sluys.

Grietken van den Steene, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 28, 1573, together with Janneken Croecx and Jacques van Hulten. She had been (re)baptized and participated in the meetings of the Mennonites. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 100 f., 171; XIV, 88 f., No. 1002.) vdZ.

Grigoryevka was a Mennonite village in the Ukraine on the southern railway, in the Ezum district of the province of Kharkov; the post office and railway station was Gavrilovka five miles distant. It was founded in 1889 by Mennonites from the leased villages of the Fürstenland settlement and had an area of about 8,000 acres, on which 41 farms were set up. The land was very fertile and the settlement prospered economically as well as culturally. In 1904 a community steam mill was built and from 1906 to 1925 a secondary school in addition to the primary school was maintained. The settlement had 52 farms with 567 inhabitants in 1925. In 1918 Grigoryevka was the scene of fighting between the German and Russian armies. In 1918-20 it was overrun by robber bands, finally by Machno's (q.v.) bands. Under the Soviet government many emigrated to other parts of Russia, and some reached Canada. By 1927 Grigoryevka had ceased to exist as a Mennonite settlement. (ML II, 175.) H.F., J.B.A.

Grigoryevka Mennonite Church, located in the village of Grigoryevka (q.v.), province of Kharkov, Ukraine, Russia, founded in 1890, had a baptized membership of 184 in 1905, with a total population of 287 in that year. It was a subsidiary of the New York Mennonite Church (q.v.), with Heinrich Funk (presumably died in exile) as an elder. C.K.

Grijpskerk, a village in the western part of the Dutch province of Groningen, the center of an extensive Mennonite congregation comprising several original congregations or circles. Many of them are very old. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 5 persons in Nieziel, one in Lutjegast, 18 in Visvliet, and 8 in Grijpskerk, making a total of 31 persons. Later all of these groups united in the Pieterzijl congregation, sometime before 1690. In the 17th century this congregation was a member of the Humsterland Flemish Sociëteit. In 1815 a new church was built in Pieterzijl (q.v.). In 1826 the congregation participated in the establishment of the Groningen Sociëteit (q.v.). The membership was 24 in 1828, 42 in 1835, 80 in 1927, and 48 in 1955. In 1892 the parsonage (which had become dilapidated) and church were transferred to Grijpskerk because of its favorable location. The new church was dedicated on Nov. 30, 1892, by S. F. van der Ploeg, who was pastor of the congregation in 1889-91. He was followed by A. Gerritsma (1894-1935) and Miss C. W. Brugman (1940-45). Since 1946 the congregation has been served by S. S. Smeding of Noordhorn (q.v.). (DB 1893, 135; ML II, 175.) vdZ.

Grijspeert (also Gryspeere, Grisperre, Gryspeer, Grijspaart), a family in Flanders, Belgium, found in the region southwest of Brugge (see Eug. de Seyn, Dictionnaire Hist. et Géogr. des Communes Belges XI, Bruxelles, 1933), of whom many joined the Mennonites, fled from Flanders to the Northern Netherlands about 1580, because of religious persecution, particularly to Haarlem. Many members of this family have served as deacons, both in Haarlem and Amsterdam. The preacher Pieter Grijspeer(t) (q.v.) belonged to this family.

Fierin Grysperre, living at Hemelghem near Yseghem, who was cited by the Calvinistic church council of Gent, Belgium, on July 19, 1583, to answer for his Mennonite faith, may have been a member of the same family. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Grijspeert (Grijspeer, Grijspaart), Pieter, was a noted preacher of the United Flemish and High German Mennonite congregation at Haarlem in 1625-55. The dates of his birth and death are not known, but he seems to have been chosen to the ministry while he was young, for in his writings he frequently used the motto, "I am young."

He was one of the signatories of the Outerman Confession (1625), presented to the Court of Holland by representatives of nine congregations. He and his colleague Jan Doom represented the Haarlem congregation at the peace conference held at Dordrecht on April 21, 1632, and signed the Dordrecht Confession. Likewise he appeared as the elder of the Haarlem congregation at the conference held at Haarlem in June 1649 for the purpose of forming a union, when representatives were present from Zeeland, Flanders, North and South Holland, Utrecht, and Overijssel. The three previously accepted confessions, Olive Branch, Jan Cents, and the Dordrecht Confession, were presented and quietly adopted, with the understanding that they were still subordinate to the Word of God. In addition many other regulations were passed for the benefit of the union, to serve in the management of the congregations.

These suggestions were published in 1654 by Grijspeert in a volume titled Een Christelyk Handboekje, gemaakt onder Verbeteringe, hoe men bequaamelyk, als elk zyn Geloove beleeft, en zyne Regeeringe waarneemt, Goddelyk de Gemeente kan regeeren, without place of publication. The author calls himself a "lover of the apostolic church and of general Christian peace." This can indeed be said of Grijspeert. Already by Maatschoen's time the booklet was so rare (1745) that he included it without any condensation in his Geschiedenis der Mennoniten (III, 188-232); not even in the Mennonite library of Amsterdam is a copy to be found. It contained questions to be presented to newly chosen preachers, deacons, and baptismal candidates, gives directions for the baptismal ceremony, the reception of excommunicated members, and marriage, besides thirty rules to be observed in the management of the congregation. In conclusion it contains an excerpt from Paulus Merula's Tydthresoor concerning the state and service of the Christian church in the first century, in order to show that it was governed by definite regulations. Maatschoen calls it a most useful booklet and wishes that all Mennonite congregations would on general principles be governed by it; at the same time he notes that many congregations were still living by its precepts.

In addition Grijspeert published a collection of devotional poems, Sommighe leerachtighe Geestelycke Liedekens, gemaeckt uyt den Ouden, ende Nieuwen Testamente, met ook eenige Psalmen Davids, uyt verscheyden Boecken by een vergadert, om in de vergaderinge der Geloovigen tot des Heeren prys, ende stichtinge onder malkanderen ghesongen te worden. The addition of the words, "Vermeerdert met eenighe nieuwe Liedekens door P.G.," indicates that he wrote some of them himself. These compose an appendix titled 's Herten vreucht, inhoudende eenige nieuwe Liedekens, uyt den Ouden, ende Nieuwen Testament by een vergadert tot vermaeckinghe des Gheests. This little volume contains 12 songs, 11 of which were written by Grijspeert. There is also an appendix of six songs by the martyr Elisabeth (drowned at Leeuwarden in 1549), Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Joost Ewoutsz, Jacques Outerman, and an unknown author. The hymnbook was published at Hoorn in 1629. A second edition, omitting 's Herten Vreucht, appeared at Haarlem in 1638. The last six songs were printed at Amsterdam in 1618, and apparently were added later to Grijspeert's collection. The Mennonite archives at Amsterdam contain two letters written by him. J.L.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis der Mennoniten III, 183-236; Biogr. Wb. III, 388 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 586; II, Nos. 1387, 1855, 1861; Catalogus Amst., 273; ML II, 175 f.

Grimm, Daniel, a Mennonite preacher in the Emmental, Switzerland, a follower of Hans Reist (q.v.), was opposed to the emigration of the Mennonites to the Netherlands in 1711. He was banished by the magistrates, but returned and caused much trouble for Runckel (q.v.), who was organizing the emigration in co-operation with the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs (q.v.). Grimm is said to have escaped from Switzerland in June 1711. No further information about him is available. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1317, 1334 f.) vdZ.

Grimmelshausen, Hans Jakob Christoph von (1620-76), author of the famous novel, Der abenteuerliche Simplizissimus, published in 1668. In book V, chapter 19, he gives a remarkable picture of "Hungarian Anabaptists" and their communal way of living, and there can be no doubt that Hutterite colonies in Slovakia are thus portrayed. Grimmelshausen tells us that he had discovered "a manner of living for human beings which is more angelic than human. It would happen if a group of men and women, both married and single, would unite and live according to the manner of the Anabaptists. That is, they would have to earn their living with the work of their hands under the guidance of an expert leader, and to spend the rest of their time with the praise and worship of God." And then he continues, "Once I saw such a life in the Anabaptist communities in Hungary [Slovakia]. Were they not involved in heresy I certainly would have liked to join them. At least I would have called their way of life the most blessed in the world." And then Grimmelshausen has no other comparison for these colonies than with the Jewish Essenes as described by Josephus who likewise practiced community of goods. "They have great treasures," he tells us, and modern research bears it out, "and plenty of food, which they, however, wasted in no way. No curse, no grumbling or impatience was heard among them, indeed no idle word at all. There I saw craftsmen working in their shops as if they were hired; their schoolteachers instructed their youth as if they were their own children. Nowhere did I see men and women together; each sex did its definite work at separate places. I found rooms in which there were only mothers of newborn infants, who were well provided for with nursing care, in other rooms nothing could be seen but many cradles with infants cared for by women appointed to this task, so that the mothers did not need to concern themselves except three times a day when the children were brought to them to be fed. The task of watching over the children was assigned to widows; the others had to spin, wash, etc. And thus also among the men; each had his assigned duty. If a man or woman became ill, they had special nurses. They all had definite hours for eating and sleeping, but not a minute for playing or idleness. Only the young people for the sake of their health walked an hour under the supervision of the teachers. There was no anger, no revenge or envy, no jealousy and no enmity among them, also no concern about temporal possessions. In short, there was a lovely harmony which seemed to have no other object than to better the human race and to promote the Kingdom of God. Such a life," Grimmelshausen concludes, "I would have liked to introduce, for it appears to me these people by far surpass in their way the lives of the monks." And then he goes on musing, "I often said if I could only convert these Anabaptists, so that our coreligionists could learn their way of life from them, . . . what a blessed man I should be. Or if I could only persuade my Christian brethren to live lives as Christian (according to appearance) as these Anabaptists." He would have been willing to sacrifice his entire fortune and possession if he thus could establish a Christian community after that pattern, but alas, where would he find such people able or willing to go along such lines?

The question as to how Grimmelshausen got all this information and also his enthusiasm for this way of life has not been completely solved. Some literary historians think it possible that he visited Slovakian Bruderhofs between 1640 and 1645 (the time of the great Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis), but others doubt that he ever traveled. A. J. F. Zieglschmid thinks rather of contacts with the newly established Hutterite Bruderhof in Mannheim (q.v.) (which existed between 1645 and 1684) where Grimmelshausen might have learned all the details described, and also the story of the Hungarian mother colonies. In any case to him it was almost like Utopia come true. R.F.

A. J. F. Zieglschmid, "Die Ungarischen Wiedertäufer bei Grimmelshausen," Ztscht f. Kirchengesch. LIX (1940) 1-36.

Griner Conservative Amish Mennonite Church, located two miles south of Middlebury, Elkhart Co., Ind., was organized in the spring of 1922 as a branch of the Townline congregation. The meetinghouse was formerly a Lutheran church. In 1954 the membership was 192 with Manasseh Miller and Louis Kauffman as preachers, Fred Bontrager deacon, and Sam T. Eash bishop. S.T.E.

Grisons (Graubünden), a canton in southeast Switzerland, the largest canton, with 2,774 sq. miles and 128,200 inhabitants. During the Reformation it showed many indications of a rapidly growing Anabaptist movement, which was, however, violently suppressed. This was especially true of its capital Chur (q.v.). Two Grisons Anabaptists played an important role in the first Anabaptist congregation in Zürich, Georg Blaurock (q.v.), and Andreas Castelberger (q.v.). They are considered the fathers of the Anabaptist movement in Grisons. At the end of April 1525, expelled from Zürich, they returned to their home with Felix Manz (q.v.). In mid-May they were in Chur and its vicinity; the Reformed took note of their activity and prepared for the conflict. In three months the conflict was on. The Anabaptists had had great success and had been supported by the Catholics. Comander, the reformer of Grisons, was anxious, and on Aug. 8, 1525, urgently appealed to Zwingli for help. The Chur authorities now took a hand. Manz was imprisoned and then expelled; Blaurock escaped from prison. In spring 1526 Anabaptists in the area of Maienfeld and Fläsch were suppressed. At first they refused to be converted; but when the use of the rack was threatened they recanted. A leader escaped the authorities. Salzmann, the Reformed teacher in the city school of Chur, wrote to Vadian, March 13, 1526, "Wolff Ulimann (q.v.) fled because of pestilence, else he would have been punished. He was fined three pounds." This notice may have been of interest to Vadian (see St. Gall). Nothing more is known of the work of Ulimann in Grisons. Supposedly the judges saw in him one of the most dangerous false teachers, who had made himself noticed in the Rhine Valley in Chur.

At Easter 1526 Salzmann complained to Zwingli that the Anabaptists were backsliding (from Anabaptism), but this seems to have been a brief flicker. At the Bundestag at Davos in May 1526 religious freedom was granted only to the Catholics and Reformed; the Anabaptists and other sects were strictly forbidden. E. Camenisch, the church historian of Grisons, estimates "that the Anabaptists at the beginning of 1526 formed a compact separatist brotherhood, differing from the other two creeds by a special concept of faith." After 1526 there were only isolated traces of the brotherhood; the Anabaptists had been robbed of their leaders and threatened by severe edicts of the government, the Reformed Church had been firmly established, and won an equal status with Catholicism. In 1528 the "Catabaptists," led by Castelberger, again stirred in Chur, causing Comander great concern. Then Castelberger disappeared from the scene. Conrad Grebel (q.v.), who was probably about to begin his work in Grisons, was at the gateway to Grisons in the summer of 1526. He died at Maienfeld of the plague. Felix Manz was drowned in Zürich, Jan. 5, 1527, Wolfgang Ulimann was executed in Swabia in 1528, and Blaurock died at the stake at Clausen in Tirol, Sept. 6, 1529. The twelfth of the theses announced by Comander for the disputation planned for Easter Monday 1531 at Chur, which could, however, not take place because of war, read, "Anabaptism is an error and a seduction against God's Word and teaching." This indicates that there were still Anabaptists in the country, but their traces become more scarce.

Martin Seger, magistrate of Maienfeld, in a letter of Sept. 16, 1533, requests Bullinger to send him the book he published against the Anabaptists in 1530. It is not clear whether the reason for this request is renewed Anabaptist activity or the memory of their earlier appearance in Fläsch and Maienfeld. After 1542 the immigration of Italian refugees sets in, among whom there are elements that oppose the Reformed creed and who are called Anabaptists in memory of the doctrines and activities of the Anabaptists in the 1520's; a more accurate name would have been "anti-Trinitarians" (q.v.). They played an important role in the history of the Reformation in Grisons, but they can be only touched upon here. In the conflict between Frell and Gantner (1570) we note a mixture of Anabaptism, anti-Trinitarianism, and Schwenckfeldianism.

From the darkness of the period 1530-70 emerges the figure of a noble Anabaptist, Leopold Scharnschlager, the schoolmaster of Ilanz. He came from

Tirol, had owned a farm in Hopfgarten near Kitzbühel, but as an Anabaptist had to flee in 1530 with his wife and daughter. Perhaps, like many of his brethren, he had set out for Moravia. In 1535 he was probably no longer there. Pilgram Marpeck, whose acquaintance he had meanwhile made, forwarded letters to him. It can be assumed that, like Pilgram Marpeck, he had ventured to return to his home. It is known from a letter written by his son-in-law, a Moravian Anabaptist, that after 1538 his stay in Tirol was short. In 1544 he was supposedly in Augsburg, for there it is known that Scharnschlager and his wife were fined 40 guilders in Bavaria. Scharnschlager also co-operated in writing the Verantwortung über Caspar Schwenckfelds Judicium (published in 1928 by Johann Loserth). He is named second in the list of authors after Pilgram Marpeck. The epistle to Caspar Schwenckfeld, which precedes that Verantwortung, is dated Jan. 1, 1544. In 1546 Scharnschlager and his wife suddenly appeared in Ilanz in the Oberland of Grisons, where they at last found a quiet place of residence. Their neighborhood did not learn of their Anabaptist faith. Having studied at a Tirolean monastery school or in Innsbruck, Scharnschlager was able to head the country school here. A considerable inherited fortune made him independent of the trifling salary. But his connections with the Brethren in Upper Germany and Moravia he quietly continued. He also put all his strength at the disposal of the brotherhood. In 1558 he copied a book (perhaps the Verantwortung) and wrote an epistle "Vom Gericht." The Brethren in Augsburg thanked him in a letter signed by Valentin Werner (Aug. 26, 1559). They asked him to continue to serve them with the treasures of his spirit, but "they do not want to overburden his honorable age." In March 1563 Scharnschlager died; his wife soon followed. The lawsuit that developed from their estate (not settled until 1566) furnishes these important notes on this Anabaptist leader.

The letter of 1559 by the Augsburg Brethren is addressed to the beloved brethren in Grisons, especially to Leopold Scharnschlager. Thus it is known that there was an Anabaptist congregation in Grisons at that time, which existed in secret. The few notes from the following decade merely say that in the lawsuit mentioned above a tawer of Chur, Sebastian Neudorfer, is named, "who carried messages down into the country."

The Chur pastor Johannes Fabricius Montanus had to dispute before the council with an Anabaptist in January 1560, and evidently used Bullinger's book against the Anabaptists. In the following year the Anabaptists again required his thought. In November 1561 several held meetings in the house of a citizen and baptized two citizens of Chur. Two outsiders in Chur said to the Anabaptists, Ferdinand had the Anabaptists so severely persecuted with fire and sword that they wished they were in Grisons. Fabricius remarks in a letter to Bullinger of Nov. 28, that they must act quickly. He had held a disputation and had been the victor. Both the Anabaptists have been imprisoned: one of them, a butcher who had learned his trade in Zürich or had long served there, Tardy by name, was to be expelled (but the sentence was not carried out). With the other, a Chur bookseller and bookbinder, Georg Frell, Fabricius had spoken, but without results; Frell referred to the Paraphrases of Erasmus. The successor of Fabricius, Tobias Egli, wrote in 1570 that Frell had added Schwenckfeldianism to his other errors. In the negotiations of 1570 and 1571 there is repeated mention of books by Schwenckfeld that Frell had in stock, and of Schwenckfeldian doctrines that he defended. They mentioned the Fastnachtsbüchle or Vermanungsbüchle that was distributed in Chur and Prättigau. Egli has shown that at a disputation held on May 19, 1570, Frell took his ideas opposing Zwingli's teachings from Hubmaier's writings. There is here probably an adulteration of Anabaptism that has only occasional contacts with Scharnschlager's type.

The fight about Frell took on larger dimensions when Johannes Gantner, Egli's colleague, took sides with Frell. He opposed the persecution of heretics on the basis of the parable of the tares, but in other points as well he touched Anabaptist doctrine; e.g., the statements of the Old Testament are not valid, for we are a new people; he who has conscientious scruples against injuring a foe, whom Christ says we must love, even in the greatest distress of the native country should not be compelled to do so; one should not swear, but letting yea be yea and nay be nay is sufficient (concerning the further developments see Chur). Frell came back to Chur later and conversed with Gantner openly, but there was no profound movement. The butcher Tardy, who was also expelled, remained for a time in Ilanz, the residence of Scharnschlager ("where he attacked everybody"), but was then permitted to return to Chur, and here committed a murder. On May 9, 1573, he stabbed his stepson on the marketplace; but he escaped and did not reappear.

The last instance of Anabaptism in Chur extends into the 17th century. Stephan Gabriel, who served as pastor of Ilanz from 1593 to 1618 and from 1626 until his death in 1638, stated in 1605 that he frequently sought Anabaptists in the great crowds in Ilanz before the Bundestag, convinced them of their error, and converted them. He was even summoned to the Catholic valley of the Lugnez to dispute with two Anabaptists before a great crowd of people, in the presence of six priests. He boasts of being victorious. The town of Ilanz was thus for a long time an Anabaptist center.

In the area of Veltlin, Bormio (Worms), and Chiavenna (Kläven) the Reformation had also gained entry. In these Italian-speaking regions, as well as in the Grisons valleys of Bergell and Puschlav, the Protestants fleeing from the Inquisition found a field for work. On the whole their work was fruitful. Only the appearance of several anti-Trinitarians brought confusion and in Chiavenna led to a long-drawn-out church quarrel, involving the congregation there, the Grisons synod, and the Zürich clergy. The principal leader of the radicals, Camillo Renato (q.v.), strongly emphasized the authority of the Spirit as above the written Word of God; he questioned the value of the sacraments, rejected infant baptism as a superstitious ceremony, without meaning; salvation, he said, is accomplished not by a historical fact, but by sudden illumination by the Spirit, bringing rebirth.

In the midst of these disputes comes the so-called Anabaptist Council of Venice in 1550. (It was probably rather an anti-Trinitarian meeting, to which some Anabaptists were invited.) The invitations had been issued orally by messengers, who first sought out the churches in Upper Italy, then in Grisons and northern Switzerland as far as Basel and St. Gall. Sixty Anabaptist (?) leaders had assembled in Venice, including 20 or 30 from Switzerland. Unfortunately those from Grisons are not named (il Nero is not Franciscus Niger; see Schiess, Korrespondenz Bullingers I, p. LXI, note 5). Titianus, an anti-Trinitarian, had of course worked in the subject cantons (Untertanenlanden) and later, in 1554 (Schiess, pp. XXI f.) disputed in Chur with the Grisons reformer Gallicius; he was driven out with lashes. But he cannot be considered the representative of the Grisons Anabaptists. There may therefore have been some of Scharnschlager's type there. The moderate wing left; hence their representatives were not named.

The above-named difficulties in the subject cantons now made it essential for the synod to set up a Confession of Faith and church regulations. In 1552 Philip Gallicius was assigned this task, and he formulated them at once. In April 1553 the Confessio Raetica was sent to Bullinger for his perusal, and after it had received his approval and been signed by the Grisons clergy, it was presented to the Bundestag and confirmed by the delegates of both creeds. Of this confession Article II (On the Sacraments) expressly states that baptism is not itself purification and sanctification. Article 18 (On Infant Baptism) says: "It is just as Christian among Christians as circumcision was considered pious by the Israelites." Article 19 says: "He who has once been baptized by a preacher of the Word of the triune God shall not be baptized differently or anew." From the church regulations, articles 37, 40, and 65 should be mentioned: Baptism shall be performed by none but the clergy, since Jesus conferred the office of baptism only on those who have the office of preaching. As the place for baptism the church is designated, and baptism at home is granted only for emergencies. The clergyman shall perform the baptismal ceremony standing, under the appropriate support of the witnesses. "On the other hand, we forbid baptism to be performed seated in barns or in open fields or woods or other unsuitable places as the godless Anabaptists do." All baptisms are to be entered into the church books, as had often been decided before.

When Bullinger worked out the second Helvetian Confession the Grisons Church adopted it without invalidating their own. It was rather considered cantonal law, and with its aid the remnants of Anabaptism and anti-Trinitarianism were wiped out. J.t.D.K.

E. Camenisch, "Die Confessio Raetica," in Jahresbericht der hist. antiquarischen Gesellschaft (Chur, 1914); idem, Bündner Ref.-Gesch. (Chur, 1920); T. Schiess, "Aus dem Leben eines Hanzer Schulmeisters," Bündner Monatsblatt, 1916, No. 2; "Verantwortung über Caspar Schwenckfelds Judicium," Züricher Zentralbibliothek (Ms B. 72); in the appendix to the former Valentin Werner's letter to Scharnschlager, 489b-92b and a note about the origin of the book, 495 f.; J. ten Doornkaat Koolman, Leopold Scharnschlager und die verborgene Täufergemeinde in Graubünden (Zwingliana, 1926, 329 ff.); K. Benrath, "Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen," Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1885, No. 1; idem, "Gesch. der Ref. in Venedig," in Schriften des Ver. für Gesch., No. 18 (Halle, 1887); Rageth Ragaz, Stefan Gabriel, der Prädikant und Dichter (Chur. 1928) 27; T. Schiess, ed., Bullingers Korrespondenz mit den Graubündnern XXIII-XXV of Quellen zur Schweizer Geschichte (Basel, 1904-6); P. D. Rosius de Porta, Historia reformationis ecclesiarum Raeticarum (Curiae Raetorum, 1771) I; ML II, 157-59.

Griswold (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized June 5, 1926, with 22 members, under the leadership of H. Penner of Alexander, Man. The 1953 membership was 69, all of whom were rural people. In 1929 a church building having a seating capacity of 150 was bought in Griswold. The following ministers have served this church: Jacob Abrahams, Peter Mandtler, Abraham Friesen, Abe L. Klassen, and John J. Krueger. A new meetinghouse was built in Alexander in 1953, when the name was changed to Alexander M.B. H.C.K.

Gritznis, Wolf von, an Anabaptist preacher who before 1535 worked in the region of Bretten (Badden), Germany, and was executed there, as was stated by Judith Ruemmich, who was imprisoned in Passau, Sept. 14, 1535. She had been baptized by him and was one of a group of 20 brethren who wished to return to their homes in South Germany when they had been expelled from Moravia. Her husband, Hans Ruemmich of Marbach, had been baptized in Auspitz by Blasy Khumbauf in the group led by Philip Plener. Since most of the Passau prisoners, who furnished the core of the Ausbund (q.v.) with their martyr poems, were adherents of Philip Plener (also called Weber), who was very successful about 1529 in the Palatinate (Hege, 60 ff.), it may be assumed that after settling in Moravia Wolf von Gritznis was one of Plener's adherents in this Upper Rhine region. Nothing more is known concerning him. HEGE.

Wolkan, Lieder, 30; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); ML II, 176 f.

Groede, in Zealand-Flanders, Dutch province of Zeeland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Sometimes this congregation is called Cadzand; after 1743 it was usually called the Mennonite Congregation of Nieuwvliet in 't Land van Cadzand. The history of this congregation has been described in the article Cadzand. A house in Groede, bought and adapted for use as a Mennonite meetinghouse (1647), was confiscated.

vdZ.

N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 144; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1158; ML II, 177.

Groene Kruis (Green Cross), a Dutch society founded in 1900 by the Mennonite pastor F. C. Fleischer (q.v.) and Willem Poolman, a physician from The Hague. This association, which was founded for the purpose of improvement of health and domestic nursing, has in the course of the years developed into a large organization. (ML II, 191.) vdZ.

Groff (Graf), Hans (1661-1746), the pioneer of 1696, settled first at Paradise and later in Groffdale, West Earl Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., on 1,500 acres. His first son, Jacob, remained in Strasburg and the rest on the paternal Groffdale acres. The Groffdale church was built on this farm in 1755, the center of a thriving congregation. Hans's sons Peter and David, his son-in-law Henry Landis, together with Hans's brother Martin (d. 1760) as minister, formed the nucleus of this Mennonite community. The first-known bishop of this congregation, Christian Burkholder, married a granddaughter of Hans Groff. Hans and his son David furnished the meeting place for the congregation in the early days in their homes. Many of his descendants with various names have served the church. Abraham Grove of Markham, Ont. (1770-1836), minister here and a molder, was a descendant. I.D.L.

Groffdale Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles northwest of New Holland, Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. The first meetinghouse was built of logs in 1755 on Hans Groff's vast acreage. A stone addition was built in 1823. In 1909 the new brick church was built which was enlarged in 1936. The congregation has co-operated in the Palo Alto Mission from the start, releasing one of its ministers, Lester M. Hoover, to serve there. In 1954 Mahlon Witmer was the bishop in charge, with Eli G. Sauder, Amos Sauder, and John S. Martin as ministers and Floyd Graybill as deacon. Though a large percentage are still farmers, the Old Order Mennonites are buying up most of the land around them. Until 1905 the Metzler and Groffdale congregations were served by the same ministers; since then a gradual separation has been taking place. First they had separate deacons and gradually a separate ministry. In 1953 all except two ministers were serving both congregations. The membership in 1953 was 348. (†ME I) I.D.L.

Groffdale (Pa.) Old Order Mennonite Church. In 1895 a frame meetinghouse was built a mile west of the original Groffdale house, for the Martinite division. Joseph O. Wenger and Aaron Z. Sensenig are the bishops; Isaac N. Zimmerman and Eli Hursh, ministers; and Benjamin Hoover, the deacon. This group has no Sunday school, summer Bible school, evangelistic meetings, nor youth activities. It had 325 members in 1955.

In the same house worship the Weaverland Conference group (OOM), who separated from the above in 1926, differing chiefly in permitting the automobile and home conveniences and English preaching. Moses Horning and Joseph Hostetter are bishops; Abram Hoover and Samuel Martin, ministers; and Eli Nolt, deacon. The two groups have well over 400 members. I.D.L.

Grombach, a village (1925 pop. 669, with 12 Mennonites) in the Sinsheim district of Baden, Germany. As early as the 16th century Mennonites were living here. In 1596 Gall Schnaitmann of Fellbach is mentioned. He was an alert man, who left a considerable fortune in his home town, and was baptized at Landau in 1587, after he had studied Menno Simons' Foundation Book. He was a wool weaver and had made long journeys; he had also worked in Göding (q.v.) in Moravia, where the Hutterian Brethren had a household. In Grombach Schnaitmann took over a mill from the lords of Flersheim. About 1598 the court records mention a sister of Bernhard Bauder of Urbach (Bossert, 271).

There are scarcely any references to other Mennonites in the areas owned by the imperial knights. The few notes handed down from Grombach therefore deserve attention, for in the 16th century no other places in the Kraichgau are known in which Mennonites lived. But from Dutch sources it is known that there were Mennonite churches in that region in the 16th century. The Mennonites in the Neckar Valley in 1575 wanted to unite with the Flemish. Consequently in April three Flemish preachers, Pieter de Leydecker, Hendrik Glasemaeker, and Daniel Graef of Holland were sent to the Neckar Valley to negotiate. They visited all the congregations there, but no union resulted. The Mennonites here gradually died out.

After their expulsion from Switzerland in 1650-1710 the Mennonites found reception and protection in the lands of the local nobility here. About that time four congregations were organized near Grombach, all equally distant from the village. A list of 1731 calls them Zimmerhof, Büchelhof, Hasselbach, and Bockschaft. Several of their preachers lived in Grombach; thus Ulrich Neukomm served Zimmerhof, and Heinrich Kündig served Bockschaft. In the Dutch Naamlijst der Predikanten this congregation is mentioned from 1766 on, appearing in the next issues under different names.

In the last quarter of the 18th century the Mennonites in Grombach helped to distribute Gerhard Tersteegen's writings. From a letter by Elder Abraham Bechtel (preacher of the congregation then called Bockschaft-Streichenberg and Wesingen 1752, elder 1770, d. 1794) of Grombach, dated Jan. 20, 1776, it is known that they contributed two "Karolines" to the printing of Tersteegen's books, and that Hans Krehbiel (preacher 1761, elder 1773) of Grombach and Jost Glück (preacher 1756, elder 1773) in Berwangen offered to make contributions to the posthumous editions of Tersteegen's works.

Today only one of the four congregations has survived, namely, Hasselbach (q.v.), to which the Mennonites in Grombach belong. (Müller, Berner Täufer, 209; ML II, 177.) Hege.

Gronau Mennonite Church, in the city of Gronau (pop. 15,000) in Westphalia, Germany, on the Dutch German border 32 miles northwest of Münster, was established Feb. 4, 1888, by about 20 Mennonite families living in Gronau and Ahaus, under the leadership of Mathieu van Delden (q.v.). Services had been held here since 1864 by the pastor of the Enschede (q.v.) Mennonite Church. Most of the families were industrialists, proprietors of the large cotton textile mills in Gronau and a jute mill

PROVINCE OF Groningen,
NETHERLANDS

Places of Mennonite congregations underlined.

in Ahaus. The chief families have been van Delden (q.v.), Stroink, Rahusen, Rommelaar, and Goerke, all but the last of Dutch extraction. The leading Mennonite textile firms in Gronau have been M. van Delden & Co. and Gerrit van Delden & Co. Mathieu van Delden, Jan van Delden, Hendrik van Delden, and Julius Stroink were leaders in the congregation, the latter three having been deacons for a number of years. Though incorporated in Germany and a member of the Vereinigung, the congregation was served in the Dutch language exclusively by the preachers of the neighboring Dutch congregation of Enschede from the beginning until 1922. At the end of that year the connection with Enschede was dissolved and Pastor A. Fast of Leer, later Emden, assumed the pastorate as a part of his circuit and has continued to serve until the present (1956). A considerable number of Mennonite refugees from Russia found help and employment in Gronau in the years 1920-25.

The first meetinghouse, erected in 1904, was destroyed in a bombing raid in 1944 and was replaced by a new building in 1950. The membership in 1928 was 32 adults and 14 children; in 1954 it was 62 and 18 children.

In 1946-53 Gronau was the seat of the extensive refugee aid program of the Mennonite Central Committee under C. F. Klassen's direction. The processing office was here as well as extensive housing and hospital facilities of the refugees. Some 1,000 refugees from Russia and several hundred from the Danzig area passed through this center on their way to Canada and Paraguay and Uruguay. A small rest home for incapacitated refugees unable to emigrate to Canada was all that remained in 1954 of the once great work. H.S.B.

DB 1864, 183; 1889, 136; 1897, 256 f.; 1900, 226; 1904, 227; (G. Heeringa), Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 150-53; ML II, 177 f.

Grondt-steen van Vreede en Verdraegsaemheit, tot opbouwinge van den tempel Christi onder de Doops-Gesinde (Foundation of Peace and Toleration, in Order to Build up the Church of Christ Among the Mennonites) is a Dutch booklet of 34 pages, printed at Amsterdam in 1674 and reprinted there 1736. It was drafted by four Zonist (q.v.) preachers, Pieter Jansz Stapper (Jisp), Jan Jansz Keeskooper (Koog-Zaandijk), Pieter Apostool (Amsterdam), and Engel Arentsz van Dooregeest (de Rijp), and signed at the Zonist Meeting held on Oct. 25, 1674, at Jisp, Dutch province of North Holland, according to the resolution of a conference of preachers and deacons held on July 18, 1674, at Amsterdam.

It was addressed to "the preachers, deacons and members of the Waterlander and Flemish Mennonites, who until now have not joined the Union" (i.e., the Zonist Sociëteit, founded at the meeting of July 18, 1674, at Amsterdam). The Grondt-steen was an attempt to unite the Dutch Mennonites; the basis of this union was to be the Confession, viz., the Waterlander Confession of Hans de Ries (q.v.) or the Algemeene Belijdenissen (q.v.). It is said emphatically (p. 19) that it is not enough to accept the Holy Scriptures as the truth; a confession is necessary because of the divergence of opinions. The Grondt-steen became the constitution of the Zonist Sociëteit. vdZ.

Groningen, a province in the northeastern part of the Netherlands, area 923 sq. mi., pop. 459,819 (1950) with 4,375 Mennonites. In the Middle Ages this province consisted of a number of different territories: in the north part along the North Sea the districts of Hunsingo and Fivelgo on fertile clay soil, where in early times numerous villages had been built on mounds to protect them from floods; the west part of the province, then called "Westerkwartier," was less fertile; the southeast part (Gorecht and Oldambt districts) was an arid, sandy soil, covered by a thick layer of peat-moor. Shortly after 1400 the city of Groningen became the governing and economical center of all surrounding territories, now forming the province of Groningen, from then on usually called Ommelanden. The north part was often struck by severe floods; this part, now protected from the sea by big dikes, is a center of agriculture at a high level (wheat, pulse, potatoes, sugar beets). Shortly after 1600 a start was made to break up the peat-moors in the southeast of the province, a number of canals were made, and after the peat (used for fuel) was dug out, agriculture was possible in this area (potatoes, rye, oats). Here since the 18th century too a growing industrialization developed, especially in the towns of Hoogezand-Sappemeer and Veendam-Wildervank (straw-board factories, distilleries of brandy and gin, iron works).

Besides in the city of Groningen (q.v.) Mennonites in the 16th century were especially found on the fertile grounds of the northern part of the province; they were nearly all farmers (agriculture). The congregations in the former peat-moor district (Sappemeer, Veendam, Pekela, Stadskanaal) are of considerably later date than those on the Hoogeland clay districts.

Concerning the history of the Mennonites, there are large periods with little information. Besides what Blaupot ten Cate gives, there is little material. Hence it is impossible to give a continuous account of its history; the following may, however, be regarded as fairly accurate. As Kühler shows (DB 1917, 1-8), four periods can be distinguished here as in the rest of the Netherlands: (1) from the beginning to about 1581; (2) 1581-1672; (3) 1672-1811 (for Groningen 1826 is more accurate); and (4) the modern period.

1. In the beginning of the 16th century the province of Groningen was very favorably situated. It was a part of the territory of the dukes of Gelderland, who were represented by Stadholders (some of them quite competent). The government was very tolerant; the Reformation (still intra-church) was able to proceed without interruptions. The humanistic clergy (the influence of men like Wessel Gansfort, q.v., was still felt) promoted it rather than the reverse. Gradually and almost unnoticed Anabaptism also arose alongside of the Reformed movement. Its first appearance can no longer be ascertained. In 1533 Viglius van Ayta, provost in Humsterland, wrote to Erasmus that the sect of the Anabaptists had made great progress in Oldehove and Nijehove and all of Groningen. Where did they come from? It is significant that Groningen forms a bridge between Friesland and East Friesland. It is therefore very likely that the influence of Melchior Hofmann was felt here, or at least that of Trijpmaker (q.v.) on his travel through the country en route from Emden to Amsterdam (1530). In 1534 Jacob van Campen (q.v.) and Obbe Philips (q.v.) stayed here for a time. The latter no doubt founded the congregations in Appingedam and 't Zandt and perhaps also the one in the city of Groningen. The presence of Anabaptists in the city is attested by a record of May 3, 1534, which forbids their presence there. On May 8 the Anabaptists were expelled from the province. But these edicts were indifferently enforced; the severest penalties were fines and temporary exile; only one was put to death in Groningen. Up to this time the movement seems to have been chiliastic, but entirely peaceful in character; even when the Münsterites gained the upper hand, the peaceful element was not submerged. "There were peaceful Anabaptists before, during, and after the Münster episode" (Kühler). The revolutionary movement was brief, but very powerful in Groningen. Twenty-eight emissaries were sent out from Münster in 1534. One of them, Claes van Alkmaer, reached the province of Groningen and found two believers ready to return with him to the New Jerusalem. They were Jacob Kremer of Winsum and Tonnis (Antonius) Kistemaecker of Appingedam. In December they returned to spread Rothmann's Van der Wrake, a work of propaganda. Kistemaecker now remained in Appingedam, where there was a considerable Obbenite congregation. He apparently became the originator of the Zandt revolutionary movement, which took place at "de Arcke," the farm of the wealthy Eppe Pieters. About the middle of January 1535 some 1,000 persons assembled here. Hans Schoenmaker proclaimed himself the Messiah; they should kill all priests and government authorities and inherit their kingdom. The local magistrate was powerless to counter the movement. In addition to Schoenmaker, Cornelis in't Kerckhof (Kershof) near Garsthuizen now appeared as "true" Messiah. Now the Stadholder took steps against them; the group itself also turned against Hans. Andries Droogscheerder, with the odd nickname of "Doctor Nenytken," openly expressed his doubt about this Messiah. Hans was imprisoned in Groningen and soon died there, having lost his mind. Cornelis was also seized, but released after giving a confession. The movement can therefore not have been a real threat to the state. Meetings of Anabaptists in Leermens and 't Zandt were dispersed—nothing more happened. In March 1535, when the Frisian revolutionaries stormed the Oldeklooster near Bolsward, the leaders in Groningen also wanted to go there. Seventy men were ready to go, but their wives would not let them go. It was therefore decided to storm the Johannine Commanderie at Warffum. The attack failed. Thirty were arrested; Jacob Kremer, the rabble-rouser, was beheaded at the end of April 1535 at Groningen. The rest were released. The influence of Münster in this coup is evident in the fact that on March 25, 1535, eleven boats were ready on the Ems to sail to Münster. Gradually this influence decreased, and the revolutionary character subsided. Batenburg (q.v.), who spent the summer of 1535 in Groningen, soon disappeared. His following was slight.

Now the peaceful Anabaptists could come to the fore, especially Dirk Philips and Menno Simons. The former had been ordained as bishop by his brother Obbe in 1536 at Appingedam, but in the next year he moved to Germany (Emden and Danzig). Menno was ordained as bishop by Obbe at Groningen (January 1537) and there baptized a number of persons, including Quirin Pieters, who died as a martyr at Amsterdam in 1545. Menno lived in the province or perhaps in the city "at a quiet place." K. Vos has attempted to show that Menno found a refuge in the home of Christoffer van Ewsum in 1536-43, who was married to Margareta van Dornum. The "quiet place" was located near Middelstum or Rasquert (near Baflo). (See Krahn, Menno Simons, 35 ff., 57 ff.)

In general, conditions became unfavorable for the Anabaptists when the strictly Catholic emperor Charles V also ruled over Groningen (1536), although he never dared to show himself quite as fanatical in matters of religion as in his hereditary lands. In consequence of a proclamation (1542) threatening him and his followers with death, Menno withdrew from Groningen to East Friesland. Two or three times he was in the province on journeys across it, as in 1549, perhaps in 1551 (1555) and 1557. A prosperous time dawned for the Anabaptists when Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) began his work. In 1551-82 he served 22 congregations in the province of Groningen, baptizing about 420 persons, 129 in Appingedam alone.

2. In the second period came the consolidation of the individual congregations, which took place very quietly. The congregations must soon have become numerous. At the conference at Haarlem in 1589, which was held to consider the affair of Thomas Bintgens (q.v.), 23 congregations of Groningen were mentioned (East Friesland may have been included). Internally the current divisions also took place here at this time, even though they did not take quite so extreme a form as at some other places. Brixius Gerrits (q.v.), the elder at Groningen, and Claes Ganglofs (q.v.), an elder of Emden, played a role in the Bintgens affair (see Huiskopers). Later Ganglofs took a strict position, with the result that most of the Groningen congregations sided with the Old Flemish. He also had a part in the failure of the union of the Vereenigde Broederschap (1601 united High Germans, Young Frisians, and Waterlanders) with the Flemish, which was promoted by Lubbert Gerrits. At the beginning of the 17th century there were in the province Old Flemish, who were most numerous (united in a conference since about 1635); Flemish, especially in the region bordering on Friesland (likewise united in a conference later on). Among the moderate (with respect to the ban and shunning) Waterlanders were a congregation in Groningen and one in Sappemeer; among the Danziger Old Flemish (q.v.) there was a congregation in Sappemeer (q.v.) and one in Pekela (q.v.), which fell into a rapid decline about 1787.

A noted personality of this period was Jan Luies (q.v., for whom the Jan-Lukasvolk take their name). In the conferences at Hoorn in 1622 (against P. J. Twisck) and at Middelstum in 1628 (against Claes Claesz of Blokzijl), he took a rigorous position among the Flemish in Groningen. In Middelstum he opposed the union of the Frisians and the Flemish (in Harlingen in 1610 and 1626) and rudely rejected the hand of peace extended to the Groningen congregations. In 1632, when most of the Flemish and Old Flemish congregations in Holland united, the churches in Groningen did not join this union.

A strict but pleasant personality, who had great influence in Groningen, was Uko Walles of Noordbroek, a pupil of Jan Luies. Like his teacher he held an unusual view of the benefit of Christ's atoning death for his opponents (see Uko Walles). He was therefore violently persecuted by the government, at the instigation of the intolerant Calvinist clergy. Even those who did not follow Walles suffered under this persecution. Although not all shared his theological views, he had a large following (conference in Groningen Feb. 23-March 7, 1637). The relationship of his group with the Old Flemish is not entirely clear. In the rural congregations they are probably to be counted identical (all known as Groninger Old Flemish). In the city of Groningen (q.v.) they were for a time distinct, but by 1677 they were again united.

The Ukowallists maintained the strict views of Menno and Dirk Philips on the Incarnation. They baptized all that came to them, even though they had previously been baptized in a congregation in another branch. Baptism was usually by immersion. They exercised the ban in its severest form especially in cases of marriage with persons outside the congregation. Old customs that threatened to disappear (such as footwashing) they conscientiously maintained. Also outside of Groningen Uko Walles had a following. The number of Ukowallists in Friesland is estimated at 600.

What was the attitude of the outside world to the Mennonites? In 1568 the War of Liberation against Spain began. Groningen was also severely oppressed by the Spaniards, whose troops were continuously marching through the province. In 1583 the Mennonites were again severely persecuted. In the country they were compelled to attend the Catholic Church and have their children baptized. In the same year Brixius Gerrits was expelled from the city. In 1594 the Catholics were expelled; the established church was now the Reformed. In 1601 an edict was passed that made the position of the Mennonites even more difficult although the magistrate did not execute it very rigorously. But it is clear that the Mennonites were not very favorably accepted, as the writings of the Groningen chronicler Ubbo Emmius (see his Rerum Frisicarum, historia 1616) show. In 1637-61 the government repeatedly opposed Uko Walles, banishing him and creating many difficulties for all the Mennonites, not only for his followers. The congregation at Wildervank-Veendam, which came into being at this time, was thereby seriously hampered. In 1662 an edict permitted the Mennonites to hold their services "as of old." They were given complete toleration in 1672. In this year of distress when the army of the Bishop of Münster made raids upon this province, the Mennonites most convincingly proved their loyalty to the state, and henceforth they were left in peace.

3. The third period (1672-1826), especially in its latter part, is a period of decline. The differences between the old parties in the Netherlands were less sharp. But they were not entirely eliminated, for instance, in North Holland, where in place of the older divisions, the Zonists and Lamists were the opposing parties. In the 18th century there was in Groningen a clearly perceptible difference between the Old Flemish and the Flemish. The latter followed the Lamists. The Old Flemish Sociëteit was so strongly Zonist that it seriously considered uniting with the Zonist Sociëteit (the negotiations in 1766 proved abortive). But even the conservatives did not escape the spirit of the time, which favored softening of lines. Thus the ban was applied less and less, was omitted, or rather leniently enforced, usually only for a short period. Gradually marriage with persons outside the congregation was at least tolerated, if not exactly permitted. In 1743 the Old Flemish decided that members of other creeds who had married into the Mennonite Church should for a certain period be denied spiritual communion. Silent prayer was replaced by audible prayer. In 1749 it was left to the discretion of each individual preacher to decide this question. The authority of the elders decreased. Since 1749 baptism and communion have been in the hands of the congregation. Organs (previously shunned as a sign of worldliness) were introduced in Groningen in 1785, and in Sappemeer in 1808. In 1898 only seven of the fifteen congregations had organs; now there is one in every church. Footwashing—maintained longest by the Old Flemish—was dropped during the second half of the 18th century. Indeed, even the magistrate's office was no longer repudiated. Nonresistance was in danger of being lost, when many volunteers ranked themselves with the "Patriots." Nonresistance as a principle had, strictly speaking, been sacrificed in 1672, when the Mennonites participated at least indirectly in the war. With respect to their standards of moral conduct, they remained true to the faith of their fathers. Their virtues were acknowledged even by their worst enemies. Their dependability and reliability in business and honesty in dealing were proverbial.

Nevertheless the congregations declined rapidly in numbers. The Mennonites of this province—except those living in the city of Groningen—were almost exclusively farmers, engaged in agriculture or cattle raising. Conditions of agriculture were very bad in the early 18th century and many farmers became pauperized or moved away. Besides this, recurring floods caused tremendous losses to the congregations. A severe flood broke the dikes of the sea at a number of places on Nov. 11, 1686; 80 Mennonites, including 55 children, were drowned, while more than 1,400 head of cattle owned by Mennonite farmers perished. The worst flood was that of 1717. In this year on Christmas day large areas were flooded; 9 brethren, 26 sisters, and 37 children perished; material losses were considerable; houses and barns were destroyed, and Mennonite farmers lost 909 cows, 192 horses, 703 sheep, and 68 pigs.

This meant severe loss for the churches. But there were other reasons why the congregations decreased. Their preachers were unable to compete with the trained ministers of the Reformed Church. Many members transferred their membership to the Reformed Church. The congregations of Bierum, Baflo, and Usquert disappeared altogether. Appingedam was dissolved about 1780; one part settled in adjacent Leermens (about 1700). Ulrum became extinct in 1794; it probably still had a considerable number of members, many of whom joined the Reformed Church. Other congregations, no longer able to maintain their independence, united. Thus the Pieterzijl congregation came into being about 1685, and the union of the Flemish and Old Flemish congregations in Humsterland (since 1838 called Noordhorn) occurred in 1775; Huizinge (now Middelstum), Sappemeer, where the six or more congregations gradually merged with the Old Flemish, Groningen (q.v.), and finally Mensingeweer (1818) originated from several unifications. To be sure, there was an influx of Mennonites from the Palatinate (q.v.) and Switzerland (q.v.). Some of the Palatine Mennonites, expelled from their homes in 1694, and the Swiss Mennonites, expelled from their country in 1710-13, for the most part fled to the Netherlands, and settled principally in Groningen, in the city as well as in the vicinity and in Sappemeer. Money was collected throughout the country to buy farms for them, especially in Hoogkerk and Adorp. These foreigners, who were at first organized into congregations of their own, merged with the Dutch congregations in the first half of the 19th century. There are now among the Dutch Mennonites many descendants of the Swiss refugees, such as the Boer, Leutscher, and Meihuizen families.

Although the progressive Lamists and Socinians were never numerous in this province, there were from early times deviating opinions. This is indicated by the 12 questions (Geuzenfragen) drawn up by the state to counter forbidden opinions (used without success in 1660-70). That such opinions also crept into the Mennonite Church is clear in the fact that there was a Collegiant congregation (in the late 17th and early 18th centuries), which, to be sure, had connections with the United Flemish and Waterlanders in Groningen (see Botterman). A government resolution of Dec. 6, 1701, calls the Collegiants (erroneously, of course) a new sect of Mennonites. Since the resolutions referred only to the city, the rural area was apparently free of Collegiantism.

At the end of the 18th century the situation was deplorable. Some congregations had disintegrated, many were on the verge of doing so; their churches were dilapidated, their members impoverished, their numbers small; while on the other hand the number of unbaptized persons was uncommonly large. The credit for their ability to survive and even to achieve a revival is due in the first place to the endurance of the people of Groningen, but also to two other factors, viz., the acceptance of preachers trained by the Mennonite Seminary—one of the first in Groningen province was Gerrit Bakker in the Noordhorn congregation (1818-71)—and the establishment of the Groningen Sociëteit (1826).

4. Most of the congregations made a more rapid growth in 1815-50. Thereafter the membership again suffered a gradual decline. The 13 congregations existing at the time of the founding of the Sociëteit (Groningen, Den Horn, Noordhorn, Middelstum, Leermens-Loppersum, Midwolda now Winschoten, Sappemeer, Mensingeweer, Noordbroek-Nieuw Scheemda, Pieterzijl or Grijpskerk, Zijldijk, Uithuizen, and Veendam-Pekela) are all still in existence, though some are very small. New congregations that have been added are Stadskanaal, which branched off from Veendam in 1850 and had a minister of its own (from 1917 to 1950 in combination with Assen), and Pekela, which became an independent congregation in 1852, but has always been combined with Veendam. Recently new congregations have been founded in Haren and Roden.

Almost imperceptibly Modernism overtook the Groningen congregations in the 1870's and later. Only in the city of Groningen was there some difficulty. In the rural congregations many who remained orthodox and did not follow the pastors and the majority of the congregations united with the Doleerenden (members of the Reformed Church who had left the main body in 1886) or the Baptists. At present the Groningen congregations are without exception liberal.

There were capable men in the province of Groningen in the 19th century. One of the outstanding men was Simon Gorter (q.v.), minister of Zijldijk 1813-56, who saved and brought to new life not only his own congregation, but also the congregations of Uithuizen and Leermens-Loppersum. A. Winkler Prins, the minister of Veendam 1850-82, a versatile scholar, and editor of a general encyclopedia, was another leader.

The first half of the 20th century was for many congregations a period of disintegration. Nearly half of them were without a pastor. Now nearly all the congregations have a pastor, but a number of congregations have merged.

Whereas the population of Groningen is increasing, the number of Mennonites has been declining. The total number of baptized members in this province is now (1953) 2,601; in 1834 it was 4,050. The percentages are as follows: 1733, 4.5 per cent of the population were Mennonite; 1775, 2.3 per cent; 1834, 1.6 per cent; 1900, 0.8 per cent; 1947, 0.6 per cent. This decrease is partly caused by the fact that many Mennonites moved from this province to other parts of the Netherlands.

The following congregations are found in the province of Groningen, with the following memberships:

	1834	1900	1955
Groningen	230	1017	1021
Grijpskerk	42	87	48
Den Horn	95	67	44
Leermens-Loppersum	42	98	90
Mensingeweer	44	100	75
Middelstum	61	74	34
Noordbroek	85	82	28
Noordhorn	56	89	75
Pekela	—	40	45
Sappemeer	255	494	270
Stadskanaal	—	106	85
Uithuizen	30	98	98
Veendam	140	240	127
Zijldijk	61	83	69
Grootegast (Kring)	—	—	13
Haren (Kring)	—	—	111
Oldehove (Kring)	—	—	10
	1141	2675	2243

vdZ.

H. H. Brucherus, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Groningen (1821); Kroniek van Abel Eppens (1911); C. P. Hofstede de Groot, Geschiedenis der Broederenkerk te Groningen (1832); G. A. Wumkes, De Gereformeerde Kerk im Ommelanden 1595-1796, 30-34; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, II; idem, Friesland; K. Vos, articles in various issues of the Groningsche Volksalmanak; idem, Het Honderdjarig bestaan der Societeit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Groningen en Oost-Friesland (Groningen, 1926); P. G. Bos, "De Groningen Wederdooperswoelingen in 1534 en 1535," in Nederl. Archief v. Kerkgesch., n.s., 6, 1906, 1-17; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 136, 164, 201, 223, 265, 374, 470, 473, 557, 558, I, II, V, 562-65, 571, 575-77, 579, 590, 594, 597, 600, 605 f., 1069, 1087-91, 1093, 1096-98, 1111-14, 1189, 1608, 1610, 1627, 1636, 1638, 1645, 1664, 1730, 1732-36, 1866 f., 1873-80, 1886-1902; DB 1872, 2; 1879, 1-10; 1917, 105; (A. Pathuis) Inventaris van het Oud-Archief den Ver. Doopsgez. Gemeente te Groningen (Groningen, 1940); H. Dassel Sr., Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d., 1952); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); ML II, 178-83.

Groningen, the capital (pop. 132,021, with 1,741 Mennonites) of the Dutch province of the same name, situated on the Hunse and the Aa, connected by canals with Dollart and Lake IJssel (formerly Zuiderzee), is the seat of a very old Anabaptist congregation dating back to 1530-34. A city record dated May 3, 1534, contains an order to all foreigners infected with Anabaptist doctrine to leave the city within 12 hours. The edict referred in particular to Obbe Philips, who was staying here in that year. Since the record speaks only of foreign preachers, and does not mention an Obbenite congregation, the group can not have been very extensive or a threat to the state. Furthermore, the magistrate was very lenient and favored the Reformation, even promoting such a Reformation in the Groningen church. The clergy, especially the inspector Willem Fredericks, was also very tolerant. This tolerance was no doubt the legacy of Wessel Gansfort (q.v.), who had a marked influence in Groningen. There are no records for 1535-36; in fact, there are large gaps in the known history of Groningen. There are no extant proclamations against the Anabaptists in this period. An edict of May 3, 1536, makes no specific reference to the city; hence it may be conjectured that the city congregation was relatively untouched by the Münsterite movement.

In January 1537 Menno Simons was ordained bishop (elder) of the Groningen Anabaptists by Obbe Philips, but it is not likely that he stayed here very much, though on March 3, 1539, he baptized Quirin Pieters here, who died as a martyr in Amsterdam in 1545. Menno Simons, who had close ties with the Groningen congregation, dedicated to this church two of his writings: Klaar bericht . . . van der Excommunicatie (1549 or 50) and Belydinge van den Drieëenigen God. An imperial proclamation of Aug. 31, 1544, ordered that the followers of David Joris, Batenburg, and Menno Simons be imprisoned and punished by death. In 1544 a number of followers of the Anabaptist leader Johan Jansen (who is otherwise unknown) were put to death in Groningen. Menno and many of his followers had already betaken themselves to East Friesland; but the city magistrate was more tolerant to the followers of Menno than the Emperor. Again on Jan. 25, 1548, the magistrate ordered the Anabaptists to leave the city or be subject to the death penalty, but this was never enforced, although many remained. Nothing is known of the inner development of the congregation. The number of Anabaptists is estimated at 23 or 24 (letter to the governor Maria), and also at 1,100 with two preachers (Cornelius). Most of the members were craftsmen. In 1551-81 Leenaert Bouwens baptized 66 persons in Groningen (22 in 1551-54). This figure is rather insignificant in comparison with the near-by city of Appingedam, where he baptized 129.

The city of Groningen, which was rather independent until 1576, now fell under the tyranny of Spain. Many "sectarians" who wished a reformation of the Catholic Church were banished and their goods confiscated. This fate struck Willem Lubberts "of the sect of the Anabaptists and Zwinglians." Following the difficult period of 1580-94 under Spanish rule, during which Brixius Gerrits (q.v.), elder of the Flemish congregation, was expelled from the city (1583), the city was taken by Maurice of Orange and with the surrounding area added as the seventh province to the united Netherlands. With respect to religion it was decided that the Reformed (Calvinist) religion should be practiced openly, "but no one should be tested and troubled in his conscience."

But in 1601 the Mennonites were troubled when the government, no doubt at the instigation of the Calvinist clergy, forbade the Mennonites to have religious meetings and to perform marriages, made rebaptism punishable, and excluded unbaptized children from the rights of inheritance. Also in the ensuing period the magistrate occasionally opposed them, although they were on the whole tolerated. Not until 1672, after the Mennonites had assisted in the difficult siege, were they permanently left in peace.

After the divisions in 1556 and the following years that split the brotherhood into several parties, there were in the city of Groningen at least three congregations—Old Flemish, Flemish, and Waterlander. In addition in 1640-73 another arose, most closely associated with the Old Flemish, viz., the Ukowallists, against whom a proclamation was issued in 1662. They were the followers of Uko Walles (q.v.), of whom we hear at the great conference of the Old Flemish in 1637 in Groningen (see Groningen Sociëteit). In the city accounts of 1663-75 the Ukowallist congregation is listed as independent of the others, and as the largest. It was the bearer of the old unabridged uncurtailed tradition; it was the most determined to hold to the ways of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips. Later it again united with the Old Flemish, or perhaps the latter united with a moderate wing of the Ukowallists. This happened in 1675; two years later they collectively built a church in the name of the Old Flemish on Oude Boteringestraat, where the Old Flemish conference met annually from that time on, and where the Groningen Sociëteit still meets. The chief promoter of this unification was Arent Jans (1610-79), an elder of the Old Flemish congregation since 1636. During the late 17th and early 18th centuries this congregation was very active in giving both moral and material support to the Mennonites of Prussia, Poland, and Lithuania, as well as to the Palatine and Swiss refugees.

This Groningen Old Flemish congregation had some excellent leaders, such as Derk Alles (q.v.) and his son and successor in office, Alle Derks (q.v.). The former baptized 1,832 persons in 307 baptismal services. Another man of great influence was Aldert Sierks Dyk (q.v.), a preacher 1733-79. The Old Flemish congregation used the Biestkens Bible and as hymnals the Veelderhande Liedekens, the Veelderhande Schriftuerlyke Liedekens, and the Lusthof des Gemoets. In 1733 the membership was 291, in 1767 about 200; in 1784, 152, and in 1800 only 138. They had held too tenaciously to the old tradition—even though in the end they had yielded. The office of elder had lost its authority; but to employ trained ministers was contrary to the institutions of their fathers. But the old had also passed away in this respect; the new period following the French Revolution brought new vigor and the Groningen Old Flemish congregation, though weak, was preserved.

The Waterlander congregation, which was represented by Popko Popkes at the well-known conference of the Waterlander congregations at Amsterdam in 1647, and which held its meetings in a house in Pelsterstraat, united with the larger part of the Flemish shortly before 1700.

The Flemish congregation belonged to the Sociëteit of Friesland from the founding of the Sociëteit in 1695 until 1791. Before it merged with the Waterlanders the Flemish congregation held its meetings in a house behind the A-Church. In 1696 they acquired a church on Pelsterstraat. It was a small congregation. In 1695 the congregation numbered about 100 members, in 1721, 123; 1752, 86; and 1809 only 48 members. Eppo Botterman (q.v.) was its learned and capable pastor in 1700-14 and 1725 until at least 1752. His being also supervisor of the Collegiants, who met on the Caroli-Weg, involved his congregation in disputes, especially with his colleague Jacobus Rijsdijk (q.v.).

The Rijnsburger Collegiants (q.v.) had already met Calvinist opposition in Groningen. In 1660-70, 12 questions (see Geuzenvragen) were formulated to be used in warding off erroneous doctrine—collectively usually classified as Socinianism. But Christoffel Wensing (q.v.), a member of the Old Flemish, had established a "college" (about 1680) and defended a Christianity independent of the church "after the manner of the Socinians." Opposition soon arose, but Wensing did not yield. Apparently there was a rather large number of members who agreed with him (surprising in view of the conservatism of the Old Flemish). The outcome was that Wensing was banned in 1687 with a number of followers. The expelled members now held more closely together than ever; soon the government intervened, urged by the Reformed clergy (1700). The Collegiants drew up a confession of faith which they presented on Dec. 19, 1701. It was declared unsuitable on the grounds that the answers to the questions on the Deity of Christ, etc., were inadequate. On Feb. 15, 1702, the college was closed, and could not be reopened until 1712 in spite of much effort. In 1715 they organized a church. Their elder was the above Botterman who sought to promote his ideas in the Flemish congregation. But because of the accompanying disunity he resigned his office with the Flemish in 1714, but resumed it in 1725 at the request of the congregation. Now his colleague Jacobus Rijsdijk (called from Zwolle in 1728) opposed him. A bitter struggle ensued, which did not end until Rijsdijk moved to Almelo in 1742. The fact that Botterman remained with the congregation until at least 1752 shows that most of the congregation at least tolerated his views, even if they were not in agreement with him. It is therefore not surprising that after the death of Steven J. van Geuns, the Collegiant supervisor, in 1757, when the colleges began to dissolve, most of the Collegiants came into the Flemish congregation.

A new increase came to the Mennonites of Groningen at the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th by an influx of Mennonite refugees from the Palatinate and Switzerland. In 1694 Mennonites expelled from the Palatinate settled in the Netherlands, principally at Groningen. In 1711 and the following years Swiss Mennonites found a friendly reception here. Both Derk Alles and Alle Derks took an active interest in them. The first group coming to Groningen consisted of 30 families, and more arrived in the course of time. An offering was taken and the proceeds used to buy farms in the neighborhood of Groningen for the refugees. As early as 1716 a Swiss congregation, which had merged with the Palatine congregation, was large enough to have an elder of its own. There was also a Swiss congregation at Sappemeer (q.v.). Strife within the congregation caused a division into the Old Swiss and the New Swiss about 1720. The immediate cause was actually a minor point, viz., the furnishing of a home; but the basic cause was no doubt deeper. Both parties held their services in a hall located "Achter de Muur" (behind the City Wall) in the "Paltzergang," one in the German language, the other in Dutch. When it was no longer possible to find a German preacher, and David Ricken, the preacher at Sappemeer, had become too old to undertake the troublesome trips to Groningen, the two congregations were again united. Many members had already transferred their membership to the Old Flemish congregation. Their preachers were Izaak Jannes Leutscher until 1810, and Christiaan Jacobs Leutscher 1810-24. In 1809 occurred the union of the "United Flemish and Waterlander congregation of Pelsterstraat with the Old Flemish of Oude Boteringestraat. Until 1815 both churches were used. At that time they decided to build a new church on Oude Boteringestraat since both the old churches were too small. The first service in the new church was held on Oct. 20, 1815. The church on Pelsterstraat was given to the Swiss, who had by this time united and who used it until 1824. Its membership was only 34. In that year it merged with the United congregation. There was now only one congregation in the city. In 1809, at the time of the merger, the membership was 228; in 1838, 365. They now had a considerable growth corresponding with the growth of the city. In 1870 the membership was 566, and in 1900, 1,017; it declined to about 850, but by 1920 was 1,200, of whom 250 lived outside the city; in 1953 the membership numbered 1,208, of whom 173 lived outside the city.

The development in the 19th century proceeded rapidly. When the two congregations united in 1815, the ministers were Pieter Klomp (d. 1832, formerly of the Old Flemish church) and Jacobus David Vissering (d. 1846, formerly of the Flemish and Waterlander congregation). Klomp was the first chairman of the Groninger Sociëteit, which was founded in 1826. Next came Klaas Sybrandi, serving in 1832-38, who wrote a number of hymns, some of which are found in the Haarlem and Leiden songbooks; Wilhelm Gerhards, serving in 1839-64; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, 1846-49, who later became a professor at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam; J. W. Straatmen, 1850-67, who was a radical modernist like his colleague Cornelis Corver, 1865-67, which displeased the congregation, causing both to resign. Their successor J. van Gilse, 1869-1906, was a capable preacher and a noted Old Testament scholar. During his pastorate the Groote Bundel of Haarlem was discarded and the Leidsche Bundel adopted. Van Gilse was succeeded by Pastor Folkert van der Ploeg 1906-31, O. L. van der Veen 1931-34, L. D. G. Knipscheer 1935- , K. T. Gorter 1942-45, H. Bremer 1946-49, and W. I. Fleischer 1949- .

The church was remodeled and enlarged in 1843; in 1915 two stained glass windows representing Biblical scenes were put in. In 1932 the Mennohuis (rooms for church activities) was built near the church. In 1854 one of the members, G. van Calcar, Jr., presented the congregation with an expensive gift: bread plates, jars, 20 large cups for the communion services, and a jug and vessel for baptismal services, all of silver.

A Sunday school for children was started in 1909, a ladies' circle in 1910, a youth group in 1923. Since 1910 the women of the church can also vote; since 1923 they can also be members of the church board.

A meeting of members on Feb. 23, 1879, resolved that the catechumens (aankomelingen) could obtain membership without baptism; though this resolution is still in force, nearly all young members are baptized now. In a meeting of Dec. 26, 1918, it was resolved that not only members of other churches (non-Mennonite) could receive membership without being rebaptized, but also that unbaptized persons who are in sympathy with the church could be accepted as members without baptism.

The congregation has made provisions for its poor and its aged. In 1847 an orphanage was opened and in 1872 a Gasthuis (old people's home), in 1928 followed by a rest home.

During the last decade in some surrounding towns where there are a sufficient number of Mennonites, as at Haren, Zuidlaren, and Roden, Mennonite fellowship groups (Kring) have been founded, which with the assistance of the church board of Groningen are developing into independent congregations. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 73 f., E 474; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 36, 143, 201, 223, 267, 289, 303, 448, 594, 597, 796 f., 1056-58, 1069, 1074, 1164, 1180, 1329; II, Nos. 1833-47; II, 2, Nos. 49 f.; DB 1861, 148 f.; 1864, 135, 140 ff.; 1868, 167 f.; 1869, 157; 1870, 112; 1875, 100; 1879, 3 f., 140; 1883, 72 ff.; 1895, 4 f.; 1901, 15, 28; 1906, 14, 20 f., 23, 27, 139 f.; Naamlijst 1810, 80; 1815, 103 f.; 1829, 61; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim; (A. Pathuis) Inventaris van het Oud-Archief der Ver. Doopsgez. Gemeente te Groningen (Groningen, 1940); H. Dassel Sr., Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d., 1952); ML II, 183-85.

Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites (Dutch, Groninger Oude Vlamingen), a branch of the Dutch Mennonites. About 1630 the Groningen Old Flemish separated from the Flemish (q.v.) in objection to the tendency of Flemish to unite with other Mennonite groups, as had happened at Harlingen 1610. Especially the country churches in the province of Groningen opposed such unions, as is seen from a meeting held at Middelstum (q.v.), Groningen, in 1628, where Jan Luies (q.v.) combatted the views of Claes Claesz of Blokzijl and other Flemish leaders who favored the unions. They did not participate in the union of Flemish and Old Flemish at Dordrecht in 1632. After much negotiation especially between the congregation of Amsterdam and the preachers of the country churches in the province of Groningen, the final separation was made.

From then on the Groningen Old Flemish existed as a special group among the Dutch Mennonites; in the province of Groningen they were often called "Uko-Wallists" after Uko Walles (q.v.), who, second to Jan Luies, was the most prominent leader of this group. The following 33 congregations belonged to this group in 1710. In the province of Groningen 15—Appingedam, Beerta (also called Klein-Oldampt), Bierum, Groningen, Houwerzijl, Huizinge (also called Middelstum), Humsterland, Leermens, Loppersum, Noordbroek, Rasquert, Sappemeer, Uithuizen, Ulrum, and Zijldijk; in East Friesland 4—Emden and Emdenland, Leer, Neustadt-Gödens, and Norden; in Friesland 5—Drachten, Knijpe, Mildam, Sneek, and IJlst; in Overijssel 4—Borne, Deventer, Hengelo, and Kampen. Besides these, there were Groningen Old Flemish congregations in Enkhuizen, Haarlem, and Zaandam, and also two in Prussia—Kleinsee (q.v., Jeziorka) and Konopath (q.v., Przechowka-Wintersdorf), also later Brenkenhoffswalde-Franztal (q.v.). The Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church (q.v.) record, which dates back to the 17th century, has the title Oude Vlamingen oder Groningersche Mennonisten Sociëtaet. During the 17th century there had also existed the following additional 19 Groningen Old Flemish churches, all of which had been dissolved or merged with neighboring congregations before 1710: in the province of Groningen 10—Baflo, Kloosterburen, Leens, Lutkegast, Meeden, Midwolda, Wold-Oldambt, Scheemder-Hamrik, Vliedorp, and 't Zandt; in Friesland 5—Franeker, Joure, Kollum and Visvliet, Langezwaag, and Oldeberkoop; in East Friesland 1—Oldersum; in Overijssel 1—Kuinre; and besides this at Amsterdam and Middelburg (see DB 1879, 2-8).

The Groningen Old Flemish congregations soon united in a conference (see Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit). They insisted on strict maintenance both of doctrine and practice; they rejected a trained and salaried ministry, holding to feetwashing when most Dutch Mennonites had dropped it, performing it in connection with the Lord's Supper, which was only held when the whole congregation was at peace. No offerings were taken during the meetings; the meetinghouses were plain with no pulpits and, of course, no organs. The ban was rigorously applied. They stood for plain living and clothing as may be seen from a number of resolutions drawn up by a conference held at Loppersum in 1659, prescribing even the furnishing of the houses and the materials and the cut of the clothes. (These resolutions were published by Blaupot ten Cate, Friesland, 307-8.) In 1685 and during the first decades of the 18th century these regulations were repeated several times though less strictly. They only admitted their own members into the communion services, and if a Mennonite of another branch wished to join one of their churches, he had to be rebaptized. They were very active on behalf of the Mennonites who were expelled from Switzerland and those in Prussia who were being persecuted in the early 18th century or struck by floods and crop failures. In this connection the names of Alle Derks (q.v.) of Groningen and Steven Cremer (q.v.) of Deventer should not be omitted. The Groningen Old Flemish formed a rather closed group, which apart from the joint assistance to the distressed Mennonites abroad did not have much contact with other Dutch Mennonites.

The group mostly provided its churches and members with their own confessions, catechism books, and devotional literature. Mention (chronologically) should be made of "Bekentenisse des Christelycken Geloofs," a manuscript of the 17th century; A. S. D(ijck), De Heilbegerige Jongeling onderwesen (Groningen, 1732); Pieter Hendriks, Korte Schets van verscheydene waarheden des Christendoms (Groningen, 1743); H. Waerma, Beknopt Ontwerp van de voornaamste Geloof-zaaken (Emden, 1744); Pieter Hendriks, Schriftuurlijke Katechismus . . . nevens een Aanhangsel, behelzende de Schets der Lere van Menno Simons (Groningen, 1744); Geloofsbelijdenisse der Doopsgezinden, bekent onder de naam van Oude Vlamingen ... (Groningen, 1755, reprints Groningen, 1774, 1805, and a later ed. n.p., n.d.); A. S. D(ijck), Prove eener kleine catechetize Passischool (Groningen, 1759); Teunis Clasen, Verklaringe van de Geloofs-belijdenisse . . . (Groningen, 1762); H. Waerma, De evangelische Geloofs-leere der Doopsgez. Christenen . . . (Groningen, 1768); A. S. D(ijck), Catechetise behandeling over de Geloofsbelijdenis . . . (Groningen, 1773).

The most prominent leaders of this group were Uko Walles, Alle Derks, Aldert Sierts Dij(c)k, Wolter ten Cate.

During the second half of the 18th century many of the old regulations were abandoned or laxly maintained. The old principle of not accepting other Mennonites into the church without baptism was gradually abandoned. Both ban and footwashing were dropped and salaried ministry was admitted, e.g., in Groningen in 1772 and in Deventer as early as 1761. The meetinghouse in Groningen acquired a pulpit in 1756, and an organ in 1785. So in this period much of the old strictness was lost, though the Groningen Old Flemish still were among the most conservative Mennonites.

In 1710 (earlier statements are not available) the total membership of the Old Flemish group can be estimated at 2,500 baptized members. This number had decreased to 1,280 in 1767 and about 800 in 1800. During the 18th century many of these congregations were dissolved or merged with other Mennonites, and early in the 19th century, the Groningen Old Flemish Sociëteit having been dissolved in 1815, the remaining congregations of this group were successively absorbed into the main Mennonite brotherhood. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 558 II, 558 V, 559-64, 571-77, 590, 600, 605 f., 614-16, 1067, 1074-79, 1087-91, 1093-94, 1096-98, 1114, 1580-81, 1599, 1610, 1627, 1635, 1638, 1645, 1664, 1730-35; Inventaris van het oud-archief der ver. Doopsgez. Gemeente te Groningen (1940); S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgez. (Amsterdam, 1745) 14-67; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim; H. Dassel Sr., Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, 1952) 11-17, 24-35; N. van der Zijpp, Gesch. der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 81, 114 f., 119, 130 f.; Catalogus Amst., 172, 173, 219, 260-62, 264-65; ML II, 185 f.

Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (Groningen Mennonite Conference). In the province of Groningen there were formerly an Old Flemish conference and a Flemish conference (Humsterlandsche Sociëteit, q.v.). Now there is only one conference, called the Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Groningen en Oost-Friesland.

1. The Old Flemish Sociëteit. As early as Sept. 18, 1628, a conference took place in Middelstum, which Blaupot ten Cate (Groningen I, 66) considers the first meeting of the Sociëteit. It was called to discuss the attempt at union and to mediate in the disputes between Jan Luies (q.v.) and Claes Claesz (q.v.). Similar meetings were held in 1633 and 1636. In 1637 (Feb. 26–March 7) a meeting was held in Groningen, chiefly to support Uko Walles in his work. A very important meeting was held at Loppersum on April 20, 1659, at which significant resolutions were passed with regard to the threat of increasing worldliness; the simplest dress and house furnishing was prescribed and all luxury prohibited. Christians were, e.g., not to wear shoes with high heels or edged with white yarn; no paintings or gay colors were to be used in the homes (see Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 307 ff.). After 1677 annual meetings were held in the Old Flemish church (on Oude Boteringestraat). Besides 15 Old Flemish congregations in Groningen province, there were in this Sociëteit four congregations in East Friesland, five in Friesland, and seven in North Holland and Overijssel. In 1766 an attempt was made to unite the Groninger Sociëteit with the Zonsche Sociëteit (q.v.), but the negotiations were unsuccessful.

The task of the Sociëteit was at first simply to preserve apostolic purity of life and doctrine. This was also the object of the elders in visiting the congregations and holding baptismal and communion services. When several of the active elders had died, the annual meeting appointed a number, usually twice the number to be replaced, as trial preachers. These men traveled through the congregations and preached. Then the membership elected their elders from these candidates. The elders at first had absolute authority; but gradually their power decreased. In 1749 it was decided that every preacher could administer baptism and communion. In 1750 the office of elder was changed to one of supervising, the name Oudste (Elder) being changed to Opziener (Supervisor); the elders now had only general oversight in matters of church discipline and doctrine. After 1766 the work of the Sociëteit was divided into four classes; each supervisor received a class. Soon the supervisors were called commissaris. Beside (or over) them stood for a time the only surviving supervisor Wolter ten Cate, who died in 1796. A new general supervisor was not chosen. The office became extinct.

It was thought that the task of the Sociëteit might be promoted by a confession of faith, especially when zeal began to flag and the old customs were no longer being so carefully preserved. Until about 1750 they got along with a written confession, which differed from one congregation to another. Copies of such written confessions are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library (see Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 614, 959, and Catalogus Amst., 172). In 1748 the Sociëteit published the Kort vertoog rakende het verval en de reformatie der zeden and soon afterward a confession of faith with a foreword by A. S. Dijk (q.v.) in 1755 (3d ed., 1805), which had considerable authority, but was not obligatory. It was frequently reworded without being able to satisfy everybody. The age of fixed paths was past.

Then the second objective was made the primary one, viz., relief. In 1717, when a major flood afflicted many members, the other members gave them good support. The Sociëteit (especially Elder Alle Derks) took charge. From now on until the end (1815) the Sociëteit was faithful to this purpose. In addition it gave financial assistance to foreign Mennonites, as, e.g., the Prussian brethren in 1738 and 1765.

Beginning in 1785 a third purpose was the improvement of ministers' salaries. On this objective not much was accomplished, and by 1811 the A.D.S. assumed this task. Now the Old Flemish Sociëteit had become superfluous. In the last times of its existence it no longer met annually. In 1815 it was dissolved. The last meeting was held on June 18, 1815.

2. In addition to the Old Flemish Sociëteit there was the smaller Flemish one, usually known as the Humsterland Sociëteit. It probably had its beginning not before 1750. It originally embraced ten Flemish congregations in the province of Groningen and until about 1798 the Foppe Ones brotherhood in Ameland (q.v.). In 1806 only the congregations of Humsterland, Pieterzijl, Den Horn, and Huizinge were members of the Sociëteit. It met annually in rotation with its constituent congregations. Its initial objective was, like that of the Old Flemish Sociëteit, the preservation of the moral and doctrinal purity of the congregations. Beginning in 1773 an annual offering was taken for the support of the poor and to improve ministers' salaries. For a time it continued to exist without achieving very much. On May 30, 1825, it was dissolved.

3. In 1825, ten years after the Old Flemish Sociëteit had been dissolved, the chairman of the Humsterlandsche Sociëteit, Gerrit Bakker, the zealous preacher of Humsterland, made the proposal that all the congregations be invited to unite in the organization of a general conference in the province of Groningen. On July 26, 1825, a preliminary meeting was held in Groningen. A second meeting was held on Sept. 16, at which it was decided to proceed with the organization. On March 31, 1826, a constitution was adopted and on May 22 the first meeting of the Sociëteit was held. The chairman was P. Klomp of Groningen and the secretary Gerrit Bakker. At this session the constitution was signed by 13 congregations: Groningen, Den Horn, Pieterzijl, Humsterland (Noordhorn), Mensingeweer, Huizinge (Middelstum), Uithuizen, Zijldijk, Leermens en Loppersum, Sappemeer, Noordbroek, Midwolda, and Veendam-Pekela.

The primary objective of the general Sociëteit was to care for a regular ministerial service. In the congregations which had no minister, the service was taken care of in rotation by those that had ministers. The second objective of the Sociëteit was to intermediate when difficulties arose between preachers and congregations.

In the course of time Stadskanaal (founded in 1848) also joined the Sociëteit. In 1878 the East Frisian congregations, Emden, Leer, and Norden, joined the Groninger Sociëteit. During World War I this tie loosened. Emden and Leer are now merged and have a German-speaking minister. In 1928, however, C. A. Leendertz, then pastor of Norden, was serving in the vacant pulpits of the Groningen congregations. Since World War II the ties between the Sociëteit and the East Frisian congregations have again been strengthened.

In 1835 a Widows' Fund was established on the initiative of Simon Gorter (q.v.), the Zijldijk pastor. Also a ministers' pension fund (Emeritaat en Invaliditeitfonds) was founded in 1917, and in 1924 a fund for raising the salaries of ministers (Steunfonds). The Sociëteit meets annually in Groningen (still in the former Old Flemish church on Oude Boteringestraat). "No great achievements have been made by the Sociëteit, but in our quiet circles it has done excellent work. And in the kingdom of God little things are also of value" (van Cleef). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 614-16, 934, 959-65; DJ 1840, 34-52; DB 1870, 110-17; 1872, 49-51; 1879, 1-11; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 66, 125-48; (A. Pathuis) Inv. van het Oud-Archief der Ver. Doopsgez. Gemeente te Groningen (Groningen, 1940) Nos. 136-48; Blaupot t. C., Groningen; L. van Cleef, Jr., "Feestrede" in DB 1877; K. Vos, Het honderdjarig bestaan der Societeit von Doopsgez. Gemeenten en Oostfriesland (1926); ML II, 185 ff.

Groot Hoorns Liedtboeck, Het, waer in Eenige Psalmen Davids ende Geestelijcke Liedekens zijn om inde Vergaderinghe der Gheloovigen te singhen etc., a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook composed by D. I. and published 1647 at Hoorn by Pieter Zachariaszn Hartevelt. It contains 488 pages with 208 hymns without notes, arranged alphabetically. The copy of this hymnbook in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library contains 16 pages (incomplete) of a suffix entitled Byvoeghsel van Sommighe Gheestelijcke Liedekens, printed at Hoorn in 1644. vdZ.

Groot, Jelis de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gillis de Graet.

Groote Bundel, Dutch hymnbook: see Bundel, Groote.

Groote Hendrik, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hendrik Beverts.

Groote Liede-boeck, Het, van L. C., a Dutch hymnary of which Leenaert (Leonhard) Clock (q.v.) is the compiler, is known in only one edition, which appeared at Leeuwarden in 1625. The (abbreviated) title reads as follows: Het Groote Liedeboeck van L. C., Inhoudende Veelderhande Schriftuyrlijcke Liedekens, Vermaningen, Leeringen, Ghebeden ende Lofsangen . . . mitsgaders het tweede Liedeboecxken van ghelijcken Propooste, ghenaemt Een Hell Cymbaelken des Juychens, waer by nu nieuws ghecomen is het derde Liedeboecxken . . . ghenoemt het nieuwe Hell Cymbaelken des Juychens . . . , mitsgaders Noch ses (liedekens) uyt het cleyn Liedt-boeck van L. C. Item veerthien van andere verscheydene personen.

From this title we learn that there was also a Cleyn Liedeboeck by L. C., but no copy of it is extant. The 1625 edition of the Groot Liedeboeck apparently was not the first edition. Part I of the book contains the introduction, dated Jan. 1, 1601, 254 hymns in alphabetic order; Part II, with introduction, dated Haerlem, Aug. 30, 1601, also in alphabetic order, songs Nos. 255-379; Part III, not in alphabetic order, Nos. 380-421 (the last hymn of this part, No. 421, composed by Leenaert Clock himself, is dated Schoonhoven July 1, 1616); Part IV, 14 hymns numbered 1-14. vdZ.

Grootebroek, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, near Enkhuizen, where there was formerly a Mennonite congregation, of whose history nothing is known. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 18 persons here in 1551-54 and another 24 in 1563-65. This presupposes the existence of a congregation at this time. In the 17th century the congregation belonged to the Waterlander branch. It dissolved before 1731, since it is not found in the first Naamlijst (of 1731). Its possessions and stocks were handed over to the North Holland Waterlander Conference or Rijper Sociëteit (DJ 1942, 39). vdZ.

Gross, a Mennonite family name. On the basis of historical inference, and in the absence of published genealogies, the Gross family name may have had its inception in the Austrian Tirol among the early Hutterites, though this is not established. The name appears among the Hutterites in Russia after the migration of 1770. When, in 1819, the practice of community of goods was abandoned at Radicheva, there were Grosses among those who abandoned the practice. During the immigration of Hutterites to America following 1874 the name Gross appeared among those who settled on noncommunal farms in South Dakota.

In the following years independent churches were organized, composed entirely of non-colonist Hutterites. Some of these churches joined the Mennonite (GCM) conference, and a number of their members, leaving the farm for the town, or marrying Mennonites, joined Mennonite (GCM) congregations. The name appears predominantly among South Dakota Mennonites. Harold H. Gross has been dean of Freeman College since 1945. H.H.G.

A different branch of the Gross family originated with Jacob Gross (ca. 1743-1810) who emigrated from either Switzerland or Germany to eastern Pennsylvania about 1763. Jacob became a Mennonite preacher at Deep Run in the Franconia (MC) Conference by 1775, and later was ordained bishop. He was the father of Christian Gross (1776-1865), a minister of Deep Run, John K. Gross (1786-1864), minister of Doylestown, Jacob Gross (1780-1865), bishop in Ontario, and Daniel Gross (1784-1875), deacon of Deep Run. A number of other men named Gross have served in the ministry of the Franconia Conference, including bishops Samuel G. Gross (1839-95) and Joseph L. Gross (1904-) of Doylestown. Of considerable influence in the Franconia Conference was Mahlon Gross (1873-1937), who left the Methodist Church in which he was a local preacher to return to the faith of his fathers, and was chosen as minister at Doylestown, May 25, 1920. J.C.W.

Gross, Georg, often called Pfersfelder, was a Protestant baron in the 16th century, who was interested in Schwenckfelder and Anabaptist ideas and defended the victims of persecution in the area of Nürnberg, Germany. For a fuller biographical account see Pfersfelder, Georg.

Gross, Jakob (Jakob von Waldshut), a furrier of Waldshut, South Germany, a very successful Anabaptist leader. According to his statements in his cross-examination (Meyer, 245 f.), he received from Conrad Grebel (q.v.), whom he called "the student from Zürich," his first suggestion to join the Anabaptists. Balthasar Hubmaier baptized him. He at once went out as an Anabaptist missioner. He was expelled from Waldshut because he refused to support the peasants of Zell in military service. (This he himself said in his trials at Zürich and Strasbourg.)

In autumn of 1525 Gross was in the Grüningen district of the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, and baptized about 35 in one day. Expelled from there in early 1526 he went to the canton of Bern, preaching at Zofingen, Brittnau, and Aarau, baptizing many, until he was imprisoned at Brugg. He skillfully defended Anabaptist doctrine. Devils are driven out of children, said he, although they do not have any. Zwingli and his theologians he reproached with keeping comfortable and rich prebends instead of going out as messengers of God to proclaim the Word and direct the erring to the right way. But those who proclaimed the Word of God without salary, content with mere food, were hunted, arrested, and subjected to all kinds of misery (Egli, 45).

In Lahr, where he soon continued his work, Gross was again imprisoned and then expelled. From Lahr he went to Strasbourg in the summer of 1526. But here he baptized hardly more than three, one of them the furrier Matthis Hiller. His meetings were poorly attended. They were opened with a prayer to ask the presence of God, that He might give strength to bear the cross with patience. Then one of the brethren rose to explain a portion of Scripture, to warn against sinful living, to admonish the hearers not to violate God's commands, to love their neighbors and feed their enemies.

Nevertheless Jakob Gross ranked with Hubmaier and Reublin as one of three most influential in founding the Strasbourg Anabaptist congregation. He was prevented from a more successful ministry by his arrest soon after his arrival. During his cross-examination, Aug. 9, 1526, he expressed some surprise that the Gospel had had so little effect after four years of preaching in Strasbourg. He complained that he was put into prison without a hearing or an admonition. But he was not afraid; for against God's will they could not injure a hair of his head. Even if the life of a Christian might be nothing but persecution and cross-bearing, which was also the lot of the apostles, that should not injure his faith, and if it was God's will he would sacrifice his life, as he had already given up his possessions. Against the Catholic doctrine that baptism washes away original sin he cited the Scripture, "Baptism, not putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God" (I Pet. 3:21). He would have nothing to do with infant baptism; for baptism is nothing but a change in living, a dying to sensual flesh; and since a little child is not yet master of its flesh it cannot kill the flesh. Furthermore, the Lord's command, Matt. 28, refers only to baptism after confession. In the end everybody must decide for himself whether to be baptized or not; this a child cannot do. Obedience to the government is a duty; for the sword is given it to punish the evil and protect the good. For himself, he wanted to obey all its commands; he would serve as a guard, put on armor, take the sword; but he would refuse to kill anyone, for that was not commanded by God. He would also refuse to swear an oath on the basis of Jesus' command in Matt. 5.

From Strasbourg Jakob Gross went to Augsburg. He may have taken part in the well-known Anabaptist synod here, which took place Aug. 20, 1527, and is known as the martyrs' synod. On Sept. 15, 1527, he was seized with Hans Hut (q.v.) at an Anabaptist meeting in Augsburg. Almost four years he languished in prison, until he recanted, June 22, 1531. NEFF.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer (Zürich, 1878); L. von Muralt and W. Schmid, Quellen zur Gesch. der Täufer in der Schweiz I (Zürich, 1952) 107, 261, 262; H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950) 152; Abr. Hulshoff, Gesch. van de Doopsgez. te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905) 18-22; C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); Chr. Meyer in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg (1874) 213 ff.; F. W. Röhrich in Ztscht für die hist. Theologie XXX (1860) 33 ff.; Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (Munich, 1901); idem, in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVIII (1901) 4 ff.; ML II, 187 f.

Gross, Jakob, was born in Germany about 1743, emigrated to America about 1763, settled at Skippack, later moved to Germantown, and finally to Bedminster Twp., Bucks Co., Pa. He was married to Mary Krall; to this union were born six children. Four sons became church leaders: Christian, a minister at Deep Run; Jacob, a minister in Ontario; John K., a minister, and Daniel, a deacon at Deep Run. He was ordained a minister at Deep Run between 1773 and 1775. He preached at Germantown on Nov. 6, 1796. By 1804 he was ordained a bishop of the Deep Run circuit, for in that year he interviewed Christian Funk (q.v.) for possible reconciliation. He was a farmer and shoemaker.

Gross's letter of Sept. 4, 1801, to Lincoln Co., Ont., giving counsel on organizing a new congregation was published in Briefe an die Mennonisten Gemeine in Ober Canada (Berlin, Ont., 1840).

A farewell letter written by Jakob Gross to his three churches in 1810 indicates his deep concern for their spiritual welfare, and also reflects the high esteem with which the laity regarded their spiritual shepherd. Bishop Gross died on Dec. 12, 1810, and lies buried in the Deep Run cemetery. Q.L.

Gross, Paul, chosen Hutterite preacher May 15, 1904, by the Rosedale, Man., Bruderhof, was confirmed March 25, 1906. He died May 2, 1929, in the Iberville Bruderhof in Canada at the age of 60 years, having served in the ministry for 25 years. D.D.

Gross, Veronika (Albrechtin), wife of Jakob Gross (q.v.) and like him a native of Waldshut. She was one of the first women to join the Anabaptist movement. She was baptized in 1525 by a preacher whom she called Wilhelm (Reublin?) in her cross-examination. In Augsburg she and Anna Salminger contributed to the spread and establishment of the Anabaptist congregation by their influence on the women. For a while she and her husband lived (1526) in the home of Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.). After the capture of her husband (Sept. 15, 1527) she sought to provide for herself by sewing and spinning. But she must have found it difficult to earn a living, for she sold two of her husband's books, the Prophets—probably the Worms translation—for four Batzen, and a small Testament for 13 Kreuzer. She attended the meetings faithfully, and was one of the 88 participants in the Easter service (April 12, 1528) held in the home of the sculptor Doucher, which was so abruptly ended by the capture of those present. In the cross-examination she stated that she had joined the Anabaptists "since she was convinced that this was the right way." Because she refused to recant she was driven out of the city with lashes on April 30. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (1901); idem, Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVIII (1901) 6 ff.; ML II, 188.

Grosse Gemeinde (Big Church) was the name given to a group during the early days of the Molotschna settlement in Russia when the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) originated under the leadership of Klaas Reimer. Both were nicknames and not official names. The name "Kleine Gemeinde" remained while the name "Grosse Gemeinde" soon disappeared. The Grosse Gemeinde was really the Flemish mother church of the Molotschna, known as the Ohrloff-Petershagen-Halbstadt Church (q.v.). Its first elder was Jacob Enns (1803-18), who was succeeded by Jakob Fast (1818-21). It was during this period that a smaller group separated under the leadership of Klaas Reimer which formed the independent organization known as the Kleine Gemeinde. Under Bernhard Fast (1821-60), who succeeded Jakob Fast as elder of the Grosse Gemeinde or the Ohrloff-Petershagen-Halbstadt Church, the congregation divided because of numerous differences of opinion and practices within the church. The more conservative wing, consisting of about three fourths of the congregation, organized an independent church under Jakob Warkentin, usually referred to as "Grosse Gemeinde" or "Pure Flemish." This became the Lichtenau-Petershagen-Schönsee-Margenau-Pordenau Mennonite Church (q.v.). When, in 1842, Warkentin was declared unworthy of his office as a result of conflicts with Johann Cornies, the congregation was divided into three groups: Lichtenau-Petershagen Church, Margenau-Schönsee Church, and Pordenau Church, each one having its own elder. This ended the era during which the name "Grosse Gemeinde" was applicable. C.K.

H. Görz, Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Manitoba, 1950); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 703 ff.

Grosses Werder (Grosses Marienburger Werder, Gross-Werder): see Marienburger Werder.

Gross-Lubin in the Graudenz (q.v.) district, formerly belonging to Poland, and from 1772 to Prussia, situated on the left bank of the Vistula River, like the adjacent hamlet of Klein-Lubin was from 1591 a Holländerdorf, i.e., a village settled by Dutch Mennonite immigrants. In 1623 it obtained exemption from the military tax and from obligatory quartering of soldiers, and in the lease of 1640, was granted freedom of religion, though it was not allowed to erect a meetinghouse. The Mennonites here were members of the congregation of Jeziorken (Kleinsee, q.v.). Both Gross-Lubin and Klein-Lubin repeatedly had much to suffer from floods. For this reason and also because the Polish Catholic clergy were very hostile to them, most Mennonites in the 18th century moved from here to other places, e.g., to Brenkenhoffswalde in the Neumark. vdZ.

F. Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 130-34; H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952) 10, 22-24, 79.

Gross-Lunau, Klein-Lunau, and Horst, three villages in the territory of the city of Culm (q.v.), formerly belonging to Poland, after 1772 to Prussia, and from 1919 to Poland again, situated on the right bank of the Vistula River, were all three Holländerdörfer, i.e., villages settled by Dutch Mennonite farmers, who moved here in 1604. (The first lease of 1604 was published in Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk, 92-94.) They are said to have had a Mennonite school at Gross-Lunau shortly after 1604. A meetinghouse was available in the neighboring village of Schönsee (q.v.). They were not allowed to proselytize among the Catholic natives or to build meetinghouses. Notwithstanding repeated floods and high rents the Mennonites became rather prosperous. About 1720 a mutual fire-insurance system was organized. In the last decade of the 18th century and the first of the 19th a number of Mennonites from these villages migrated to Russia. vdZ.

Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952) 13, 34 f., 36, 37, 65 (note 48), 82 f., 92-94, 95.

Grosslützel: see Lucelle.

Grossmann (Megander), Kaspar, born 1495 in Zürich, early a zealous follower of Zwingli. Called to Bern in 1528, he, as a strict Zwinglian, rejected Bucer's mediation on the communion and therefore returned to Zürich as archdeacon and canon at the cathedral. He died Aug. 18, 1545. Conrad Grebel said at his cross-examination in 1525, that Grossmann was also of his opinion, but dared not speak out before Zwingli. This was probably not entirely correct. At the disputation of Nov. 6-8 Grossmann, Leo Judae, and Zwingli defended Zwingli's theses against the Anabaptists. In Bern he frequently had to take a position on the Anabaptist question with other preachers. On April 19, 1531, he took part in the disputation with Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.) of Aarau at Bern, and from July 1-9, 1532, with Haller and Hofmeister at Zofingen. Both disputations have been preserved in print, but the speakers are designated merely as "Prädikant" or "Täufer," hence it is impossible to determine the personal attitude of the individual preachers (see Hofmeister, Pfistermeyer, Zofingen). After the disputation Grossmann was appointed to examine the records with the other preachers in Aarau and then have them printed by Froschauer in Zürich. In his Catechism of 1536 he interprets baptism entirely in accord with Zwingli's idea, probably because of the need to formulate a clear position against the Anabaptists. In his numerous letters to Zwingli and later to Bullinger he does not mention Anabaptists. L.v.M.

Emil Egli, in HRE XII, 501 ff.; W. Köhler and O. Farner, ed., Zwingli Werke X (1929) 137, note 1; R. Steck and G. Tobler, Aktensammlung zur Geschichte der Berner Reformation (Bern, 1923); ML II, 189.

Grossmann, Michael, a Hutterite and writer of hymns, a cobbler by trade, was sent to Prussia in 1602 with Josef Hauser (q.v.). When he returned to Moravia he was chosen preacher for the Neumühl brotherhood, Feb. 1, 1604, and ordained on Feb. 5, 1606; then he was made elder at Austerlitz, and died April 4, 1634, at Sobotiste. He is the author of the hymn, "Mich hat die Lieb gedrungen sehr," which contains his name in an acrostic. NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 470, 476, 492, 583, and 619; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 85; ML II, 189.

Gross-Schützen, a Hutterite Bruderhof in Hungary: see Velké Levary.

Grossweide, a common Mennonite village name found first in the Marienburg Werder, Prussia, whence it was transplanted to the Molotschna settlement of Russia; Manitoba; Mexico; and the Menno, Neuland, and Friesland settlements in Paraguay. C.K.

Grossweide, a Mennonite village in the Halbstadt district of the Molotschna, Ukraine, with 51 farms and 2,700 acres. In 1927 the village had a population of 316, most of whom belonged to the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church. A small part belonged to the Mennonite Brethren, who held services in a private home. In the primary school all the village children were taught. The inhabitants engaged almost exclusively in agriculture and cattle raising; the latter received more attention after the Revolution, since the farms had been radically reduced in size. Though generally thriving the villages experienced some crop failures, as in 1833, 1848, and 1920. On June 16, 1926, the grain was almost completely destroyed by hail. In Grossweide there was for a long time an orphanage founded by A. A. Harder (q.v.), in which 50-80 orphans found a home, care, and education. After the Revolution it was taken over by the government. Little is known about the final disintegration of the village under the Soviets. (ML II, 189.) N.G.

Grossweide Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Horndean, Man., a member of the Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized in 1896 under the leadership of its mother church, the Winkler M.B. Church. The membership in 1954 was 164. The first meetinghouse, with a seating capacity of 160, was rebuilt and enlarged. It burned down in January 1953, and was replaced by a new one seating 400, dedicated on Nov. 1, 1953. Jacob Heide was the leader and minister of the church in 1925-44. In 1952 John J. Neufeld was serving as presiding minister and A. W. Klassen as assistant minister, with D. M. Hiebert as deacon. J.J.N.

Groupe des Eglises Mennonites de langue française (Group of French-Speaking Mennonite Congregations) of France and neighboring Switzerland. When the German language had been gradually replaced by the French in a number of congregations they organized a conference in 1907 (called Association), which was reorganized in 1927 under the present name. This conference, which meets annually on the Monday after Easter, was at first a part of the conference of Alsace (q.v.), but became independent in 1946. vdZ.

Grouw, a town (pop. about 3,000) in the Dutch province of Friesland, southeast of Leeuwarden, picturesquely situated on a lake, seat of a Mennonite congregation. This congregation was probably founded about 1560-70; Leenaert Bouwens baptized 37 persons here in 1563-65. Of its early history nothing is known. A meetinghouse was built in 1659. In 1696 through the activity of its preacher Jan Claesz (or Klaasz, q.v.), a more liberal leader, the congregation was divided. The more liberal group, called Jan Claeszvolk and later Waterlanders, was the larger group. This group was in warm sympathy with the Collegiants (q.v.) at Grouw and participated in their meetings. Its members mostly lived in town, being navigators, captains, and steersmen on whaling vessels or Baltic freighters, butter merchants like the Koopmans and Halbertsma families, and clockmakers like the Hoekstra family. The smaller group called themselves Flemish; their members were mostly farmers, living outside of the town of Grouw. They maintained the old practices like silent prayer and were averse to a salaried ministry. The Flemish built a new meetinghouse called the "Kleine" or "Oude Huys"; the Waterlanders kept the former meetinghouse, now called the "Groote" or "Nieuwe Huys." In 1829 the two congregations united; the Kleine Huys was abandoned and the Groote Huys was replaced in 1830 by the present one, which has been built on the same spot and shows the type of the older one, being a hidden church. A pipe organ was acquired in 1872. The number of Mennonites here must formerly have been considerable. The Oude Huys (Flemish) Mennonites at the beginning of the 18th century numbered about 150 baptized members, in 1829, 122; the membership of the Nieuwe Huys (Waterlander) can be estimated at about 320 in 1756, 148 in 1829. These numbers decreased principally because of economic conditions which made many people leave Grouw. In 1839 at the time of the union the membership was 270, in 1861 again increased to 380, reaching its height of 462 in 1889, and then declining: 419 in 1900 and 230 in 1953. Taco Kuiper, who had studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, was the first trained minister to serve the (Groote Huys) congregation of Grouw (1790-99). J. A. van der Ploeg, also trained at Amsterdam, served the Groote Huys from 1802 and the united congregation 1829-52. With C. Corver (q.v.), who served as pastor in 1863-65, modernism (liberalism) entered the congregation. Corver was followed by A. van Gulik 1866-1903, P. Ens 1903-14, H. G. Berg 1915-20, F. H. Pasma 1921-51, and H. R. Keuning 1952- . A new parsonage was built in 1952. Church activities are a Bible group, a women's circle, and a youth group. F.H.P., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1848-53; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim; J. H. Halbertsma, De Doopsgezinden en hunne herkomst (Deventer, 1843) 313 f.; DJ 1917, 84-91; DB 1887, 51, 53, 79; 1896, 160, 164, 171; 1900, 90, 123; F. H. Pasma, De Doopsgezinden te Grouw (Grouw, 1930); ML II, 189.

Grouw, Jan Klaasz (Claesz, Claesen) van: see Klaasz, Jan.

Grouw, Ruurd Gerbens van: see Gerbens.

Grouw, Tjalling Gerbens van: see Gerbens.

Groveland Evangelical Mennonite Church, located one-half mile east of Groveland, in Groveland Twp., Tazewell Co., Ill., began as a subsidiary of the Wesley City congregation near Peoria, Ill. Meetings were held in homes until the congregation organized in 1878. The meetinghouse has been remodeled twice. Elders who have served are: Peter Hochstettler and Emanuel Rocke; ministers, Ben Birkey, Chris Oyer, Joseph Rediger, Joseph Springer, Moses Ropp, Amos Oyer, and Paul Rupp; and deacons, Andrew Roth, Ben Roth, Daniel Ackerman, and E. E. Zimmerman. Groveland was host to the conference in 1895, 1903, 1907, 1912, 1918, 1925, 1935, and 1943. Fanny Schmallenberger and Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Rocke went as missionaries to Africa, and Ellen Hochstettler to Tennessee. About 1896-1900 some members left to join with the newly organized Missionary Church Association. The membership in 1954 was 149. Milo Zimmerman is the present (1955) pastor. E.E.Z.

Groveland Mennonite Church (MC), also known as the Plumstead Mennonite Church, located in Plumstead Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., is a member of the Franconia Conference. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1806 for members of the Deep Run congregation living in that area. The present meetinghouse was erected in 1886. Preaching services were held every four weeks by the ministers of Deep Run, Doylestown, or Blooming Glen churches. In 1947 a weekly Sunday school was started, with preaching services every two weeks. Omar Showalter was ordained Aug. 18, 1951, as the first minister and Leidy Myers was ordained March 8, 1952, as the first deacon. The membership in 1955 was 51. L.M.

Grubb, Nathaniel B., b. July 6, 1850, in Frederick Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., the son of Silas and Elizabeth Bertolet Grubb, of Pennsylvania-German background. He was married on July 4, 1872, to Salome C. Gottshall, of Tremont, Pa. There were six children, of whom three grew to adulthood. Nathaniel B. Grubb was educated in Frederick Institute (an academy and preparatory school in Frederick Township); and in the Mennonite school at Wadsworth, Ohio (1872).

He was baptized and became a member of the Eden Mennonite Church, Schwenksville, in 1865. On June 30, 1872, he was ordained as assistant to the elder of the congregation. In addition to Schwenksville, he conducted services at Herstines, Bertolets, Skippachville, Rock Hill, and Rich Valley. On Oct. 1, 1882, he became pastor of the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia, which he served for 38 years and 3 months. On May 28, 1884, he was ordained to the office of elder, or bishop as it was frequently called at that time.

Grubb had a large part in the founding of the Mennonite Home for the Aged at Frederick, Pa., and served on the board of managers of the home for 30 years. He was a member of the Publication Board of the General Conference for 39 years; a Mennonite member of the board of trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor for 24 years; a member of the board of trustees of Bethel College, Newton, Kan., for 6 years; and a member of the board of trustees of Perkiomen Seminary (now Perkiomen School), Pennsburg, Pa., for 18 years.

He was the first editor of the Mennonite, serving as such for six years. He was also the editor of the Mennonite Year Book and Almanac for a number of years. During his career he resided in Frederick Township, Schwenksville, and Philadelphia.

Grubb was a very successful pastor, winning many to Christ and the church, and was also active in home mission enterprises and in establishing Sunday school and Christian Endeavor conventions. His avocation was printing and publishing. At one time early in his career he owned a printing office and founded the Schwenksville Item.

He died in Philadelphia on April 25, 1938, and was buried in Northwood Cemetery, Philadelphia.

An obituary was published in the Year Book of the General Conference Mennonite Church for 1939. A historical sketch of his life appeared in Mennonite Life, January 1951.† A.S.R.

Grubenheimer, a name applied to the Waldenses in the 14th century because they were accustomed to assemble in corners and isolated places, in gravel pits (Gruben) to escape their enemies. The name seems to have been used for the Anabaptists as well. (ML II, 190.)

Gruber, Lamprecht, of Fieless (Villnöss) in Tirol, Austria, a martyr, was one of the groups of Anabaptists at Sterzing who in 1532 went to their death for the sake of their faith. He is one of the rather infrequent examples of Anabaptists who recanted, and then, seized by remorse, atoned for their lapse with death. He speaks openly about it in the letter which he and his fellow prisoners wrote to the church in the Adige; he says he hopes to heal the wound he inflicted on his people through his weakness, and depends on God's help to do it. Otherwise it would not be possible to endure the torture inflicted upon him. In a second letter he gives expression to his joy in receiving word from Austerlitz, and states that he and his five companions, Hans Beck, Lorenz Schuster, Peter Planer, and his former servant, and finally Hans Thaler, hope to discard the hungry, physical body "next Wednesday." They are therefore saying good-by and warn against sleepiness. Then follow greetings to the brotherhood in Moravia, to Lamprecht's wife, to Lienhart and Jörg Zaunring, to Koller's parents, and to Planer's wife. They are glad that the Lord so strongly moves His children to go to Moravia. All of them, says the Geschicht-Buch, witnessed with their blood to divine truth. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 105 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 74; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; ML II, 190.

Grulla Mennonite Brethren Church, the only Protestant church in Grulla, Starr Co., Tex., a village of 1,800 Latin Americans. It is a member of the Southern District Conference, organized with 12 members on May 22, 1948, under the leadership of the missionary and pastor Ruben Wedel, who is still serving. The membership in 1955 was 42, most of whom were poor people. The first meetinghouse, a new garage which seated about 100, was replaced by a new church dedicated in 1950. Five baptismal services have been held. R.W.

Grumbach, Argula von (ca. 1492-1554), a courageous woman of Burg Ehrenfels near Hemau, Upper Palatinate, Bavaria, Germany, a true follower of Luther, and yet independent in her religious conviction, wishing to be known as "Christian" rather than "Lutheran." She warmly defended those persecuted and oppressed for their faith. In defense of Arsacius Seehofer, a young Luther enthusiast who was compelled to make a humiliating recantation, she wrote a courageous letter to the Ingolstadt city council, to Duke William of Bavaria, and to the University of Ingolstadt, admonishing "all Christian estates and governments to stay by the truth and the Word of God, . . . over which neither pope, emperor, nor prince has any authority." This bold step, unheard of at the time, for a woman to assert herself in writing in ecclesiastical affairs, caused a great stir, and brought her much recognition and admiration, but still more mockery and persecution. Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) also spoke of her with great respect. In his Schlussreden against Johann Eck (24-26) he remarked that women should be silent in church, but when the men are mute with fear, let the women speak, as Argula did. In a letter to the city council of Regensburg he cites the example of Frau Argula von Stauff (her maiden name), to encourage it to take a bold stand for Protestantism. NEFF.

S. Riezler, Geschichte Bayerns 1508-1597 IV (1899) 89; C. Sachsse, Dr. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914) 12, 85; RGG II (1928) 1502; HRE XVIII, 779, where bibliography is cited; ML II, 190.

Grunauer, Barbara, an Anabaptist martyr, a widow of Salzburg, Austria, was drowned in Salzburg Oct. 25, 1527, with Elsbeth, the cook of Georg Steiner. Johann Eck (q.v.) reported this to Duke George of Saxony, Nov. 25, 1527. HEGE.

F. Gess, Akten und Briefe zur Kirchengeschichte Herzog Georgs von Sachsen II (Leipzig, 1917) 812; ML II, 190.

Grünberger, Veit (Greyenburger, or Uhrmacher—watchmaker—for his trade), was one of the outstanding apostles of the Hutterian Brethren. Nothing is known of his birth date or early life. The Geschicht-Buch states that about 1570, when he was traveling through the Pinzgau, (Salzburg, Austria) with a brother, Veit Schecht, they were spied on by peasants and recognized as Anabaptists by their prayer before meals; they were then turned over to the authorities, tried, and imprisoned in Mittersill, and five weeks later were taken to the city of Salzburg and put in chains. Over 18 months passed before they were given a proper hearing. The record of this cross-examination is given in his most remarkable Verantwortung. Without fear he testified to his faith and frequently embarrassed his judges with his replies. When asked to what faith he belonged, he answered, "You know that already. Your lord the archbishop knows it too. Our books have been sent up to the governor; there you may see them. Besides, two of our preachers have been judged, Klaus Felbinger (q.v.) at Landshut in Bavaria, and Hans Mändel (q.v.) at Innsbruck; these have given a better account of our faith than I can give. Furthermore, the prince must have known before he was made archbishop, how many of our people have been killed in his realm. What he does with us now is his business; with God's help we will hold still. We have read Felbinger's and Mändel's Rechenschaft more than once; they are entirely Scriptural; if they are not believed we can do nothing more; the judges know the truth very well; if they wanted to live accordingly they would not need to ask us."

In the cross-examination as reported by the Geschicht-Buch, Grünberger asks, "What shall I say? You are the accusers and the judges. What you cannot judge, the executioners must do in your stead. The hangman is your high priest, who helps you hold the field." The disputation covered chiefly marriage, fasts, baptism, and Jakob Hutter's mission. Veit's questions are sharp, his responses sharper. "Veit Urmacher asks the judges whether they consider Paul also an Anabaptist. They said no. Then he asked them why he commanded the twelve disciples to be baptized when they had already been baptized with John's baptism. This was not adequate for salvation. How much less does infant baptism suffice, which is only of men and not like that of John from heaven. Then they were silent. When they asked him whether Hutter was the Messiah, Veit answered, Christ is the Messiah. I am not ashamed of Jakob Hutter. He was burned at the stake for the sake of divine truth. But you have a fine Messiah in Rome and one here in the city."

Veit's fellow prisoner Schecht finally renounced his faith, but returned to it later with genuine repentance. Veit remained in prison until 1576. He wrote from prison on Feb. 16, 1573, that he had no fears for his life. They had been told that no one wanted to wash his hands in their blood, and everybody knew who they were. He finally succeeded in escaping by letting himself out a window by means of a rope made of old materials. And so he went home to the brotherhood "with peace and joy." The next year he was chosen to the ministry at Neumühl and confirmed three years later. On March 17, 1586, he died at Scheidowitz, Moravia. The story of his imprisonment and that of his brethren Matthias Binder (q.v.) and Paul Glock (q.v.) and how God helped them escape, is the subject of the hymn, "Merk auf, du wahr' christliche Gemein." LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 713-26; J. Loserth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Salzburg," in Mitteilungen der Gesellsch. für Salzburger Landeskunde LII (1912) 35 f.; the text of the Verantwortung (1573) is published in extenso ibid., 51-56; Mart. Mir. D 501, E 841 f.; ML II, 190 f.

Grüneisen, Karl (1802-78), a German theologian, court chaplain and holder of other honorary offices. He is the author of a series of works on theology and art criticism. His "Abriss einer Geschichte der religiösen Gemeinschaften in Württemberg," in Ztscht für die hist. Theol. (1841) 63-142, was published in extract as Geschichte der neuen Taufgesinnten in Württemberg (1840) and translated into Dutch under the title, Mennoniten en Doopsgezinden in Wurtemberg (Amsterdam, 1848). Part I of the Abriss presents a noteworthy account of the rise of Anabaptism in Württemberg in the 16th century, and the struggle against it, and then also the rise of the Baptist brotherhood in 1838. (ML II, 191.) NEFF.

Grünfeld, a common Mennonite village name found in the following Mennonite settlements: Schlachtin, South Russia; Barnaul, Siberia; Alexanderwohl, Kan.; Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno, Paraguay. C.K.

Grünfeld, a village in the Barnaul settlement, Siberia, founded in 1908 by Mennonites of Chortitza, South Russia, originally embraced 54 farms with 7,344 acres of arable land and 475 acres of useless land. There were 176 male settlers. In 1912 it was divided into two villages—Grünfeld with 36 farms and Tchernovka with 18. A new school was built in 1926. The Mennonite Church, whose members lived in the villages of Grünfeld, Alexandrovka, Tchernovka, and Rosenwald, was originally attached to the Orlov congregation (later called Schönsee), but because of the great distances it became a separate congregation in 1912 under the leadership of Peter P. Epp. In 1927 it had 186 members, most of whom lived in Grünfeld. It was decided to build a church in the village of Tchernovka, which is centrally located. Nothing is known about the later fate of the village under the Soviets. (ML II, 192.) J.D.

Grünfeld, a village in the district of Krivoy-Rog, Ukraine, with an area of 5,520 acres, founded in 1873 by Mennonites from the Chortitza settlement. The principal occupation was farming on 3,600 acres. The village also had a manufacturing plant for farm machinery, a mill, and a creamery, operated by an agricultural co-operative, and a grocery store. After the Revolution one fourth of the population emigrated to America. In 1928 there were 550 inhabitants. Grünfeld belonged to a compact group of Mennonite villages (Grünfeld, Neu-Chortitz, Gnadental, Steinfeld, and Hochfeld), and had a seven-class school with eight Mennonite teachers, and a Mennonite church. It was also the home of Jakob Rempel (q.v.), the elder of the Neu-Chortitz Mennonite Church (q.v.).

The collectivization of Grünfeld, which began in 1929, resulted in the exile of a great number of prosperous Mennonite farmers, beginning Feb. 25, 1930. The families of K. Dyck, M. Schmidt, H. Friesen, H. Wiebe, D. Wiebe, P. Fröse, H. Martens, and J. Martens (unmarried) were sent to the Vologda region, and a great number were banished from their home district. In 1931 some were sent to the Ural Mountains. These banishments continued to occur until the Ukraine was occupied by the Germans in 1941. A total of 22 families, about 100 persons, were forced to leave Grünfeld. Among the exiled was Elder Jakob Rempel, who perished like many others. When the German army approached in 1941 some men were evacuated. The land of the collective was now divided among the remaining inhabitants.

The church, which had been used as a dormitory for school purposes and later as a granary, was again used for its original purpose. In 1942 at Pentecost the first baptismal service was conducted. There had been no public worship services since 1929. Peter Sawatzky and Abram Rempel were ordained as ministers, Elder Jakob Penner of Friedensfeld officiating. On Oct. 21, 1943, the inhabitants of Grünfeld and the other villages were evacuated westward by freight trains, some of them being located temporarily in the Warthegau. Numerous Grünfeld persons were among those who were repatriated by the Russians. Eighty-eight reached Canada and 16 Paraguay. (M.E. questionnaire by Sara Kehler and Anna Rempel; ML II, 192.) Hch.L., C.K.

Grünfelder, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Lüsen in Tirol, Austria, served first as deacon, then as preacher in his home church and in the vicinity of Michelsburg and Schöneck. At the end of November or the beginning of December 1537 he was seized in the Oetz Valley with Sebastian Glaser and taken to Imst. Dr. Gall (see Gallus Müller) was sent to Imst to convert them, but his trouble was in vain. The confession made by Grünfelder reveals that he had joined the Anabaptist congregation two years before and had at first stayed in the Puster Valley. Concerning the death of the prisoners, who were joined by Old Oswald of the Oetz Valley, Griesinger wrote to Hans Amon and Ulrich Stadler and the entire brotherhood in Moravia: "We [Griesinger and Lochmaier] cannot refrain from writing to our brethren. They testified with great joy to the holy Word of the Lord, as you already know, but not in detail. I cannot really describe their joy. When Bastl and Hänsel were executed, about 1,000 persons were present. Hänsel cried out quite loud, admonishing and warning the people. Bastl did too, until his death, together with Old Oswald. The populace was quite horrified. It is true, as the wise man says, Neither the aged nor the gray will be spared. They did not let their legs finish burning, but threw them into the water; we hope that their witness was not in vain." Bastl Glaser is the author of two hymns. Griesinger's account is in part taken verbatim from the Geschicht-Buch. LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 133; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 132; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 71-74; Wolkan, Lieder, 171; Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol II (Vienna, 1892) 148; Mart. Mir. D 40, E 446; ML II, 192 f.

Grünhoffental (Alexandrovka), a small Mennonite settlement near the city of Alexandrovsk in South Russia, about four miles from Neuschönwiese, settled in the early 1860's by six men who belonged to the Kronsweide congregation. The village owned 2,187 acres. (ML II, 193.) D.H.E.

Grüningen, a town in the Hinwil district of the canton of Zürich, Switzerland. In 1467 Hinwil had a population of about 2,200. The county of Grüningen, of which the town was the capital, was the part of the canton of Zürich in which the Anabaptist movement found its strongest expression. It can be said that in the years 1525-28 the movement developed here into a real movement of the people. The soil had been truly prepared for it ever since this territory had been incorporated into the canton which had been a center of opposition for those who favored economic autonomy and self-government by the peasants over against the centralization which the city of Zürich was promoting. The opposition was particularly strong against the activity of the district magistrate (Landvogt).

The Reformation stirred up this oppositional movement anew. Many preachers complained against their manorial lord, the abbott of Rüti, and in line with the radical wing of the Reformation demanded the abolition of the tithe, grounding their demands in the Gospel. The ferment was so strong, that in April 1525 the peasants attacked and plundered the Rüti monastery. They now added new religious demands to their previous economic and legal requirements: choice of the pastors by the congregations, dissolution of the clerical endowments, secularization of the monasteries, in the hope that the money realized by these measures could be used for the purchase of their freedom from Zürich. The Zürich council promised to examine their complaints, but the peasants were not satisfied. Consequently the government decided, on the advice of the magistrate Jörg Berger, not to yield any further to the demands of the peasants, although they had made concessions to the peasants in other districts. The demand for ecclesiastical autonomy, which had often been advocated by Zwingli, was also not granted. These refusals must have created a strong sense of disappointment in the territory. The people must have felt that they were robbed of their rights in every respect.

It was in such a situation that the Anabaptist movement entered Grüningen. The assertion by Bullinger (Reformations-Geschichte I, 261) that the disturbances in the Grüningen territory were caused by the escaped Anabaptists from Zürich I consider untrustworthy. The escape occurred in March 1526 according to the documents. Actually the causes of the peasant movement extend much further back; their immediate motivation, namely, the preaching of the radical preachers, begins at the latest in 1524. These preachers, especially Hans Brennwald of Hinwil, for the most part rejected the Anabaptist ideas. In my judgment the Anabaptists are not responsible at all for the peasant troubles. On the other hand, their teachings concerning the inner conversion, personal sanctification, along with the rejection of all outward forms, the rejection of force (which means the government which was so hated right in Grüningen) found a ready hearing among the peasants. By putting these ideas into practice they could hope for a realization of their earlier demands. We see this in the decision of one of the leaders of the peasants, one called the "Girenbader," to join the Anabaptists in January 1526.

The earliest record of the presence of Conrad Grebel in the territory is found in July 1525. He was the first Anabaptist preacher here and preached in Hinwil and Bäretswil. Probably sensing the mood of his hearers he emphasized that "he had appealed to imperial justice, the divine justice, and also civil justice, but in no case was he given any justice." He claimed to know that Zwingli had advised that the peasants would be brought to the city and shot down. Such statements certainly kept alive the revolutionary mood against the authorities. In autumn the Anabaptist movement grew rapidly. Much information concerning this is contained in the letters of magistrate Berger to the Zürich council. On Sept. 20 he reported concerning two refugees from Waldshut, Ulrich Teck and Jakob Gross, who had been expelled because they refused to carry arms; they had baptized 30 persons before being arrested. They had to pay a fine of five pounds. However, the people stood with them and demanded that the council arrange for a disputation with the Anabaptists. Soon thereafter Blaurock and Grebel appeared. The people of Hinwil refused to arrest Blaurock; so the magistrate and his assistant had to act alone. The crowd followed him, assembling in an open field to listen to Grebel and Manz preach. The leaders must have had an extraordinary influence among the people. Grebel was arrested, but Manz escaped. At the suggestion of the magistrate the court arranged for a trial. The magistrate proposed a disputation, to which 12 impartial men from the district should be invited who would then be able to witness concerning the result of the disputation. The Zürich council agreed to these proposals from Grüningen and arranged for a disputation with the Anabaptists on Nov. 6, 1525.

In spite of the fact that the real leaders were now in prison in Zürich, the Anabaptist movement continued in undiminished strength in Grüningen. Natives of the territory themselves continued the agitation. Both before and after the disputation such charges were raised as that Zwingli would not let the common people speak. The Anabaptists would not admit defeat in spite of the declaration by the 12 representatives that the Anabaptists had been given sufficient opportunity to speak. The representatives sought to work out a compromise between the Anabaptists and the government, but without success. At an assembly of the district legislature 90 Anabaptists remained steadfast in their position, while 13 yielded to the authorities. The magistrate finally succeeded in having a decree adopted to the effect that all persons who would not obey the decisions and mandates of the authorities following the disputation of Nov. 6 but would still continue in their Anabaptism would be incarcerated in the tower or prison on bread and water. But the imprisoned Anabaptists succeeded in escaping out of the tower on Dec. 30. It is worthy of note that Berger recognized the religious needs of his people and tried to do something about them. He proposed a mandate to the effect that each escaped Anabaptist should pay a fine of ten pounds along with the cost of his imprisonment and give a bond for 100 pounds as well as renounce Anabaptism. He proposed granting the common people their request which they had made so often to be allowed to read out of the Gospel for themselves, this in true Reformation spirit.

The Anabaptist movement was much discredited by radical elements. For instance, "Uoli" flung into the face of the magistrate that rebaptism is right. From the pulpit in Hinwil he repeated the charge that the Anabaptists had not received a hearing in Zürich. He moved about the country with a gun and once during the sermon he shot a charge into the roof of the church. At a meeting in a forest in May 1526, 15 Anabaptists were arrested, among them two leading men of the district, Jakob Falk and Heini Reimann. Falk was already in July 1525 a listener to Grebel's preaching and also took part in the disputation of Nov. 6, 1525. Both men had gone to Appenzell in January 1526 after their escape out of the tower in Grüningen. In the summer of 1526 we find traces of Blaurock and Manz. In December 1526 both were arrested by Berger. On Jan. 5, 1527, Felix Manx was put to death by drowning in the Limmat, while Blaurock was beaten with rods and driven out of the city.

The Anabaptist prisoners in Grüningen were not at all impressed by this execution. Falk and Reimann were strongly determined to hold fast to their convictions in spite of the threat of the death penalty. So at the Landtag of May 23, 1527, the council demanded that both Anabaptist leaders should be punished according to the existing mandates. The Anabaptists brought out against this demand the point that they had not been heard at the disputation and demanded that Zwingli should defend himself in writing on the basis of God's Word. The Landtag decided that it recognized the disputations and the mandates of the council but reserved the right to show mercy to the accused. Against this the council claimed a legal right to try the accused before its own court in cases where the Landtag would not execute the mandates. The officials of Grüningen did not want to recognize this right as claimed. The result was a long litigation, which was finally decided by Bern in favor of Zürich.

Why did the Grüningen officials protect the Anabaptists? They agreed with the Zürich government in principle, and only sought moderation of the punishment. It would be wrong to infer from their action a fundamental recognition of the Anabaptists. Their motivation had two further grounds: on the one hand consideration for the many friends and relatives of the Anabaptists, on the other hand a maintenance of their autonomy in criminal trials over against the tendency of the Zürich council to undermine such rights in favor of the centralization of authority. The prisoners were granted the privilege of written defense. As a result their ideas were recorded in a long petition to the Landtag, which is now an important document of the Zürich archives. The contents of this description is briefly as follows: The governmental mandates are contrary to the Word of God and the command of Christ. We must obey God more than man and must baptize according to the will of Christ. Christ calls baptism "a righteousness" and a "counsel of God," a baptism which is to be performed only after repentance and only for believers. It cannot be given to children. Christ gave believers no other disciplinary power than the ban since believers walk in the will of the Spirit. The fruits of the spirit are love, peace, kindness, etc. "Those who walk therein are the church of Christ and the body of Christ and the Christian church. Now we trust you are convinced that we are in the true church. Now they want to force us out of the true church into a foreign church." Circumstance cannot be a ground for baptism. As Abraham was obedient to God, so we now who do not belong to the covenant of Abraham desire to be obedient to Christ. At the end of the petition comes the following proclamation: "Now everyone would really understand from their charge that they call the baptism of Christ rebaptism and for this there is no ground in the Holy Scripture. Now, however, we trust . . . that the baptism which we practice is the baptism of Christ and that infant baptism is rebaptism."

Further noteworthy is the confession of Jakob Falk (q.v.). He refused to disclose those whom he had baptized and thus deliver them over to persecution. Rebaptism, as they call it, he considers to be right, while infant baptism is not right. Whoever would come to him and request baptism, such a one he would baptize. For this he was willing to suffer death. "So then when he was asked who had strengthened them and given them help and comfort he said nobody except alone the Son of God who had redeemed him, this one would not forsake him." After the outcome of the trial the two Grüningen leaders were handed over to the authorities and drowned in the Limmat on Dec. 1, 1528. The remaining persons were to acknowledge infant baptism and then would be set free. If they would not do this, they would remain in prison and live on bread and water. Among those who swore to abandon Anabaptism were Heini Karpfis from the territory of Grüningen and Hans Herzog from Stadel. Both, however, rejoined the Anabaptists, were again arrested, and were likewise drowned on March 23, 1532.

The fate of these martyrs broke the power of the movement in Grüningen. In so far as there is further documentary evidence for the later period, only scattered Anabaptists appear in the valley of the Töss. After 1560 some persons living in the Haltberg near Wald are mentioned several times. The pastor of Wald complained that these people never went to church. According to Bergmann the movement gathered renewed strength toward the end of the century under the influence of missionaries sent from Moravia and Holland. In 1601, 15 persons publicly confessed their adherence to the Anabaptists. Many others supported their cause privately and they had so much support among the people that the lesser officials hesitated to take strong measures against them. Again the authorities sought through disputations to suppress the movement. One of these took place on March 3, 1613, in Grüningen. Magistrate Hozhalb gave consideration to the complaints of the Anabaptists. He attempted to improve the clergy and as a result received promise of attendance at the church services. He forbade the public to scoff at the Anabaptists and to offend them. On Aug. 29, 1616, three Anabaptists from the Grüningen district were sentenced to six years' galley service. During the Thirty Years' War the movement grew further since it received little attention from the authorities. But with the beginning immigration to the Palatinate and Holland from 1641 on, the last Anabaptist congregations disappeared from the territory of Zürich. L.v.M.

Staatsarchiv Zürich, Akten Grüningen und Akten Wiedertäufer; E. Egli, Actensammlung zur Geschichte der Zürcher Reformation (Zürich, 1879); E. Egli, Zürcher Wiedertäufer (Zürich, 1878); R. Stähelin, Huldreich Zwingli I (Basel, 1895); C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916); H. Nabholz, Die Bauernbewegung in der Ostschweiz 1524/25 (Bülach, 1898); idem, Zur Frage nach den Ursachen des Bauernkrieges 1525 in Gedächtnisschrift für Georg v. Below (1928); A. Largiadèr, Untersuchungen zur zürcherischen Landeshoheit (1920); L. v. Muralt, "Jörg Berger," in Festgabe des Zwinglivereins für Hermann Escher (1927); idem, Glaube und Lehre der schw. Wiedertäufer (Zürich, 1938); TA Zürich; ML II, 193-95.

Grünthal, a common Mennonite village name found in East and West reserves, Man.; Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno, Paraguay. C.K.

Grünwald, Georg, of Kitzbühel, Austria, an Anabaptist martyr. The Hutterian chronicles relate: "In 1530 Brother Georg Grünwald, a cobbler, a servant of the Lord Jesus, very zealous in God, was captured at Kufstein on the Inn for the sake of divine truth, sentenced to death, and burned at the stake. . . . This Grünwald wrote the hymn that is known in almost all countries, 'Kommt her zu mir, spricht Gottes Sohn.'" The only other information we have about him is in connection with the Anabaptists in Kitzbühel, where the Anabaptists found a strong following in the absence of the feudal lords. Kitzbühel was at that time a benefice of the archbishopric of Salzburg. When secular and church authorities began to interfere, they found plenty of work. On May 5, 1528, 200 Anabaptists were investigated. The severest penalties struck the impenitent, and many of them moved away, many leaving their families behind. Among these was Grünwald, who had been made preacher. In September 1529 he was at Lackstatt in Bavaria. The authorities of Rattenstein and Kufstein seized Grünwald, and executed him. He thus, as several old manuscripts say, witnessed with his blood that which he had preached with his mouth. The above-mentioned song, together with the oldest melodies, is found in Böhme's Altdeutsches Liederbuch (1677, No. 636) and Wackernagel's Das Deutsche Kirchenlied III, 128 and 1252, with all the versions of the poem as found in hymnals of the Lutherans and the Reformed; it is also found in many Anabaptist manuscripts. Loserth.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 48; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 48; Wolkan, Lieder, 17, 94; Monatsschrift für Gottesdienst und kirchliche Kunst, 1912, 6, p. 197, and Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. IX (1911-12) 368; Mart. Mir. D 31, E 438; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 67; ML II, 195 f.

Gruppe, a section of the Montau-Gruppe congregation in Poland, in the Schwetz-Neuenburg swamp along the Vistula River near Culm, was founded in 1568 by Dutch emigrants. Old documents show that the Polish kings confirmed the lease contract concluded between Hans Dulsky, the heir of Lubochyn, and the Mennonites. The contract was renewed every 50 years, but each time the rental fee was increased; this is evidence that under the skilled hands of the Mennonites the soil increased in value. The church was built at Montau in 1586, and was for 200 years shared by Montau and Gruppe. In this period there are records of visits by preachers from Lithuania, Danzig, Altona, and Harlingen. The congregation belonged to the Frisian (q.v.) branch.

The origin of the separate congregation of Gruppe goes back to the erection of a second church in 1776, built in Ober-Gruppe (rebuilt 1865), which was needed because of the great distances within the settlement. From that time on there were two branches, Montau and Gruppe, in the congregation. This was clearly expressed when in 1856 the Montau church was to be completely rebuilt because of flood damages, and the Gruppe party refused to share the cost. On the other hand, five years later Montau refused to aid Gruppe in the rebuilding of their church. Only the efforts of Elder Peter Bartel prevented a schism. On Oct. 7, 1866, the new church in Gruppe was dedicated. The costs of the building amounted to 6,756 talers.

A second dispute arose from difference in attitude toward the new military law of Nov. 9, 1867, which resulted in a complete break between the two groups. The Montau branch opposed Bartel in three respects: (1) he added acceptance of the military order to the baptismal formula; (2) he required them to add their signature to a regulation expelling those who did not agree with his position; and (3) he changed the place of baptismal instruction from Montau to Gruppe.

But the schism was no sooner formed than an attempt was made to heal the breach. It was begun about 1900 under Bartel's successor Görtz; the church moderated its position on the military law and also granted the admission of new members. And in 1895, when a new confession of faith was drawn up for all the West Prussian churches, Gruppe also accepted it. The formal unification was planned for the winter of 1913, but it was postponed by the war until 1921. Since then the two groups form a single congregation as formerly.—In 1897 Gruppe acquired a new church, and in 1899 a home for the poor; in 1899 an organ was also installed in the church. During the last one hundred years, however, the membership steadily declined, partly because of the events described above, and partly by members moving into the city of Graudenz. Because of the boundaries set by the Treaty of Versailles in 1918 75 members of Gruppe either emigrated or were cut off from the congregation. In 1927 Montau-Gruppe had a baptized membership of about 550 (see Montau), in 1940 400. Bernhard Kopper was the last elder, 1934— . O.S.

L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe, Ein Gedenkblatt an die Besiedlung der Schwetz-Neuenburger Niederung (1918); ML II, 196.

Gruwel (Grouwel), Barend, prior of the Dominican cloister at Zwolle, Netherlands, was appointed inquisitor of the territory of Gelre (q.v.). In this capacity he was active in the trial of Maria and Ursula van Beckum (q.v.) in 1544 (Mart. Mir. D 65, E 467). He also made investigations into Anabaptist "heresy" at Zutfen in 1549 (DB 1909, 109, 112). vdZ.

Gsäl (Gsel), Waltan (Valentin or Balthasar), an Anabaptist martyr, one of the seven executed in Gufidaun (q.v.) in October 1533 (not 1536, as in Mart. Mir.). His companions were Hans Beck (q.v.), Valser (Balthasar) Schneider, Christian Alseider (q.v.), Wölfl of the Götzenberg, Hans Maurer of Flass, and Peter Kranewitter. They died, "mightily admonishing the people to repent, . . . and showing that no impure, false, idle, or heedless hearts can stand the test." One of their epistles advises the Brethren to remove the children living among the ungodly, lest they be ruined. Another epistle reports that ten of them were still in prison, all of whom desired to witness to the Lord with their blood. In a letter from Auspitz, Nov. 21, Hutter laments the death of such excellent companions, especially that of Valtan Gsäl, his faithful brother, who was very dear to him. Unfortunately no further details are given concerning Gsäl, either in the chronicles or (as far as is known) in official court records. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 107; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 75; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I (Vienna, 1892) 510; H. Amman, Die Wiedertäufer in Michelsburg (Programm, Brixen, 1896); Mart. Mir. D 33, E 444; ML II, 196 f.

Guardians' Committee: see Fürsorge-Komitee.

Guengerich, Samuel D., was born Aug. 25, 1836, in Somerset Co., Pa., the oldest son of Daniel P. and Susana Miller Guengerich, and died Jan. 12, 1929, near Wellman, Iowa. He married Barbara Beachy, daughter of Joel and Elizabeth Gnagy Beachy. Among his children is William S. Guengerich, minister in the Seventh Street Mennonite Church, Upland, Cal. Although his elementary schooling was somewhat irregular, he decided to become a teacher, acquiring his certificate from Millersville (Pa.) Normal School in 1864. He took his preparation for teaching seriously, as is evidenced by several essays on education which are now in the Mennonite Church Archives at Goshen, Ind. After this he taught in the public schools of Iowa for a number of years. He helped organize the German School Association, which served the Amish churches of Iowa from 1890 to 1916, promoting the interests of parochial education through his writings, speeches, and local leadership of the movement. He paid a service fee of $300 in 1865 for exemption from military duty during the Civil War. He was instrumental in getting a law on the Iowa Statutes granting exemption from jury duty for religious convictions.

When an interdenominational Sunday school was organized in his township in 1870, Guengerich became one of its first teachers. The following year he was the superintendent of a strictly Amish Sunday school in the community. He remained an active promoter of Sunday schools the rest of his life. He was a member of the Upper Deer Creek (q.v.) Amish Mennonite Church, north of Wellman, Iowa.

In his later years he had a little shop where he did writing, bookbinding, and printing, and kept a small supply of books for sale. He was instrumental in bringing about the organization of the Amish Mennonite Publishing Association (q.v.) in 1912 and served as its manager to the time of his death. He wrote and published a number of leaflets and pamphlets among which was Deutsche Gemeinde Schulen, ihren Zweck, Nutzen und Nothwendigkeit zum Glaubens-Unterricht, deutlich dargestellt (Amish, Iowa, 1897). In 1878 he launched the monthly Christlicher Jugend-Freund (q.v.) in the interest of Sunday schools, serving as editor for a short time. He also was the editor and manager of the Amish Herold der Wahrheit (q.v.) at its beginning, and at his death at the age of 92 was editor of the German part. In 1892, with the help of his brother Jacob D. Guengerich, he edited and published a German hymnal, Unparteiische Liedersammlung zum Gebrauch beim Oeffentlichen Gottesdienst und zur Haeuslichen Erbauung, which was eventually widely used in Amish Mennonite church services.

Guengerich had a great interest in Mennonite history and wrote a number of important manuscripts on Amish history, particularly on the Iowa settlements. His "Brief History of the Amish Settlement in Johnson County, Iowa" was published in the Mennonite Quarterly Review, October 1929. Other historical manuscripts from his pen are deposited in the Archives of the Mennonite Church.

Although he was never ordained, perhaps no other member of the Amish Mennonite Church was as widely known during the period 1875-1925 as was S. D. Guengerich. He traveled widely and reported his journeys in the Sugarcreek, Ohio, Budget (q.v.) and other publications. But he also championed many causes in his writings which appeared in this periodical and in the church papers. Through the Budget his appeals for the orphanage work in Armenia and other missionary enterprises reached the eyes and hearts of many Amish Mennonites in all sections of that church. Through many years he championed Sunday schools, religious education, philanthropy, mission activity, improved congregational singing, church literature, and a deeper spiritual life among the Amish. Although his own congregation left the Old Order Amish and joined the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference after 1912, his influence continued to reach both groups. A.L.S.

Guert Jansdochter (also called Guert Jan Mickersdochter) of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, was put to death because she had been (re)baptized and did not believe in the sacrament of the Mass. She was drowned at Alkmaar on Feb. 6, 1538. She is thought to have been a follower of Batenburg (q.v.), as was her mother, Stijntgen, Jan Mickers' widow, who was drowned at Alkmaar on April 16, 1540. vdZ.

DB 1909, 24, where the name of Guert and the date of her death is incorrect; Mellink, Wederdopers, 173.

Guert Willems was put to death at Rotterdam in accord with the sentence of the Court of Holland of April 21, 1558, because he had assisted and liberated a Mennonite at Rotterdam who was to be executed there (see Jan Hendriks). Whether Guert Willems was a Mennonite or not cannot be decided. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 384; I. M. J. Hoog, De Martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland (Schiedam, 1885) 237-38.

Gufidaun, a village in Tirol, Austria, near Klausen, plays an important role in early Anabaptist history. Anabaptist missionaries came here as early as 1527. In the homes of Gufidaun and in the vicinity the shepherd Wolfgang preached, called by the clerk of Gufidaun. The miners of Klausen requested him not to hesitate to do so. Indeed, he preached wherever a congregation requested it.

In Gufidaun Georg Blaurock (q.v.) was seized and burned at the stake not far from Klausen, Sept. 6, 1529. In 1528-29 Jörg Zaunring, called Klesinger, Michel Kürschner, and other missionaries worked. Here Kürschner was executed by burning at the stake. In 1529 Georg von Firmian, the owner of the benefice of Gufidaun, was rebuked by the government because his clerk, Hans Treu, gave support to fugitive Anabaptists. Four years later seven brethren were executed at Gufidaun. Here the brethren also took counsel as to how they could safely aid their members to escape to Moravia, for "in the entire land they had no place to live." In July a group with 25 children started out, and although the roads were guarded by the police of Schwaz and Rattenberg, they arrived safely. The Hutterite Geschicht-Buch lists 19 persons who sealed their faith with their blood in Gufidaun.

A special order was given the clerk there on Nov. 5, 1535, to watch for the leaders, especially for Jakob Hutter (q.v.), who were now expelled from Moravia. Hutter was actually seized in Klausen and was to be taken to Gufidaun, but because the prisons there were not safe enough he was transferred to Brandzoll. Hutter's wife was kept in Gufidaun to be converted from her error, but with the aid of friends she escaped from the castle tower.

After Hutter's death there were still some Anabaptists in Gufidaun; in 1540 some are reported from Klausen. In October 1540 there is mention of an Anabaptist woman, who, however, joined them only out of ignorance. Four years later 13 others joined them. Gufidaun was the home of Hans Mändl (q.v.), one of the most outstanding Anabaptists, not only of Tirol, but of his era. In 1553 Anabaptists were again reported there. Then the movement in Gufidaun apparently died out.

LOSERTH.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 41, 54, 75, 183; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892); ML II, 197.

Guillam Roels, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 13, 1571. During the trial he refused to name his fellow members in the congregation. He was unwilling to recant his faith and remained steadfast until his cruel death. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 80, 82, 162; XIV, 86-87, No. 975.) vdZ.

Guillaume (Guljame) van Dale (van den Daele), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 23, 1562. His name is found in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede" of the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Guillaume, who was a native of Hansbeke in Flanders, may have belonged to the Mennonite van Daele (q.v., van Dale, van Dalen) family, members of which were later found in the Dutch congregations of Aardenburg (q.v.) and Haarlem. (Offer, 651; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 29, No. 94.) vdZ.

Guilliame van Robaeys (i.e., from Roubaix, Flanders) was put to death at Commines, French Flanders, in 1552. Particulars were not available. (Mart. Mir. D 133, E 526.) vdZ.

Gulden Fonteyne, De: see Gherwen, Abraham van.

Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen, oder schöne und nützliche Worte und Wahrheiten zur Gottseligkeit, a devotional book of the Swiss-Mennonite Brethren, most likely of the "Reist Leut" (see Reist, Hans), of which three editions are known: 1702 and 1742 (both printed in Basel, although the city is not named), and 1745 printed at Ephrata, Pa. It is a 500-page book, apparently intended for devotional and edificatory purposes, trying to revive the spirit of the early Anabaptists. The anonymous compiler (who used for his title Prov. 25:11) combined in it two very different materials. Part I (403 pages) contains a number of writings of 16th-century Anabaptists: (1) the writings of Michael Sattler (q.v.) and the story of his martyrdom (1527); (2) the very popular Confessio of Thomas of Imbroich (d. 1558, q.v.); (3) "Ein Testament von einer frommen Liebhaberin Gottes," by Soetgen van Houte (d. 1569, q.v.); (4) eleven epistles by the Anabaptist martyr Matthias Servaes (d. 1565, q.v.), together with (5) two epistles by another martyred brother Conrad Koch (1565, q.v.). All these documents are introduced by long and very moving prefaces, likewise of 16th-century origin, thus proving that these materials were simply reprints of old contemporary pamphlets which had been circulating among the brethren ever since the beginning. Now they were combined into one book to provide the persecuted Swiss Brethren with readings which could strengthen them in their tribulations. Part II (94 pages) contains material of much later origin: (a) the Dordrecht Confession of Faith (1632) (q.v.), reprinted after the manual of T. T. van Sittert (q.v.); and (b) "Several Christian Prayers" (apparently likewise taken from the 1664 manual but originating with Leenaert Clock, 1625, q.v.) enlarged by some more pieces of unknown origin, showing a pietistic slant (pp. 72-94).

The intention of the compiler and editor becomes apparent from his own preface, ". . . It is true that external peace makes the number of those who profess Christian faith increase. But it is also true that at such times of ease for the flesh Satan insinuates to man all sorts of evil suggestions. So depraved is human nature that it cannot endure good days of ease. . . ." And thus he calls for a return to the genuine Christian way of the forefathers, to the idea of the "suffering church" in which faith and steadfastness have to be evidenced. —Part II does not show quite the same spirit, presenting material which originated eighty to one hundred years later. The Anabaptists had no written or printed prayers, but now a collection of 19 prayers is introduced with these words, ". . . My intention is only this that I might help a little those who are unskilled in prayer . . ." (see Prayer-books).

The book is one of the best of the Mennonite devotional literature of the middle and later period. It offers "words and truths unto godliness," partly to revive the old spirit but partly also to meet the needs of the new piety just coming up around 1700 (see Pietism). Bishop Henry Funk (q.v.) had the book reprinted in Pennsylvania, most likely with similar intentions and out of the same spirit. Even though no further edition ever came out, the many old copies found in Mennonite homes in America prove the great popularity of the book. In Europe things were different: the von Mechel publishing house in Basel was still advertising the 1742 edition in 1822. Later the book was completely forgotten and is today exceedingly rare.† R.F.

R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Scottdale, 1949) see Index; ML II, 197 f.

Gulden Harpe, De, a Dutch hymnbook containing 270 hymns without music, alphabetically arranged. The hymns were all composed by Karl van Mander (q.v.) and selected from poems published in a number of volumes. The first edition of De Gulden Harpe appeared in 1599, followed by editions of 1605, 1620, and 1627. According to Jacobsen there was also an edition in 1626, in which for the first time Bethelehem Dat is het Broodhuys, inhoudende den Kersnacht was included, consisting of 15 hymns by the same poet. The Gulden Harpe was used among the Old Flemish congregations of Holland and also among the Danzig Mennonites who had the 1620 and 1627 editions. vdZ.

W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 119; R. Jacobsen, Carel van Mander (1548-1606) Dichter en Prozaschrijver (Rotterdam, 1906, 106); Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde III, 394.

Guldin, Nikolaus, an Anabaptist who made his influence felt in the beginnings of the Anabaptist movement in Switzerland, but who caused it serious injury by his attitude. He joined the movement in Zürich in 1525, was seized and expelled from the city after renouncing the faith. In St. Gall he again turned to the Anabaptists. The frivolous nature of his influence is clearly shown in the court records. When he was called to account at Easter 1526 for breaking his recantation, he also recanted in St. Gall, and was released from prison at the intercession of friends and upon his promise never to return.

Concerning other activity among the Anabaptists, it is known that in the spring of 1525 he baptized two women "in the mason's house on the lake." They are perhaps the subjects of the letter, fanatical in tone, published in full in von Muralt-Schmid, Züricher Täuferakten (see also Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer, 38). Another of his letters was written to Hans Meier, a baker in Aarau.

After his dismissal from prison in St. Gall he entered the ranks of his former opponents, and soon managed to gain the confidence of the leading theologians. They say in his praise that his change of heart was lasting. On Jan. 16, 1530, the preachers of Memmingen, Basel, and Strasbourg interceded for Guldin with the Zürich council when he broke his oath never to return; they say he "is thoroughly converted," and emphasize that they "have never heard anyone so fundamentally converted and with so strong a confession of his error."

Guldin gave information concerning the fanaticism of the St. Gall Anabaptists to Johannes Kessler for his Sabbata, which was used as a principal source for the study of the Anabaptist movement in St. Gall well into the 19th century.

In 1535 Guldin took part in the military campaign of Charles V against Tunisia. His notes are found in Vadian's correspondence; Kessler also printed them in part. Hege.

J. Schwarzenbach, Zu den St. Galler Täufern, in Zwingliana: Mitteilungen zur Geschichte Zwinglis und der Reformation II (1905) 19 f.; E. Egli, Aktensammlung zur Geschichte der Züricher Reformation in den Jahren 1519-1533 (Zürich, 1879) No. 1636; ibid., Die Züricher Wiedertäufer (Zürich, 1878); Johannes Kessler's Sabbata (1902) 158; TA Zürich, passim; ML II, 197.

Gulfport, a city (1950 pop. 22,659) on the Gulf Coast, in Harrison Co., Miss. It is "Mississippi's gateway to world commerce," the nation's largest producer of tung oil, and a heavy producer of pine products.

Mennonites first settled about 20 miles northwest of Gulfport in 1921 on a 5,000-acre tract of land with intentions of farming. Of the 29 families who settled on this tract only four remain, 18 having left the community and the others having moved toward Gulfport. About one third of the approximately 100 Mennonites in the area live in Gulfport or near-by Handsboro. Nearly all belong to the Mennonite Church (MC).

There are two Mennonite (MC) churches in the community. Gulfhaven (q.v.) with 63 members is located on the tract originally settled. Wayside (q.v.) with 24 members is a mission church organized in 1948, located about five miles north of Gulfport.

In 1945 the Mennonite Central Committee Civilian Public Service Camp #141 (Camp Landon, q.v.) was opened at Gulfport. The camp has continuously operated as a Voluntary Service unit since the termination of CPS. Approximately 250 young people have spent from a few weeks to several years in this unit. O.K.

Gülich van Berch, Hendrik, who lived at Cologne, Germany, and was likely a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Cologne, published an Antwordt (Reply) to a letter written to Marcus (?) by a Mennonite preacher in Friesland. A copy of this booklet is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. The title page of this copy is lost, hence the place and date of publication are unknown. The Antwordt is dated Jan. 23, 1577. From the book itself we are informed that the author combats the views of Hans de Ries (q.v.) and Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.). In this book is found a note stating that Hendrik van Gülich died Sept. 7, 1577. Another book by van Gülich is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, entitled Ein Versamlung oder Zamenfügung, etlicher einheilliger sprüch usz dem Zeugnisz des neuwen bundtz, nach der Orthnung des A.B.C. betreffende so woll die Lher, als den wandel der geheilichten . . . (n.p., 1592). (Catalogus Amst., 196; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 534; Biogr. Wb. IV, 485.) vdZ.

Gulik, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, some of whom have been Mennonites. Willem van Gulik (d. Dec. 4, 1761) was a Mennonite preacher at Zierikzee 1728-61, and Augustus van Gulik (b. 1838 at Blokzijl, d. 1918) was a Mennonite preacher at Giethoorn-Zuid 1863-66 and at Grouw 1866-1903.

vdZ.

Gumbinnen, a government district of East Prussia, Germany. In the northern part of the district there have been Mennonites since the 18th century, to whom King Frederick I (q.v.) of Prussia gave some land in the upper lowlands of the Gilge, the southernmost tributary of the Memel, for settlement. The grants were for the most part uncultivated wasteland, that had suffered serious damage in the Swedish war. To induce the Mennonites to settle there, the king promised them complete religious liberty and freedom from military service. He applied to the government of Bern, which was subjecting them to severe oppression, and secured permission for them to emigrate. In 1711, 42 Mennonite families settled in Jedwilleiten in the area of Linkuhnen; these were followed in 1713 by 18 additional families, who took over the Kallwen estate.

From the region of Culm several Mennonite families of Dutch descent settled in Lithuania in 1713; the three estates in the Kammerwerk Kukerneese (Alt- and Neu-Schöpen, as well as Neusorge) were leased to them. With great industry they converted the land into fertile fields. There were no ditches or dikes. As early as 1718 they protected themselves against floods of the Old Gilge with dikes and drained the lowlands with ditches, all built at their own expense. They were chiefly engaged in cattle raising; they made profitable use of their skills in cheese making acquired in Switzerland and Holland, and built up a thriving business. In 1724 there were 105 Mennonite families in the Tilsit lowlands.

The incidents growing out of the forcible recruiting of soldiers for the Potsdam guard caused the Mennonites of Kukerneese and Tilsit to move to the Gross-Werder and the vicinity of Thorn, for they feared further violations of their liberties. The families remaining behind—40 families were settled on estates at Waldburg—scattered throughout the country, were to be expelled from the country on the basis of a royal decree of Feb. 22, 1732, after an invitation had been issued on Feb. 2 to the Salzburg emigrees to settle in Lithuania. A statement presented by the Chamber of War declared to the king that "the Mennonites were of great benefit to the country both as industrialists and as farmers." By banishing them the state would suffer obvious injury, since "there is a lack of such people here who understand these things" (i.e., draining and making the soil arable). But this protest was made in vain; the Mennonites were expelled.

King Frederick II (q.v.) made the first attempt to bring the Mennonites back into the country. In 1740, 60 families of the region of Elbing leased the estates Seckenburg, Polenzhof, and Ginkelsmittel in the Friedrichsgraben district. But the land had been so badly damaged by previous floods that it did not yield enough to meet obligations on it. The farms were therefore leased to other colonists in 1840, "who would belong to the church in Lappehnen." At that time there were apparently Mennonites only on the estate of Plauschwarren in the Ballgarden district, for which 12 Mennonite families applied. In 1776, 16 families with 77 souls were living here. In that year they were most numerous in the Linkuhnen district, with 27 families and 151 souls. In the Tilsit district there were 16 families with 80 souls, in the Winge district six families with 21 souls, in the city of Tilsit four families. Statistics of 1810 (Festschrift zur Einweihung des Regierungsgebäudes zu Gumbinnen, 1911, 195) registered 463 Mennonites in the district of Gumbinnen. The highest total was reached in 1890, with 743. Since then there was a steady decline. The church was located in Adlig Pokraken (built in 1831). The membership in 1940 was 450, which included 120 unbaptized children. The last elder was Bruno Götzke (preacher 1931, elder 1932), now at Backnang (q.v.).

Census figures show the number of Mennonites in the Gumbinnen district as follows (the Lyck, Lötzen, Sensburg, and Johannisburg areas were after 1905 a part of the newly organized government district of Allenstein, which was composed of parts of the former districts of Königsberg and Gumbinnen; furthermore, in consequence of the Treaty of Versailles a division of the partly ceded areas of Heydekrug, Ragnit, and Tilsit was necessary. Heydekrug was united with the Lowland area, and the remaining portion of Ragnit and Tilsit became the Tilsit-Ragnit district):

Districts	1861	1871	1880	1890	1900	1910	1925
Niederung (Lowland)	456	487	563	628	557	369	329
Tilsit-City	29	39	27	22	74	100	85
Tilsit-Ragnit	49	50	91	69	44	49	50
Pillkallen	..	..	1	..	..	8	..
Stallupönen	..	3	4	..	..	..	5
Gumbinnen	1	..	..	6	2	..	1
Insterburg-City	1	..	2	3	2	3	1
Insterburg-Rural	..	..	..	1	..	..	1
Darkehmen	2	2	2	..	1	..	5
Angerburg	9	6	5	2	..	..	6
Goldap	..	..	..	1	..	4	7
Oletzko	..	..	..	..	..	..	1
Belonging to Allenstein after 1905
Lyck	1	..	..	2	6	1	..
Lötzen	2	3	3	8	5	16	2
Sensburg	5	2	1	1	1	1	3
Johannisburg	..	..	..	..	..	3	4
	555	592	699	743	692	554	500

HEGE.

Erich Randt, Die Mennoniten in Ostpreussen und Litauen bis zum Jahre 1772 (Königsberg, 1912); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Norden, 1912); ML II, 198 f.

Güns (Hungarian, Köszegh), in the Eisenburg area of Hungary, at the edge of Austrian Burgenland, had several Anabaptists among its inhabitants in the 1660's, who came from Techtitsch, not far from Tirnau, and from Kobelhof in Upper Austria. The evidence is found in the register of the Roman Catholic parish there. The information was furnished by the Protestant pastor Seregély at Unterschützen. (ML II, 199.) LOSERTH.

Günzburg, a city on the Danube in Bavaria, Germany, was in the 16th century the scene of six Anabaptist executions. Details have not been preserved about these deaths, nor about those in the neighboring cities of Dillingen, Lauingen, and Höchstadt, in each of which two Anabaptists were martyred. The only information is that given by the martyr-list of the Hutterian Brethren. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 183; ML II, 199.) HEGE.

Günzlhofen, a town near Fürstenfeld-Bruck on the Amper in Upper Bavaria, Germany, where the first Anabaptist congregation in the duchy of Bavaria came into existence, and which also produced the first Anabaptist martyrs in Bavarian territory. Here the noble family of Perwanger had its seat, living in an old castle, in which religious services were also probably held. Augustin von Perwanger, the head of the family, had had some disagreement with his pastor Georg Küttl, whom he had himself proposed for the position in 1508, when he wanted to appoint his own vicar in the subsidiary Hattenhofen, feeling entitled to do this as lord of the manor. When he found himself without the support of either the Duke of Bavaria or the Bishop of Freising, he published an account of the incident in an open letter of 16 pages. His congregation shared his view, thus strengthening his position. Later he withdrew from the Catholic Church.

About 1526 he joined the Anabaptists. It is very probable that he soon made contacts with their outstanding leaders, like Hans Denk, Balthasar Hubmaier, and Eitelhans Langenmantel, who came from this region, and that other members of his former parish joined him; for a considerable number of persons from the vicinity of his residence suffered and died for their faith in Munich and Augsburg. Georg Wagner (q.v.) of Emmering, who was at that time employed in the neighboring monastery of Fürstenfeld, and who died a martyr's death at the stake with admirable courage on Feb. 8, 1527, at Munich, was probably one of these. A number of those captured on Easter morning in 1528 at the home of the sculptor Doucher (q.v.) were natives of villages near Günzlhofen. Many Anabaptists fled over the border from the neighboring Jesenwang when the inquisitor Martin Pasensner went from village to village in the name of Duke William of Bavaria.

At the end of December 1528 Augustin von Perwanger and his younger brother Christoph, who had also become an Anabaptist, were beheaded in Munich because they were members "of the terrible Lutheran heresy of Anabaptism," as a chronicle puts it, although they had recanted, and in spite of the intercession of friends. This deed put an abrupt end to the Anabaptist movement in Günzlhofen. HEGE.

J. Lehner-Burgstall, "Altbayerns Burgenkranz," in Altheimatland III (Munich, Oct. 17, 1926) 114, where the village is erroneously called Günzelkofen; Fr. Roth, "Zur Geschichte des Marktes Bruck an der Amper," in Beiträge zur bayerischen Kirchengesch. XXII (1916) 124, 125, and 212; ML II, 200.

Gurdau, a village near Auspitz in Moravia, which in the 17th century belonged to the noble family of Lippa, who were friendly toward the Hutterian Brethren. The village church is said to have been built in its present form as a fortress in 1404. In the spring of 1541 the Anabaptists purchased a house through Hans Amon, a preacher, and Jakob Kircher, a deacon at Gurdau. There in 1547 three brethren were chosen to preach: Hans Greckenhofer, Wolf Sailer, and Peter Hag. The last two were also known as writers of hymns. Hag wrote a hymn about the brethren held in the Falkenstein, and Sailer a number of hymns. LOSERTH.

Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 97, 133, 161, 178; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 178, 208, 240; Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 168; ML II, 200.

Gurtzham, Hans, a cobbler, was a member of the Anabaptist group at Ortenburg in Carinthia, whose leader was Michael Matschidl, called Kleinmichel. In 1546 he was seized with Matschidl and his wife Lisbeth; the three were examined by two priests, but stood their ground so well that "the others had to retire with shame." The captives were put in chains and taken via Spittal to Drauburg, where they lay in prison for a time, and were then transferred to Vienna. In prison they met the Anabaptist Hans Staudach (q.v.) and three other brethren who were executed on St. Matthew's Day. Hans Gurtzham glorified their death in a hymn. The others were held about three years.

From prison Matschidl wrote a letter to the brotherhood in Moravia, stating their intention to remain true to the end. But Matschidl's end was a peaceful one. A great fire broke out in Vienna, and, as was the custom, the prison doors were opened. Matschidl and his wife escaped to Moravia, but Gurtzham returned to prison. Here he wrote two hymns, "Die Harpfen" and "Das Ortenburger Lied." In the former he describes his own capture and the martyrdom of Staudach. Gurtzham was drowned in the Danube, June 27, 1550. The Geschicht-Buch reports the rumor that before the drowning he was led into a warm room, and as he was sitting behind the stove he quietly left this life, whereupon his corpse was cast into the river. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 267 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 167, 194; ML II, 200.) LOSERTH.

Guth (Gut), a Mennonite family name officially reported among the Mennonites in the Swiss canton of Aargau as early as the late 16th and early 17th centuries, chiefly in the villages of Hinderwyl, Muhen, and Uerkheim. A Jakob Gut of Oftringen near Zofingen was one of a group of ten Anabaptists—some of them leaders—expelled from the canton on Sept. 9, 1660, after a period of confinement in the penitentiary at Bern.

Among the Mennonites of the Palatinate the first of the name Gut to be named was a Jakob Gut in Hilsbach near Heidelberg in 1685. It has not yet been shown whether he was identical with or related to the above Jakob Gut. In 1716 there was a Johannes Guth among the Mennonites on the Branchweilerhof; in 1724, 1738, and 1743 Jakob Guth (a son of the above Johannes) is listed. In the records of 1716 appears Hans Guth, and of 1759 Isaak Guth on Scharrau near Friesenheim (q.v.).

In 1738 and 1742 a Jakob Guth family is mentioned in Kaiserslautern. It is possible that the Heinrich Guth, who was born at Obermehlingen near Kaiserslautern in 1747 (or 1742?) and who died on the Ransbrunnerhof near Pirmasens in 1809 after a temporary residence in Alsace, is a descendant of this family. His son John, born in Sulzthal in Alsace, was the ancestor of all the families of this name that are today found in the Palatinate and adjoining regions, all of whom belong to the Amish branch. Of his sons, Johannes founded the line on the Bärenbrunnerhof, Georg that on the Freudenbergerhof, and Joseph the line formerly living in Alsace, whereas Peter emigrated to America about 1850. Likewise, Joseph Guth emigrated to the United States from the Bärenbrunnerhof in 1885.

Several members of the family were elders or preachers of the Amish congregation at Ixheim (q.v.), or the small group at Fleckensteinerhof, e.g., Joseph and Johannes Guth of the Bärenbrunnerhof, and Christian Guth of the Kirschbacherhof, later Freudenbergerhof (from 1870 owner of this farm).

The best known was Christian Guth, b. in 1879 on the Grafenweierhof near Bitsch, Lorraine. He was educated at St. Chrischona, near Basel, ordained as minister in 1907 and as elder in 1912 for the Ixheim congregation, and in 1923 assumed the duties of traveling evangelist (Reiseprediger) and secretary of youth work for the conference of the South German Mennonites. From 1926 to 1933—at that time an innovation for the German Mennonites—he conducted the annual student camps (Schülerfreizeiten) on the Neudorferhof. A lengthy period of assisting in the communion services and baptism (1929) of the Mennonite congregation at Lemberg united him with this group until the time of their exile (1940), especially when many former members of the congregation found a refuge in the camp at Backnang near Stuttgart. He died after a three-year retirement at Neckargemünd near Heidelberg in 1952.

At present (1953) there are in Europe 31 Mennonite families with the name Guth, especially in the Palatinate in the Saar region and the adjoining area of France. Nine families of Mennonite descent are today members of the Protestant state church. By far most of the families of this name have remained loyal to their ancestral calling as farmers or millers. Some have been particularly successful in animal breeding. Most of the American descendants of the Guth family spell the name Good (q.v.), although a few in Illinois and Iowa, of Amish background, still use Guth. P.S.

Mennonite records in the Karlsruher Generallandesarchiv; Erna Guth, Familien-Stammbuch, Eschringerhof (Saar); J. Heiz, Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902); Christ Seul, 1931, Nos. 7 and 9; Gemeindeblatt 1952, S. 103 (Nachruf); Müller, Berner Täufer.

Guthwohl, Heinrich, an Anabaptist martyr of Lehnmer in the Knonau district of Switzerland, who died in 1639 in the prison of the monastery of Othenbach at Zürich. (Mart. Mir. D 816, E 1115; ML II, 213.)

Guymon Mennonite Church (MC), near Guymon, Texas Co., Okla., was never officially organized. Will Helmuth was ordained minister Dec. 27, 1908, but moved to Missouri in the fall of 1909. Of the six families that settled near Guymon, only the Felty J. Kauffman family remained. This settlement began in 1907 and was affiliated with the Missouri-Kansas Conference. A.H.E.

Guyon, Madame (Jeanne Marie Motte-Guyon, nee Bouvier) (1648-1717), a French mystic, who preached and practiced semi-quietism, and by her writings exerted influence in Germany on Tersteegen (q.v.), Gottfried Arnold (q.v.), the Moravian Brethren, and also on pietistically inclined Mennonite circles. Her most read books were Leben heiliger Seelen and Heilige Liebe Gottes mit Sinnbildern. The latter, published in 1717, translated from the French by Tersteegen (q.v.) and published in 1751 at Mühlheim a.d. Ruhr, was reprinted in 1828 in Lancaster, Pa. NEFF.

R. Friedmann, Menn. Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 214 f., 218; ML II, 213.

Gysbrecht Aertsz of Koudekerk, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on April 25, 1534, at The Hague or Haarlem. He had participated in the journey to Münster (q.v.) and was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; DB 1917, 121, No. 137.) vdZ.

H

Haag, den, Netherlands: see Hague, The.

Haan (Haen), de, a Dutch Flemish Mennonite family, originally living at Sweveghem, near Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders. Pieter de Haan emigrated because of his faith to Haarlem, Holland, where he died in 1617, and where his descendants lived, most of whom were merchants, and many of whom were deacons of the church. Collateral branches were found in Amsterdam and Leiden. Here David Bierens de Haan (1822-95) (a son of Pieter de Haan, 1757-1833, banker and cloth manufacturer at Leiden, and Wijna Bierens of the Amsterdam Bierens family), who was a professor of mathematics and physics at the University of Leiden, was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation 1866-95. Anthony de Haan Pz, who was a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation 1835-39 and 1846-48, was one of the founders of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. It could not be determined whether there is relationship between this family and the well-known Dutch Mennonite leader Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v., 1622-1706). vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat II (1911), 175-80; X (1919) 120-26; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 598 f.; DB 1885, 55 f.

Haan, Galenus Abrahamsz de: see Galenus Abrahamsz.

Haan (Han), Thoman, an Anabaptist martyr of Nikolsburg, Moravia, was seized May 12, 1592, at Freiburg in Bavaria, cruelly tortured, and beheaded and burned on June 18. He endured his martyrdom singing and praying. His death is the subject of two hymns. One of these, with 38 stanzas, contains the acrostic, "Thoman Han," and begins, "Thuet losen, was ich singen will, den Fromen zu trost und zu muete"; the other, which also deals with the martyrdom of Matthäus Mair (q.v.), has the acrostic, "Thoman Han, Matheus Mair," contains 20 stanzas, and begins, "Trost, Fried und Freud, Standhaftigkeit im Herrn." Neff.

Wolkan, Lieder, 236; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 792-98; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 315 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 774; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 162; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 562-64; Mart. Mir. D 787, where he is called Thomas, E 1089; ML II, 213.

Haarlem, Netherlands, a city (pop. 166,000, 3 per cent of which is Mennonite) since 1345, which became the capital of the province of North Holland in the 19th century. A considerable number of industries are located here, especially the famous printing house "Enschede." The city also has several Mennonite publishers: N. V. Erven Bohn and H. D. Tjeenk Willink en Zoons Uitgevers Mij N.V. Haarlem is also the center of the Dutch flower bulb culture, which is centuries old, and in whose history we also find Mennonites such as Voorhelm and Schneevoogt. The city has experienced times of growth and decline which have influenced the life of the various Mennonite congregations located here, of which the two surviving in 1784, the Flemish (Klein Heiligland) and the Waterlander (Peuzelaarsteeg), merged to form the United Mennonite Church. In 1671 there were 1,868 members in the Heiligland congregation. If the members of the Waterlander and other smaller congregations are included, the Mennonite proportion of the city's population at that time would certainly have been 15-20 per cent. In 1640 the Mennonite population was estimated at nearly 5,000 baptized members. The city was known as "the Mennonite Haarlem" because there were many prominent and influential citizens among them.

The present Haarlem congregation is scattered over the several civic areas of Haarlem, Heemstede, Bloemendaal, and Zandvoort, while others are living in the flower bulb districts. The congregation has a meetinghouse in the center of the city built in 1683 with a seating capacity of 700. In 1955 a second church, Noorderkapel, was dedicated. The city of Haarlem itself has 166,000 inhabitants, not including the suburbs, which have 58,000. Of this total population of 224,000 the Mennonite congregation in 1954 had 3,391 members, 1,337 men and 2,054 women. The congregation is divided into four districts, each district having a preacher and a district committee. Several of the districts are further subdivided. Once a month services are held in Heemstede, Bloemendaal, Haarlem-Noord, and Haarlem-Oost. During the winter there are also district evening meetings in which a topic is discussed. The following services or organizations are sponsored by the church council or the deacons: (1) a "deacon ministry" (diaconie) in which the work is carried on by a welfare worker; (2) a Mennonite nursing service with a district nurse; (3) a Mennonite family aid service with two family social workers; (4) a Mennonite school with eight teachers; (5) a relief fund for lodgings for the aged.

Closely connected with the congregation but autonomously administered are a number of Mennonite institutions and foundations: (1) the Mennonite Orphanage, administered by a board of regents, which has nine children under the direction of a housefather and housemother; (2) the Mennonite rest home "Spaar en Hout," an institution with a capacity of 46 persons founded by the orphanage and administered by its regents; (3) four Mennonite almshouses (hofje) in which 34 elderly sisters of the congregation have their private dwellings — Bruiningshofje (established in 1610), Blokshofje (1634), Zuiderhofje (1640), and Wijnbergshofje (1662); (4) the Mennonite rest home for the aged at Heemstede, property of the Gallenkamp Foundation, with a capacity of 140 persons.

The congregation has nine Sunday schools for children from 9 to 10 years of age, a young people's church for children 11-15, Mennonite Pathfinder groups for boys and girls of 8-17, a Mennonite youth fellowship for young people 15-20 called Elfregi, a Mennonite young people's circle (Kring) for ages 20-30, a study circle for young people, and a study association for men. It has further a circle for members 35-65 years of age, called De Medewerkers, a circle for members 50 years and older, a Mennonite circle for the aged, and 13 sisters' circles. There is also a local unit of the Mennonite Association for the Spread of the Gospel. The ushers (Collectanten) also have their own organization. There is also a Mennonite choir (1894) which is however not a church choir.

The congregation is governed by the "Large Church Council" (Groote Kerkeraad), whose members hold office for life. This council is composed of 15 members including the four active ministers and the retired minister living at Haarlem. It meets usually three times a year. Current matters are handled by the "Serving Church Council" (Dienende Kerkeraad), consisting of 17 members, which likewise includes the four active preachers and the retired preacher. The four active preachers constitute the executive committee of both church councils. Two of these ministers are annually elected as chairman and secretary of the two councils. All matters concerning the support of needy members lie in the competence of the board of deacons consisting of 12 members who are also members of the "Serving Council." The preachers may not belong to the board of deacons. The deacons are assisted by a board of deaconesses (5 members) and the welfare worker. The board of deacons also controls the current financial affairs of the congregation. The management of the various endowments is handled by autonomous trustees who are members of the Large Church Council.

The congregation is a member of the A.D.S., to which it appoints four delegates, and of the North Holland Ring, and also of the Association for the Support of Mennonite Orphans of Needy Congregations. The congregation also has its own monthly periodical which contains reports on the work of the church councils and the various congregational organizations.

History. About 1530 there were already Anabaptists in Haarlem. Court trials of Anabaptists took place here repeatedly about that time, although these brethren and sisters came from other sections of the province of Holland. It is clear also that among those on trial were some who either played a part in the Münster affair or were involved in it. Jan Matthijs himself was from Haarlem. A large number of Anabaptists were arrested in March 1534 at Spaarndam north of Haarlem, victims of the unscrupulous Jan van Leiden. Anabaptists were to be found in the whole district around Haarlem, in Kennemerland and Waterland. After the Münsterite affair it is reported that a congregation was formed in the city of Haarlem, although we have no direct evidence of this. It is known that the city authorities of Haarlem in the early years did not always obey the instructions of the national government; later this was changed. On April 26, 1557, the bookseller Joriaen Simonsz was first strangled and then burned at the stake, as was also Clement Dirksz, while a fellow prisoner, Mary Joris, likewise sentenced, died in childbirth. Before the trial of these first two martyrs there was a meeting in the Schouts Street in which a certain Bouwen Lubbertsz preached "without fear or fright." In his last will and testament to his son Simon, Joriaen Simonsz tells his son not to have any fellowship with "Lutherans, Zwinglians or such others," but "search out a little flock whose whole rule of life agrees with the commandments of God. They also have preachers." From this and from the fact that Leenaert Bouwens baptized 11 persons at Haarlem in 1551-78 it is clear that there was a church here by 1560 and possibly earlier. To what extent this congregation or its ministers played a part in the meeting of 1557 at Harlingen is not known. However, from the connection with Leenaert Bouwens we should assume that the strict party had the upper hand.

In the meantime the Anabaptists of Haarlem were persecuted. The sheriff Jacob Foppens, assisted by a spy called Aagt, was able to arrest sevral members, particularly in 1570. Among these were Anneken Ogiers, daughter of Jan Ogiersz, wife of the potter Adriaen Boogaert, who was sentenced to death by drowning on June 17. She had been baptized in 1557 at Amsterdam. Other victims were Barber Jans, Allert Jansz, Andries N., Adriaen Pietersz, and Barber Joosten. Soon thereafter (1571) Alba's Spanish troops occupied the city. Then came the rebellion of 1572 when the city took the side of the Prince of Orange, followed by the siege in 1573, which ended with surrender to Don Frederik. It was only after the Treaty of Veere in 1577, which granted toleration to both Roman Catholics and Reformed, that Haarlem again could open its gates to Protestant refugees from Flanders, among whom were many Mennonites. This number increased after the fall of Antwerp in 1585. One of these refugees was the well-known poet and painter Karel van Mander, author of the Schilderboeck and two books of poems, De Gulden Harpe and Bethlehem. He lived in Haarlem 1583-1603. Among other Mennonites of this time should be named the families of de la Faille, Anselmus, Hartsen, Hoofman, Coppenol, Verkruissen, Verbrugghe, Messchaert, Apostool, Boeckenhove (Boekenoogen), and Bodisco. Refugees from other sections and other countries also sought and found permanent refuge in Haarlem, among whom were the Willinks from Winterswijk, and Thomas Teyler from England, ancestor of the well-known Pieter Teyler van der Hulst. One should also name here another Fleming, Hans de Ries, who also must have lived for a time in Haarlem. Whereas he was a man of toleration, the opposite was the case with the Fleming Hans Doornaert, a weaver and formerly a preacher in the congregation at Gent. He and Jacob Jansz Schedemaker got into a dispute over the question of prayer (1587), a matter in which Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert, the secretary of the city, also took part.

But now we have come to the time of the many congregations. In addition to the Flemish congregation there were a Waterlander, a Frisian, and a High German. Each has its own separate history, although little is known of the earlier years. The Flemish and the Frisians seemingly developed into separate congregations about 1567. The Waterlanders, however, had probably been in existence ten years earlier as followers of Schedemaker. The High Germans formed a separate congregation on the basis of their national origin. The Flemish had undoubtedly the largest congregation in Haarlem. The writer of the letter of 1740 to Pastor Martinus Schagen (DB 1863) confirms this. The letter also indicated that since 1589 the Old Flemish, also called "Huiskopers" (q.v.), had their own congregation at "De Vier Heemskinderen" on the Helmbreekerssteeg near Spaarne. The Young Flemish who were more moderate, whose minister was the well-known Jacques Outerman, by 1614 had a large church building in the Groenendaalsteeg near the Smalle Gracht.

The Old Flemish had as their preachers Vincent de Hont, Phillips van Casele, and later Lucas Philips. The first and the last of these fell into a quarrel ca. 1620 concerning the question of whether a bridegroom who had intimate relations with his bride before the wedding day was to be subject to punishment or not. Vincent was strict, and so a division came about in the Haarlem congregation between the Vincent de Hont group and the Lucas Philips group or "Borstentasters" (q.v.). The latter continued to meet in the Helmbreekerssteeg, while the followers of Vincent met in the Oude Gracht near the Raaks. The two congregations continued to be irreconcilable even though they were declining. The Lucas Philips group died out about 1700. The Vincent de Hont group or Old Flemish held out longer. In the 18th century they sought contact with the Danzig Mennonites and also with the congregations at Blokzijl and Sappemeer. Eduard Simons Toens, Pieter Boudewijns, and Abraham Tieleman were their last ministers. Many of the members withdrew to join either the Heiligland congregation (the continuation of the Young Flemish) or the Waterlander group at Peuzelaarsteeg. In 1773 the last members joined their fellow believers at Amsterdam. Separate from the latter group, but with much in common, was a congregation of the Groningen Old Flemish, whose ministers were Evert and Pieter Mabé, and which met in the Lange Margarethastraat. This congregation ceased to exist after the death of Pieter Mabé in 1781.

The Young Flemish in 1604 bought a building in the Klein Heiligland called the "Olyblock." In 1626 a church was built (enlarged in 1650) which served until 1795. This congregation was originally the most important one in Haarlem, and was called commonly the "Block" or "Flemish Block." In 1671 the congregation had 1,868 baptized members. Before following its history, however, it is necessary to look at the course of affairs in the High German, Frisian, and Waterlander congregations. In 1602 these groups united; that is, the Mild Frisians joined the other groups. Their meetinghouse stood close by the Gasthuisvest between the Grote Houtstraat and Heiligland with an entrance on the Houtstraat. Leenaert Clock, the preacher in the High German congregation, had promoted the union. But he and Claes Wouters Cops in 1611 separated from the group, and with their followers formed the United High German and Frisian congregation. The other group remained for a time under the name United Congregation of High Germans, Frisians, and Waterlanders. They had by far the majority and kept the old name. From 1611 to 1617 the two groups had to use the meetinghouse alternately, but in the latter year a new meetinghouse was built right behind the old one to serve the Waterlander group, with its entrance at the Klein Heiligland, so that after 15 years there was again a complete division. This new group was the one which grew in numbers and in 1683 built the church in the Peuzelaarsteeg. In 1617 it had 290 members whose names are known. The Leenaert Clock group continued independently until 1638, when it united with the Flemish congregation (Block) on the basis of the Olive Branch Confession. Among the preachers of the High Germans and Frisians were Isaac Snep and Coenraad van Vollenhoven. In the Flemish congregation was Pieter Grijspeert. In addition to these "united" congregations and the previously named congregations of Vincent de Hont and Lucas Philips there was a congregation of the Little Frisians which met in the Zijlkerk, and a High German congregation which met in the Wijnberg in the Barrevoetestraat, where it had a meetinghouse. The former died out, while the latter also united with the "Flemish Block" congregation in 1651-52.

We now turn our attention to the two largest congregations. The Waterlander congregation had a sturdy growth, but the Flemish Heiligland congregation did not. The tensions and the strife between the Amsterdam preachers Galenus and Apostool, the War of the Lambs (Lammerenkrijg, q.v.), had led to a similar division in Haarlem. The cause of this was the fact that ten Flemish members had taken communion in the Waterlander congregation. When they were called to account by the strict party of Isaac Snep an uproarious tumult developed in which the followers of Snep shouted loudly and jumped down from the balconies to the main floor. The quarrels continued until 1655. Already quite a number had left the congregation to join the Waterlander congregation, among them the preacher Hendrik van Diepenbroek. Due to the intervention of the city authorities a division came about. The party of Isaac Snep and Pieter Marcus had 1,360 supporters, while that of Coenraad van Vollenhoven had 508. Once again the two groups had to hold their services alternately in the same building. Van Vollenhoven considered the grounds for the division to be insufficient, but Snep and his party, strengthened by ministers of other congregations, demanded their rights in a petition of April 1669 to the authorities. After vain attempts at a reconciliation the city officials on Aug. 18, 1671, ordered a partition wall built into the church. The larger northern part of the building was given to Snep and his followers, the southern part to van Vollenhoven. There was also a division of the property. In 1672 the Waterlander congregation united with the van Vollenhoven group, so that their part of the meetinghouse became too small. Plans for a new church building could not be carried out until 1683 as reported above.

A new quarrel divided the Flemish congregation, where Thomas Snep held the scepter. His co-minister Jan Evertsz had married as his second wife a woman who had many debts. He was now accused of being a "bankrupter." Again the authorities intervened, and in 1681 Evertsz and his group left to hold their meetings in the "Glashuys" in the Bakenessergracht. In 1684 this group, which had 728 members, built a new church in the Kruisstraat. The group of Thomas Snep, which had 382 members, continued to meet in the "Flemish Block" meetinghouse, which was now much too large. Again the necessary division of property caused much difficulty, but finally the orphanage and the Zuiderhofje were given to the Kruisstraat congregation. Attempts at a reunion made by the Waterlanders in 1688 and even by the Flemish Heiligland congregation in 1689 were rejected. Finally in 1747 the congregation was dissolved and the members joined the Heiligland congregation. Now comes the time when the smallest congregations died out, and finally in 1784 the two largest congregations united on the basis of the Acte van Vereeniging. After more than two centuries of divisions with the resulting large loss of members, peace had returned. In Haarlem for a longer or shorter time there had been 20 different Mennonite congregations, with 14 different meetinghouses.

Originally all the congregations had lay preachers, whose number is too great to be listed here. The first salaried preacher was Pieter Schrijver, who came to the Flemish congregation from Hoorn in 1706. In the Waterlander congregation it was Nicolaas Verlaan, who came from Rotterdam in 1729. It was natural that after the establishment of the seminary the Haarlem congregations secured their preachers from this training school.

In addition to the regular Sunday services and the catechetical instruction of the youth, the deacons took care of the needy members and of the ordinary education of their children. Each of the two large congregations originally had an orphanage, as well as one of the almshouses which belonged to the various congregations. In 1782 a separate house was built, called the "Armen-" or "Bestedelingen-Huis" (poorhouse) to provide for the old, poor, and infirm members who had been taken care of for many years in private families. The building included a school for the children of parents cared for in the house. Soon others asked for admission for their children. Thus arose a separate school in the Groot Heiligland alongside of the poorhouse, which was later called the Kinderhuis. This school, which was rebuilt several times, was closed during World War II and sold to a hospital, and was finally closed in 1952. A second school, built in 1893, was still in use in 1955.

As the older institutions and arrangements became out-of-date others were called into being: district nursing, family care, sending needy members to the brotherhood houses for rest, a new home for the aged (1955), and numerous kinds of youth work. Special mention should be made of the welfare worker.

Since 1945 the congregation has been served by four preachers; previously there were always three. In 1784, when the two congregations united, the following preachers were serving: Martinus Arkenbout 1757-90, Klaas van der Horst 1762-1803, Petrus Loosjes Adrz. 1762-1810, Cornelis Loosjes Adrz. 1763-92, Bernardus Hartman van Groningen 1770-1806. Their successors were Kornelis de Haan 1792- , Matthijs van Geuns Jansz 1792-1823, Abraham de Vries 1803-38, Sybrand Klazes Sybrandi 1807-49, Klaas Sybrandi 1838-71, Sytze Klaas de Waard 1828-56, Willem Carel Mauve 1839-63, Hendrik Arend van Gelder 1863-83, Jeronimo de Vries Gz. 1872-1908, Jacobus Craandijk 1884-1900, Leonard Hesta 1890-1901, H. J. Elhorst 1900-8, B. P. Plantenga 1901-27, A. Binnerts Szn. 1907-32, C. B. Hylkema 1908-36, J. M. Leendertz 1927-50, J. G. Frerichs 1932-46, J. IJntema 1936-44, S. M. A. Daalder 1945- , C. P. Hoekema 1945- , Miss C. Soutendijk 1946- , J. A. Oosterbaan 1950-54, A. J. Snaayer 1954- . C.B.H.

The history of the Haarlem congregation has not yet been written. Much material is to be found in the Haarlem congregational and city archives, in Inv. Arch. Amst. I and II, and in the Naamlijsten, and in the DB, especially for 1863, pp. 125-64, which contains a letter of 1740 concerning the Mennonites at Haarlem. Material on the orphanages is contained in the memorial volume, De Weeshuizen der Doopsgezinden te Haarlem 1634-1934 (Haarlem, 1934). See also ML II, 213-15.

Haarlemmermeer, formerly a lake, now a polder, situated between the cities of Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Leiden in the Dutch province of North Holland. The lake was impoldered in 1848-52. The fertile soil of the polder (about 4,500 acres), surrounded by a dike, is 10-15 feet below sea level. Fifty-two per cent of it is arable land (cabbage seed, wheat, flax, potatoes; also some vegetables and flower bulbs) and 15 per cent is pasture. The principal town is Hoofddorp (pop. 3,700). Most of the Mennonites living in this polder formerly belonged to the congregation of Haarlem; some of them also were members of the church of Aalsmeer. They usually also joined the Nederlandsche Protestantenbond, a union of liberal Protestants founded at Hoofddorp on Sept. 24, 1890, by L. van Cleeff, the Mennonite pastor of Aalsmeer. In 1912 the congregation of Haarlem founded a church for this group, with a building dedicated on Feb. 25, 1912, by Pastor W. Luikinga of Aalsmeer. In 1946 this group was organized as an independent Mennonite congregation and called as its pastor in the same year Miss T. G. Siccama, who had already served as a pastor of the Protestantenbond since 1945. She served until 1949, and was succeeded by N. Treffers-Mesdag in 1953. The membership in 1955 was 165. There is a women's circle, a choir, and a Sunday school for children. (DB 1912, 223; ML II, 344.) J.IJ., vdZ.

Haarlemsch Martelaarsboek, also called the Groot Martelaarsboek, a name often used for Historie der Martelaren ofte waerachtighe Getuygen Jesu Christi, published at Haarlem, Holland, in 1615. vdZ.

Haarlemsche Bundels (Hymnbooks of the Mennonite Congregation of Haarlem). There are a number of Haarlemsche Bundels: (1) Liederen en Gezangen (Haarlem, n.d., 1713). This hymnbook was a reprinted and enlarged edition of the Oude Liederen of 1684, a songbook used in Amsterdam. In this Haarlem edition a number of Psalms were replaced by versions rhymed by various poets as Vondel, Hooft, Westerbaen, Rooleeuw. It had since 1729 also been in use in de Rijp. It was reprinted at Haarlem in 1756, 1763, and 1776. This 1776 edition, which was also in use in the Remonstrant Church of Rotterdam, was given a somewhat modified title. (2) Christelijke gesangen en Liederen (Haarlem, 1804), usually called Oude (Old) Haarlemsche Bundel. (3) Christelijke Kerkgezangen (Amsterdam, 1851). (4) Doopsgezinde Liederen (Haarlem, 1895), known as Nieuwe (New) Haarlemsche Bundel.

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 were also used in some other Mennonite congregations. All these songbooks are now out of use, having been replaced in 1945 by the Doopsgezinde Bundel (q.v.). vdZ.

Catalogus Amst., 277, 329, 330; DB 1861, 159 f.; 1865, 70-72, 76-79, 91-94; 1895, 180 f.; 1896, 111, 132-34; 1900, 117.

Haarlemsche Vereeniging: see Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten.

Habaner, originally a nickname for the Hutterites in Slovakia, used by the Slovakian peasants; later the general name for those Hutterites who after about 1760 turned Catholic and as such were permitted to continue to live in their existing Bruderhofs on a semi-community or co-operative principle. These Habaners are still living in a few villages of Western Slovakia today; in 1925 the older people were still speaking German. Today they have become almost completely Slavicized, and their old traditions, customs, and skills are nearly gone, although remnants of their former community organization still exist. The name "Habaner" has been differently explained: as deriving from "Haben," a section of Velky-Levary (q.v., the former Gross-Schützen), or from "Haushaben" (another term for Bruderhof), which the neighbors abbreviated into Haben. The latter interpretation would correspond to the usage of neighbors in America who call the Hutterites "the colony people."

History: The violent conversion of the Brethren by a strengthened absolutistic government under Empress Maria Theresa (1740-80) and the greater Jesuit missionary activity then permitted in Hungary is graphically described in the Hutterite Klein-Geschichtsbuch (230-39). Around 1700 their former community of goods was widely abandoned, yet the Bruderhof organization still remained under a central leadership, with communal bakeshop, blacksmith shop, slaughterhouse, school, and common pastures and ponds. After 1726 infants were generally, although not always, baptized. The last active Vorsteher of the brotherhood was one Zacharias Walter, 1746-61, but eventually he could no longer stand the brutalities of his persecutors, and turned Catholic. The next Vorsteher, Heinrich Müller, died steadfast in a monastery 1762. After 1757-58 all Anabaptist books were confiscated by Jesuits and later sent to Bratislava, Esztergom, and even Budapest. In 1769 the entire population of the Bruderhofs in Sobotiste, Velky-Levary, St. Johann, and Trenchin were compelled to attend Catholic services. The methods used were rather brutal: children were taken away from their parents and put into Catholic orphanages, and the men were dragged into monasteries until they accepted the Catholic faith. In the 1780's (time of Joseph II) a second wave of book confiscation set in. Recent reports, however, show that nevertheless a good number of their precious handwritten books were kept and hidden. In the 1890's, when an old house was torn down, books were found behind the plaster of the walls. It was not until 1863 that all fields were completely parceled out into individual lots. But even in 1925 they had something like a community chest and a few other co-operative activities on their Hofs.

Many Brethren tried to emigrate to the Ukraine (Little Russia), where those Brethren who had lived in Transylvania had found a new refuge. But this was more difficult than anticipated, the authorities being extremely vigilant and permitting no emigration whatsoever. Strangely enough, Emperor Joseph II (1780-90), generally known as an "enlightened" ruler, who issued the famous Toleration Edict of 1781, and who in 1782 had a long conversation with a group of petitioning Brethren (Klein-GB, 364 f.), still refused to give the Brethren freedom of worship, and demanded that they stay in their new Catholic faith. During the 1780's the Brethren in the Ukraine five times sent missionary teams to Slovakia to induce emigration, but in spite of the desire of nearly all Habaners to return to their former faith, the results were rather poor. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (p. 374) lists a total of eleven families with 56 souls who actually managed to reach the Ukrainian Bruderhofs. Among them was also one Jacob Walter, of probably the oldest Hutterite family in existence (since the 1590's). After the promulgation of the Toleration Edict in 1781, many Habaners declared themselves no longer willing to go to a Catholic church, but their resistance soon broke down. In 1793 another team arrived from Russia, but it failed completely in its purpose. One hundred years later the Brethren now in America again invited the late descendants of these Brethren in Slovakia to come over and begin anew a life in the brotherhood. One Ignatz Pullman came in 1892, bringing a number of rare codices and books along (no longer of value to him) but soon left again. Today the Habaners have almost completely lost knowledge of their own earlier history as Hutterites. Occasional visitors (Dutch Mennonites in 1910, Hutterites from America in 1936, also a few interested scholars like Beck and others) told them their own history, yet hardly awakened any reaction to it.

Description of the Habanerhofs. Today there exist only two such Hofs in Slovakia, namely, in Sobotiste and in Velky-Levary. They represent closed settlements with handsome whitewashed, one-story houses (built of sun-baked clay brick), arranged in a square around a central courtyard, very clean and so solidly built that most of these houses still stand as they were built soon after 1621. Remarkable are their high thatched roofs which are almost fireproof because the straw on the inside of the roof was worked through and covered with clay so that no straw is visible at all (a good protection also against heat and cold, and even dirt). At the ground level are found all those rooms which once served brotherhood activities such as worship, eating, cooking, children's and sick rooms. The floor of this level is of stamped clay covered with yellow sand—a practice which the Brethren also continued even in their American houses until a few years ago. The attics have two stories with the bedrooms, called Oertl or Stuben. Besides the square, around the courtyard there are other buildings such as the mill, the forge, butcher shops, and in Sobotiste also a remarkable clock tower.

Famous were the crafts of the Habaners. Still today one house in Velky-Levary shows the tiled sign of a potter's "firm," J. H. 1781, which stands for Joseph Hörndl, the Krügelmacher (Beck, 620, Klein-GB, 355), a man known for his stubborn allegiance to the old faith, who wrote to the Ukraine for help. Their ceramics, called "Habaner-Fayence," were of the highest quality and still are the pride of museums (see Ceramics).

Today this craft is no longer practiced. Their other outstanding craft was the making of fine steel knives; it, too, is dead today. Only minor crafts such as shoemaking, tanning, etc., have survived and found a good market both in Slovakia, and before 1918 in Lower Austria.

The most remarkable fact is that in spite of re-Catholization and de-Germanization, a skeleton organization still has survived to this day. In 1936, when two Hutterite elders from Canada visited these places, they were warmly received, shown around, and even some faint memories of old stories came to the surface. In fact, in one chest some old books were still discovered, and a few of them were even taken to America. R.F.

Photographs of the Habanerhofs in Lydia Müller, Der Kommunismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer (Vienna, 1928) and in R. Friedmann, "Die Habaner in der Slovakei," in Wiener Ztscht f. Volkskunde, 1927. A short description also by R. Friedmann in Proceedings of the 5th Annual Conf. on Menn. Cultural Problems, 1946, 61-65. For history see Beck, 584 ff., also 302, note 2, and Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 230-39, 355-75. For older descriptions of the Hofs (1802, 1810) see ML II, 217. Concerning book confiscation see Friedmann, Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., 1929, 166-68. An extensive description in the Slovakian language is presented by Frantisek Kraus, Nove Prispevky k Dejinam Habanov na Slovenska (Bratislava, 1937), with very fine illustrations. The description of the trip of the two Hutterite elders (Michael Waldner and David Hofer) to Slovakia in 1936 exists only as a typescript, extant in several Canadian Bruderhofs. ML II, 216 f.

Habegger (Habecker, Hawbecker), a Mennonite family originally from Trub, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The name means "a person from Habchegg" (Hawk Ridge), the name of a place between Trub and Langnau. The first record of Anabaptists having the name was in 1564, when the wife of Vincentz Habkegkers was fined for her beliefs. In the early 18th century some members of this family emigrated to the Palatinate, while others went to the Bishopric of Basel for refuge. In 1737 nine persons of this name left the Palatinate and traveled on the same boat for America. These became the ancestors of the Habeckers and Hawbeckers of Lancaster and Franklin counties, Pa. Jacob C. Habecker became a minister of the Habecker (MC) congregation near Mountville, Pa. David Habecker (1791-1889) moved to Niagara Co., N.Y., from Lancaster Co., where he was ordained to the ministry in 1834. He died at the age of 98, having been in the ministry for 64 years. The Habeggers in the Jura area of the canton of Bern lived on the Münsterberg and in Chaluet near Court. In 1708 Peter Habegger was an Anabaptist minister. Records of 1764 mention Ulrich Habegger as a minister. In the migration of 1852 from the Jura to Adams Co., Ind., several families of this name were included. Among them was a gifted young minister Peter Habegger (1821-99), who had been ordained only four years before. He was ordained as bishop in 1853. The main centers where this Mennonite family is found today are the Bernese Jura, Adams Co., Ind., and Lancaster Co., Pa. D.L.G.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 452, 455, 470-71; M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Lancaster, 1931) 97, 100, 420.

Habermann, Anstatt, an Anabaptist preacher in the Kurpfalz (today Baden) who took part in the disputation at Frankenthal (q.v.). He was a native of Heimsheim (perhaps Heinsheim) near Mosbach. Nothing else is known of him. (ML II, 217.)

Habets, Joseph (1829-73), a Dutch Catholic priest, archivist of the province of Limburg, chairman of the Historical Society of Limburg-Roermond, wrote De Wederdoopers te Maastricht tijdens de regierung von Karel V (Roermond, 1877), which gives a thorough and authentic account of the rise and suppression of the fanatical Anabaptists of Münster in and about the city. (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 653 f.; ML II, 217.) Neff.

Habsburg: see Hapsburg.

Hackfurt, Lukas (Lux Bathodius, Latin), an upper-class citizen of Strasbourg, a civil custodian of alms, was a respected member of the Anabaptist group in the Reformation period. His name recurs frequently in the records of council proceedings concerning the earliest Anabaptist movement in Strasbourg. He was apparently a strong supporter of the group and of pronounced influence on its leadership until he recanted in 1531 (Adam, 204). Neff.

C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1855-60) 270; T. W. Röhrich, Zur Geschichte der strassburgischen Wiedertäufer (reprint from Ztscht f. Hist. Theol., 1860) p. 15 f.; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905) 85; Joh. Adam, Evan. Kirchengesch. der Stadt Strassburg (Strasbourg, 1922); ML II, 218.

Hadewyck (Hadewijk), a Dutch Anabaptist woman. Her husband, a soldier, being compelled to be present at the execution of the Dutch Anabaptist martyr Sicke Freerks (q.v.) at Leeuwarden, was so outraged by this fact, that he accused the Catholic Church and had to flee to save his life. After the flight of her husband (1531) Hadewyck became converted and united with the congregation of Leeuwarden, was arrested there in January 1549 with Elisabeth Dirks (q.v.), but escaped. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 74; Mart. Mir. D 156-58, E 546; ML I, 696.

Hadjin, a city in interior Turkey, located in a pocket in the mountains of the Taurus range about 100 miles inland from Adana. Christian missionary work was begun here about 1850 by the American Board. A smaller but significant mission effort known as the United Orphanage and Mission, which was largely sponsored by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, began in 1898 when Rose Lambert (later Mrs. David Musselman) and Mary A. Gerber arrived. Within a year they had gathered 175 orphans and opened two homes, one for boys and one for girls. By 1905 there were 305 orphans, with an extensive industrial training program and evangelistic work. A total of over 20 missionaries were sent out but several of them served only a short time because of ill health or death. Work was closed in 1914 with the outbreak of World War I. In 1919 three missionaries were sent back and work resumed only to be closed again the next year by the Turkish Nationalist siege of the city. Some of the missionaries carried on work among Armenian refugees in other centers, especially Damascus, but never again in Hadjin. As a matter of fact the Armenian population of Hadjin was practically annihilated through a series of massacres and deportations centering in the years 1896, 1909, and 1920. S.F.P.

Rose Lambert, Hadjin and the Armenian Massacres (N.Y., 1911); Mrs. D. C. Eby, At the Mercy of Turkish Brigands (New Carlisle, 1922); J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, 1920); Julius Richter, History of Protestant Missions in the Near East (Edinburgh, 1910).

Haemstede, Adriaen Cornelis van (1525-62), of noble lineage, attended the University of Louvain, where he published in 1552 Tabulae totius juris canonici, . . . Livino Bloxenio á Burgh dicatae (copy in the State Library at Munich). He apparently joined the Reformed Church soon after. From Emden he was sent to Antwerp at the urgent request of the Reformed Church (dated Dec. 17, 1555), and preached there in homes and out-of-doors. From autumn 1557 to February 1559 he spent a second period in Antwerp, full of danger and difficulty.

In this period he wrote his chief work, the martyrbook, De Gheschiedenisse ende den doodt der vromen Martelaren, die om het ghetuyghenisse des Evangeliums haer bloedt ghestort hebben, van de tyden Christi af, tot ten Jare M.D.LIX toe, byeen vergadert op het kortste, Door Adrianum Corn. Haemstedium. An. 1559 den 18. Martii. The book is of great value, with its carefully collected and highly reliable reports, and was reprinted at Dordrecht 1657, Brielle 1658, Dordrecht 1659, Amsterdam 1671, Doesburg 1870-71, Doesburg 1883. His influence on Tieleman van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.) is unmistakable.

In his report on Anthonie Verdickt, who died in Brussels Jan. 12, 1559, there was in the edition of 1559 (p. 449) a statement of Verdickt's very liberal view on early or late baptism, which has been deleted from all subsequent editions. Sharpened denominational sensitivity is also shown by the fact that because of Haemstede's mild judgment of the Anabaptists his name has been omitted from all the editions of his book since 1566 (Dresselhuis, 67; Sepp, 12). Worthy of note is also Haemstede's Confession of Faith for the Reformed in Aachen (1559) (Goeters, Theologische Arbeiten, 82 and 91). The following Anabaptist martyrs are found in Haemstede's martyrbook: Wendelmoet Claesd., Anneken vanden Hove, Sybrand Jansz, Janneken de Jonckheere, and Laurens Schoenmaker.

Fleeing from Antwerp, Haemstede led 13 merchant families to Aachen in February 1559 (not 1558; see Goeters, 55 ff.; 1907, 27), obtained permission to let them enter, preached to the citizens, had dealings with the Anabaptists, and preached in Jülich (Redlich, II, 375-81).

When Elizabeth assumed the British throne he sought refuge there for his fellow believers. In May 1559 Haemstede was in London, and was given the right to preach to his countrymen in Christ Church or St. Margaret's. In a letter to Palatine Elector Frederick III (Sept. 12, 1559) he pleaded for intervention in behalf of the Reformed in Aachen and sent a very instructive confession of faith for them (Nederl. Archief, 1907, 46 ff.; Theologische Arbeiten, 1906, 85 ff.). But he soon became involved in a serious dispute on account of his mild judgment of the Anabaptists. On July 3, 1560, the church council of the greatly increased congregation charged Haemstede with offering the hand of brotherhood to several Anabaptists, though they rejected him; on the question of the incarnation he confessed his ignorance and declared that he would not for that reason reject the Anabaptists. Indeed, he had to intercede for them to the magistrate, to the bishop in London, whom the queen had appointed as supervisor of foreign groups, as well as to the Low German Reformed Church. They did not teach, as the Münsterites had, community of goods or of women; he would not judge them harshly. An anonymous petition was actually presented to the bishop of London, Edmund Grindal, to tolerate several who were unable to unite with the Reformed group. On Sept. 4 the bishop sent it to Petrus de Loenus and Jan Utenhove for their opinion (Strype, Grindal, 62 f.). Haemstede admitted that he had promised to speak for them, not because he sanctioned their doctrine of the incarnation, but because he hoped they would see the light; at any rate, they were weaker members of Christ. They replied with the reproof that to underestimate error is to confuse the believers, strengthen the opposition, and make the church suspect in England and elsewhere. Instead of making the confession of guilt required of him, Haemstede declared that persons who acknowledge Christ as priest and intermediary, desire the Holy Spirit in order to work righteousness, are founded upon Christ, the only foundation. Hence he hoped for the best for them as for all his dear brethren. Even if they built on this foundation with wood, hay, straw, or stubble, they could partake of salvation. Their great ignorance did not exclude them from salvation. The truth should be presented to them in friendliness, but to judge and condemn them as ungodly was of the flesh and forbidden. Gal. 5; Matt. 7. This judgment refers not to all, but to the good among the Anabaptists, who err in simplicity (Kerkeraadsprotokollen, 448). The council replied that then no church discipline could be exercised toward those who joined the Anabaptists. Whoever rejected the incarnation, infant baptism, the oath, and government, refused to join the church, could not possibly be considered a brother. Haemstede agreed with a document of this nature, but added: the question of the method of incarnation was only a minor point in the article that the Son of God truly appeared in the flesh. To separate on this point would be to cast dice for the garment and to neglect the Crucified, or to quarrel about the color of the garment.

On Aug. 5, 1560, Haemstede was suspended from the office of preaching. He replied, "Do these things, it is well, I thank you; this is what I seek. Christ ought always to suffer at the hands of the scribes and Pharisees; his ministers suffer likewise. But I must preach the Gospel; the Lord will provide the place for me" (Kerkeraadsprotokollen, 455).

In further negotiations before Bishop Grindal on Sept. 16 Haemstede signed a correct confession of the incarnation, but refused to make a confession of guilt, and was therefore excommunicated on Nov. 19, 1560, and expelled from the country. His adherents long maintained that he had been unjustly sentenced, and were themselves excommunicated. Among them were such distinguished men as Acontius, the historian Emanuel von Meteren, Antonius Corranus, and Cassiodorus de Reyna.

Haemstede went to Holland, where he worked in The Hague, East Friesland, and later in Groningen. There is also record of a trip to Cleve (121). In Antwerp a document in his defense was circulated (170). Also in the church council of Emden opinion was in his favor, and they wrote to the London church and to Grindal to have the case reopened. But when Haemstede appeared in London on July 19, 1562, to preach, and looked up his followers, he was arrested on July 22. Grindal rejected as inadequate and ambiguous the confession of guilt presented by Haemstede and presented to Haemstede a formula of recantation (Strype, Grindal, 469 f.), in vain. An edict of the Privy Council to the church commissioners, Aug. 19, 1562, ordered him to leave England within 15 days or forfeit his life. He died in Friesland in that year.

The influence of Haemstede's attitude toward the Anabaptists continued not only in England. In Holland and East Friesland voices were heard in their defense. A very similar case soon after this is that of the Walloon preacher, Adrian Gorinus.

W.G.G.

Haemstede's Geschiedenisse is found in Bibliographie Neerlandais II (The Hague, 1890) 269-378; Chr. Sepp, "Geschiedenis der Martelaaren door Adriaan van Haemstede," in Geschiedkundige Nasporingen II (Leiden, 1873) 269-378; H. T. Oberman, "De betrouwbaarheid der Martelaarsboeken van Crespin en van Haemstede," in Nederlandsche Archief v. Kerkgesch. IV (1905) 74-110; Daniel Gerdes, Historia reformationis III (Groningen, 1744-52) 270 ff.; E. Meiners, Oostvrieschlandts Kerkelyke geschiedenisse I (Groningen, 1738) 371 ff., 396; "Ab Utrecht Dresselhuis," in Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis, 1835, 41-150; Chr. Sepp, Geschiedkundige Nasporingen II (Leiden, 1873) 9-136; Fr. Pijper, Jan Utenhove (Leiden, 1883); M. F. van Lennep, Caspar van der Heyden (Amsterdam, 1884); F. L. Rutgers, Calvijns invloed (Leiden, 1899); W. G. Goeters, "Adrian van Haemstede's Wirksamkeit in Antwerpen und Aachen," in Theol. Arbeiten aus dem Rheinischen Wissenschaftlichen Predigerverein, 1906, 50-95; 1907, 25-29; idem, "Documenten van Adrian van Haemstede, waaronder eene gereformeerde geloofsbelijdenis van 1559," in Nederlandsch Archief, 1907, 1-64; F. de Schickler, Les Eglises du refuge en Angleterre (Paris, 1892) 117 ff.; A. A. van Schelven, De nederduitsche vluchtelingenkerken der XVIe eeuw (The Hague, 1908) 120 ff.; Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire litteraire des dix-cent Provinces de Pays Bas (by Paquot) (II, 1768) 342-44 (erroneously considers Haemstede an Anabaptist); Th. Petrejus, Catalogus Haereticorum (Cologne, 1629) 82, lists a sect of Haemstede's followers; DB 1916, 114 ff.; Biogr. Wb. III, 439-46; N.N.B. Wb. I, 1013-16; F. Pijper, Martelaarsboeken (The Hague, 1924) 34-72; ML II, 218 f.

Haetzer, Ludwig (he himself spelled his name "Haetzer," whereas his contemporaries use the spelling "Hetzer"), was born in Bischofszell in the canton of Thurgau of Switzerland about 1500, apparently descended from a respected family. That he was of Waldensian descent, as Ludwig Keller believed, cannot be proved; according to his own testimony he was educated in the faith of the medieval church, probably early intended for the priesthood. He was educated in the school of the Chorherrenstift of St. Pelagius. In the fall of 1517 he was matriculated in the philosophical faculty of the University of Basel, but never acquired an academic degree. His education was humanistic, for already by 1523 he was versed in the three classical languages. This is in agreement with his formal high evaluation of Holy Scripture, his view of Christ as an example, and his predominantly ethical understanding of the Christian faith, features which mark the first recognizable phase of his theology.

After the conclusion of his studies, about 1520, Haetzer probably was consecrated as a priest in Constance, which was the seat of the bishop. Then he was given the position of chaplain in Wädenswil at Lake Zürich (in a territory which was politically attached to Zürich). However by 1523 he left this position to go to Zürich. The reason for this move was very likely his inclination toward the Reformation.

With his first book, Ein Urteil Gottes unsers Ehegemahls, wie man sich mit allen Götzen und Bildnissen soll, aus der Hl. Schrift gezogen durch L. H., published at Zürich by Christoph Froschauer and dated Sept. 24, 1523, Haetzer enters the clear light of history. In three theses, which were proved with many citations from the Bible, he advocated the rejection of images in the Christian churches and argued for their removal as a command of God. In conclusion he refuted four possible counterarguments (the text found in W. Köhler, No. 164, pp. 126-28). This booklet was intended to defend the repeated acts of iconoclasm which had taken place in Zürich during this month, and to assist in hastening reform. Haetzer also tried to work personally for the Reformation. In October 1523, for instance, he interrupted the pastor Konrad Heffelin of Maschwanden, a village on the Zürich border in the direction of Zug, in a sermon, with the result that the council of Zürich occupied itself with this affair on Oct. 22, 1523, and later again on March 21, 1524. Heffelin was deposed from his position; Haetzer was exonerated.

Following the first Zürich disputation of Jan. 29, 1523, the question of images and the Mass took first place in the Reformation movement. Upon the request of the city pastors, Zwingli, Jud, and Engelhard, the council held a second disputation in Zürich on Oct. 26-28, 1523. On the first day Leo Jud spoke on the images and on the second and third Zwingli discussed the Mass and the Lord's Supper. Haetzer was present at the debate and twice asked for the floor. The council then commissioned him to draw up the report, in which task Georg Binder, the schoolmaster of the Grossmünster church, was to help him. The records of the disputation, examined and approved by a council commission, were published on Dec. 8, 1523, by Froschauer: Acta oder Geschichte, wie es auf dem Gespräch der 26., 27. und 28. Tagen Weinmonats in der christlichen Stadt Zürich vor einem ehrsamen gesessenen grossen und kleinen Rat, auch in Beisein von mehr also 500 Priestern und viel anderer biederer Leute, ergangen ist. Betreffend die Götzen und die Messe (reprinted in Zwingli's Sämtliche Werke II, 671-803). The foreword by Haetzer praises the majesty of the Word of God, which is to decide ecclesiastical disputes. The Zürich council appeared as the example of a Christian government. In connection with these events Haetzer also published a second edition of his booklet on images. In the matter of church politics during these months he sided entirely with Zwingli, who was still urging immediate reform. His theology is an extreme Biblicism, which betrays Zwingli's influence and has definite reform in view. His later understanding of the Apostle Paul in a reformatory sense is not yet present in his thinking.

Haetzer's next work was the translation of a medieval document to be used for the conversion of the Jews, which was printed by Silvan Otmar in Augsburg on Jan. 2, 1524, with the title: Ein Beweis, dass der wahre Messias gekommen sei, auf den die Juden noch ohne Ursache in der Zukunft warten, geschrieben durch Rabbi Samuel [Maroccanus] . . . , which Haetzer probably did on a commission. In 27 chapters the correctness of medieval church doctrine against Jews is proved out of the Old Testament. Many of the offensive Catholic statements Haetzer softened by the use of marginal notes. The second edition of this booklet, which appeared on March 12, 1524, published by Johannes Hager in Zürich, contains an insert (text in Goeters), which in Zwinglian formulation attacked the offerings and chants of the Mass, and its numerous prayers. In view of the fact that for the time being the old church order was still in force in Zürich, the critical note of the pamphlet is noteworthy.

The first document indicating an inner estrangement of Haetzer from Zwingli is his exposition of the New Testament epistles from Ephesians to Hebrews: Eine kurze wohlgegründete Auslegung der zehn nachgehenden Episteln S.Pauli, erstlich im Latein durch Johannes Bugenhagen aus Pommern, Bischof zu Wittenberg, geschrieben und von L. H. verdeutscht. This book was published by Otmar in Augsburg, the foreword dated June 29, 1524 (text in Goeters). In this book the Reformation is sharply accused of not having applied the Word of God with all strictness and decisiveness. Zwingli himself, though not named, is frequently attacked. The booklet states that a second reformation is expected, which would for the first time produce the true church of confessing Christians. These documents make it clear that Haetzer was being attracted to the circle around Conrad Grebel and Felix Manz. Since we have no extensive sources from this circle at this time, Haetzer's testimonials give an excellent picture of their position. They show that the estrangement from Zwingli was brought about not by dogmatic reasons (now the reformatory understanding of Paul is evident in Haetzer also), but by consideration of church policy. A marginal note on Eph. 5:22 ff. gives the first literary evidence that the common church practice of infant baptism had become dubious to the Grebel circle.

In June 1524 Haetzer traveled to Augsburg with a letter of recommendation from Zwingli to Johannes Frosch, to supervise Otmar's publication of his book on the epistles. Also a translation of Bugenhagen's commentary on the Psalms had been planned, which, however, was not carried out. In Augsburg Haetzer won the friendship of the reformer Urbanus Rhegius. A fateful incident was the beginning of an acquaintance with the merchant Georg Regel, whom he accompanied to his country estate. When soldiers of the Duke of Bavaria took the Regels as prisoners from their castle at Lichtenberg on the Lech because of their support of the evangelical cause, he scarcely escaped arrest and fled to Augsburg. About October he returned to Zürich.

Meanwhile the problem of baptism had become a public matter in Zürich. The circle of opponents of infant baptism had grown to a considerable number; there were connections with Carlstadt. The leaders of the group upon their request were given the opportunity to express themselves on the question of the permissibility of infant baptism in private conversations on two Tuesdays. On the side of the opponents of infant baptism Haetzer also participated in these conversations, and challenged Zwingli with sharp logic in the latter's exposition of Bible passages. He was also present at the disputation before the council on Jan. 17, 1525. Together with Reublin, Brötli, and Castelberger he was expelled from Zürich on Jan. 31 as a noncitizen. But he did not, as did the other members of the Grebel group, accept the baptism of faith in these days, because he disapproved of this act. To be sure he definitely rejected infant baptism, as the fragment of a letter written to Balthasar Hubmaier shows, which must date from this period (text in Goeters), but he was not ready for rebaptism. In fact there is no evidence that he was ever baptized. He definitely did not join the Anabaptist group in Zürich.

From Zürich Haetzer went to Constance. Here the bishop was engaged in a struggle with the council, which was advocating reform. Haetzer was among the clergy who, on April 29, 1525, took the oath of obedience to the council. But his days there cannot have been of long duration. Fridolin Sicher's Chronik claims that Haetzer stayed for a while in Swabia and participated with Christoph Schappeler of Memmingen in the composition of the Twelve Articles of the Peasants. Soon he was in Augsburg again and entered the service of the publisher Otmar as a proofreader. In Otmar's shop then appeared his booklet: Von den evangelischen Zechen und von der Christen Rede aus Hl. Schrift (text in Goeters). The word "Zechen" refers to meetings of Protestant-minded members of the trade guilds, such as were being held in this time of religious and social disputes, and may often have ended in wild drinking parties. Haetzer testified that he himself had taken part in such occasions. In this booklet he severely criticized these meetings. Not Christ but Bacchus, he said, was leading people together here. Instead of brotherly edification and admonition, calumnies and warlike counsel reigned. For Christians, who are to live a spiritual life of moderation according to God's will and according to the example of Christ, and who are to have naught but God's Word in their mouths, participation in such meetings is inappropriate. At this time Augsburg was deeply involved in social unrest and in a dispute about communion. Most of the preachers were preaching Lutheran ideas, for which reason many citizens turned away from them and assembled instead in smaller circles. In these conventicles, which followed the teaching of Carlstadt and Zwingli on the Lord's Supper, Haetzer played an important role. In September 1525, when the clergy of the city were on the point of gaining the upper hand in this dispute about the Lord's Supper because of the intervention of Wittenberg (q.v.), Haetzer, in a letter dated Sept. 14 (reprint in ZSW VII, No. 383, pp. 360 ff.), demanded of Zwingli that he compose a counter booklet which Haetzer would have published in Augsburg. Shortly after this Haetzer had a clash with Rhegius, when he depreciated and tried to refute among his friends Rhegius' Lutheran sermon on John 6:63. He was thereupon challenged by Rhegius to a disputation, but failed to appear. Then he was expelled from the city as a disturber of the peace. Haetzer did not advocate Anabaptist teachings in Augsburg, even though the later Anabaptist congregation here had its origin in these conventicles.

About the middle of October 1525 Haetzer went to Basel by way of Constance, where he had some theological discussions with Ambrosius Blaurer, and in Basel was received by Johannes Oecolampadius. Through Oecolampadius he sent greetings by letter to Zwingli, and on Oct. 17 wrote a letter himself to Zwingli (reprint in ZSW VIII, No. 393, p. 389 f.), seeking to regain the latter's favor. Meanwhile he translated Oecolampadius' important book on the Lord's Supper, Vom Nachtmal, together with two sermons by the same author on the same subject. But the reconciliation with Zwingli did not take place until he made a journey to Zürich on Nov. 5, on which occasion he took part in the Anabaptist disputation of Nov. 6-8, 1525, held in the Grossmünster church. There he is reported to have publicly confessed his error and even to have attacked the Anabaptists. A personal conversation with Zwingli resulted in a theological understanding between them. Haetzer, who had not received the baptism of faith, recognized the admissibility of infant baptism as an external sign corresponding with the circumcision of the Old Testament. Like Zwingli he made a sharp distinction between the impartation of the Spirit and the reception of the sacraments. The motivation for this agreement is to be found in the status of the dispute on the Lord's Supper. Thus he now again enjoyed the full confidence of Zwingli, who also sanctioned his translation of Oecolampadius' book on the Lord's Supper. This booklet appeared at the end of 1525, published by Froschauer, with the title: Vom Sakrament der Danksagung. Von dem wahren natürlichen Verständnis der Worte Christi: Das ist mein Leib, nach der alten Lehrer Erklärung. The foreword (reprint in Staehelin, I, No. 319, pp. 437-47) rejected as Catholic superstition the view of the real presence of Christ in the communion emblems. The idea that the sacraments bring about the forgiveness of sins and the assurance of faith is definitely attacked, thus probably showing the spiritualizing influence of Carlstadt. Furthermore a long list of contemporary opponents, from Luther to Erasmus, are depreciatingly characterized. This foreword contains in addition a justification by Haetzer of his position on the question of baptism (p. 444), which deserves particular attention. At Zwingli's request he was present in Basel participating in the call of Conrad Pellikan to the Zürich pulpit (letter to Zwingli dated Dec. 30, 1525, in ZSW VIII, No. 431, p. 482 f.). In the middle of February 1526 he was back in Zürich to supervise the publication of another writing by Oecolampadius on the Lord's Supper. At the time of the disputation of Baden he was living in Basel. The council delegated him to Baden, but he apparently did not take part in the disputation. Meanwhile he was engaged in the translation of writings by Oecolampadius. At the end of July 1526, appeared in the printing house of Thomas Wolfe in Basel the booklet Der Prophet Maleachi mit Auslegung Johannis Oecolampadii, durch ihn im Latein geschrieben, mit Fleiss verdeutscht durch L. H. (reprint in Staehelin, I, No. 413, pp. 565-67). The foreword of July 18, 1526, shows a transition in Haetzer's thinking. Scripture and spirit become the principal theme. Biblicistic tones are still noticeable, but at the same time there is a spiritualistic tendency, which is revealed even in his concept of the sacrament. A translation of Oecolampadius' commentary on Isaiah was announced. Shortly afterward there appeared in the same printing shop a translation of Oecolampadius' second booklet on the Lord's Supper entitled: Vom Nachtmahl. Beweisung aus evangelischen Schriften, wer die seien, die des Herrn Nachtmahlswort unrecht verstehen und auslegen, which, however, was probably written before the translation of the commentary on Malachi. The foreword, dated Aug. 5, 1526 (reprint in Staehelin, I, No. 419, p. 572 f.), again rejects the real presence, and spiritualistic tendencies are also visible here. The depreciation of all learnedness is reminiscent of the ideas expressed by Carlstadt.

But suddenly this leisurely literary activity came to an end. Haetzer had been guilty of a moral offense with a maid in Basel. In order to evade exposure he left the city. Probably for this reason only a part of the planned translation of the commentary on Isaiah, Das 36. und 37. Kapitel Jesaja des Propheten, ausgelegt durch Johannes Oekolampad, appeared, published by Otmar in Augsburg in 1526. His name is not mentioned in the booklet nor is there a foreword.

In Strasbourg Wolfgang Fabritius Capito received Haetzer in his home and supported his scholarly interests. Haetzer was still planning the translation of the commentary on Isaiah, but then soon turned directly to the Hebrew original text. Capito, who was one of the outstanding Hebraists, or Hans Denk, with whom he entered into a friendly relation during these weeks, may have persuaded him to do this. By Denk he was drawn into the Anabaptist disturbances in Strasbourg. With Michael Sattler, who already at Zürich in November 1525 had taken the opposite Anabaptist side, Haetzer had a conversation which ended in disagreement. In a debate between Martin Cellarius-Borrhaus and Denk he sided with the latter. When Denk was expelled from Strasbourg on Dec. 23, 1526, Haetzer, who was suspected by the reformers of Strasbourg of being a secret Anabaptist and a friend of Denk, remained. But when new disturbances took place in the middle of January 1527, caused by the news of the death of Manz, he became involved in a quarrel with the city preachers concerning Zwingli's attitude. He left the city voluntarily, following his friend Denk to Worms. A letter of farewell to Capito (reprint in Röhrich, 459 f.) assures Capito of his forgiveness and arranges for the disposal of his possessions.

In Worms Haetzer co-operated with Denk in the translation of the Prophets, which appeared on April 13, 1527, published by the printer Peter Schöffer under the title: Alle Propheten, nach der hebräischen Sprache verdeutscht. The keen foreword of April (reprint in G. Baring, Die Wormser Propheten) shows Haetzer to have been the chief translator and gives Denk the rank of an important co-operator. This volume, which was often reprinted in the following years, was the first translation of the Prophets of the Reformation period, which fact gives a good testimonial to the philological training of the author. The Zürich translation of 1529 used the Denk-Haetzer edition more than did the Luther translation of 1532. Meanwhile an Anabaptist congregation was also formed in Worms, which came to public attention on June 9, 1527, through the articles of Jakob Kautz. The extent of Haetzer's co-operation in the establishment of the congregation is not entirely clear. After a futile attempt by the council to settle the matter the leaders were expelled. Denk and Haetzer had just previously left the city.

Again Haetzer went to Strasbourg. An attempted reconciliation with Capito failed, because in the meantime Haetzer's misstep in Basel had become known. In August he met Denk in Ulm and with him traveled to Augsburg. During the "Martyr Synod" of August 1527 he stayed in the city, but did did not participate in the meeting. He was acquainted with Hans Hut, and probably had during these weeks also a meeting with Caspar Schwenckfeld, at least according to a report by the latter. Even before the beginning of the persecution in Augsburg, Haetzer and probably also Denk had left for Donauwörth. From there they reached Nürnberg, where Hans Schlaffer saw them together; then their ways parted. About Sept. 1, Haetzer, according to a statement by Jörg Dorsch, was in Wiebelsheim in Franconia. At the end of October 1527 he was in Regensburg and took part in the establishment of the local Anabaptist congregation. Here he baptized four persons; this is the only information in the sources that he ever baptized anyone. Even before Nov. 15 he had left the city and returned to Augsburg, probably by way of Nürnberg. Here he seems to have spent the winter; an old bit of information says that he left Augsburg in April 1528 when the new Anabaptist persecutions began. Then all trace of him is lost. He presumably returned to his home in Bischofszell, in order to devote himself in peace to his literary plans. In the winter of 1527-28 he seems also to have married. His wife was Appolonia, a maid in the house of Georg Regel, who had been baptized as an Anabaptist.

Haetzer's relationship with Anabaptism is not quite clear. He certainly never belonged to the Biblicistic congregationalistic wing of the Swiss Brethren. After his residence in Strasbourg and through his friendship with Denk he had close connections with the spiritualistic wing, which predominated in South Germany. He was never active as an Anabaptist, nor promoted Anabaptist teaching, with the exception of the baptisms in Regensburg. In his later writings the problem of baptism plays no role. Also in his trial at Constance no charge of Anabaptism is mentioned. Until new hitherto unknown sources make a different judgment necessary he will have to be considered as only a marginal personality in the early Anabaptist movement. During the latter years of his life he was a spiritualist who sought refuge in Anabaptism because he was in disagreement with ecclesiastical parties.

As a continuation of the translation of the Prophets, there appeared in the spring of 1528, published by Schöffer, a translation of part of the Apocrypha: Baruch der Prophet, Die Historie Susannas, die Historie vom Bel zu Babel, alles neulich aus der Bibel verdeutscht. Sebastian Franck, who probably was personally acquainted with Haetzer, reported he had also begun a translation of the apocryphal book of Jesus Sirach, but this was never printed; the Baruch book was the only completed part of the planned translation of the entire apocrypha. The foreword (text in Goeters) attempts to justify the publication of the apocryphal book and attacks the conception of the canon held by the reformers. In opposition to the doctrine of the Scriptures held by the Reformation, Haetzer now manifests an extreme spiritualism which would devaluate the external word in the form of Scripture and preaching in favor of the immediate witness of the Spirit. Faith now appears as an inner experience. Apocalyptic expressions are now found more frequently. In choice of words and formulation of thought mystic influences are unmistakable. There are evidences of the influence of Denk and also of Hut.

Also the edition of the Theologia Deutsch, which was printed by Schöffer with the title: Theologia Deutsch, neulich mit grossem Fleiss korrigiert und gebessert . . . , was probably revised by Haetzer, as his motto, "O God, redeem the prisoners," at the end of the book, indicates. The attached Hauptreden probably came from Denk, who died in November 1527. Through Denk Haetzer probably became acquainted with the Theologia Deutsch and thereby also with mysticism.

One other writing of Haetzer's must have appeared in print, which has, however, not yet been found. It bears the title Reime, bzw. Lieder unter dem Kreuzgang, and was no doubt a collection of songs with mystical thought content. The only known fragment (text according to Franck in Goeters), which ridicules the church doctrine of the Trinity, indicates close contact with chapter XXX of the Theologia Deutsch.

Haetzer wrote two other booklets which were not printed. The one was called by his contemporaries "the booklet of the schoolteachers" and was apparently directed against all learned scholarship. (A short summary of the content, according to Johannes Gast's Exordium, found in Goeters.) Of greater importance is the other writing, "the booklet of Christ." In it he seems to have attacked the deity of Christ and to have established his doctrinal view with citations from the Bible. Other indications of the content are lacking, but his contemporaries unanimously called Haetzer an Arian. Any doubt of this seems to be unfounded, since in his early writing on christological matters there is a conspicuous haziness. The stress always lies on the human appearance of Christ. Both manuscripts fell into the hands of his opponents at his trial and were later destroyed.

In the middle of November 1528 Augsburg demanded that the council of Constance arrest Haetzer. This could at first not be carried out because the man sought was no longer in the city, but on Nov. 28 Haetzer was finally arrested. Inquiries were sent to Zürich, Basel, Strasbourg, and Worms, which show that he was accused of breaking the peace and of an immoral life. Only from Strasbourg did a reply come, which revealed the misstep mentioned above. And so the charge of instigation of disturbance of the peace was dropped and the trial concentrated on the charge of immoral conduct. In Augsburg it was asserted that he had taken as his wife the wife of Georg Regel, Anna nee Manlich, although he himself was already married, and had received from her a wedding ring and some financial loans. He had therefore caused Anna Regel to commit adultery and had injured Georg Regel in body and possessions. All this he was said to have justified with pseudotheological reasoning. Nevertheless the trial came to a rapid conclusion. In December Augsburg sent Dr. Gereon Sailer as the prosecutor to Constance. Sailer for the first time brought Haetzer's writings with him, which showed Haetzer to be a teacher of error. Here especially "the booklet concerning Christ" is to be thought of. Finally on Feb. 3, 1529, he was sentenced to death for adultery.

Much remains unclarified concerning this trial. The court records of Augsburg on this matter are still unknown; they might perhaps reveal the background. Many contemporaries cite Haetzer's christological errors as the reason for the death sentence. It is conspicuous that Anna Regel was not summoned. Nor was Georg Regel, the husband concerned, the plaintiff, but instead the Augsburg council. Just at this time Regel seemed to have been reestablishing himself in Augsburg. The death sentence is quite unusual. Persons guilty of adultery at this time in Constance were punished with fines and imprisonment. One is involuntarily inclined to assume that the intention was, under the charge of adultery, actually to remove the teacher of error.

To undertake to clear Haetzer entirely from the charge of immoral conduct is a futile undertaking. The misstep in Basel has been well attested. Also he seems to have made a confession in Constance. In Augsburg he met frequently with Anna Regel, and one of his songs contains her maiden name as an acrostic. Anna Regel also seems not to have led an altogether blameless life, as one can gather from a letter written to her in 1543 by Schwenckfeld.

Haetzer's death walk on Feb. 4, 1529, has the effect of reconciling the spectator with the unfortunate end of his life. Composed and reconciled he went to the site of execution, upon which already a John Hus had died, admonishing those present in moving addresses. Then his head fell under the executioner's sword. Anabaptist historical tradition counts him among its martyrs. Thomas Blaurer, the councilor of Constance, described his end in an epistle to Wilhelm von Zell, Haetzer's friend ("How Ludwig Haetzer, executed with a sword at Constance, departed out of this time," published at Constance by G. Spitzenberg in 1529; Krebs, No. 467, pp. 460-68).

Haetzer was one of the outstanding authors of songs; his compositions found their way into early Anabaptist hymnology. The following of his songs have been preserved for the most part in Hutterite records and later served other poets as models (see Wolkan, pp. 12 ff.):

(1) "Erzürn dich nit, o frommer Christ." This is a rhymed version of Psalm 37 in 23 stanzas, probably written in Haetzer's later years.

(2) "Gedult sollst han auf Gottes Bahn." Three stanzas with the acrostic: Gedult bringt Erfahrung (Rom. 5:4a), also probably from Haetzer's later years. A fourth stanza in the Hutterite version on Rom. 5:5a is a later addition. Both songs have been taken into church hymnals.

(3) "Lug, Herr, wie schwach ist mein Gemüt." Six stanzas with the acrostic: Lu-de-wi-g Haets-er, surely from the time of his imprisonment shortly before his death. A seventh stanza in the Hutterite version is an addition.

(4) "Ach Gott, erhör mein Seufzen gross." Three stanzas with the acrostic: A-na Manlich, probably coming from the same period.

(5) "Will', Sinn und Gmüt richt auf zu Gott." Four stanzas with the acrostic: Will-helm von Zell, probably a poetic version of Zell's letter to the imprisoned Haetzer. The genuine fifth stanza gives Haetzer's reply to the letter and comes from the time of his imprisonment shortly before his death.

(6) "Die Lieb' ist kalt jetzt in der Welt." In the Ausbund it is attributed to Leopold Scharnschlager (q.v.); in the Hutterite tradition it is however ascribed to Haetzer. It has seven stanzas, of which two to six are a rhymed version of I Cor. 13:4-8 with many allusions to Haetzer's writings of 1525, for which reason it is concluded that it probably stems from that time and was written by him. Three additional stanzas in the Hutterite version are an addition.

(7) "Sollst du bei Gott dein Wohnung han." It is sometimes attributed to Leonhard Schiemer (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 28 f.). It has nine stanzas, one to six of which are a poetic revision of a song by Hans Witzstat with the acrostic Sophia. There are good reasons for ascribing it to Haetzer; in that case it probably comes from later years of his life. It is also found in church hymnals.

(8) "Ach, fröhlich lasst uns heben an." In the current version it does not have Haetzer's name, but is ascribed to him by Wolkan because of his motto at the end of the seventeenth stanza. But this is also found in the case of other poets, so that this cannot indicate the contrary. Compare in this regard also the lost "Lieder unter dem Kreuzgang."

Haetzer's significance does not lie in his historical effectiveness; this is exceedingly slight. He was an industrious translator and author, who was known personally by many important contemporaries; and as the first demonstrable anti-trinitarian of the German language in the Reformation time, he has been preserved from complete oblivion. His martyrdom and his songs have made him useful to the Anabaptists. It is doubtful whether the portrait etched by Christoph van Sichem in 1608 is genuine. G.G.

Details and references in G. F. Gerhard Goeters, Ludwig Haetzer, ca. 1500 bis 1529, eine Randfigur der frühen Täuferbewegung (Zürich theological dissertation, 1955); Seb. Franck, Chronica, Zeytbuch und Geschichtbibel (1531) 416 f.; H. Zwingli's Sämtliche Werke (in Corpus Reformatorum), ed. E. Egli, G. Finsler, W. Köhler, I ff. (Leipzig, 1904 ff.); Tr. Schiess, Briefwechsel der Brüder Ambrosius und Thomas Blaurer I (Freiburg, 1908); E. Staehelin, Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads (Leipzig, 1927-34); M. Krebs, TA IV: Baden und Pfalz; Th. Keim, Ludwig Hetzer, in Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie I (1856) 215-88; F. L. Weis, The Life, Teachings and Works of Ludwig Hetzer (Strasbourg theological dissertation) (Dorchester, Mass., 1930); Wolkan, Lieder; ML II, 225-31.

Haffner, Georg, an Anabaptist preacher who baptized Hans Betz (q.v.) in 1530 above Donauwörth, Bavaria. (Wolkan, Lieder, 31; ML I, 213.)

Haffner, Hans, of Riblingen, near Schwäbisch Hall, Württemberg, Germany, an Anabaptist of the Philippite (q.v.) brotherhood in Moravia in the 1530's, and the author of a remarkable devotional tract. He had been baptized at Auspitz by Adam Schlögl in 1533. In 1535, when persecutions in this country became almost unbearable, the entire Philippite group left this land (in contrast to the Hutterites) and planned to return to their native Württemberg. On their way the greater part of this brotherhood was seized and the brethren were imprisoned in the castle of Passau on the Danube (1535). There they were tortured to betray information; many died in the dungeons while many others languished for many years under unbelievable conditions. In 1540 or 41 Haffner finally recanted together with his wife Angella (or Agnes?), whereupon both were released. He then disappeared from the records; most likely he had returned to Württemberg.

In the Ausbund (q.v.), the oldest part of which was composed by these brethren in the Passau prisons, in the hymn No. 100, "Mit Freuden wollen wir singen," the 11th stanza is signed "H. Haff," which Wolkan (Lieder, 39) rightly assigns to Hans Haffner. Haffner is the author of a tract, Concerning the True Soldier of Christ (q.v.), an unusually noble and profound confession to the principles of Anabaptism, above all to that of Gelassenheit (q.v.). It is found in only one Hutterite codex. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Concerning the True Soldier of Christ," MQR V (1931) 87 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 28 f.

Häftler (hookers), the nickname given to the Amish in the 18th century and later in South Germany and neighboring territories to distinguish them from the Mennonites who were called Knöpfler (buttoners). The Amish retained the use of hooks (q.v.) and eyes to fasten clothing after their use was displaced by buttons. The German has two words for hook, Hafte and Hake, Hafte being more common in the Palatinate and Alsace. (ML II, 231.) H.S.B.

Haga, a Dutch Mennonite family of Sneek, Friesland. Bauke J. Haga (1789-1874), married to Hillegonda Veen, was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation of Sneek. His son Hendrikus Haga (b. 1814 at Sneek, d. 1889 at Arnhem) was a Mennonite minister, serving at Oldeboorn 1837-55 and at Arnhem 1855-87. Bauke Haga (the son of Hendrikus, b. 1849 at Oldeboorn, d. 1937 at Nijmegen) was a Mennonite minister at Warga 1874-81, Witmarsum and Pingjum 1881-82, Tjalleberd 1882-88, Almelo 1888-91, and Nijmegen 1891-1917. Antonie Haga (1834-1902), a brother of Hendrikus, rose to the high military position of commander of the Dutch army in the East Indies (1887-89). vdZ.

Hagen, Karl (1810-68), a renowned German historian, the son of a local minister, at his death was a professor at the University of Bern, Switzerland. As a private lecturer in the University of Heidelberg he wrote a historical work in three volumes, Deutschlands literarische und religiöse Verhältnisse im Reformationszeitalter (Erlangen, 1841-44). The last volume deals with the Anabaptist movement; in the second volume Hubmaier is briefly mentioned in the discussion of liberty of conscience. In the introduction to the third volume the author says, "My chief object in this third volume was to demonstrate how the Protestant Church, through limitation of new doctrines, through intolerance, charges of heresy, etc., departed from the principles of the Reformation as early as the third decade of the 16th century, and that they could therefore later on scarcely claim the name Reformation or at least only in a few connections, and that on the other hand the concepts of the Reformation were represented by the heretical sects and parties, which at that time stood in the same relationship to the orthodox Protestant party as at present that of the more liberal religious wing to Pietism and to the general reigning religious view. Those heretical sects have hitherto been far too little considered, in respect to their influence on public opinion, either by their views or by their practical effectiveness. Recently, to be sure, attention has been called to them, as for example by Ranke in the third volume of his German history."

Thus Hagen discusses the Anabaptists from the liberal point of view with amazing historical fidelity. His presentation is based on special study of sources, which at that time occurred rarely or never. It has been superseded by more recent investigation. His evaluation of the Anabaptist movement in its one-sided liberal viewpoint is also corrected to a degree thereby. But as the first liberal presentation of Anabaptism, breaking with the traditional historiography and seeking to do justice to the movement, it has value alongside of the presentation by Max Goebel (q.v.), which came out a few years later from the orthodox point of view and gave a quite true historical account. (ML II, 231.) NEFF.

Hägerley, a Swiss Anabaptist martyr: see Högerli.

Hagerman Mennonite Mission (MC) is a small assembly five miles southwest of Markham, York Co., Ont., and ten miles north of the East Toronto Mennonite Mission. It was founded in 1934 in the local school as a Sunday school, and organized as a mission in 1937 under the Mennonite Conference; Floyd Schmucker was ordained as pastor. A basement church was built in 1944. In 1953 the membership was 17. J.C.F.

Hagerstown, Md., was the location of Civilian Public Service Camp No. 24, consisting of five units operated conjointly by the Mennonite Central Committee and the Brethren Service Committee. Units 1, 3, and 4 were administered by the MCC. The three MCC units were located on farms in the northern part of the Cumberland Valley in Washington Co., Md. The farms were owned by agencies of the MCC constituent churches. Each unit had approximately 35 men, whose work was in the area of soil conservation. During 1944 two special schools were held at Unit 4, which was located about five miles north of Clearspring (q.v.). These were the Farm and Community School and the Christian Workers' School. Unit 24 was approved by Selective Service in December 1941 and closed in September 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949).

Hagerstown, Md., is the county seat (pop. 26,000) of Washington County (q.v.), in the west central part of the state. Two of the eight Mennonite churches in the county, Reiff (q.v.) and Paradise (q.v.), with a membership of 375, have a Hagerstown address. Brook Lane, a mental hospital operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, was established near here in 1949. M.G.

Hagey-Blair, a community in Waterloo Township, seven miles southeast of Kitchener, Ont., which had some followers of the Canada West-Ohio movement designed for unification, evangelization, and education. Daniel Hoch took the leading part in forming in 1855 a "Conference Council of the United Mennonite Community of Can. W. & O." Hoch is said to have been related to the Kinzies of the Hagey congregation, who agreed with him. Daniel Hege of Illinois, secretary in 1862 of the General Conference, wrote an explanatory letter from Blair while resting at the home of S. B. Baumann, when Hege and Ephraim Hunsberger of Wadsworth, Ohio, were touring eleven churches of Canada West, and calling on numbers of persons. Canadian funds gathered for the Wadsworth School were heaviest in the Waterloo area. No organized church can be named for this community. Meetings were held in the Carlyle School at Blair. J.C.F.

Hague, The (Dutch 's Gravenhage or Den Haag), capital of the Dutch province of South Holland and seat of the Netherlands government, has a population (1947, without suburbs) of 532,989, of whom 3,719 are Mennonites.

As early as 1534 Meynaert van Emden went to The Hague from Deft to perform baptism. Cornelis Kelder, whom he had baptized and who was condemned to death on Oct. 11, 1536, was from The Hague. On Sept. 9, 1538, Adriaen (or Paulus Adriaensz) from The Hague was burned at Vught. This could indicate that a congregation existed at this place, which met in a home at the Spui. In 1557-61 Leenaert Bouwens baptized seven persons (according to another list 14), and in 1563-65 thirty-one more. This is evidence that a Flemish Mennonite congregation of some size must have existed here, which at the beginning of the 17th century met at the Kort Achterom and after 1642 in the house "de Rosencrans" on Herdersstraat. Evidently the congregation had no elder, since on Jan. 6, 1643, Tobias Govertsz van den Wijngaert of Amsterdam was asked to come to perform baptismal services. During the middle of the 17th century the congregation was without a minister for some time. Before 1679 the congregation united with the Waterlander church of The Hague through the mediation of its elder Maerten Pieterze. This united congregation remained for some time. In 1730 it made its meetinghouse "de Rosencrans" available to the Reformed, and on Jan. 18, 1752, when David Koster, the sole surviving member, died, he willed the property of the congregation to the Mennonite Church of Leiden.

In 1879 it was apparent that there was a sufficient number of Mennonites living in The Hague to start worship services. Upon instigation of H. M. de Vries, S. Hingst, J. Kalff, G. de Vos, and H. L. Boersma monthly meetings were started in September of that year and held in the Remonstrant church. C. Sepp, pastor of the Leiden Mennonite Church, was the leader of the group and on March 14, 1880, he performed the first baptismal service. After Sept. 11, 1881, the group met biweekly and on Sept. 27 of that year the congregation was organized with 47 charter members. Before the end of the year it had a membership of 130. The church council of the Leiden congregation which had managed the property of the former Hague congregation now returned it to the new Hague congregation. On April 1, 1883, S. de Waard of Westzaan became the minister of the congregation and on Sept. 5, 1886, the congregation had its first worship service in its new church located on Paleisstraat. When de Waard resigned on Oct. 7, 1894, a call was extended to D. Kossen from Den Helder who began his service on May 5, 1895, but left the congregation on Jan. 2, 1898. He was succeeded by H. J. Elhorst from Arnhem who served the congregation from June 26, 1898, to Nov. 4, 1900, who in turn was followed by S. Lulofs of Deventer on May 5, 1901. Under his leadership the congregation grew rapidly and on May 1, 1910, G. Wuite Jzn of Arnhem began his service as second minister of the congregation. On Oct. 21, 1911, they started using an educational wing which had been erected behind the church. On Sept. 9, 1929, S. Lulofs, who had died on Sept. 5, 1927, was succeeded by A. Keuter of Akkrum. On Jan. 4, 1944, he was arrested by the German occupational authorities and died in the concentration camp Bergen-Belsen on March 10, 1945. On May 12, 1946, he was succeeded by J. E. Tuininga of Arnhem, who resigned in 1955.

Under the ministry of Lulofs and Wuite the congregation experienced its best growth and when Wuite retired Oct. 25, 1938, it was desirable to have two ministers take his place. On Nov. 20, 1938, P. Vis of Arnhem and H. W. Meihuizen of Veendam began their ministry. The need for additional room for congregational activities such as administration, deaconess work, young people's meetings, and choir practice, was met when a house next to the church was purchased for this purpose. When P. Vis died on Aug. 13, 1942, no one was called to fill the vacancy because of the uncertain conditions during the German occupation. After Pastor Keuter's arrest O. T. Hylkema was called from Bussum and began his ministry on April 16, 1944.

Soon after the organization of the congregation its membership was 150; at its twenty-fifth anniversary it was 1,200, and at the fiftieth anniversary it was 3,000 (1931). The largest membership was reached in 1943 with 3,200 members. Since that time the number has slightly decreased and is now a little over 3,000 (1953). Since 1911 the congregation has published a Maandblad containing information regarding congregational activities, which was combined with the paper of the Leiden congregation from 1942 to March 1947. Since that time the reports appear as an insert in the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad. From 1911 the ministers of the congregation served a group of Mennonites at Delft which became an independent congregation in 1923. Since 1946 a group of Mennonites in Gouda is being served. The field of service of the congregation extends not only over the city but also includes Scheveningen, Wassenaar, Leidsendam, Voorburg, Rijswijk, Zoetermeer, Loosduinen, and a part of Westland. This territory is divided into 44 districts in which special meetings are held.

Other expressions of congregational life are Sunday school, three groups of the Menno Simons Kring for younger people and two for older members, which bear the name of the first and the last martyr of the congregation, Cornelis Kelderkring and Albert Keuterkring. There are four ladies' groups, a choir, and various organizations for special causes. During the winter months various courses are offered and six congregational evenings are held. The presentation of a Christmas pageant has become a tradition.

The founding of the congregation at The Hague stimulated the Mennonites of Berlin, Germany, to establish a congregation (De Zondagsbode, Feb. 3, 1889). H.W.M.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 20, 30, 83, 203, 216, 314; II, Nos. 1831-32; II, 2, Nos. 45-48; DB 1880, 166; 1882, 128; 1883, 59; 1887, 149-50; 1892, 126; 1896, 36-79; 1907, 210; 1918, 52; G. ten Cate, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgez. Gemeente te 's Gravenhage (Leiden, 1896; 2d ed. The Hague, 1908; 3d ed., enlarged by H. Veth, The Hague, 1914); L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van het Kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 203-13; ML II, 160.

Hague, Sask., a town (pop. 400) about 40 miles north of Saskatoon. The railroad station was built in 1898, then in 1900 was moved half a mile north of the first site. Nearly all the first residents of Hague were Old Colony Mennonites. Ten years later people of other denominations moved in. In 1911 the Rosenort Mennonite Church was built, then enlarged in 1929 when additional settlers from Russia arrived. A Lutheran church has also been erected in the town. J.G.R.

Hague and Osler, Sask., about 12 miles apart and 30 miles from Saskatoon, were settled as a whole by Old Colony Mennonites. In 1895 the first settlers from Manitoba unloaded their belongings from the railway, for there was no station or any building in the town. Only a sign with the name Hague was to be seen. The first village was Neuanlage, 6 miles south of Hague, 5 or 10 families settling here in that year. The next villages built were Reinfeld, Hochfeld, Reinland, Blumenstein, Blumenthal, Neuhorst, Chortitza, Rosengart, Hochfeld, Osterwick, Schönwiese, Grünfeld, Grünthal. On the other side of the South Saskatchewan River is the village Edinburg. When the Mennonites from Russia came in 1923, the Old Colony Mennonites were at their height in numbers, because the majority of the children remained in the villages, the total number at Hague and Osler being about 2,000. A part of this number were Bergthaler Mennonites. Some were dissatisfied with conditions here, mainly because the German language was hard to maintain; so nearly half of the population moved to Mexico and Paraguay. The houses and land of the emigrants were then taken over by Mennonites who came from Russia in 1923 and later. J.G.R.

Hahn, Eduard von, a Russian statesman. After the death of General Insov, Czar Nikolas I appointed Eduard von Hahn, a young official of his chancellery, as president of the Fürsorgekomitee (q.v.) for the German settlers in South Russia, with its headquarters in Odessa. The emperor made this appointment in the early 1840's at the suggestion of Princess Helene Paulovna, who at the time played an important role in Russian court affairs.

The charge to Hahn included the Mennonite settlements; here he brought about order with a firm hand. He frequently removed elders from office. Thus on May 20, 1842, he deposed Elder Jakob Warkentin in Halbstadt, and informed all the congregations of this event. This deed naturally produced some disquiet among the Mennonites of Russia; for it was unheard of that a government official would so rudely meddle in church matters. But in the end the people had to yield, for Warkentin had been guilty of civil offenses in interfering in government orders, in inciting disobedience to the local civil authorities, especially in the punishment of a member of the church, for whom the elder offered to take upon himself the labor imposed upon the offender; and in illegal operations in the election of an Oberschulze, and finally in unfounded and completely untenable charges against the local government (Gebietsamt).

In 1844 Elder Peter Schmidt of Waldheim was deposed because he baptized a Lutheran boy and received him into his congregation without government permission, and because he received into his congregation members expelled from other congregations contrary to the wishes and advice of the latter.

Furthermore, in 1847 Elder Heinrich Wiens of Gnadenheim was banished over the border into Prussia, because he excommunicated three members of his congregation for inflicting corporal punishment on an offender on command of the Schulzenamt.

Eduard von Hahn early recognized the importance and capability of Johann Cornies (q.v.) and gave him far-reaching authority; thus he contributed most effectively to Cornies' reformatory work and to the rapid cultural and economic progress of the Mennonite colony on the Molotschna, as the records in the archives of the Molotschna Agricultural Association show. Hahnsau (q.v.) of the Trakt settlement was named after Hahn. (ML II, 232.)

D.H.E.

Hahn, Joh. Michael, b. Feb. 2, 1758, at Altdorf near Böblingen (Württemberg), d. Jan. 20, 1819, a simple peasant who had also learned the trades of butchering and clockmaking, the founder of the brotherhood of the "Hahnischen" or "Michelianer," and the author of a number of books explaining his speculative theosophical system of doctrine. In 1777, while working in a field, he had a vision of three hours' duration. Inwardly converted, he withdrew from all associations and attended the meeting, where he soon acquired great influence. In 1780 he had a second vision, which lasted seven weeks. He received a "central insight," and "looked into the innermost birth and heart of all things." From now on he proclaimed his doctrine as a fluent, inspiring speaker and a profound author.

After 1794 Hahn found an asylum in Sindlingen near Herrenberg on the estate of Franziska, Duchess of Hohenheim, where he devoted the rest of his life to his spiritual work. The Holy Scriptures, which were his unquestioned authority, he interpreted somewhat allegorically. The world, ruined by sin, will be transformed by the redemptive work of Christ into a spiritual body. He urged complete sanctification and separation from the world. His eschatology was especially highly developed, as well as his teachings on the first resurrection, on the places of purification and the interim state in the Beyond, on the expectation of the Antichrist, of the millennium, and the restoration of all things. He was also the author of sacred hymns. Three of his (approximately 2,000) hymns were taken into the hymnal of the South German Mennonites. The membership of the brotherhood founded by him was estimated in 1920 at about 15,000. His views were favorably received in two Mennonite congregations in Baden, Dühren (q.v.) and Heimbronnerhof (q.v.), which separated from the Verband (q.v.) in 1858. His numerous writings were posthumously published in 13 volumes (Tübingen, 1819-41). (See Michelians.)

NEFF.

Die Hahn'sche Gemeinschaft (2 ed., Stuttgart, 1949; Hahns Leben, 5-30, Hahns Lehre, 31-139); ML II, 232 f.; III, 124-26.

Hahnsau, the first village of the Trakt (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in the province of Samara, Russia, was founded in 1854 in the Malyshevka district by settlers direct from Prussia. The original village had 25 Mennonite families with a total population of 163, all farmers. The village was named after Councilor Eduard von Hahn (q.v.). The first group of settlers included a minister and two teachers. The establishment of the Hahnsau village succeeded well and rapidly, since most of the settlers were well-to-do; they had not only the 350 talers required by the Russian government of its immigrants, but also sufficient funds for building. The settlers Claas Epp, Sr., former Dorfschulze in Fürstenwerder (Danzig), and Johann Wall, a minister, had brought considerable capital with them. They were the delegates who had previously traveled to Russia to arrange the settlement with the government.

Of essential significance to the settlement and its later development were the excellent traits of character, such as diligence, of the colonists and a good business sense, as well as the education they had acquired at home. From this village the emigration to Turkestan took place in 1880 and 1881 under the leadership of Claas Epp, Jr. (q.v.), which caused the disintegration of Hahnsau. (Am Trakt, North Kildonan, 1948, 7-10; ML II, 233.)

D.H.E., C.K.

Hahnsau and Popovka Mennonite Brethren Church was located at Hahnsau (q.v.), Trakt settlement, Samara, Russia. It was begun about 1860 by B. Bekker, Jacob P. Bekker, H. Bartel, and Otto Forchhammer. In 1874 the group was accepted into the Mennonite Brethren Conference as the Hahnsau and Popovka M.B. Church. Hahnsau was a village of the Trakt Mennonite settlement and Popovka was a Lutheran village in the vicinity. It was here that differences of opinion existed as to whether the Holy Kiss (q.v.) or Sister Kiss was to be practiced between brethren and sisters. Among the leaders were Eckert (q.v.), Hahnhart, and Borchdorf. The first two were leaders also in Kansas. In the 1870's most of them came to Kansas, settling near Marion, where some of them joined the Mennonite Brethren Church and others the Baptist Church. Those remaining in Russia joined the Baptists. By 1885 the Hahnsau and Popovka Mennonite Brethren Church no longer existed. However, a new Mennonite Brethren group has apparently been started there in later years, about which little information is available. Before World War I, itinerant Mennonite Brethren ministers visited the settlement and organized an M.B. group.

C.K.

P. M. Friesen, Brüderschaft, 429 f.; Am Trakt (North Kildonan, 1949) 49 f.; Jacob P. Bekker, "Anfänge der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde in Russland" (manuscript in BeCL).

Hainaut (Dutch, Henegouwen; German, Hennegau), now a province of Belgium. Although records of Anabaptists here are sparse, many Anabaptists must have lived here in the first decades of the Reformation. In 1535 about 1,000 inhabitants of Hainaut were prepared to take part in the attack on Amsterdam; nothing more is known about them. The only recorded execution of a Hainaut citizen was that of Cortoys, who was beheaded in Utrecht on June 11, 1539.

It is very probable that most of the Anabaptists here as elsewhere joined the Calvinists, for when persecution began anew about 1550, it was mostly Calvinists who were executed in Doornik (Tournai) and Mons (Bergen). But between 1551 and 1557 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized here; hence there must have been some Anabaptists. In Doornik he baptized 31 persons. Through his visit the number of Anabaptists grew again. They also became better known thereby, for persecution soon struck them. In addition to the many Calvinists who suffered a martyr's death, it is also reported that six Anabaptists were burned at the stake in Hainaut in 1558: Lambert van Doornik, Adriaen van Hee, Joos Meeuwesz, Egbert Goossen, and Willem de Hoedemaker. The first was a native of Doornik; the others were Flemish. They had attended an Anabaptist meeting in the woods of Obignies, and when they were seized they yielded without resistance. They were executed in Obignies. In Mons, the capital of the province, Jan Fasseau of Giory was beheaded in 1555 or 1556 for the sake of his Anabaptist faith. One of the last Anabaptist martyrs in Hainaut was Maeyken Boosers (q.v.), who was burned at the stake at Doornik, Sept. 18, 1564.

After this there is no further mention of Anabaptists; but the Protestants here were so severely persecuted that according to the memoirs of van Vaernewyck the city of Doornik was practically deserted in July 1568. The books of martyrs present only a partial list of the victims; 30 are named there, whereas recent research has revealed that by 1570 at least 227 persons had been killed in Doornik for their faith.
J.L.

Mart. Mir. D. 302-4, E. 667-69; F. vander Haeghen, Th. Arnold, and R. vanden Berghe, Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Neerlandais II, 663, 683, 699, 703, 739; Meyhoffer, Le Martyrologe Protestant de Pays-Bas, index, "Hainaut"; Vos, K., Menno Simons (Leiden, 1912) 258; ML II, 284.

Haintzeman, Konrad, a cobbler by trade, a preacher of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia, was captured in 1558 in Stain near Krems, Austria, on the Danube, when he was about to go to Moravia from Germany with a company of brethren, and was taken to Vienna, where he spent more than a year in terrible imprisonment. Bishop Anton Brus wished to have him executed in secret, since he refused to renounce his faith; but on the intercession of the Lutheran pastor Pfausinger, who had learned of the preparations, King Maximilian released him. He went to his brethren in Moravia; in 1560 he was chosen preacher and two years later ordained in this service. He died eight years later, in 1568, in the thermal springs of Teplice in Hungary, where he sought a cure for the ills acquired during his imprisonment. He is the author of two epistles written to the elders in 1558.
Neff.

John Horsch, Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten (Elkhart, 1890) 129; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 210, 214, 219; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 300; ML II, 233.

Hairdressing. The more conservative Mennonite groups have shown during their history a marked resistance to cultural accommodation to the surrounding society's mores, conventions, and fashions. They based this nonconformity to the "world" upon such Biblical passages as "Be not conformed to this world." In both Europe and America there has been conviction against the cutting ("bobbing") of women's hair in the decades following World War I. This conviction was based in part on deep-seated aversion to any sort of conforming to the fashions of the "world," and in part on the specific reference of the Apostle Paul concerning a Christian woman's hair being "shorn," indicating that this constitutes a "shame" (I Cor. 11:6), and that woman's long hair was given to her (by God) for a "covering" (I Cor. 11:15). Such Mennonites not only object to cut hair, however, but also to all forms of highly artificial and fashionable coiffures, basing their position on the teaching of the Scriptures against worldly conformity in general, and on such passages in particular as I Tim. 2:9 and I Pet. 3:3, both of which condemn the arrangement of the hair in what J. B. Phillips renders "an elaborate coiffure." In the stricter groups such as the Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonites, the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde), any marked deviation from what the church regards as acceptable hairdressing would involve church censure and exclusion from the Lord's Table and ultimately excommunication. In the Mennonite Church (MC) efforts are made by public teaching and pastoral counsel to secure a more perfect conformity to the standards of the group in regard to hairdressing. In the other Mennonite branches the matter of a woman's coiffure is regarded basically as her private concern, although the church is concerned to teach the principle of nonconformity to the world. The conservative groups in Canada, however, still maintain the older forms of hairdressing. In Switzerland there is strong resistance to the cutting of woman's hair, and to a lesser degree in France and the more conservative churches of South Germany.
J.C.W.

Haitjema, a Dutch Mennonite family, living at Balk, Friesland, where Klaas Haitzes (Haitjema) and Tjeerd Haitjema were among the last lay preachers and elders, Klaas serving 1809-ca. 40 and Tjeerd 1829-49. The Balk (q.v.) congregation maintained the old Mennonite manner of living and dressing until a large proportion of its members left for America in 1854. Tjiets Haitjema (1853-1939) (DB 1902, 26-28, where her picture is found), married to G. van der Sluys, wore her plain dress until 1872. Another member of this family is Th. L. Haitjema, now Reformed Professor of Theology at the University of Groningen. vdZ.

Halberstadt, a city in the former Prussian government district of Magdeburg, where there was in 1535 a small congregation of Anabaptist refugees from the territories of Duke George of Saxony. Two families settled here in 1535; their leader was Georg Knoblauch. He collected a small group of men and women, including Hans Heune (or Höhne) of Seehausen near Frankenhausen, Christoph Thalacker, Georg Möller, Hans Birkhan, and Hans Hesse of Riestedt, several of whom died as martyrs. Services were held in Knoblauch's house in the Willows behind the cathedral at Halberstadt. Here transient brethren also found shelter.

The Brethren here were truly pious. The official, Heinrich Horn, who listened in on one of their meetings and gave a report to the bishop's authorities on Sept. 9, 1535, said, "Within a mysterious murmuring is held; it was not possible to understand what it was, since it took place behind barred doors and closed windows. The men occasionally came into the yard, knelt and prayed with folded hands." Petronella, a woman who was arrested later, stated, "The brethren and sisters prayed four times daily, also before and after meals. They usually get up twice at night to pray and praise God." At the communion service, which was held a short time before the harvest, the preacher washed the feet of the participants and kissed them; each broke off a bit of the bread, ate it in commemoration of the death of Christ, and confessed that he would gladly die for His sake. Whoever considered himself unworthy of the meal did not take part. Baptism was also performed in Knoblauch's house; thus on July 10, 1535, he baptized Hans Heune's wife Grete, Hans Kraut (the tailor), the brothers Georg and Jobst Möller, as well as Wolf Goldener. Even weddings were performed in the quiet little house; there is record of that of Georg Knoblauch's daughter Ursula with Hans Möller.

The Anabaptists in Halberstadt are sad evidence of the difficulty and danger attending membership in an untolerated brotherhood in the 16th century. To escape persecution they lived under the open sky and the forest wilderness. In order not to subject their children to the inclement weather and to give their women the necessary care in confinement they sought protection in the city. When the owner of the "house among the willows" learned that an infant born there was not baptized, she dispossessed the group. They then found refuge in the unoccupied Grauer Hof in Halberstadt in mid-August. But on Sept. 13 the police found two women, Anna Knoblauch and Grete Heune, with six children; soon they also seized Hans Heune, who had just returned home, and Petronella, a baker's wife, who had been baptized five years previously by the schoolmaster Alexander (executed in 1533).

The prisoners openly confessed their faith. Nevertheless they were tried under torture on the orders of the cardinal. On Sept. 20 Adrian Henckel (also called Adrian Richter) and Anna Reichard (Hermann Gerucher's wife) were also arrested. Since the prisoners refused to renounce their faith, Bishop Heinrich von Ackon decided to have various scholars attempt to convert them. They had partial success. Two mothers of newborn babies agreed to recant, probably to preserve the lives of their children, while Adrian Henckel and Hans Heune, as well as Petronella, persisted in their faith and declared to the judges that they were happy to suffer death for Christ's sake. On Oct. 8 Cardinal Albrecht gave the secular authorities the order to sentence them to death; they were to be taken to Gröningen, placed in a sack, and drowned; they were then to be interred in unhallowed ground by the executioner. HEGE.

The statements of the victims have been published by E. Jacobs in "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harz-Vereins für Gesch. u. Altertumskunde XXXII (1899); see also P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913); ML II, 233 f.

Halbertsma (Halbetsma), a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly living in the province of Friesland, now spread throughout the Netherlands. From the side of the mother this family became Mennonite. Dr. Scipio Halbetsma, a lawyer at the Court of Friesland, in 1669 married Catharina Rinia Stinstra (Mennonite) of Dokkum (daughter of Joost Rinia and Antje Hendricksz Stinstra). Their son Hidde Halbetsma (1685-1762) was a silversmith and a member of the congregation of Gorredijk (q.v.). Their son Joost (1723-88), b. at Gorredijk, moved to Grouw (q.v.), where this family resided for many generations and where are still found the Halbertsma woodworking factories. Joost's son was Hidde (1756-1809), a merchant and officer of a volunteer corps. This Hidde was the father of Pastor Joost Halbertsma (q.v., 1789-1869). Like him his brothers Tjalling (1792-1852), a merchant, and Eeltje (1797-1877), a physician, both living at Grouw, were active in promoting the Frisian language and culture. Their popular literary work in the Frisian language was compiled in the collection of Rimen en Teltsjes (Rhymes and Tales), of which a fifth edition appeared at Leeuwarden in 1918.

These Halbertsma brothers have a large progeny, many of whom served in several Mennonite congregations as deacons. Lieuwe E. Halbertsma (b. 1824 at Grouw, d. Lippspringe, Germany, 1854), a son of Tjalling, mentioned before, went into the ministry after having been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. He served the congregations of Ternaard 1850 and Emden, East Friesland, 1850-54. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat V, 1914, 172-81; XII, 1921-22, 206-17; XI, 1925, 135 f.; XL, 1954, 174-98.

Halbertsma, Justus Hiddes, b. Oct. 23, 1789, at Grouw, d. Feb. 14, 1869, at Deventer, served as Mennonite pastor at Bolsward 1814-21, and Deventer 1821-56, when he resigned to devote himself to writing. One of his works was De Doopsgezinden en Hunne herkomst (Deventer, 1843), in which he attempted to prove a Waldensian origin for the Mennonites. The book is of value for its information on the liberal ideas of Halbertsma and many Mennonites of his time. The book also contained some sermons, which were sharply criticized by Samuel Muller in the Dutch periodical Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen of 1843 and 1844 (reprint, Beoordeeling van eenige Kerkredenen van J. H. H., Amsterdam, 1844).

Halbertsma studied the Nordic languages, especially his native Frisian, and became a specialist on Gysbert Japiex (1603-66), a Frisian poet. He cooperated with his brothers Eeltje, who was a physician in Grouw, and Tjalling, in publishing Frisian verse and tales, which were eagerly read and thus influenced Frisian life. He also translated the Gospel of Matthew into Frisian (1858). The complete Frisian works of the Halbertsma brothers were published in 1871 titled Rimen en Teltsjes (5th ed., Leeuwarden, 1918). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2530; Biogr. Wb. III, 457-61; W. Eekhoff, biography of Halbertsma in De Frije Fries, 1873; N.N.B.Wb. III, 528 ff.; DB 1901, passim; DJ 1912, 21-41 with portrait; Wumkes, introduction to Rimen en Teltjes (5th ed., Leeuwarden, 1918); ML II, 234.

Halbstadt, a common Mennonite village name transplanted from the Prussian Marienburg Werder to the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. The name also appears in the following settlements: Barnaul, Siberia; Manitoba; Mexico; and Menno, Neuland, and Sommerfeld settlement of Villarrica, Paraguay. C.K.

Halbstadt, village and district of the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement in South Russia, was founded in 1804 together with eight other villages by Mennonites emigrating from Prussia and was named after a village in Prussia. Leaders were Klaas Wiens and David Hübert. Originally the village owned 3,829 acres of land or 21 full farms with 189 acres each; later 945 additional acres, or 25 small farms of 38 acres each were added. (A. Braun states that Halbstadt owned about 5,500 acres.) The importance of the town within the Molotschna villages lay at first in the fact that it was made the seat of the district administration (1816) of the Molotschna settlement.

Of the 60 Mennonite villages of the Molotschna settlement, Halbstadt had the largest number of industries. In the course of time there developed, in addition to the smaller shops, a cloth factory (1815-16), a brewery (1809), three vinegar factories, two large steam-power mills, a starch factory, a barley mill, a motor factory, two tile factories, two oil presses, and the "Raduga" print shop. In connection with this growing industry, Neu-Halbstadt (q.v.), an adjacent workers' settlement, was established in 1842.

Of special cultural significance for the Mennonites of South Russia were, next to the elementary school, the Halbstadt Zentralschule (q.v. founded 1835), which was the teacher-training institute, the Halbstadt Kommerzschule (q.v., founded 1907), and the Halbstadt Mädchenschule (q.v.). The Kommerzschule was originally a Realschule, and after the Revolution it became an agricultural school (1923).

Originally made up of only Mennonite families, Halbstadt gradually took in various elements of the population in consequence of the addition of factory workers and the Revolution. Even before the Revolution, non-Mennonites were in the majority. After the Revolution it became difficult for the Mennonite minority to assert its social and cultural character. The total population was 1,455 in 1925, of whom 482 were Mennonites, 118 other Germans, 675 Ukrainians, 120 Russians, 19 Jews, and 41 Poles, Bulgarians, and Greeks.

Under the Soviets all industries of Halbstadt as well as the land were nationalized. The collectivization process and the antireligious policies caused the exile of many Mennonites. During the outbreak of hostilities between Russia and Germany in World War II many were evacuated to Siberia. Those remaining left Russia for Germany in a trek under German army escort in 1943. Many of the Halbstadt citizens who escaped from Russia after World Wars I and II have found new homes in Canada and South America. (See also Molotschna, Halbstadt Mennonite Church, and Ukraine; ML II, 234 f.) Abr.K., C.K.

Halbstadt Kommerzschule (School of Commerce), Molotschna, South Russia, was established as a private Realschule in 1907 sponsored by the Mennonite Educational Association (Mennonitischer Schulverein). Since it was under the supervision of the Russian Department of Education the name was changed to "Kommerzschule des Mennonitischen Bildungsvereins" in order to enjoy greater freedom and flexibility under the Department of Commerce. It retained the curriculum of the Realschule and added a year and some commercial subjects to the curriculum. Students from the regular Zentralschulen (q.v.) could enter a preparatory class of the school. The school consisted of the upper four grades of a regular Russian eight-grade school of commerce. Two foreign languages were taught. In 1910 the enrollment was 124. The school occupied the former starch factory of Halbstadt and had a dormitory for students from distant communities. The director of the school was chosen by the executive committee of the Educational Association (Bildungsverein) and approved by the Department of Commerce. In the early days J. J. Sudermann of Apanlee was the chairman of the executive committee and P. J. Wiens the director of the school. Some of the teachers were A. A. Friesen, P. P. Letkemann, and B. H. Unruh.

During the revolution and the following years the school went through great difficulties. In 1923 it was changed into an agricultural school. C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, Man., 1951) 160; P. M. Friesen, Brüderschaft, 627 ff.; Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 28.

Halbstadt Mennonite Church was originally a part of the Ohrloff-Petershagen Mennonite Church (q.v.) of the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, with one church at Ohrloff and one at Petershagen. The first two elders were Jakob Enns 1805-18, and Jakob Fast 1818-21. From this, the oldest congregation of the Molotschna, the "pure Flemish" congregation of Lichtenau, with strongly conservative tendencies, separated about 1824 under the leadership of Jakob Warkentin. The remnant of the congregation under the leadership of Elder Bernhard Fast retained its name (Ohrloff-Petershagen) until 1858, when a new church was built in Halbstadt (Neu-Halbstadt) to replace the old one in Petershagen, and the congregation was called Ohrloff-Halbstadt. From 1863, when a third church was built in Neukirch for the benefit of distant members, until 1895, it was known as Ohrloff-Halbstadt-Neukirch. The three elders who had charge of the congregation during this time were Bernhard Fast 1821-60, Johann Harder 1860-76, and Abram Görz 1876-95. In 1860-84 the congregation had in its midst Bernhard Harder (q.v.), a warmly revivalistic preacher, teacher, and poet, and one of the most important pulpit orators among the Mennonites of Russia, known far beyond his own congregation.

In the course of three decades the three parts of the congregation had grown to such proportions that it was difficult for the single elder, Abram Görz, to give it the necessary spiritual leadership. When he resigned in 1895 the Halbstadt group followed its long-cherished desire for independence, and with the consent of the Molotschna Mennonite Kirchenkonvent (q.v.) it organized as a separate congregation. The choice of elder in that year fell almost unanimously upon Heinrich Unruh (q.v.) of Muntau, who had served them as minister since 1870. He served as elder 20 additional years (to 1915), until his physical weakness prevented his further service in the office. He died in 1927. The local minister, B. Harder, was then given temporary charge. In 1918 Abraham Klassen (q.v.), who had hitherto been a minister of the Gnadenfeld congregation and a teacher in the Halbstadt schools, was chosen elder and served the congregation until 1930. He died in exile. The membership reached its highest point in 1910-19. Since then it decreased by about one third through emigration to Canada and the loss of the members living outside the Molotschna district. In 1926 the total membership was about 1,200, of whom 653 were baptized members.

The Halbstadt congregation had been leading in singing among the churches of the Molotschna. In 1919 Heinz Unruh, a son of Elder Unruh, a musically very gifted young man, became leader of the church choir. With youthful enthusiasm he reorganized and enlarged the choir and soon oratorios by Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn were sung at the Halbstadt church. The choir also made frequent singing tours to other churches of the Molotschna.

In 1921 the Halbstadt Mennonite church building became state property, but even now for a while services went on unmolested. After 1927 religious persecution gradually set in, taxes on churches and ministers became increasingly severe, so that at last church activities became almost impossible. But in spite of all difficulties services at the Halbstadt church continued until January 1931, when on New Year's Day the last service was held, and the church was officially closed by the government. The two ministers, Klassen and Harder, were arrested by the local authorities. For several weeks they were imprisoned at Halbstadt and then tried. Harder was sentenced to banishment to Siberia, but fell ill and died one day before the execution of his sentence. Klassen was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment in Melitopol. After three years he was released, but in 1941 was again arrested, and sentenced to Siberia, but died on the way in a freight car. In 1938 the Halbstadt church building was torn down and the bricks used for other buildings. The cemetery across the street from the church with its many beautiful marble monuments was also demolished and the grounds used for other purposes. An adopted daughter of Abraham Klassen is now living at Winnipeg, Man.

In its relationship to other congregations of the Molotschna settlement the Halbstadt congregation represented a moderate position and always defended the right of other groups to be independent in doctrine and organization, and had leaders who willingly granted the right of freedom and tolerance to other branches. In the period of confusion attending the withdrawal of the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) it could therefore preserve a calm, thoughtful position and lend a hand of mediation. As a matter of principle it did not rebaptize persons transferring their membership from other Christian denominations. The fact that Elder H. Unruh, who was always above party spirit and of a very pacific temperament, was the chairman of the Molotschna Mennonite Kirchenkonvent for more than a decade made itself felt and prepared the way for an understanding between the various branches. (See also Halbstadt, Molotschna, and Ukraine; ML II, 235 f.) ABR.K., C.K.

Halbstadt Zentralschule, Molotschna, Russia, founded in 1835, was the second Mennonite secondary school in Russia. The initiative for the founding of the school was given by Faddeyev of the Department for Foreign Settlers to train teachers, secretaries, and to promote the Russian language among the Mennonites. Orphans and children of poor parents received free training, for which they were obligated to serve the community for pay for a number of years. At first the school was dependent on the Oberschulze of the district and the level of education was rather low (1835-70). Among the teachers of this period were Johann Neufeld, Abraham Ediger I, Johann Voth, Peter J. Neufeld, Jacob Wiebe, and Gustav Rempel. Some of the outstanding graduates during this time were Daniel Fast, Johann Claassen, and Bernhard Harder.

In 1869 the school became subject to the newly organized Molotschna school board (Molotschnaer Mennoniten Schulrat). Before this time the school offered a two-class course consisting of four years. Now two years were added. The graduates received a certificate. The standard of education was raised considerably. In 1878 a two-year teachers' training course was added. The Neu-Halbstadt elementary school became the "model school" (Musterschule) in which the students did their practice teaching beginning in 1879-80. The two basic classes (Grundklassen) of the Zentralschule, consisting of two years each, were changed into three-class courses, each consisting of a year (1884-85). Some of the outstanding teachers before World War I were Kornelius Unruh, Peter J. Neufeld, P. M. Friesen, Heinrich Franz II, H. A. Lenzmann, P. A. Ediger, D. H. Hamm, W. P. Neufeld, P. P. Fast, Cornelius Bergmann, D. J. Klassen, Hermann Penner, Abraham Klassen, Abraham Töws, and P. J. Braun.

In the beginning Russian had been taught as a foreign language. Around 1890 all subjects except the German course and Bible were taught in Russian. After the Russian Revolution (1917) all subjects with the exception of the Russian and the Ukrainian languages and literature were taught in German. In 1921 the Teachers' Training Institute was perfected and became known as the Molotschnaer Mennonitisches Lehrerseminar. Teachers at this time were P. J. Braun, Peter Epp, Aaron Toews, P. P. Sawatzky, B. B. Wiens, and Abraham Klassen. Its director, P. J. Braun, reported in 1922 that 400 teachers had been graduated during the period of 44 years (since 1878) and that they were serving in most of the Mennonite settlements of European and Asiatic Russia. Many of them were ordained to the ministry or were leaders in the economic and cultural life of the Mennonites. After the Revolution the school fought a losing battle with the Communist government and philosophy. Gradually most of the teachers were forced to resign; many left for America, others were exiled, and a few managed to find other occupations. The Halbstadt Mennonite Zentralschule and the Teachers' Training Institute did much to raise the spiritual, cultural, and economic level of the Mennonites of Russia. (See also Education Among the Mennonites in Russia and Zentralschule.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 596-612; P. Braun, "The Educational System of the Mennonite Colonies in South Russia," MQR III (1929) 168-82; P. Braun, "Das Molotschnaer Mennonitische Lehrerseminar in Halbstadt, 1878-1922," manuscript, Bethel College Historical Library; Leonhard Froese, Das Pädagogische Kultursystem der mennonitischen Siedlungsgruppe in Russland (Göttingen, 1949).

Haldimand County, Ont., is situated 50 miles southeast of Waterloo County, at the outlet of the Grand River into Lake Erie. Across Lake Erie to the south can be seen the ridge of Pennsylvania bordering the lake near Erie City. Having a heavy clay soil in many parts, it is suited to the cultivation of grain, hay, and livestock. It was one of the earliest Mennonite settlements of Ontario. To this area came the Hoovers (Hubers) about 1790, from York Co., Pa., or near Gettysburg. Fuller accounts will be found under Rainham, South Cayuga, Selkirk (MC). J.C.F.

Halewijn (French, Halluin), a town (pop. 13,000) just across the Belgian border in northern France, which in the 16th century belonged to the Southern Netherlands, was the scene of Anabaptist activity in the middle of that century. In 1561 there seems to have been a congregation here, several members of which were executed in 1563 (see Jan de Swarte). vdZ.

Half-Anabaptists, people (mainly of Switzerland) who sympathized with the Swiss Brethren and supported them without, however, themselves ever joining their brotherhood. "Great is the number of those who are suspended between heaven and earth, and know not what to do," writes a Bernese observer around 1690. As is well known the Swiss authorities harshly persecuted the Brethren throughout the country, in particular in the canton of Bern. These persecutions, however, were by no means popular, as it was widely known that the Brethren were as good, if not better, Christians than the majority. Thus many people helped them, gave them food and shelter, and shielded them against the official "Anabaptist hunters" (Täufer-Jäger), often endangering themselves. Bernese mandates expressly condemned and threatened these "sympathizers."

The Brethren themselves were split in their attitude toward these friends, or "true-hearted people" (die Treuherzigen) as they called them. In the Amish split of 1693 the Reist people contended that the "true-hearted ones" would be saved, while Jakob Ammann in his unyielding sternness denied this (MQR 1937, 244, note 29). In contemporary literature these Half-Anabaptists are occasionally mentioned. George Thorman's Probierstein des Täufertums (q.v., Bern, 1693), though it was a polemical book against the Anabaptists, still had to admit that the Brethren were highly thought of by the population at large. "They [the Half-Anabaptists] remain with us," he writes, meaning with the established church, "but they are fully persuaded that it would be better for them to cast their lot with the Anabaptists." If they refrained from doing so, it was because of fear, as they were not ready to accept suffering and tribulation.

Around 1700 Hans Reist (q.v.), the leader of the milder branch of the Swiss Brethren, composed and published a prayer, Das Gebätt, in which we read, "We also pray to Thee on behalf of all those people who do so much good unto us with food and drink and house and shelter, and who produce and show unto us great love and loyalty" (Friedmann, Menn. Piety, 185). Again we read in the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.), the first complete Mennonite prayerbook of 1739, several such prayers for the Half-Anabaptists, "the goodhearted people who love us and do good unto us and show mercy, but have little strength to come into the obedience of God" (ibid., 191-212). Such supplications are made at six places.

That in spite of all the superhuman hardships the Brethren were never completely exterminated in Switzerland is at least in part due to the efforts of these Half-Anabaptists. R.F.

John Horsch, "The Half-Anabaptists of Switzerland," MQR XIV (1940) 57-59; D. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 49; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 185, 191; M. Gascho, "The Amish Division of 1693," MQR XI (1937) 244; ML II, 234.

Hall (or Schwäbisch-Hall), a city (pop. 15,165) of Württemberg, Germany, 35 miles northeast of Stuttgart, charmingly situated on the Kocher, with its splendid church of St. Michael. Until 1504 Hall was ecclesiastically a subsidiary of Steinbach, which belonged to the Komburg monastery, but it had an independent right in the preaching office, to which Johannes Brenz (q.v.) was called in 1523. Together with his friend Johann Isenmann, who was called to the pastorate in 1524, Brenz effected the Reformation in the city. Judging from the funeral address of Bidembach, the Anabaptists in the region of Hall caused them some concern. But the only one known by name is Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who worked for the Anabaptist movement from Livland, Kiel, and East Friesland to Strasbourg and there died in prison. The council of Hall issued a mandate to warn its subjects of the leaven of the Anabaptists; this was surely done at Brenz's instigation. In 1530 Hall could venture to write to the emperor that with true diligence and God's aid they had averted the Anabaptist sect (Hortmann und Jäger, I, 290).

The statement made by the Chronicler Herolt that in 1534 many peasants with their families, who had been Anabaptist adherents, had emigrated to Moravia in the hope that they might there become better Christians (Württembergische Geschichtsquellen I, 255) evidently had reference to those who came into the Rhine region from the Palatinate, concerning whose migration Kirchberg reports (see Hohenlohe), rather than to peasants of Hall. The isolated case of Katherine Höffmann of Reinsberg as an Anabaptist is mentioned in 1555 (Gmelin, Hallische Geschichte, 736). Her kinship with Melchior Hofmann, which Gmelin assumes, is very unlikely. On the other hand, there are indications that the Hutterian Brethren sent men into the Hall region to gain adherents for their brotherhood. The Geschichts-Bücher records on p. 235, "In this year Brother Paul Schuester, a preacher, fell asleep with a peaceful heart in the district of Hall." Paul Schu(e)ster had been chosen to the ministry in 1551. There is no information concerning later Anabaptists in the district. It is very likely that there were none. G. Bos.

G. Bossert, Sr., TA:I: Württemberg; G. Bossert, Jr., "Aus der nebenkirchl.-relig. Bewegung der Ref.-Zeit in Württemberg (Wiedertäufer und Schwenckfelder)," in Bl. f. Württemb. Kirchengesch., 1929, 1-41; J. Hartmann and K. Jäger, Johannes Brenz I (Hamburg, 1840) 290; J. Gmelin, Hallische Geschichte, 735 ff.; ML II, 236.

Hall (now called Solbad Hall), a city (pop. 10,535) in the lower Inn Valley, Tirol, Austria, the old capital of the Inn Valley, the seat of the district court, on the left bank of the Inn, 20 miles east of Innsbruck, with which it carries on a lively trade. It has a rich past in the history of Anabaptism in Tirol, which has been better preserved in archive materials than in the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren. In 1521 Dr. Jakob Strauss was already working to reform the ceremonies and practices of the church, preaching against corruption in the confessional, calling the monks misleaders of the world; but he was not in agreement with the Wittenberg Reformation either. His successor Urban Rhegius also worked with the same idea; thus the Anabaptists in Hall and vicinity found a well-prepared field.

Not only Hall, but also the suburb Mild soon became a center of the Anabaptist movement. The martyr list of the chronicles, to be sure, records only two executions, whereas 68 are recorded for Kitzbühel. The movement evidently moved from Hall to other places which seemed safer at the moment. The town on the Inn also attracted them as the route of many Anabaptists on their way to Moravia. Loserth.

J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892); G. Loesche, "Tirolensia, Täufertum und Protestantismus," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Gesch. des Protestantismus in Oesterreich XLVII (1926); ML II, 236.

Hallau, a village in the Klettgau district of the canton of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, not far from Waldshut, since 1525 a possession of the city of Schaffhausen. During the period 1524-25 it was subject to a variety of revolutionary and Anabaptist ideas. It took the lead in the revolt of the Schaffhausen peasants. Hans Rüeger, the cabinetmaker of Hallau, was active here in promulgating the ideas of Thomas Müntzer, who had come into the territory near by in the fall of 1524; he advocated community of goods and took part in the peasant disturbances. In a later court trial he admitted that he had desired that the peasants should be on top and the lords underneath.

It is difficult to say to what degree the true Anabaptist movement was involved in the uprising of the Klettgau peasants. On Feb. 5, 1525, Johannes Brötli (q.v.) preached in Hallau for the first time. He is no doubt the founder of an Anabaptist congregation of the Zürich type. He had signed the letter of Grebel and the Zürich Brethren to Müntzer in which they protested against the use of force. His letters to the Brethren in Zollikon indicate that he preached the Gospel as interpreted by the Zürich Anabaptists, who certainly had no part in revolutionary activities. His preaching, however, no doubt contributed to the intensification of the hopes of the peasants for better conditions in the future. The city of Schaffhausen, at the request of Zürich, sought to arrest Brötli, but the peasants forcibly prevented this, apparently considering Brötli as their leader. Almost the entire population of the village was baptized by him. The Anabaptist movement continued strongly for a time. On Nov. 13, 1527, Hans Rüeger was executed as an Anabaptist. By 1529 the majority of the people are reported to have returned to the church, but in 1531 again we find the list of Hallau people who were fined because of attendance at Anabaptist meetings. Thereafter the traces of the movement became progressively weaker. In 1534 there was some discussion in the Schaffhausen council concerning Anabaptists. Later a George Sattler of Oberhallau appears in the report of a Zürich trial of 1548 as an Anabaptist preacher and leader of secret meetings in the Klettgau. Nothing further is known about the movement here. L.v.M.

H. Nabholz, Die Bauernbewegung in der Ostschweiz (Bülach, 1828); C. Bächtold, Die Schaffhauser Wiedertäufer (Schaffhausen, 1900); ML II, 236 f.

Halle, Bartholomeus van: see Bartel Boeckbinder.

Haller, Berchthold (1492-1536), the reformer of the Swiss canton of Bern, was of a gentle disposition, which he also revealed to the Swiss Brethren. He insisted that it was impossible to eradicate error; that should be left to God. Persecution merely increased the following of the Anabaptists. He therefore wanted to grant them religious freedom if they would be quiet, and punish only those who created a public disturbance. To Zwingli he wrote in 1527: "We know, of course, that the council is quite ready to banish the Anabaptists. But it is in our place to judge all things with the sword of the Spirit, either from the pulpit or in conversation." The council, however, disregarded Haller's admonitions and had two Anabaptists drowned in the Aare in 1529 or 1530 (Thudichum, 225). He also took part in the discussion with the baker Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.). To Zwingli he wrote that he could not convince himself that it was permissible to punish Anabaptists with the sword, so much the less because they strictly avoided wickedness, whereas so many even of the ruling men were, on the contrary, so indifferent and careless (Müller, Berner Täufer, 24).

Haller states his attitude toward the Anabaptists still more clearly in a letter to Bullinger, Nov. 16, 1534 (see the letter of Sept. 12, 1532). He says that he had been requested by the city of Bern to offer an opinion on the suppression of the Anabaptists. They had expected that he would sponsor the death penalty, but he could not do this. He pointed out to the council the basis of the evil namely, that when many preachers serve their belly more than their duty, it is not surprising that we are called false prophets; when one sees in the magistracy so much pomp, luxury, and greed, and such disregard of the divine Word, the simpler folk are easily persuaded that we have an unchristian government; when false oaths are not punished and offensive cursing is tolerated, it is easy to see why they do violence to the Scripture in forbidding all oaths; when one sees the young people, whose baptism is demanded, growing up in all evil, they can easily decide to reject infant baptism. He had long since proposed that one should not be so quick to shed Anabaptist blood, while the Papists, who do much more harm to the temporal and Christian state, are spared.

Such a gentle and friendly judgment of the Anabaptists and the reasons for the movement was quite extraordinary. Yet Haller was unable to prevent a relatively large number of Anabaptist executions in Bern. His was a yielding temperament, which was almost dominated by Zwingli. One of his great services for the introduction of the Reformation was his participation in the great Bern disputation of Jan. 6 to 26, 1528. NEFF.

Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); H. Hoffmann, Reformation und Gewissensfreiheit (Giessen, 1932) 22, 37; C. Pestalozzi, Berthold Haller (Elberfeld, 1861); ML II, 237.

Hallman, Eli S. (1866-1955), a prominent Mennonite (MC) bishop in Saskatchewan, born near Washington, Waterloo Co., Ont., married Melinda Clemens in 1893, had seven children (beyond infancy). Ordained to the Mennonite ministry on June 17, 1897, he served the First Mennonite Church, Kitchener, Ont., until 1905, when he was sent to Guernsey, Sask., as pastor of the newly founded Mennonite settlement there, the Sharon Mennonite Church, and bishop of all the Mennonite congregations in the Canadian West. In 1912 he moved to Goshen, Ind., to serve as financial field secretary for Goshen College, which post he held till 1916. Following this he lived for two years at Grand Bay, Ala., near Gulfport, Miss., then until 1920 at Allemands, La., in both places assisting new congregations. In 1920-28 he served again at Guernsey, then at Falfurrias, Tex., 1928-32, and at Tuleta, Tex., 1932-50, until his retirement to Akron, Pa. H.S.B.

E. S. Hallman, The Hallman-Clemens Genealogy with a Family's Reminiscence (Tuleta, 1949), largely autobiographical.

Hallman, H. S. (1859-1932), U.M.C. minister and editor, was born Aug. 5, 1859, near Kitchener, Ont. On Feb. 18, 1881, he married Maria Rosenberger, to which union nine children were born. Converted at the age of 14, he entered the ministry in 1881, and was ordained in 1885 by the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church. He held pastorates at Port Elgin and Elmwood, Ont.

Elected editor of the Gospel Banner in 1888, Hallman served in this capacity for 20 years, and also as publisher from 1899 to 1908. Under his leadership the paper became a weekly publication in 1893. He also published several tracts, books, hymnbooks, and periodicals, and became the founder and first publisher of the Scripture Text Calendar which he continued to edit until his death in 1932.

Hallman was secretary-treasurer of the Ontario Conference Mission Board 1898-1910, and president 1910-17. He was the first president of the Ontario Conference city mission work. He was secretary of the Ontario conference for 15 years and also secretary of five general conferences of the denomination (1888-1904 inclusive).

In the latter part of his life Hallman became active in the Christian and Missionary Alliance, although retaining his membership in the United Missionary Church. For some years he was superintendent of the C.M.A. publishing business in New York City, later serving as pastor of Alliance churches in Brantford and Toronto, Ont. He died in Toronto on Oct. 13, 1932. E.R.S.

Hallum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, not far from the North Sea, since the 16th century the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Anabaptism was rooted here already in the earliest period; the martyr Frans Claesz (q.v.), executed in 1539 at Leeuwarden, and also the martyr Joriaen Simonsz (q.v.), who is said to be from Hallmen in Friesland, burned at the stake at Haarlem in 1557, were natives of this town. In 1568-82 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized here no fewer than 226 persons. The Mennonite congregation, however, at this time had its center not in Hallum, but in Hijum, about 1½ miles west of Hallum. Of its oldest history very little is known. It did not join the Mennonite Sociëteit (Conference) of Friesland when this was founded in 1695. In 1713 it numbered only about 15 members. In 1779 the old meetinghouse at Hijum was abandoned and a new one built at Hallum, because most members now lived in this town. Then the congregation was called Hallum. From about 1604 until about the beginning of the 18th century there was in addition a second congregation at Hallum, belonging to the Jan Jacobsz group (q.v.). Between 1604 and 1643 the traveling elders of this group baptized 159 persons at Hallum, but since then no traces any more are found of the Jan Jacobsz group at Hallum. Its last members may have merged with the congregation of Hijum, which joined the Mennonite Conference of Friesland in 1713 as a united congregation. Even after its transfer to Hallum the congregation did not prosper, remaining very small in membership—20 in 1838, 88 in 1861. The last untrained preacher was Johannes Uiltjes Stinne, a cobbler. He served 1783-1818 and was followed by Roelof Schuiling, serving 1818-57, who at the same time also served the congregation of Oudebildtzijl (q.v.). In 1858 a new parsonage was built. An organ was purchased in 1879, in 1906 replaced by a larger one. In 1896 it was discussed whether the congregation, which then numbered 36 members, would be dissolved, but Pastor Sjoerd Wartena, serving here from 1897 until 1910, succeeded in raising the membership to 100 in 1910. S. Wartena was followed by the pastors M. J. Kosters Gz 1911-17, H. J. Busé 1917-22, S. D. A. Wartena, a son of Sjoerd Wartena, 1922-36, C. P. Hoekema 1936-45, and A. Veldstra since 1949.

The membership increased to 138 in 1922, 175 in 1954. A new meetinghouse was built in 1912. In the same year two sisters were chosen on the church board as deaconesses. The congregation possesses a small archive; the oldest document is of 1776. The following activities are now (1954) found in the congregation: a Menno Kring (youth group), Menniste Bouwers (age 13-18), Sunday school (age 6-12), and a ladies' circle.

S.D.A.W., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1888 f.; DB 1910, 121-41; J. Loosjes, Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden, in Ned. Archief v. Kerkgesch. XI (1914) 229, ML II, 237 f.

Halmael, van. This family, now extinct, was in the 17th-19th centuries found among the members of the Mennonite churches both Lam and Zon, at Amsterdam, where they were mostly engaged in banking. Francois van Halmael (Halmale), b. about 1530, a descendant of an old family, emigrated from Belgium. He was a soldier and was active during the capture of Brielle, Holland, in 1572. In his old age he joined the Mennonite Church, retired from all political and military business, and resided at Wesel on the Rhine, Germany. Of his children, who were cloth-merchants, five moved to Holland, Israel van Halmael to Rotterdam, where he became a preacher of the Flemish congregation until he resigned in 1645 at an old age; Abraham, Jacob, Otto, and Isaak van Halmael moved to Amsterdam. Abraham (b. 1573?) became a deacon of the Amsterdam Old Flemish congregation "bij de Kruikjes" in 1616 and a preacher in 1619, and served until 1624, when he moved to Utrecht. He died there in 1630. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 131, note 2.) Another Abraham van Halmael was preacher of the "Lam en Toren" congregation at Amsterdam from 1675 until his death in 1679. This family, which was very influential in the Amsterdam business life in the 17th and 18th centuries, and related by marriage to a large number of prominent Mennonite families, provided many deacons. Jacob Otto van Halmael, a deacon in the Amsterdam Flemish congregation, sided with Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) in the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v.), a quarrel in this congregation, and with Michiel Comans published three pamphlets in 1664 (Waerschouwinge; Antwoordt op de Waerschouwinge; and Tweede Waerschouwinge). Hendrick van Halmael (1654-ca. 1720), a grandson of Jacob, wrote a number of tragedies. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XXVI (1940) 60-64; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1715 f.; II, Nos. 115 f., 314, 1459 f.

Halstead, Harvey Co., Kan., a town (pop. 1,300) located in the central part of the state, was founded in 1872. Of the 500 Mennonites in the vicinity (1954) about 20 per cent live in Halstead. Christian Krehbiel of Summerfield, Ill., accompanying Mennonites from Russia in 1873, liked the land in the Halstead area. A delegation of the Summerfield Mennonite Church (q.v.) was then appointed to investigate the land for possible settlement. The delegation was joined by David Goerz, Bernhard Warkentin, and others, making a total of twelve. As a result a Mr. Touzalin of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe Railway came to Summerfield, and arrangements were made to reserve land for settlement near Halstead. In 1874 a group was sent to make the final selection of the land which was chosen between Halstead and Moundridge. The town to be established was named Christian (q.v.).

Warkentin (q.v.) built a mill on the Arkansas River at Halstead and also conducted an agricultural experimental station, particularly to promote and select the hard Red Turkey Wheat which he imported from the Ukraine. In 1876 David Goerz (q.v.) established in Halstead the Western Publishing Company (q.v.), where he published Zur Heimath (q.v.). In 1882 the Halstead Seminary (q.v.), which became the nucleus of Bethel College, was established. Peter Wiebe founded a lumber business in 1874. Numerous other Mennonite families of the Summerfield Mennonite Church settled in and around Halstead founding the Halstead First Mennonite Church (q.v.) on March 28, 1875. The Grace Mennonite Church (CGC), a mile west of town, was founded in 1880. The first Mennonite relief agency, the Mennonite Board of Guardians (Fürsorgekomittee, q.v.), of which David Goerz was secretary, had its headquarters in Halstead. For a while it seemed that Halstead would become the center of the Mennonite settlements in Kansas. Gradually, however, Newton won in popularity. Warkentin and Goerz moved their major interests to Newton. Later the town became noted for the Halstead Hospital and its founder, Dr. A. E. Hertzler, who was of Mennonite descent. C.K.

C. Krahn (ed.), From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949) 35 ff.; Frank W. Blackmar, Kansas . . . I (Chicago, 1912) 802.

Halstead (Kan.) First Mennonite Church (GCM). In 1874 a group of 30 brethren from Summerfield, Ill., purchased land in the vicinity of Halstead and held the first church service in a schoolhouse on Jan. 11, 1874, with Christian Krehbiel in charge. On March 21, 1875, a constitution was drafted, and a decision reached to elect a minister and deacons and to celebrate the Lord's Supper on Easter Sunday, March 28, 1875; Valentine Krehbiel was elected as minister. The congregation met in homes and schools until the church building was dedicated, Jan. 1, 1878. The present church was erected in 1885, and remodeled and enlarged after World War II.

Although the Halstead church has grown steadily, it has never become large. It has rather furnished the nucleus from which the following churches were formed: West Zion of Moundridge, Kan.; Garden Township of Hesston, Kan.; Bethel College Church of North Newton, Kan.; Burrton, Kan.; and Geary, Okla. It has sponsored some unusual organizations, such as the Leisy Orphan Aid Society, the Mennonite Board of Guardians to help immigrants, and the Mennonite Charity, which took over the Halstead Hospital begun by Dr. A. E. Hertzler. In addition the church has carried on special work with the American Indians.

In its first 75 years nine ministers served: Valentine Krehbiel 1875-79, David Goerz 1878-97, Christian Krehbiel 1879-1907, J. H. Langenwalter, J. E. Amstutz 1911-21, H. J. Unruh 1922-35, D. C. Wedel 1936-46, Loris Habegger 1947-54, and Roland Goering 1954- . At least seven other ministers for a time had their church home here, mostly before being ordained. The late Sister Frieda Kaufman of the Bethel Deaconess Hospital and Sister Clare Kuehney, missionary to India, came from this church. It has produced a number of physicians and college teachers: H. H. Ewert, H. A. Kruse, W. J. Baumgartner, M. D. Baumgartner, E. B. Krehbiel, D. R. Krehbiel, and J. H. Langenwalter. Two members have served as state legislature representatives, H. P. Krehbiel and J. A. Schowalter. P. J. Galle served as district judge. D. Goerz published here the German paper Zur Heimath, which was a forerunner of the church paper, Christlicher Bundesbote. Bernhard Warkentin was a pioneer in the milling business, establishing the first water mill at Halstead. In 1953 the congregation had 346 members. D.C.W.

C. E. Krehbiel, Historical Sketch, First Mennonite Church, Halstead, Kansas (Newton, 1925).

Halstead Seminary. The Halstead College Association was incorporated May 5, 1883, with B. Warkentin as president and D. Goerz as secretary. The Association was to furnish a rent-free building for five years to the Kansas Conference (GCM) School which became known as Halstead Seminary. The school, which was controlled by the Kansas Conference and located at the western edge of Halstead, Kan., opened on Sept. 19, 1883, with 12 students, but increased to 76 during the first year. H. H. Ewert was the principal.

The purposes of the school were: (1) to prepare teachers for the elementary schools, the English public school, and the German parochial school; (2) to prepare students for college entrance; and (3) to offer general liberal arts training to any who desired an education beyond the elementary stage. To attain these objectives three different "courses" were offered: a teachers' course, a German-English academy course, and a college preparatory course.

In 1885 in co-operation with the mission board, a special department for Indian students was set up at the Seminary with 15 Indians attending. The arrangement did not work out, for it really meant two schools, the seminary controlled by the conference school committee, and the Indian school controlled by the mission board. After two years the Indian school was removed to the Christian Krehbiel farm east of Halstead where it continued a few more years.

Progress of the Seminary was encouraging although there were also financial and other difficulties. As the movement in behalf of Bethel College at Newton got under way the school interest also gradually shifted from Halstead to Newton. From 1883 to 1893 the total enrollment at Halstead was 515 with 30 graduates.

In 1892 the Conference voted to close the Halstead Seminary with the end of the 1892-93 school year. In the fall of the same year Bethel College under the auspices of a Mennonite corporation opened its doors and became the successor to the Halstead Seminary. E.G.K.

P. J. Wedel and E. G. Kaufman, The Story of Bethel College (North Newton, Kan., 1954).

Hamberg, a Mennonite village in South Russia in the Gnadenfeld district of the Molotschna settlement on the Tokmak River, not far from the railway station of Stulnevo. The village, founded in 1862 by farmers from older villages, was laid out in 26 full farms with 175 acres each, and three small farms of 40 acres each, on a total of 4,684 acres. It soon achieved prosperity, but suffered greatly in the horrors of the Civil War in 1917. Over 300 shots fell into the village, damaged the buildings, and killed cattle, though no human lives were lost. The village was repeatedly plundered by roaming bands of robbers; five persons were killed. Twenty-three adults succumbed to the typhus epidemic. With few exceptions the inhabitants were members of the Schönsee Mennonite Church (q.v.). (ML II, 239.) D.H.E.

Hamberge, a village west of Lübeck, Germany. Here and in the adjacent Hansfelde, Mennonite families were living in the middle of the 18th century. The only names known are Wienantz and Wibbe, whose bearers were already resident here in 1700.

A significant concession was made to the Mennonites here sometime before 1654, when they were given a part of the cemetery for the burial of the Mennonite dead of Hamberge, Hansfelde, and also Lübeck. The preacher Herman Hermansen (Harmen Harmens) was buried here in 1713. The earliest information concerning this cemetery is given by the Lutheran Pastor Christian Rodatz, who was in Hamberge in 1645-66, and took a more friendly attitude toward the Anabaptists than his colleagues (see Lübeck). His successor, Michael Leopoldi, was of a somewhat different mind, as the inspection report of Christian von Stökken, the Superintendent of Eutin, shows—". . . only that the Anabaptists have their own burial here in the cemetery, which they bought with money, for which everything can be had today." The dead were also carried through the church, in at the south door and out at the north. Besides the purchase price they had the usual fees to pay; they had "to pay to the pastor the quarterly fee and offering, as well as to the sexton the proper dues at definite times, and probably more than others paid" (according to later information they paid a double fee). When the Mennonites became fewer their burial site was reduced. In 1734 the parson required them to repair the fence; Wiebert Wiebe appealed in the name of the group to the Domkapitel, probably with success. That is the last we hear of them.

Like the Mennonites of Lübeck, those of Hamberge and Hansfelde disappeared, partly by dying out and partly by emigration. (ML II, 239.) R. Do.

Hamburg (Hamberg), a common Mennonite village name which appeared first in the Molotschna settlement, Russia. From here it was transplanted to the following settlements: Borozenko, province of Ekaterinoslav; Omsk, Siberia; East Reserve, Man.; and Cuauhtemoc, Mexico. C.K.

Hamburg-Altona (Germany) Mennonite Church. This congregation, begun in 1601, whose meetinghouse has always been in Altona, was called "Altona" until toward the middle of the 19th century, when it was called "Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona." The first printed use of this second name was in J. Mannhardt's Namens-Verzeichnis of 1857. This is also the name used in B. C. Roosen's Geschichte (1886-87). The modern name Hamburg-Altona appears for the first time in the Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender for 1899. The old Dutch seal of the congregation carries the name Mennoniten-Gemeente tot Hamburg en Altona. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1731-1829 used only "Altona by Hamburg" or "Altona" alone. The first meetinghouse, destroyed by bombing in World War II in 1944, erected in 1674 and rebuilt in 1717 after the burning of the city by the Swedes in 1713, stood in the street called "Grosse Freiheit" in Altona, with an attached cemetery. The new meetinghouse (built 1915) with parsonage, is located at Mennonitenstr. 20 (Langenfelderstr. 100/102) in Altona, the cemetery at Holstenkamp 80/82 also in Altona. The baptized membership in 1953, greatly increased over that of 1941 (300, plus 38 children) because of the postwar refugees from the Danzig area, was 681, plus 236 unbaptized, total 917. The membership of the congregation is scattered throughout both cities and the suburbs and more distant towns, and since the refugees have joined, still more widely scattered in a radius of 50-75 miles. More distant refugees are attached to the neighboring and newly organized congregations of Bremen (q.v.), Friedrichstadt (q.v.), Kiel (q.v.), Lübeck (q.v.), and Uelzen (q.v.).

Hamburg and Altona, though actually one large community, have always been two distinct political entities, with Altona much the smaller of the two. Hamburg, until 1933 a city state with a total area of 160 sq. mi., founded by Charlemagne in 811, became an independent Hanseatic City in the late 13th century, and has remained ever since a leading economic and cultural center of Germany. In 1600 it had a population of 40,000, in 1939, 1,143,000 in the city proper, but in the total area of the former free state, 1,682,200, of which over 80 per cent were Lutherans. Altona is a city of 185,653 in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, immediately adjacent to Hamburg on the west and closely associated with it, but with a separate political and religious history. Through the admission of Reformed, Mennonites, and others, under the rule of the Counts of Schauenburg the population of Altona increased to such an extent that the village became a market-town in 1604. After the Schauenburg line became extinct, the rule passed to the Danish crown in 1640, which held Schleswig-Holstein until 1863, when it passed to Prussia (1866). In 1664 Altona received the rights of a city and was made the first free harbor of Europe, to enable it to compete with the much larger Hamburg.

The admission of Mennonites into Altona occurred under Count Ernst in 1601. The document is no longer in existence, but the terms are known. Every Mennonite householder had to pay an annual fee of one Taler as protection money; in return the Mennonites were permitted to establish themselves in the district called "Grosse Freiheit," to carry on trades, and to bury their dead; but the services had to be conducted quietly. The successors of the Count permitted them to hold their services openly. The name "Freiheit" is derived not from freedom of religion, but from freedom of occupation, which the inhabitants enjoyed. After the transfer to Danish authority the charter had to be renewed with every change of the throne. These originals are still in the archives of the church.

The Mennonites developed home industry and trade to a high level. To the first Mennonites settled in Altona were added the remnants of the Mennonite Church at Fresenburg (q.v.) which was destroyed in the Thirty Years' War. From Glückstadt (q.v.), where there was a church until 1800, the well-known van der Smissen (q.v.) family came to Altona in 1683. Home industry, i.e., weaving, was engaged in especially by the de Voss family, shipping and commerce by the Goverts (q.v.), Roosen (q.v.), van der Smissen, and de Vlieger families. After the great fire of 1713, when the Swedish General Magnus Steenbock reduced the city to ashes, many trading-houses transferred to Hamburg, where some Dutch Mennonites had settled before 1600. At least it is known of Hans Quins (Wins?), an ancestor of the well-known preacher Gerhard Roosen, that he had fled about 1570 from Brabant or Flanders to Hamburg and died there of the plague in 1597.

It was as a consequence of the events of Münster that the strictly Lutheran city of Hamburg together with the "Wend cities" (q.v.) issued repeated edicts against the Anabaptists. In 1555 the authorities of Hamburg, Lüneburg, Rostock, and Wismar passed measures designed to keep Menno from entering their territories (Mannhardt Jahrbuch 1883, 84). The settlement of a few families in the city by 1575 was possible only because they energetically assured the clergy that they had no connections with the Münsterite Anabaptists. Their ability as merchants also made them desirable citizens. In 1605 a formal agreement was drawn up with the 130 Dutch immigrant families (including such names as de Voss, Siemons, Stockman, Lammers, Amoury, de Buyser, Harmens, and Janssen). In return for the obligation to keep themselves quiet(!) and to pay taxes and fees, they were to be admitted without giving an oath of citizenship. This contract was renewed for the last time in 1635, for the Lutheran clergy vigorously opposed it.

Hamburg would have had no Anabaptist movement if it had not come in from the outside. The regions most desired by the refugees from the severe persecution then raging against all non-Catholics in the Netherlands, were the Rhine region, where the Anabaptist movement had grown strong, especially in the duchy of Jülich and later the Holstein area. It is thus easy to understand that there were several Anabaptist groups of whom the Flemish (q.v.) were the strongest and most influential. The Noë, Quins, Goverts, and van der Smissen families were among them. From 1639 the Flemish Mennonites of Glückstadt (q.v.) were combined with them. The congregation of the united Mennonite groups later adopted the Olyftacxken (q.v.) as their confession of faith. The strict Frisians required Flemish Mennonites who united with them to be rebaptized. By 1671 the Frisian congregation died out, chiefly through transfers of membership to the Flemish. Their meetinghouse stood in the Roosenstrasse in Altona.

Also the Huiskoper (q.v.) group (see Bintgens) was thus disbanded; their preacher was Jan de Buyser (q.v.). The High Germans were the smallest group; Johann Peltz(er) (d. 1600) is named as their "priest." From about 1682 there was only the one united congregation in Hamburg-Altona. The Mennonites of Altona (q.v.) are always to be included, for they never had a congregation of their own.

It was not to be expected that the Mennonites could settle and develop a congregation without a struggle; indeed the struggle with secular and religious authorities lasted a long time. In 1672 Emperor Leopold threatened the city with a lawsuit on the ground that 300-400 were living there, contrary to the treaty of 1648. In this case, to be sure, the senate defended the Mennonites, stating that they were peaceful and also competent citizens, who had nothing to do with the Anabaptists of Münster but instead prayed for the government in their church prayers.

Several decades of peace followed, but in 1706 the Mennonites again became the objects of ecclesiastical and secular sessions. The occasion of the controversy was the greatly gifted preacher Jakob Denner (q.v.), whose sermons were attended by many non-Mennonites, simple people as well as educated. Several senate decrees, issued upon the insistence of the clergy, did not succeed in preventing this. Hence the Lutheran church authorities decided to discipline its "obstinate children" on the following grounds: "running out" (to Altona) is contrary to God's command; beware of false prophets; it is contrary to city law, which forbids attendance even at Lutheran services outside the city, to say nothing of fanatical services; it leads to contempt for the office of preaching and to their own injury and false guidance. This threat of exclusion from the confessional and communion was apparently not very effective. Another circumstance that contributed to this state of affairs in 1711-12 was the warlike condition that made it impossible to attend the Mennonite church. The religious authorities suggested that the Mennonites could now attend the Protestant Church "unless they imagined themselves holier than others." The Mennonites then reminded the senate that in former disturbed times they had held their quiet worship services, if not by law, at least by tacit consent, and asked for liberty of conscience to hold their meetings in some secluded attic without singing. This was apparently done, in spite of the declaration of the church authorities that connivance in this case was contrary to conscience, and the worship contrary to the divine Word. A renewed protest in 1715 was apparently equally fruitless.

Even more dangerous to the Mennonite congregation than these threats from without were the internal conflicts. Especially the separation of the Dompelaars (q.v.), who in addition to immersion required footwashing, and who celebrated communion at night and with unleavened bread. Repeated attempts to arbitrate, both from without and within, even by the Lutheran clergy, failed, although the Dompelaars, for want of suitable preachers in their own group, had to employ non-Mennonite preachers. This group experienced a time of growth at the beginning of the 18th century under Denner, whose sermons were attended even by "pious Catholics." The deacon of the main Mennonite body, Ernst Goverts, obtained royal permission in 1708 to build a Dompelaar church on the Grosse Freiheit to seat 300; he gave the beloved preacher an annual salary of 500 marks. Still it took decades with all sorts of experiences with the Moravians and other Separatists before the group dissolved by gradual return to the old church. Denner, whose collection of sermons (1630) is still to be found in many Mennonite homes, was its last preacher (see Weenighem, B. van).

According to the Naamlijst of 1743 there were at that time two congregations in Altona, one of which was Flemish. In 1731 and again in 1755 only one is mentioned. Was there a temporary split? The church was further weakened in the 1750's by the Quakers (q.v.), who agreed with the Mennonites on some points, such as the rejection of warfare and the oath. Eleven members, including the minister Berend Roelofs (q.v.), were lost. Also the notorious Antoinette Bourignon attracted some members to her fanaticism. In addition, there were at times differences in teaching between the preachers and the congregation, e.g., concerning the doctrine of Christ (Riewert Dirks), and among the preachers; the dissension between the Lamists and Zonists of the Netherlands (see Amsterdam) raged here, the decision finally favoring the Zonists. Jakobus Kornelius van Campen used the pulpit to attack his colleague Jan de Lanoy, who favored the less strict Lamist wing. Not until 1705 was reconciliation achieved.

Active connections with other countries were also maintained, especially with the Netherlands, from where many of the Hamburg preachers came and many guest preachers visited them. Relations with Friedrichstadt (q.v.) were similar, both for business and for the arbitration of church difficulties. Brethren from Fresenburg (q.v.) also requested help in 1656, when they were ordered by a royal mandate to leave the city within a week; the intercession of Jan de Buyser (q.v.), the preacher of the Huiskoper group, was probably successful. Connections were also maintained with West Prussia, Danzig, the Palatinate, and England. In 1711 a collection of 1,470 florins was made for the persecuted Swiss Brethren, in spite of financial difficulties at home.

The organization of the church was on the presbyterial pattern. The ministers, chosen by the congregation, were "in half service," their chief function being to preach. They could function at baptismal and communion services only after a further solemn act, ordination into "full service." The minister must first have been a deacon (q.v.). Hamburg also had deaconesses, though on a voluntary, unorganized basis. The church council was composed of preachers and deacons. The most prominent of the deacons and ministers of the Hamburg congregation was no doubt Gerrit Roosen (q.v.), who besides preaching also wrote against such things as fashions and wigs, and against Quaker inroads. Not until the 18th century were unsalaried lay preachers gradually replaced by salaried ministers trained usually at the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam. It was a sign of the economic strength of the Mennonites that they in 1749 could engage four well-paid ministers, with two assistants. In the service of the deacons there was also a change, in that they were appointed for one year instead of a lifetime; there were, in accord with apostolic example, seven deacons. The church council was responsible for the lay meetings of male baptized members, whose business it was to choose the ministers proposed by the church council. In the 18th century it met annually.

At that time their church services began at nine in winter and at eight in summer. Singing was led by a chorister until 1764, when an organ was installed. Midweek services, together with the Bremen hymnal, were introduced in 1786 by Reinhard Rahusen (q.v.); but at the same time a Dutch hymnbook was in use. As late as 1802 a new Dutch hymnal was compiled for the congregation, entitled Christelijke Gezangen voor de openbaare Godsdienstoeffeningen, ten dienste der Mennoniten Gemeente te Hamburg en Altona (Amsterdam, 1802). This songbook was, however, not used long, and preaching in the Dutch language was replaced by German preaching in 1817 (DB 1901, 47). Services for children were begun in 1719; they were actually a questioning of the children in the presence of the church board. Discipline was strictly observed. Marriage outside the brotherhood was punished by the ban. In 1702 this practice was discontinued, but the promise to train the children as Mennonites was required. After 1750 all discipline for "mixed marriage" was abandoned because of the rapid recession of the congregation. Military service was strictly prohibited. Shippers and whalers were required to sell their boats rather than arm them in warlike times.

Since it was illegal in Hamburg for the Mennonite ministers to perform marriages, the Mennonites went to Altona for such services. In 1753 the regulation was passed that the Mennonites must before marriage secure a state certificate for 1.50 Talers. From 1723 on, with some interruptions, they had their own school. The first teacher was a member of the congregation, who at the close of the week could look back upon 52 hours of teaching. The small salary was raised by collection. The school, which engaged four teachers, closed in 1795. For a long time the Mennonites and Reformed shared a cemetery. In 1677 Christian V granted the Mennonites permission to open a cemetery of their own; Hermann Goverts, a deacon, gave half the land for the burial ground, which was located in Altona, and which also served the Separatists. During the war the Mennonites built a cemetery in Hamburg (Oelmühlenkirchhof). The clergy saw to it that funerals were held in accord with the Peace of Westphalia, i.e., without the ringing of bells or other ceremony.

The achievements of the Mennonites of Hamburg in cultural matters were significant; they would not have been possible without their financial strength, which was founded upon their economic activities. Also their skill in the various crafts is worthy of note. In the weaving of wool they were unsurpassed, and furnished the cloth needed by the Schauenburg court; thereby they were not subject to guild pressure. They established connections with the Leipzig Fair and with Russia. Imported hides were tanned in their own tanneries. Jakob Denner was a dyer; his church was therefore popularly called the "Blue-dyer Church" (Blaufärberkirche). Retail trade was also promoted. There was less opportunity to engage in agriculture; nevertheless, a number of families owned large farms. Their extensive overseas trade was very strong. The Roosen and de Vlieger families were prominent in the whaling industry, which in the face of the political uncertainty of the time, required a venturesome spirit. Equipment was built along the Elbe for working and packing the products of the whaling industry. Even if the residents of Altona surpassed those of Hamburg economically (Hinrich van der Smissen, q.v., "builder of the city," was a resident of Altona), those of Hamburg must not be underestimated.

This growth of Mennonite industry, which was of benefit to the entire city, was accompanied by improved relations with the government. In Altona all friction with the state was eliminated in the course of the 17th century. In Hamburg the secular authorities were much less biased than the Lutheran church authorities. To the great annoyance of the latter, the secular authorities disregarded the absence of recognition of Mennonites in the Peace of Westphalia by permitting them to hold services in Hamburg in times of war as far back as 1686 when the Danes were besieging the city, and also by excusing them from swearing an oath. It is significant that at the beginning of the 18th century two thirds of the congregation was living in Hamburg.

A catastrophe for the twin cities, especially Altona, and also for the Mennonites, was the war between Sweden and Denmark 1712-13. Trade became difficult; epidemics raged; fires, set by Stenbock's troops, leveled homes and breweries. The people were impoverished; the church mortgaged its property. It would have been small wonder if the congregation had disbanded.

The century following this catastrophe has a character of its own. Progressive tolerance led to civil equality; friendly relations with the state softened the old principles; internally a calmer development took place, the age of division and schism was past.

After the war the state authorities were interested in restoring economic conditions as rapidly as possible. The Mennonites took advantage of this in having their old liberties confirmed; to the right of free trade and religion was added release from taxes for the proposed new church and school, for the parsonage and the homes for the poor, and in particular, release from all future war taxes and other "extraordinary burdens." The privilegium exemtionis confirmed at the change of government in 1715 granted the Mennonites all of this. The church building was begun at once; private rebuilding was also undertaken. Hinrich van der Smissen, with his characteristic energy, rebuilt the burned breweries, some of his houses, besides new dyeing works, sawmills, smithies, forges, shipbuilding etablishments, etc.; he was a member of the city building committee of Altona (the van der Smissensallee was later bought by the city).

Other important names in the congregation of the two cities were Roosen (q.v.), Goverts (q.v.), de Vlieger (q.v.), Linnich (q.v.), Beets (q.v.), especially Gerritt Beets, the "Apollo" of the congregation, Rahusen (q.v.), de Voss (q.v.), and Goos (q.v.).

There is a dearth of statistics of membership in the congregation. In 1716-17 the heads of 123 households took part in the building plans for the church; that would indicate a total membership of about 620; in 1809, 15 families were counted in Altona; in 1814 Hamburg had 40 members; in 1840 the combined membership was reckoned at 125. The causes of this retrogression were emigration (to Pennsylvania ca. 1700), and transfer to other denominations, the most serious of which was the defection of the Goverts brothers. Severe losses were also caused by mixed marriages, which until 1800 were permitted by the state only with the promise of training the children as Lutherans; after the congregation had dwindled in size, this was no longer considered a threat to the Lutherans. The Mennonites still had to pay their fees to the Lutheran pastors—because the salaries of the latter were in part dependent on these fees, which were rated according to the number of houses in the parish. The Mennonites did not object to this fee; on the contrary, in 1750-51 they made a contribution of 5,810 Marks to the city for the restoration of the church of St. Michael.

Thus it came about that relations with the outside grew obviously more favorable. The Mennonites were now publicly recognized for their contribution to the common good, and the clergy had to discard their idea of equating them with the Münsterites. This increasing recognition of "unorthodox" creeds was due in large part to Rationalism, and reached its culmination in the 1820's. Napoleon had dictatorially introduced French laws, which declared the civic equality of all citizens of the state regardless of creed. This was the occasion in 1813 for the consideration by the Hamburg clergy of the weighty question: hitherto only "the Mennonites, who were worthy of respect," had been tolerated, whereas other non-Lutherans were usually shunted off to Altona. In 1814 a proposal was made to drop the fees required of the Mennonites; the clergy offered no objection. The mayor also wanted to include in the new statute "the quiet, responsible, outwardly excellently upright Mennonites." In October 1814 they were pronounced a recognized religious society and were given the right to hold office and to vote. Elder Isaak Goos replied for the congregation that its only wish was to have its quiet existence protected, and pointed out that their religious principles prevented them from accepting certain judicial positions or participation in war affairs. The joy in the new-found freedom was somewhat dimmed by the fear that the old principles would now be broken. Two centuries earlier the Mennonites had been regarded as a threat to church and state; now they had the same equal privileges that their brethren in Altona had enjoyed for two hundred years.

The 19th century, however, brought a period of severe conflict, caused by the growing nationalism among the nations. In 1803 a conference of elders and preachers meeting at Ibersheim had advocated strict adherence to nonresistance. After ten years of negotiation, the Altona Mennonites succeeded in maintaining this right in return for a fee and a fine of 1,600 Talers. In Hamburg too the request of the small congregation was for a long time disregarded. A lieutenant who was expelled from the congregation in 1818 was released from his military duties. New, considerable difficulties arose again by the military regulations of 1821, which made no provision for religious objection. Thus, in 1837, when the son of Elder Goos was drafted into the army, the request for his release could no longer be based on precedent; his request contained not only a willingness to pay a fee, but also a veiled threat of emigration. The Kollegium of the Hamburg clergy granted the request. But in 1845, when a young Mennonite was again called, a petition succeeded only in releasing him from personal service, not from guard duty. The Altona Mennonites had been released from military duty by the provisional government. But in Hamburg a number of men continued to be conscripted in spite of protests. Not until 1851 did a general petition, which threatened moving into adjacent Altona, make an effective impression. By abandoning a principle maintained until then (that service by a substitute is service), the Mennonites could secure the release of their young men. In 1867 the privilege was completely lost; the only way out was by serving in the medical corps or the like. But in the meantime, Mennonitism had undergone a change, especially under the influence of Wilhelm Mannhardt of Berlin (q.v.), in the direction of the old principle of personal liberty.

The inner development of the congregation in the 19th century proceeded without interruption. The state saved the congregation by annulling the prohibition of mixed marriages, but numerically it declined. After 1817 there was only one preacher, now called pastor because of academic training. Berend Carl Roosen (q.v.), pastor after 1845, awakened interest in the history of the congregation. His successor, Hinrich van der Smissen, was pastor 1885-1928. After 1839 the language of the services, which had been Dutch, was exclusively German. The parochial school, which was revived for 13 years, passed into private possession. Connections with Holland grew weaker; those with Friedrichstadt were maintained for some time. The Hamburg-Altona church was given an important position by being made the seat of the Vereinigung (q.v.) in 1885.

Until 1675 religious services were held in a rear building on Roosen land on the Grosse Freiheit (free trade); in that year a church was built, paid for by a contribution of 5 per cent of the proceeds of the whaling industry for one year. This church was burned down in 1713. On its site a new church was dedicated in 1715. The aftereffects of World War I resulted in great losses to the Mennonites of Hamburg-Altona. However, before the end of the war the congregation erected its splendid new church, parish house, and parsonage (1914-16) in Altona, Mennonitenstrasse 20. It also has a rather extensive archives; its library, which was begun in 1747 with the legacy of Pastor Rahusen's books, is the richest of all Mennonite libraries in Germany.

On several occasions the Hamburg congregation, usually in connection with the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs, raised funds for the Mennonite refugees displaced by persecution; e.g., in 1690 for those in the Palatinate, in 1710-12 for Switzerland (collection 631 guilders), in 1733-35 for those from Lithuania (collection 3,352 Dutch guilders), in 1766 for Polish Prussia. In 1710-11 the church board of Hamburg approved a plan to colonize the Swiss Mennonites in East Prussia; but this project was not carried out, both because of the aversion of the Swiss Mennonites and also because of the opposition of the Amsterdam Committee.

Hamburg-Altona suffered most severely during World War II, especially during the air raids in July 1943. One third of the Mennonites lost their homes, most lost property, and some lost their lives. The well-known van der Smissen Allee, the Dennerstrasse, the old Mennonite church in the Grosse Freiheit, the chapel in the cemetery, etc., were completely destroyed. Fortunately, the new church and the other buildings, including the valuable library, although somewhat damaged, were not destroyed. By 1946 the church could be used and by 1948 it was fully restored.

Ministers of the church since 1801 have been Isaak Goos until 1845; Berend Carl Roosen, 1845-82; Hinrich van der Smissen, 1885-1928; Otto Schowalter, 1928- .

The third old people's home of the German Mennonites, called "Abendfrieden," was established in 1952 in a suburb of Hamburg, Pinneberg-Rellingen.

Regular services are held by the Hamburg pastor in Altona, Bad Oldesloe, Trittau, and at the old people's home.

The Hamburg-Altona congregation has taken over the patronship of the Menno Simons Monument at Bad Oldesloe.

The Mennonite Central Committee with headquarters first in Kiel (1946-47) and later in Hamburg (1948-52), did much to alleviate both the physical and spiritual suffering of the Mennonite refugees from the east in the area of Schleswig-Holstein, where a total of 4,300 were resident in 1950. The MCC program of relief, with large distribution of food and clothing, ministered to many more non-Mennonites as well. (†ME I.)

R.Do., H.vdS.

E. Wichmann, Geschichte Altona's (Altona, 1865); B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gem. zu Hamburg und Altona 2 vv. (Hamburg, 1886); H. Münte, Das Altonaer Handlungshaus van der Smissen, 1682-1824 (Altona, 1932); R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster i.H., 1930); O. Schowalter, "Die Mennoniten zu Hamburg," Menn. Life V (April 1950); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 567, 578, 797, 1058, 1062, 1108, 1114, 1155, 1177, 1186, 1271, 1319 f., 1328, 1355, 1422 f., II, Nos. 2788-91; ML I, 46 f.; II, 239-44.

Hamelmann, Hermann (1525-95), Lutheran superintendent at Oldenburg, Germany, after serving for a time as Catholic priest in the church of St. Servatius in Münster, and later as a Lutheran clergyman at Lemgo. He wrote the book, Ecclesiasticae historiae de renato evangelio et motu postea incepto in urbe Monasteriensi explicatio brevis, sed integra. This book offers important data, not given anywhere else, and collected with great care, and is thus an important source for the history of the Anabaptists in Münster. But because Hamelmann assembled the material uncritically, without inquiry into its authenticity, he is not entirely dependable. At any rate his statements should be accepted with caution. This was convincingly demonstrated by C. A. Cornelius in the introduction to his book, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster (Münster, 1853). Also F. O. zur Linden agrees that Hamelmann's presentation of the origin of Anabaptism in East Friesland is incorrect. NEFF.

M. Goebel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens der rheinisch-westfälischen Kirche (Coblenz, 1849) 499; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885) 181; ML II, 244.

Hamilton Avenue United Missionary Church, located on Hamilton Avenue, Flint, Mich., an appointment of the Michigan conference, was originally a city mission in charge of deaconesses. The first minister was W. O. Cline, who was stationed there in 1913. In 1954 there were 90 members and the Sunday-school attendance averaged 150.

The following have served as pastors: W. O. Cline 1913-18, J. A. Bradley 1918-21, R. D. Dean 1921-25, J. A. Avery 1925-26, B. Douglass 1926-30, E. W. McClintock 1930-33, J. A. Bradley 1933-36, H. C. Eagle 1936-43, W. K. Burgess 1943-47, L. L. Surbrook 1947-52, G. N. Bridges 1952- . E.R.S.

Hamilton Chapel United Missionary Church, near Dowagiac, Mich., had 13 members in 1954, with Russel Wright serving as pastor. The new church, dedicated on Nov. 7, 1954, is unique in its architectural style, having a round roof. R.P.P.

Hamm, Westphalia, Germany, where there was once a small Mennonite congregation (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1101-2). The Naamlijst of 1731 states that the pulpit was vacant at that time. Since the following Naamlijsts do not list the congregation, it was obviously extinct. vdZ.

Hamm (Ham) is a Mennonite family name of Dutch-Prussian background. The name can possibly be traced back to Johan de Mepsche op den Ham from Groningen, the Netherlands, an Anabaptist who fled to Danzig, where he died in 1588. Urban Ham is mentioned in a record as a resident of Orlofferfelde, Prussia, in 1601. The Danzig church record lists the name since 1676. The name appears also in the records of the following congregations: Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, Montau-Gruppe, Deutsch-Kazun. From Danzig and Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia (Chortitza, Samara), the United States (Beatrice, Neb.), Canada, and South America. Some outstanding representatives are Dietrich Hamm, David Hamm (q.v.), Dr. David H. Hamm of Hague, Sask., and H. H. Hamm of Altona, Man. C.K.

Horst Penner, "The Background of a Mennonite Family—Hamm," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 16.

Hamm, David, born in Prussia, was elected as minister of the Köppental-Orloff Mennonite Church (q.v.), Trakt settlement, Samara, in 1853, and served as elder 1858-84. During his eldership the congregation was greatly disturbed by the activities of Claas Epp, Jr. (q.v.). When Epp published his Die entsiegelte Weissagung des Propheten Daniel und die Deutung der Offenbarung Jesu Christi Hamm wrote the preface (1877) emphasizing the second coming of Christ, at which time He would find only "a little flock" of faithful followers. He states that Epp was "compelled by the spirit of God" to write this book. The Mennonites of the Trakt settlement in general had been influenced by Jung-Stilling, Christian Clöter, and other chiliastic writers before they left Prussia (Bartsch, Unser Auszug, p. 7). However, when Claas Epp, Jr., became more and more extreme in his proclamations the sounder elements of the congregation under the leadership of Hamm opposed his views (Bartsch, p. 25), and Epp and his group withdrew from them and removed to Central Asia.

David Hamm was instrumental in establishing the Allgemeine Mennonitische Bundeskonferenz (q.v.), for which he preached a much-appreciated conference sermon at Halbstadt in 1883 proclaiming the motto of the conference based on I Thess. 5:12-15 as being "Unity in major issues, freedom in minor questions, and charity in everything." In 1869 the Köppental and Alexandertal congregations of Samara sent letters to the Prussian congregation stating that they could not have fellowship with those that accepted the edict providing for noncombatant service. It is likely that David Hamm took the initiative in this matter. His signature stands first on the list. David Hamm compiled the Choral-Buch für den Kirchen-Gesang der Mennoniten-Gemeinde an der Wolga (Danzig, 1859). C.K.

Franz Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittel-Asien (Halbstadt, 1907); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 119; H. Ediger, Beschlüsse . . . der Konferenzen . . . (Berdyansk, 1914) 1 ff.

Hammer Creek (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. Until 1819 the Mennonites of the Hammer Creek-Denver district met in eight private homes for worship. Deacon Christian Eby was successful in keeping the children of members for the church during and after the Revolutionary War. The first two bishops were both named Christian Bomberger. From this congregation came Bishop Peter Eby of the Pequea and Bishop Benjamin Eby and the Ebys, Snyders, Brubakers, etc., who emigrated to Ontario in the first two decades of the 19th century. Since 1913 the congregation has had a large brick church. Amos S. Horst and Mahlon Zimmerman are the present (1954) bishops. Noah Hurst and Parke Heller ministers, and J. Henry Eshleman deacon; the membership is 182. I.D.L.

Hammerstein, a village about 10 miles east of Neustettin, province of Pomerania, Germany, where one of the three camps was located (the others being Mölln and Prenzlau) in which a part of the 4,000 Mennonite refugees fleeing Russia in November 1929 were quartered by the German government until they could emigrate to Brazil and Paraguay, which they did in the first half of 1930. H.S.B.

Hammon Cheyenne (Indian) Mennonite Church (GCM), located one mile north and one-half mile east of Hammon, Custer Co., Okla., was organized

Feb. 11, 1906, when four Indians were baptized by Rodolphe Petter. The mission had been established by H. J. Kliewer in June 1898. Services were held in the mission house until the chapel was built in 1902. Religious services were also conducted at the Red Moon Government Boarding School near by. By 1949 the number received as members was 129, and the membership was 75. H. J. Kliewer served as pastor 1898-1927, J. B. Ediger 1927-47, and Arthur Friesen 1947- . A.F.

Hamster, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a peasant of Reinsdorf near Zwickau, Germany, brother-in-law of Georg, Heinrich, and Jobst Möller (Müller) (q.v.); after their martyrdom, at the age of 30, he joined the Anabaptists. When the lord of Weida at Wildenfels refused to tolerate this step, Hamster fled to the region of Jörg Uttenhofer on the Silberstrasse, and associated with the tailor Hans Steinsdorf (q.v.) at Schneeberg, they mutually strengthening each other. Both considered infant baptism without value, denied original sin, declared the sacrament to be mere bread and wine, recognized the government and the obedience due it as long as it performed God's will. They rejected community of goods, but held that those who have much should share and not permit their neighbor to suffer want. On July 20, 1538, Steinsdorf and his apprentice were arrested, and on Aug. 24 the same fate befell Hamster. He was tried Aug. 26 and 27 (court records in Wappler, 110-12). He confessed that he had not been rebaptized; but he believed that his baptism 33 years previously had no value because he had not understood it. And if sin had been taken from him at that time he would not have been a bad boy.

Hamster was now transferred to the Zwickau prison, where Steinsdorf also lay. But they were not put together. Repeatedly they were examined or "instructed in the faith." Hamster said he would gladly be wherever God the Almighty put him; even if he were to be expelled from the country he would not swear, for God had forbidden it; he would rather stay with his family and provide for them with labor, as he had always done. He did not believe in the resurrection of the flesh; for the spirit had come from the Father and would return to the Father; but flesh and blood had nothing to do with the divine Father.

When all efforts to convert them proved futile, their confession was sent to the Elector of Saxony with the comment, "They are laymen; neither can read or write; they are little versed in the Old and New Testaments, but place their faith on the spirit which they boast they have from God the Father." The elector relegated to the court at Wittenberg the matter of sentencing them. The court had difficulty in reaching a decision and repeatedly questioned the prisoners. "But they persisted in their faith." They were probably beheaded near the end of 1538. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1908); ML II, 244 f.

Hamswerum, a town in East Friesland, Germany, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized eleven persons in 1551-61. Since nothing is known of the existence of a congregation in this town, the members apparently joined the congregation in Emderland. vdZ.

Han, Thomas, an Anabaptist martyr: see Haan, Thoman.

Handbüchlein, Kleines: see Kleines Hand-Büchlein.

Handbüchlein wider den Prozess, der zu Worms am Rhein wider die Brüder so man die Hutterischen nennt ausgangen ist im 1557 Jahr, a Hutterite polemical writing, considered with the Rechenschaft by Peter Riedemann (q.v.) and the Article Book (q.v.) as one of the most significant doctrinal books of the Hutterites of the 16th century. It was an official pronouncement of the brotherhood, prompted by a document which a number of Lutheran theologians (Melanchthon, Brenz, Andreae, etc.) had issued at Worms in 1557 (see Bedenken). In this document, the Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern (in Württemberg also called Bedenken . . ., published by Bossert in the TA Württemberg in 1930), the Anabaptists are accused of a number of damnable doctrines and practices (see John Oyer's analysis); their teachings are declared blasphemous; hence Lev. 24:16 (death penalty) should be applied. Toward the end of this document also the upbringing of children in the communistic colonies in Moravia is briefly but violently attacked as a devilish institution (teuflische Communion . . . wider die Natur und alle Rechte; Bossert, p. 166, lines 14-19).

The Anabaptists in Germany felt the need of defending themselves against these accusations, which were much stronger than Melanchthon's attack of 1536 ("Several Unchristian Points Which the Anabaptists Advance," MQR 1952, 268), although by 1557 Anabaptism had already lost some of its prime vigor. At a conference in Strasbourg the Swiss Brethren decided to produce an answer (see letter to Menno Simons, 1557), but apparently this plan was never carried out. At the Frankenthal (q.v.) Disputation in 1571 the Prozess was mentioned but no reply was given.

The Hutterites, on the other hand, although less involved (as they lived in faraway Moravia, where the Lutheran theologians had but a minor influence), nevertheless produced an elaborate answer in which they developed at some length their own doctrine and position. This answer was then called Handbüchlein wider den Prozess, but neither author nor year is mentioned in it. One would not err too much in assuming that this book was written between 1558 and 1560, and although it was a document issued by the entire brotherhood in Moravia, it seems to have been drafted by Peter Walpot (q.v.), then by far the most outstanding spiritual leader of the Hutterites (see Friedmann in Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., 1931, 105). As far as Anabaptist manuscript literature is known, this book is the strongest polemical writing of the Brethren against the Lutherans, and has always been understood by the Brethren in this spirit.

The Handbüchlein is subdivided into 12 sections called "books" which answer point by point the specific accusations of the Worms theologians; viz., (1) concerning worldly authority and whether such an authority can be a Christian; (2) concerning the use of law courts and lawsuits; (3) concerning the taking of an oath; (4) concerning the Anabaptist claim that whoever does not belong to their church (Gemeinschaft) is condemned and not saved; (5) concerning infant baptism; (6) concerning the Lord's Supper; (7) concerning original sin and whether children have it; (8) concerning the necessity to preach and to hear the Word of God; (9) concerning the Holy Trinity, whether Christ was the Son of God; (10) concerning whether rebirth prevents any backsliding hereafter; (11) concerning justification, whether man is justified through Christ or by his own endeavor; (12) concerning the upbringing of children in communal establishments.

A comparison of these "books" with the Prozess shows that the latter condemns the Anabaptists only on seven points (see Oyer's analysis) while the Handbüchlein answers in 12 points. Some of the additional five items were taken from the 1536 accusations of Melanchthon. Item 12 concerning the children is mentioned in the Prozess only casually (in Bossert's print only five lines, though sharp in tone), yet the Hutterites felt particularly sensitive in this area, since they were very conscientious with regard to the upbringing of children, and wanted to make it clear to everybody that children were to them the most precious things in the world, and their proper upbringing was one of their most important tasks. We might here remember that it was Peter Walpot who in 1568 wrote a very thoughtful and much advanced School Discipline for the Hutterite schools (see Education).

The Handbüchlein answer to the Worms theologians is a rather skillful and effective work. The arguments are thoroughly but soundly Biblical as was the Anabaptist way of thinking; the words are straightforward, yet never acid (as most polemics of the 16th century were). The author (Walpot?) also quotes amply from old authorities such as Origen, Jerome, Augustine, the Councils, and recent authorities such as Luther (Deutsche Messe, 1526), Zwingli (Contra Fabrum), and Cellarius. It is most likely that the learned book by Christoph Eleutherobios (q.v.), Vom wahrhaftigen Tauff Joannis, Christi und der Aposteln. Wann und wie der Kindertauff angefangen und eingerissen hat (How Infant Baptism Originated) (1528, sec. ed. 1550) was much used, mainly for "book" five. It is found in many Hutterite manuscripts.

The chapter "Concerning original sin" is one of the most decisive sections of the Handbüchlein and expresses a viewpoint accepted by practically all Anabaptists. The Brethren declare: man as a child of Adam stands under the general curse of original sin; hence physical death. But Christ is the reconciliation of this world including small children. The mere "inclination" to sin (which is inborn in all of us) does not yet condemn man. Only the doing of sin will cause eternal death. Moreover, the Scriptures declare that the children will not bear the consequences of the bad deeds of their fathers, rather everyone dies for that which he has perpetrated himself (Ezek. 18:17, 20). This argument, incidentally, is the main argument suggested by Peter Riedemann in his Rechenschaft of 1540 (MQR, 1952, 214). The Handbüchlein closes this chapter by declaring that if the inclination to sin is not carried out into works of sin, it does not harm man and does not cause eternal death. "Whosoever is born of God does not sin" (I John 3:9).

Strange to say, the Handbüchlein is nowhere mentioned in other Hutterite writings, not even in their Gross-Geschichtsbuch. But from the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (ed. Zieglschmid, 1947) we learn that the knowledge of it was kept very much alive in Hutterite tradition. Johannes Waldner (q.v.), the author of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, tells us that in 1756 when the Lutheran transmigrants from Carinthia came to Transylvania and there showed the greatest interest both in Hutterite life and Hutterite doctrines the Brethren gave them Riedemann's Rechenschaft and the Handbüchlein to read. "In this little book the Lutheran Church is sharply attacked and its false teachings and errors are clearly brought to light" (Klein-GB, 274). It appears that the arguments of the Handbüchlein as well as those of the Rechenschaft impressed the newcomers so profoundly that they decided to join the Hutterites and to embrace completely their teachings.

The original of the Handbüchlein is no longer extant. That no Hutterite codex in European libraries contains it accounts for the fact that it was completely unknown to scholars like Beck, Loserth, and Wolkan. The oldest copy is one made in Velke-Levary in 1637 and now in Paraguay. Several copies of this manuscript were made, of which one is in Canada, and one in the Goshen College Library (produced by the late Elder Elias Walter, and donated to Christian Hege). R.F.

W. Wiswedel, Bilder III (1952) 171-83 (Wiswedel used the Hege copy, now in Goshen); W. Wiswedel and R. Friedmann, "The Anabaptists Answer Melanchthon," MQR XXIX (1955), an English translation of the above study plus additional pertinent material by R. Friedmann; Zieglschmid, Klein - Geschichtsbuch; R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift der Hutterischen Täufergemeinschaften in Mähren," Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. 1931, 105, 107, 111; the text of the Handbüchlein is to be published in the second volume of Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse Oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter, in 1955; John Oyer, "The Writings of Melanchthon Against the Anabaptists," MQR XXVI (1952) 210-15.

Handelinghe der Doopsgesinde, ghenaemt de Vereenigde Vlaamsche en Duytsche Gemeynte, gehouden tot Haerlem anno 1649 met de dry confessien aldaer geapprobeert. Of the acts of this Dutch Flemish conference there are three editions: n.p. 1649, Amsterdam 1664, and Vlissingen 1666. The edition of 1666, published by Geleyn Jansz, is of great importance for Dutch Mennonite history, because in the same volume are inserted a number of other documents. The 1664 edition only contains the acts of the meeting. The 1666 edition contains (1) Voorrede signed by the delegates of a number of congregations in Zeeland: Vlissingen, Middelburg, Veere, Zierikzee, and Brouwershaven; (2) the resolutions of the Haarlem meeting; (3) the Olyf-Tacxken (q.v.) confession; this edition is more complete than that of Algemeene Belydenissen (q.v.) of 1665, because it also contains the second and third question and the Brief tot Vreed-Bereydinge and Presentatie, which are not found in the Algemeene Belydenissen; (4) Vrede-handelinge at Amsterdam 1630, and confession of Jan Centzen; (5) Copye ende Seecker Antwoordt van de Switser broeders ofte Hooghduytschen . . . over gegeven aan de Poolsche betreffende . . . de Menschwordinghe ende der Godtheydt Jesu Christi, an account drawn up in 1592 at Strasbourg by a meeting of Mennonite leaders; (6) Copye Emanuel, an account of the United High-German and Frisian Mennonites of Hoorn, Holland, 1630; (7) Confession of Adriaen Cornelis (Dordrecht Confession) of 1632.

To the volume are added the Concept of Cologne of 1591, with an introduction, which is not found in the Algemeene Belydenissen, the Confession of Jacques Outerman of 1626 with introduction, and Eenighe Aenteykeningen uyt de Aenporringhe. vdZ.

Handclasp or Handshake: see Oath.

Handlung oder Acta gehaltener Disputation und gespräch zu Zoffingen imm Bernner Biet mit den Widertöuffern geschehen 1532 (Zürich, Chr. Froschauer, 1532), a copy of which is found in the AML and GCL: see Zofingen.

Handt-Boecxken, ofte: Concordancie, Dat is: De Ghelijckluydende plaetsen der Heyliger Schrift by een vergadert (n.p., 1576; 2d ed. Rotterdam, 1614) is a concordance of the Bible by an unknown Mennonite author. It is the oldest of Mennonite concordances, and likely also of all Dutch Protestant concordances. Both editions are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. vdZ.

Hanekuyk, a former Mennonite family at Harlingen (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, related by marriage to other well-known Harlingen Mennonite families, such as Fontein, Oosterbaan, and Hingst. Aagjen Douwes Hanekuyk (1737-1813) of Harlingen, married to Heere Oosterbaan (q.v.), was preacher at Makkum and Harlingen and later professor of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Hylke Everts Hanekuyk (ca. 1745-1824) of Harlingen was a friend of Pastor Freerk Hoekstra (q.v.) of Harlingen. A theological study written by Hylke E. Hanekuyk, entitled Verhandeling over de voortreffelijkheid van de Christelijke geloofs en zedeleer, was edited after his death by Hoekstra. vdZ.

Hang, Le, an Amish congregation in Alsace, in the upper Bruche Valley (Vosges), sometimes called Bourg-Bruche. Hang is a little valley surrounded by woods, with about 12 farms. Here a number of families expelled from Switzerland settled in 1770-75; e.g., Bacher, Augsburger, Eymann, Ulrich, Schuerch, Lehmann, Mosimann, Dellenbach. Information on this period is completely lacking, since the local clergy, who kept the registers, did not register dissenters, and the group kept no records.

If remoteness from the world was at first an asset, it became a handicap in the time of freedom. Separation from the church as a whole, difficult transportation, and the inadequate educational opportunities on the linguistic border hindered its development. Nevertheless there were still in 1920 about 35 families with 105 souls in a radius of two hours in the vicinity. Religious services were then held once a month, conducted by brethren from Colmar, with meeting place in a farm home. In 1951 the congregation built its first meetinghouse, with aid from the United States, and meetings are now held every 1st and 3rd Sunday in the month. The membership in 1953, including children, was 125, with Charles Goldschmidt as resident pastor and elder. The congregation has its own burial ground in L'Evreuil. (ML II, 249.) H.V., H.S.B.

Hannema, a Dutch Mennonite family of Harlingen (q.v.), province of Friesland. This family, which has lived at Harlingen at least since 1530, became Mennonite in the 18th century, when Sjoerd Hannema (b. 1721 at Midlum, d. 1794 at Harlingen), founder of the Sjoerd Hannema Trading Company, was baptized upon confession of faith in the Harlingen Mennonite congregation on Jan. 30, 1752, together with his wife Elisabeth Scheltema, whose father and grandfather were merchants and Mennonite preachers at Franeker (q.v.). Sjoerd Hannema himself and many of his descendants served the church as deacons. Sjoerd Hannema, apparently a grandson of the above Sjoerd Hannema, was the (untrained) preacher (1800-8) of the small congregation of the Jan-Jacobsgezinden (q.v.) at Baard, Friesland (Naamlijst 1810, 77); he died in February 1808. vdZ.

Hannover (English, Hanover), the capital (pop. about 400,000) of the former province of Hannover, had about 40 Mennonites before World War I. In 1891 they united with the support of the Vereinigung der Mennoniten im Deutschen Reich to hold regular annual religious services. These were conducted by the preachers of Emden, Hamburg-Altona, Leer, Norden, Crefeld, and Friedrichstadt in the home of the merchant J. Schütt. On Nov. 8, 1908, a committee of three was chosen (Th. Brons, W. Rieweseh1, J. Schütt) to arrange for monthly services. After the death of J. Schütt (Aug. 8, 1909) the group met in the Logenhaus, Schiffgraben 8, for several years. Since 1913 there have been no services. On April 8, 1929, the annual meeting of the Curatorium of the Vereinigung was held in Hannover. In connection with this session a service had been held on the day before in the auditorium of the Psychological Institute, which was attended by nearly 40. The hope was expressed that regular services could again be arranged, but this was not realized until after World War II when many refugees from the Danzig area located in this area and a meeting in Hannover was placed on the preaching circuit of the Göttingen congregation. (Menn. Bl., 1891, and other years, especially 1908, 96; 1929, 49; ML II, 249.) NEFF.

Hanover Mennonite Church (MC), located in Hanover, York Co., Pa., built its first meetinghouse in 1870, and the present one on Broadway in 1881. Hanover is in a circuit of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference with Bair's Hanover and Hostetter. In 1953 the church membership for the circuit was 108. Richard Danner was the bishop; Harvey S. Grove, Amos D. Shank, and R. Norman Bange the ministers; and Melvin J. Shank, deacon.
I.D.L.

Hanover Municipality in the East Reserve (q.v.) of Manitoba was settled by Bergthal Mennonites from Russia in 1874.

Hanover (Ont.) United Missionary Church was erected in 1904 with a seating capacity of 100. In 1953 the congregation had 49 members with S. S. Shantz serving as pastor. W.J.P.

Hans, an Anabaptist martyr; see Hans de Goudsmid.

Hans, the servant of Jan Cooman (official name Hans Moens), was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 25, 1569, because he had been rebaptized. With him were executed Jan Cooman, Jan van Hasebroek, and Herman de Timmerman. (Mart, Mir. D 415, E 766, Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 382, 401; XIV, 66 f., No. 757.) vdZ.

Hans de Bakker (official name Jehan Jan Gielis, alias Hans de Backe), an Anabaptist martyr of Jumay, Belgium, was secretly drowned in a tub in the Steen prison at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 20, 1560. His name is found in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 640; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 6, 10; XIV, 28 f., No. 306; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Hans Barbier, a Dutch Anabaptist leader: see Hans Scheerder.

Hans van Borculo, also called Hans (or Jan, Janne) Collen (or Colien, Coken), an Anabaptist martyr, a weaver by trade, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 16, 1558. He is named in the hymn beginning "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. The records of the Margrave of Antwerp state that his wife, whose name is not given, had been executed in 1559; but nothing further is known of this execution. vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 454, 465, 470; XIV, 24 f., No. 272; ML I, 301.

Hans Borduerwercker (official name Hans Verhoeven), an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Aug. 27, 1555. His name is found in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father) of the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 161, E 550; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 426, 429; XIV, 20 f., No. 229; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML I, 246.

Hans Bouwen, a Flemish elder: see Hans Busschaert.

Hans Bret, an Anabaptist martyr, the son of the Englishman Thomas Bret and Elisabeth Akers van der Does of Dordrecht. By trade he was a confectioner. Through betrayal he was seized on May 6, 1576. He was severely treated, being cast into a dungeon. He was frequently examined. Since he was well educated—he had a mastery of Latin—he was well able to withstand the inquisitors. In spite of his youth he remained steadfast, and died at the stake in Antwerp on Jan. 4, 1577, at the age of 24. The tongue screw with which the executioner closed his mouth to prevent his speaking was hunted out of the ashes by the well-known preacher Hans de Ries (q.v.). This tongue screw with a certification by Trijntje Simons is preserved in Amsterdam, and has been handed down from generation to generation in the possession of the de Hoop Scheffer family.

The charge made against Bret was that he possessed forbidden books, that he had been rebaptized and had frequently attended the forbidden meetings of the Anabaptists, each Sunday morning giving religious instruction to a group of baptismal candidates (aankomelingen). Bret had been a servant of Albert Verspeck (q.v.), who later was a preacher of the Waterlander Mennonites in Holland (BRN VII, 248). Hans de Ries (q.v.), who was a friend of Bret, and who had been present at the execution of his friend, married Bret's mother soon afterward. Hans's brother David Bret lived in England, where his father came from. From prison Hans wrote a number of letters to his family, to the congregation of Antwerp, and to friends, the first of which is dated Monday after Pentecost 1576, the last August 1576. In these letters he complained that he lacked writing paper. He wrote that there were imprisoned with him more of Menno's "Volk" at that time; singing of hymns, which would have given them much comfort, had been forbidden. Soon after his death a volume was published under the title De Christelijcke Seyndtbrieven gheschreven door eenen vromen Christen genaemt Hans Bret, printed in 1582 (n.p., likely at Antwerp; a copy is in the library of the University of Gent, Belgium). This volume contains 18 letters by Bret and 6 letters addressed to him in prison, three of which were probably written by his friend Hans de Ries; besides these letters this book contains Bret's death sentence and two songs celebrating his sufferings. Of this collection six letters are found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror; viz., the first three, the tenth, and the last two. Three of these were written to his mother, one to his brother David, one to his sister, and one to Hans de Ries. K.V., vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 727-46, E 1037-54; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 210; XIV, 98 f., No. 1117; Bibliographie I, 689-702; ML I, 266.

Hans Busschaert (Bouwer, or de Wever), a co-elder with Menno Simons, was born at Dadisele (Dudzele) near Brugge, Flanders, Belgium. His special field of activity was Flanders, preaching and baptizing mostly at Gent. In 1566 he was one of the elders called to Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, to try to settle the dispute between Frisian and Flemish Mennonites (q.v.). In 1567, when the separation of the two groups became final, he was in Emden, East Friesland, and took the side of Dirk Philips and the Flemish. In 1568 he was again present when another vain attempt was made to reconcile the parties. (DB 1893, 31-44, 68, 72.) vdZ.

Hans Busschaerts-volk, a name given to the followers of Hans Busschaert (q.v.) de Wever, a group of Flemish Mennonites. This otherwise unknown name is used in a letter written by the Dutch congregation of Vlissingen to that of Amsterdam (June 19, 1622). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 559.) vdZ.

Hans Cassier: see Ries, Hans de.

Hans (Jan) van Coelen (not identical with the following martyr), an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Amsterdam on July 28, 1535. He was charged with participating in the Amsterdam Anabaptist uprising of May 10-11, 1535; he admitted that he had been aware of this revolt, but insisted that he had not taken part in it. Hans, who had also lived at Groningen, had been (re)baptized in June 1535 at Gheyn (near Cologne, Germany) by Peter van Geyn. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 125, 131-34; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.) vdZ.

Hans van Collen (van Coelen), a Dutch Mennonite martyr, identical with Hans van Borculo (q.v.). vdZ.

Hans (Jan) Corneliszoon (Hans de Ruytere), an Anabaptist martyr, born at Rheden near Arnhem, Dutch province of Gelderland, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 4, 1577. He was charged with having been rebaptized and delivering addresses. He was thus apparently a preacher. According to the account of van Braght (Mart. Mir.) his wife and daughter were executed with him, but Génard did not find them in the records. vdZ.

DB 1899, 108; Mart. Mir. D 748, E 1,056; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 210; XIV, 98 f., No. 1118.

Hans van Dantzig: see Dan(t)zig, Hans van.

Hans Doornaert, an early Dutch Anabaptist preacher, was originally a weaver of Gent, Belgium, and a preacher (Vermaner) of the local Anabaptists, but later emigrated to Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, with many of his brethren. Here he served as a preacher of the Waterlander congregation, opening and closing their services with a call to silent prayer. Since this was permitted only to regularly ordained preachers of the congregation, Doornaert was vigorously opposed by the regular minister, Jacob Jansz Schedemaker (q.v.), whereas others approved, inasmuch as Doornaert performed this service in a much more inspiring way than they were accustomed to. In 1587 a conference was called on this matter in Haarlem, which was attended by preachers and delegates from Alkmaar, Amsterdam, and some congregations in Waterland. But it did little good, and there would no doubt have been a division in the Waterlander congregation if Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.) had not succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation and therewith also outward peace. J.L.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 123, 1-4; DB 1877, 81; 1897, 93; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 368-71; ML I, 466.

Hans de Druckere, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, who was sentenced to death at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 23, 1552. He was to be burned alive, and his head was then to be put on a stake. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 420, 422; XIV, 20 f., No. 217.) vdZ.

Hans den Duytsch (official name Hans Pfleinshorn), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Nürnberg, Germany, was beheaded at Antwerp, Belgium, at the Steen prison on Oct. 26, 1558, and his body thrown into the Schelde River. His death is commemorated in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 565; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 451, 465; XIV, 24 f.; ML I, 250.

Hans Flamingh: see Vlamingh, Hans.

Hans Georgen (John George), an Anabaptist martyr, a count from Italy, who had joined the Mennonites. He had gone to Germany, but was betrayed, arrested, and brought back to Italy. On the sea trip near Venice, without trial, he was thrown into the sea. This martyrdom took place in 1566. (Mart. Mir. D 344, E 703.) vdZ.

Hans de Goudsmid (also called Hans de Zilversmid or Hans van Osnabruggen, i.e., of Osnabrück in Hannover, Germany), an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, by drowning on Oct. 31, 1562. Van Braght names a martyr Hans, who is obviously identical with this martyr, and gives the day of his death as Aug. 15, 1561. But this must be wrong; according to the official records studied by Génard, no martyr was executed at Antwerp on that date. Hans de Goudsmid and six other martyrs, executed at Antwerp about the same time, are celebrated in a song found in the Nieu Liedenboeck (1562), which begins "Lieve Broeders, ick groet u met sanghen." The song was published by Wackernagel. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIV, 32 f., No. 269; Wackernagel, Lieder, 140; ML II, 250.

Hans van Gulik (Mellink, Wederdopers, 264) may be identical with Hans Scheerder (q.v.).

Hans Inghelberts (Engelberts), an Anabaptist martyr, originally from Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, was burned at the stake in Antwerp, Belgium, together with three other martyrs, on May 26, 1573, because he had attended Mennonite meetings. He had likely not yet been baptized on his faith. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 116, 117, 177; XIV, 90 f., No. 1026.) vdZ.

Hans Jacopsens (Jan Jacobsz), an Anabaptist martyr, son of the martyr Jacob Dirksz (q.v.), was executed together with his father and his brother

Andries (Adriaan) at Antwerp, Belgium, on March 17, 1568. Hans was a native of Utrecht and a tailor by trade. (Mart. Mir. D 370, E 724; Antw. Arch.-Blad X, 14, 68; XIV, 54 f., No. 631.) vdZ.

Hans Keeskooper, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jannijn Buefkijn.

Hans Knevel, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor's apprentice of Antwerp, was burned at the stake there in 1573. He had at first fled to Hamburg with his friend Steven Jansz Dilburgh, when he became aware of immediate danger, but returned to Antwerp and was soon seized. At his cross-examination he defended himself and his faith with unusual adroitness. For three days he was taken to a priest to be convinced "of his dangerous error." Hans Knevel answered with a superior knowledge of Scripture. When he asked the priest why he had come, the priest replied, "To win your soul." "Then he told him, if he sought to win souls, to go around in the city, in the brothels, the tippling houses, tennis courts, and to those who shed so much innocent blood, and to seek to win their souls. His own soul Christ had already won." When he was accused with insubordination to the government, he replied, "We will gladly obey the authorities in all taxes, customs, and excises; yea, we should be sorry, if we should withhold one stiver of what is their due." When his faith was likened to that of the Münsterites he said "his faith was as different from the Münsterite sect as heaven is from the earth."

Van Braght's account concludes, "This account we have chiefly taken from Hans Knevel's own letter, which he wrote at Antwerp from prison to his dear brother Steven Jansz Dilburgh and his wife Leentjen at Hamburg, in which he communicates at length the firm foundation of his faith and living hope in God's grace and blessed promises." Van Braght mentions 1572 as the year of his death, but according to P. Génard, who studied the documents, no Anabaptist martyr was put to death at Antwerp in 1572. But Génard found a large number of victims put to death in 1573 who are not found in the Martyrs' Mirror. Hans Knevel may be identical either with Hans der Weduwe (q.v.) or Hans van Munstdorp (Manstrop) (q.v.), both burned at the stake on Feb. 17, 1573. (Mart. Mir. D 621, E 945; ML II, 514.) Neff, vdZ.

Hans Korbmacher (Dutch Mart. Mir., Hans Mandemaker), an Anabaptist martyr executed at Innsbruck, Austria: see Mandl, Hans.

Hans Keune (Kuene), an Anabaptist martyr, unmarried, concerning whom all further particulars are lacking, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on March 14, 1570, together with Carel (Caerle) Thys, because he had been rebaptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 446, 453; XIV, 72 f., No. 803.) vdZ.

Hans van Leeuwarden, an Anabaptist preacher at Amsterdam 1534-35, who performed baptism in the house of the deacon Jan Paeuw (q.v.). He was a locksmith or a maker of bags by occupation. Mellink supposes that he is identical with Hans Scheerder (q.v.); but it is also possible that he is the same person as Jan van Geelen. (A Jan van Leeuwarden is named at the same time in Amsterdam, whose wife was Fenne, which was also the name of Jan van Geelen's wife.) At any rate he was a rather influential leader of the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, who was also active in the Dutch province of Groningen. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 23, 46, 47, 172; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Hans (Hansken) Lisz, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on Dec. 11 (Mart. Mir., Dec. 10), 1561. He belonged to the congregation of Brugge, of whom a number of members were arrested while holding a meeting. Twelve of them were executed. Verheyden, who studied the documents, did not find the name of Hans Lisz among them; so he supposes that Hans Lisz may be identical either with Jehan (Hans) Cant (q.v.) of St. Winnoxbergen in Flanders, or with Jehan Bertheloot (q.v.) of Cassel, Flanders, who were both executed on Dec. 11, 1561. (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 50, No. 42 f.; ML II, 660.) vdZ.

Hans van der Maes, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hans Vermeersch.

Hans van Mandel, an Anabaptist martyr of Flanders: see Hans Vermandele.

Hans Marijnsz (Hans Marijnsz van Oosten, or Jan Marinissen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the market square of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, on Feb. 9, 1569, together with the preacher Hendrik Alewijnsz and Gerrit Duynherder. Hans was about 30 years of age and a cartwright. (Mart. Mir. D 389, E 742; DB 1908, 16; ML III, 57.) vdZ.

Hans van Monster (of Münster, Westphalia, or from Monster near the Hague?), an Anabaptist martyr, was imprisoned in the castle of Berchem near Antwerp, Belgium, and beheaded there about 1550. Together with him Oude Jacob (q.v.) and Bartel (q.v.) were executed. (Mart. Mir. D 102, E 500; DB 1899, 153 f.; ML III, 161.) vdZ.

Hans van Munstdorp, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1573. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives the date of the execution as September, but according to the Antwerp documents it took place on Feb. 17. Hans and his wife Janneken were arrested together. Janneken (q.v.) was put to death on Oct. 6, 1573, after she had given birth to a child.

A letter written by Hans to his wife in prison is printed by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 664, E 983 ff.) in which he assured his wife that his intention to stay by the eternal truth was unchanged, he hoped to see her in the everlasting kingdom of God, and encouraged her to be true to the end. "Adieu and farewell, my lamb, my love; adieu and farewell to all that fear God. Adieu and farewell, until the marriage of the Lamb in the New Jerusalem. Be valiant and of good cheer; cast the troubles that assail you upon the Lord, and He will not forsake you. . . . Love God above all; have love and truth; love your salvation, keep your promises to the Lord!"

In the records of Antwerp P. Génard found a martyr called Hans van Manstrop (Menstrop), who was burned at the stake at Antwerp on Feb. 17, 1573, because he had been rebaptized, and whose goods were confiscated. This martyr is apparently identical with Hans van Munstdorp, and may be the same person as Hans Knevel (q.v.). (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 104 f., 173; XV, 90 f., No. 1009; ML III, 183.) NEFF, vdZ.

Hans van Overdam(me), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Gent on July 9, 1551 (van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, 1550), with Hans Keeskooper (Jannijn Buefkijn, q.v.). He was a native of Gent and unmarried; he had been baptized by Gillis van Aken. Already in 1545 he had been sought for heresy, and was then banished from the territory of Gent. The Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1562, No. 17) contains a song by Hans van Overdamme in honor of Govert Mertens, Marie Vlamincx, Tanneken van Roosbroecke, and Gillis van Aerde, all of Lier, who had been executed on Jan. 31, 1551. Hans himself is commemorated in a song, "Ick weet, die Godes woort bekent, Dat hij ter wereld moet lijden" (I know that he who confesses the Word of God must suffer in this world), also found in the Offer des Heeren. Both Offer des Heeren and the Martyrs' Mirror contain a confession by Hans van Overdamme and two letters, one sent to the congregation of Gent, which tells how he was arrested, and one addressed to the city officials of Gent, which, with a severity unusual among Mennonite martyrs, censures the magistrates for their false religion and their satanic persecution of the children of God.

Hans and his companion Jannijn Buefkijn died steadfast. They had arranged that when they came to the scaffold Jannijn Buefkijn would slowly take off his hose, while Hans van Overdam addressed the crowd assembled around the place of execution; this they did. Thereupon they suffered death, each bound at a stake.

A novel by Kristen Loer, Strijd om het geluk (1949), has Hans van Overdamme as its principal character.

Offer, 98-120, 565, note 4; Mart. Mir. D 86 ff., E 486 ff.; Verheyden, Gent, 15, No. 27; ML II, 69; III, 283, 331; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 78; Wackernagel, Lieder, 126.

Hans van Oznabrugge (Ozyerbrugge), an Anabaptist martyr: see Hans de Goudsmid.

Hans de Potbeckere, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant, was burned at the stake in Antwerp, Belgium, in 1538 or 1539, because he had been rebaptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 444 f.; XIV, 16 f., No. 169.) vdZ.

Hans Reyst-volk, followers of Hans Reist (q.v.) of the Emmental, the leader of the main body of Swiss Mennonites who refused to follow Ammann in 1693. Hans Reyst-volk were among the Swiss Mennonite immigrants in the Netherlands in the 18th century. The name died out since the group considered itself the main body of Swiss Mennonites, treating the Amish as the separated group. Hence of the two parties at the time of the Amish schism the Reist following continued as the main body. H.S.B.

Hans de Ries, Dutch Anabaptist leader: see Ries, Hans de.

Hans de Ruyter, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hans Corneliszoon.

Hans Scheerder, a Dutch Anabaptist leader, who was very active in propagating a revolutionary type of Anabaptism. In the fall of 1534 he baptized in Amsterdam. Here he met with Jacob van Campen, Jan Paeuw, Cornelis Pieters wt den Briel, and other leaders; about Easter 1535 he was in the province of Groningen as an accomplice of the Münsterite leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). After this he is found at the conference held at Bocholt in 1536, and in 1537 he operated as a church-robber near Cleve and Wesel. So "the former Obbenite (follower of the peaceful Obbe Philips) of 1534, the Münsterite leader in the Ommelanden (of Groningen) of 1535, became after Bocholt a Batenburger church-robber" (Mellink, Wederdopers, 396). Then he disappears from sight. Hans, who was a native of Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, had been baptized there in January 1534, together with Obbe Philips (q.v.), by Bartholomeus Boeckbinder (q.v.). On the next day both Obbe and Hans had been ordained elders by laying on of hands. Hans Scheerder is also called Hans Barbier (barber), but this is an error because Scheerder means wantscheerder, i.e., shearer of cloth. Hans van Gulik may be identical with this Hans Scheerder. He is also called Hans Wantscheerder "uit Appingedam." vdZ.

BRN VII, 118, 129, 367; DB 1916, 116, No. 60; 119, No. 98; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Hans de Schoenmakere, who was a cloth dyer by trade, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Kortrijk (q.v.), Flanders, was burned at the stake at Antwerp on July 17, 1553. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 421, 423; XIV, 20 f., No. 225.) vdZ.

Hans Sikken, a Mennonite preacher of Danzig, Prussia, who came to the Netherlands in 1567 together with Dirk Philips and Geert H. to settle the Flemish-Frisian quarrel (see Flemish Mennonites). While Dirk Philips remained in Emden, Sikken went to meet the representatives of the Frisian group at Appingedam, Dutch province of Groningen. Here he pronounced the ban upon the Frisian group. Of Sikken nothing more is known, but the Hans S. who was present in April 1556 at a discussion at Wüstenfelde between the Dutch-North German and the South German Mennonite leaders on avoidance in marriage was Hans Sikken. On this trip to the Netherlands he wrote a letter to Steven Vaader, the elder of the Danzig Mennonite Church, which is mentioned in the Danzig Mennonite Church Record, 1667-1830, now in Bethel College Historical Library. vdZ.

Menno Simons, Opera Omnia (Amsterdam, 1681) 489; DB 1893, 54, 64 f., 77; 1894, 37.

Hans de Smet (official name Jan Symens), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Aug. 7, 1559, at Gent, Belgium. He was a native of Waasten (Warneton) in Flanders and a cloth dyer by trade. He was arrested at Gent on Friday after Pentecost, together with a large number of members of the Gent congregation. Hans remained steadfast, as did his wife Tanneken Gressy, executed at Gent on June 27, 1560, after she had given birth to her child. The names of Hans and the other martyrs executed at Gent in 1559 are found in a song, "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), which is found in the Liedtboecxken vanden Offer des Heeren, No. 14. (Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 63; ML II, 250.) vdZ.

Hans de Smid, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in November 1558 at the Steen prison at Antwerp, Belgium. His official name was probably Hans Janssens, of Kruiningen (Dutch province of Zeeland). He is celebrated in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), which is found in Liedtboecxken vanden Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 452, 465; XIV, 24 f., No. 268; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Hans Smit, an Anabaptist martyr: see Schmidt, Hans.

Hans Speck: see Jan Specke.

Hans van der Stra(e)ten, an Anabaptist martyr, arrested at Antwerp, and burned at the stake at Brussels, Belgium, on March 28, 1571. He was 31 years of age and had been married only six weeks when he was imprisoned. His wife, Tanneken van den Broucke, b. at Mechelen, 17 years of age, was arrested together with Hans. In prison when she was tried, she recanted and was put in a cloister at Breda, in the Netherlands, but soon managed to escape; then she traveled to Danzig in Prussia, where she joined the Flemish Mennonite Church. Hans belonged to a family that had many "heretics," some of whom joined the Mennonites and died as martyrs; a brother of Hans, Martin van der Straeten (q.v.), was executed at Gent in 1572, and their father Josse (Joost) (q.v.) suffered martyrdom for his faith in Antwerp in 1571. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 540, E 875; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 101, No. 147; idem, Gent, 60.

Hans (Jan) van Straten, an Anabaptist who lived in England and was arrested in London in 1575 with some other Anabaptists, two of whom were put to death; viz., Hendrik Terwoort (q.v.) and Jan Pietersz (q.v.). Hans after a long and severe imprisonment was set free. (Mart. Mir. D 694-712; E 1009.) vdZ.

Hans Suikerbakker, an Anabaptist leader who was in prison at Antwerp, Belgium, in March 1538 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 192), and is obviously identical with Joachim Vermeeren (q.v.). vdZ.

Hans de Swarte, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Lille, France, on April 27, 1563. He was a son of Jan de Swarte (q.v.). See also Swarte, de, family. (Mart. Mir. D 299, E 664.) vdZ.

Hans (Jan) Symonsz (erroneously also called Simon Janssen), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 13, 1567. He was a wholesale dealer and a preacher of the Antwerp congregation. In 1566 he had been in Friesland to settle the Flemish-Frisian quarrels (see Flemish Mennonites). The Martyrs' Mirror contains two letters written by Hans in prison. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 345-46, 351-56; E 704, 709; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 460, 462; X, 65; XII, 462; XIV, 46 f., No. 523.

Hans, Theodor, was a pastor of the Moravian Brethren in St. Petersburg, Russia, who rendered important services to the deputies (see Deputations) of the Mennonites of Russia in the early 1870's when they sought exemption from military duty. Pastor Hans's home soon became the information center for Mennonites for questions concerning the new military law that was being formulated in the Ministry of War, and since he had good connections with the upper governmental circles he was able to assist them in obtaining audience and in supporting them in general. When the presence of Mennonite representatives in the capital was demanded or desired he summoned them by telegraph or letter, and when none was present he protected their cause.

Hans probably had a greater influence on the Mennonites of Russia than the casual contacts may seem to indicate. In the days when St. Petersburg seemed an unfriendly capital and it was anticipated that all peace-loving Mennonites would have to leave the country, he received the delegates in his home, helped them to establish the necessary contacts, and above all stimulated them with regard to their Mennonite conscience and Christian responsibility. "You cannot simply leave the country without having been inwardly and completely absolved from your calling [in Russia]. Thus the question of leaving the country for conscience' sake becomes the question of remaining in the country for conscience' sake." "Russia needs you, and the responsibility God has given you for the country is great." Admonitions like these, which were received in letters and reread and printed, must have had a considerable influence. D.H.E., C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 506-9; D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Rosenthal bei Chortitz, 1887) 150 ff.; Abr. Görz, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Forsteidienstes der Menn. in Russland (Gross-Tokmak, 1907); ML II, 249.

Hans (Jan) Vermandele (in Mart. Mir. called Hans van Mandel), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, March 19, 1569. He had been arrested with a number of other members of the Antwerp congregation, when a meeting was held in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.). He was 25 years of age and a weaver, originally from Kortrijk in Flanders (q.v.). He lived at Dambrugge near Antwerp and was married to Betken, whom he had married in a meeting of the congregation outside of the city. He had been baptized upon his faith in Antwerp in 1566. Even while cruelly tortured he refused to name the person who had baptized him and the place where the baptism took place. (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 337, 368, 398, 440; XIV, 64 f., No. 711.) vdZ.

Hans Vermeersch (thus called in Groot Offerboek of 1615 and later in martyr books, including van Braght, Mart. Mir.; in Offer his name is Hans van der Maes), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at the end of 1559 at Waastene (Warneton) in West Flanders, Belgium. About this martyr nothing is known but a letter he wrote in prison, which is found in Offer des Heeren and all following martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. He states that he was taken from prison to the inquisitor, and gives a detailed account of his trial, both the inquisitor's questions and his answers. In the Offer this letter is followed by a hymn concerning Hans beginning "Tyrannich werck spoortmen nu alle weghen" (Tyrannic action is now found everywhere). In the 17th century members of a Vermeersch family were found among the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Haarlem, while Gielis Vermeersch was a deacon at Harlingen about 1690. It could not be determined whether or in what way these families are related to the martyr Hans Vermeersch. (Offer, 358-66; Mart. Mir. D 259, E 631; Wolkan, Lieder, 67.) vdZ.

Hans de Vette, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Gent, July 5, 1559. With his wife and eleven other Anabaptists, including Hans de Smet (q.v.), he was thrown into prison at Gent on Friday after Pentecost in 1559, when their meeting had been betrayed. They were executed on different days. All remained true to their faith. Hans de Vette wrote a "confession" in prison, in which he describes his trial in detail. Hans was a native of Waastene (Warneton) in West Flanders, and a dyer by trade. His wife Miertgen (q.v.) was executed on June 27, 1560. A song on Hans is found in Offer der Heeren, which begins "Hebt goeden moet, o broeders van weerden." A hymn commemorating the whole group is found in the Liedtboecxken vanden Offer des Heeren (No. 14), "Ick moet een liet beginnen." vdZ.

Offer, 348-57, 556-59; Mart. Mir. D 246 ff., E 620 ff.; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 60; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 67, 71; DB 1908, 51; ML II, 69, 250.

Hans Vlaming(h): see Vlamingh, Hans.

Hans de Wantscheerder, a Dutch Anabaptist leader: see Hans Scheerder.

Hans der Weduwe(n), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 31, 1573, because he had been (re)baptized and had attended the forbidden meetings of the Mennonites. Either Hans Knevel (q.v.) or Hans van Munstdorp (q.v.) may be identical with this Hans der Weduwen, of whom nothing further is known. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 102 f., 172; XIV, 88 f., No. 1005.) vdZ.

Hans van der Weghe, an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested at Gent and burned at the stake with two girls, Janneken van Hulle and Janneken van Rentegem. From prison he wrote four letters which admonish his relatives and friends to a life of penitence and faith, that they might be partakers of eternal life. Hans was a native of Ronse (Renaix) in Flanders. His brother Jacob van der Weghe was burned at Gent in 1573. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 528, E 865; Verheyden, Gent, 56, No. 195; ML II, 70, 250.

Hans de Wever, an Anabaptist elder: see Busschaert, Hans.

Hansen, Georg, an elder of the Old Flemish (Klerkse, Klärische) Mennonite congregation in Danzig, was made deacon in 1655, preacher in the same year, and elder in 1690, serving until his death, Jan. 16, 1703. He was a cobbler by trade, widely read and gifted in speech and writing. He made the notes in the archives of the church in Danzig which report on important events in the congregation from 1667 on, which furnished the basic data for the later Danzig Mennonite Church Record 1667-1836, which, among other things, gives a complete list of ministers of the church since the days of Dirk Philips.

Hansen is also the author of several important books. One was Ein Glaubens-Bericht vor die Jugend durch einen Liebhaber der Wahrheit gestellt und ans Licht gebracht (1671), a book of 276 octavo pages (reprinted by the Mennonite Publishing Co., Elkhart, in 1893?). By clever choice of Bible verses the Christian doctrines of God and Christ and the Holy Spirit, and the Mennonite doctrines of baptism, footwashing, mixed marriage, the ban, avoidance, revenge, and the oath, are graphically presented to the children. In the foreword to this book Hansen makes the interesting observation that the youth of Danzig read German more fluently than Dutch (Menn. Bl., 1857, 61); nevertheless the Dutch was retained in church services for another century. A more extensive book, which he finished in 1699 in the Dutch language, and which was published after his death in Amsterdam (1705), was Spiegel Des Levens, Geschreven door George Hansen, In sijn Leven Outsten der Gemeynte Godts tot Danzigh, Maar nu door eenige Beminders der Waerheyt ter eeren Godts ende stichtingh haers Naesten in Druck uytgegeven. It deals in the main with regeneration, its nature and effect. Hansen was also the author of Einfältige Antwort der Mennoniten die man Clercken nent auf den Erforscher der Wahrheit (n.p., n.d.), in which he attacked the booklet Erforscher der Wahrheit, printed in 1680. The Einfältige Antwort was not published until 1706. Hansen also published in the Dutch language the Fundamentboek, printed in 1696 at Amsterdam. It was translated into German by Elder Isaak Peters and published at Elkhart, Ind., under the title: Ein Fundamentbuch der Christlichen Lehre, welche unter den Mennoniten in Preussen (die man zu Danzig "Clerken" nennt) gelehrt wird. The contents of this book had been approved and agreed upon by the Prussian elders on Jan. 20, 1680. Hansen also compiled the confession of faith that is known under the title, Confession oder Kurze und einfältige Glaubensbekänntnisse derer Mennonisten in Preussen, so man nennet die Clarichen. Of this book, Schagen (Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren, Amsterdam, 1745, 44) mentions an edition of 1678, entitled Confessio aut Breves ac Simplices Fidei Articuli illorum Mennonistarum in Borussia, qui vulgo Clarici vocantur. His Bekenntnis des George Hansen und sein Examen was printed in German and Latin, presumably by a member of the Commission which examined him. In 1768 the Flemish congregation of Prussia published Hansen's confession of faith with a catechism and several other additions. (Menn. Bl., 1857, 7, 39, 63; ML I, 159 f.)

In 1678, when at the orders of King John Sobiesky, 1674-96, a religious cross-examination was held with the Mennonites of Danzig before Bishop Stanislaus Sarnowski and other spiritual dignitaries, Hansen spoke so successfully (Jan. 20) for the Flemish group that they were absolved of all suspicion of spiritual relationship with the Arians or Socinians.

Hansen placed the painter Enoch Seemann under the ban because he painted portraits. In vain Seemann protested this narrow-minded measure; he wrote a very bitter book, Offenbarung und Bestrafung des Georgen Hansens Thorheyt, Jedermann zur brüderlichen Vermahnung und getreuen Warnung wohlmeinentlich an Tag gegeben durch einen Liebhaber der Wahrheit (Stoltzenberg, 1697). The congregation supported its elder. NEFF, VDZ.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 73, 77 ff.; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 130-34, 137, where Hansen's books are analyzed as to their spiritual contents; ML II, 250.

Hansen, Joseph (b. 1862), a German historian, director of the historical archives of Cologne, wrote numerous books and articles on the history of the inquisition and witch-hunting, on the Counter Reformation, and on the older and more recent history of Westphalia and the Rhineland, among which his treatise, "Die Wiedertäufer in Aachen und in der Aachener Gegend" in Ztscht des Aachener Geschichtsvereins VI (1884) 295-338, is of importance for the history of Anabaptism. (ML II, 251.) NEFF.

Hansen, Reimer (1853-1926), professor at the Oberrealschule in Oldesloe, Germany. Of simple rural origins, the gifted youth acquired a thorough education by study at the University of Kiel as well as by private study. His particular field was history. Later he became famed for his research in the history of Schleswig-Holstein, and especially of his home Dithmarschen. For Mennonite history two of his articles, written with objective scholarship, are of significance: "Wiedertäufer in Eiderstedt" (until 1616) in the Schriften des Vereins für schleswig-holsteinische Kirchengeschichte, series II, vol. 2; "Menno Simonis in Holstein" in Die Heimat, 1907. For the Mennonitisches Lexikon he wrote an article on the Danish Prince Frederick. (ML II, 251.) R.DO.

Hansfelde: see Hamberge.

Hansijtten (or Hanssytsche Mennonieten), a name sometimes used during the 17th century in the Netherlands to indicate the Waterlanders (q.v.), and especially the adherents of Hans de Ries (q.v.). VDZ.

Hans(ken) van Audenaerde (Oudenaarde), an Anabaptist martyr, burned on the Vrijdag market place at Gent, Belgium, on March 17, 1573, together with Beliken de Jaghere (q.v.) and Grietgen van Sluys (q.v.). Hansken was born at Geeraerdsbergen, Flanders, a son of Joris, a hatmaker, lived in Gent for two years, and was only 18 years of age. (Mart. Mir. D 631, 647; E 968; Verheyden, Gent, 61, No. 214; ML III, 330.) VDZ.

Hansken van den Broecke (vanden Broeke, vanden Brouck), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on Oct. 15, 1558, after being strangled. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror mentions that he had come to Brugge from Oostende to hear the preaching of the Gospel, and that he was arrested with some others and executed about June 12, remaining steadfast in his faith. Verheyden has published more exact and exhaustive data. He was a linen weaver by trade, had been baptized at Gent in 1556, lived in Oostende for some time, and had moved from this town to Brugge in the spring of 1558 together with Jacob de Swarte (q.v.) who was burned at the stake at Brugge on Aug. 15, 1558. (Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Verheyden, Brugge, 47, No. 30; ML II, 250.) VDZ.

Hansken van Frubergh, an Anabaptist martyr of whom nothing is known but that he was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1558. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 439; XIV, 17 f., No. 165.) VDZ.

Hansken Henricx (Bosseneerken, i.e., from 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant), an otherwise unknown martyr, was burned at the stake in 1557 at Antwerp, Belgium. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 417 f.; XIV, 20 f., No. 216.) VDZ.

Hansken van Oudenaerde, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hansken van Audenaerde.

Hansken Parmentier, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Dec. 11, 1561, at Brugge, Belgium. Verheyden, not finding this name in the records, suggests that Hansken Parmentier is identical either with Jehan Bertheloot (q.v.) or with Jehan (Hans) Cant (q.v.), both executed on Dec. 11, 1561, at Brugge. (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 50 f., Nos. 42 and 43; ML III, 335.) VDZ.

Hansken in't Schaek (Hans Schaek, or Koordedrayer), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on May 18, 1570, at Brugge, Belgium. Hansken, who was born at Kortrijk, Flanders, was a member of the congregation at Brugge; while attending a meeting of this congregation on Ascension Day (May 4), 1570, in the woods of Tillegem near Brugge, he was arrested with a number of other members during a police raid. He remained steadfast and refused to name other members of the church, and consequently had to suffer death. He was executed with Kaerle de Raedt (q.v.) and Willem Vernon (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 369, E 725; Verheyden, Brugge, 61, No. 66.) vdZ.

Hansken Schalijdecker, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Jansze.

Hansma, Leendert, b. 1861 at Dokkum, d. Dec. 5, 1940, at Assen, a Dutch Mennonite bookseller and printer at Assen. He published the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (q.v.) from its beginning (1901). He helped to establish a Mennonite fellowship circle, and soon after, a congregation at Assen, and for a number of years served as its secretary (1896-1926). He not only published the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje but also contributed to its contents; in a number of issues sketches are found signed H.V.A. (i.e., Hansma, van Assen). (DJ 1942, 17 f. with portrait.) vdZ.

Hansmann, Hans, a purse maker of Basel, therefore usually called Seckler, was one of the first Anabaptists of Switzerland and filled a place of leadership among them, which was, however, of short duration, for he was one of the first Anabaptists to suffer a martyr's death in Bern. At first he worked in Basel, but the mandates issued in 1526 against the Anabaptists by the Basel government apparently caused him to leave. In 1527 he settled in Bern with Jakob Hochrütiner (the son of Lorenz Hochrütiner of Zürich). With the other leaders of the Bern Swiss Brethren he was arrested in the spring of 1527 and cross-examined. (The protocol is still in the state archives at Bern; see Quervain, 120.) The council favored expulsion, and the clergy undertook public attempts to convert them. A confession of faith discovered in the search of a house was sent by Berthold Haller (q.v.) to Zwingli on April 25; by April 28 Zwingli had already presented a refutation of Anabaptist doctrine. Hansmann and Hochrütiner could, however, not be deflected from their faith. Since they did not render an oath they were put in neck-irons and on May 1 expelled from the canton. The other prisoners recanted to escape expulsion (Quervain, 121; Müller, 25).

Hansmann returned to Bern for the great disputation (see ML I, 17 f.) of Jan. 7-26, 1528, which was to be decisive in the Reformation of Bern. With him came seven other brethren, including Georg Blaurock. They were, however, not admitted to the proceedings, but were interned for the duration. Shortly before the close of the session they were called to the Rathaus, where five theologians, including Zwingli and Conrad Schmid, publicly disputed with them. The speakers on the Anabaptist side were Hansmann, Blaurock, and Hans Pfistermeyer. The council declared that the learned doctors had adequately convinced the Anabaptists of their error with the Holy Scriptures; but since they persisted in their opinion they were to be expelled from the canton, and if they were ever seen there again, to be "drowned without mercy in that very hour." The safe conduct to the border guaranteed to them was granted (Müller, 29 f.).

Concerning this disputation one of the four presidents at the disputation, Conrad Schmid (q.v.), published a booklet entitled, Die predigen so vonn den frömbden Predicanten, die allenthalb här, zu Bernn uff dem Gespräch oder Disputation gewesen, beschehen sind, (with) Verwerffen der articklenn und stucken, so die Widertöuffer uff dem gespräch zu Bernn, vor ersamem grossem Radt fürgewendt habend (Zürich, Chr. Froschauer, 1528, copy in Goshen College Library). This first book on the Bern Anabaptists can make no claim of reliability. "The booklet," says Ernst Müller, "not only swarms with epithets from the animal world, but also with distortions and misconstructions" (p. 46). Rather remarkable, however, is the reproach made by the theologians of Zürich and Bern, that the Anabaptists refused to repeat the Ave Maria, since the Reformed Church later took the same position on this point.

Where Hansmann went from Bern is not certain. In the spring of 1529 he was again imprisoned with Hans Dreier (q.v.) and examined on the rack on several points: infant baptism, whether a Christian can hold a magistrate's office, the oath, community of goods, tithes and interest, community of wives, and separation from the church. Hansmann (here called Seckler) was tried first. The record states that he said, "Infant baptism is a principle of the pope and because it is not done away with there can be no Christian Church, for it is not instituted of God." Then Hans Dreier was examined. On the question of baptism he said briefly, "I stay with baptism like Seckler." Concerning separation, he said he would not attend church because he was separated from those who do not confess Christ. The confessions made by Seckler and Dreier were signed by them. On May 24, 1529, several other persons were tried before the prebendary on the same points. First came the hatter Heini Seiler (q.v.) of Aarau. His answer was like that of the other two, and he "would leave his life for it and testify to it with his blood. . . . He had not gone to church for a long time nor to any other preaching, for one must be taught alone by God."

A letter of self-vindication written by an Anabaptist, which Fluri found in the state archives in Bern and identified as Seckler's, gives his belief clearly. He says that in the old covenant God had removed the temple of Solomon; in the new one the believers are the temple of the living God, wherefore no one could compel him to enter the temple (the church). Further he testifies that he had held no secret meetings, but when anyone requested the reason for his faith, "I revealed my faith to him through the Scripture." Infant baptism has no foundation in the Word of God, and was "instituted without the Word of God," and must be regarded as a plant, according to Matt. 15, "which my heavenly Father did not plant," and which should therefore be uprooted. "But those who commit themselves by baptism into the death of Christ are my fellow members, of which body Christ is the head." The government, in which a Christian might participate, should be obeyed; not by compulsion, however, but voluntarily. The oath is contrary to the word of Christ; whatever the government required he would perform as long as it was not contrary to God's Word. He did not reject private possession of property; in the first church all things were common, but there was no command. "Tithes and all fees imposed by the government a Christian will pay as far as it concerns body and goods; but a Christian will not take them." This was also his idea on the taking of interest. Separation from the church was due to idols; he had no objection to the teaching of the preachers whom God calls and who point out much that is right (Müller, 42 f.). He had baptized only seven persons in the town of Bern; may the Lord preserve these souls in their faith to His praise to the end. A Verantwortung by Hansmann was also discovered in the archives of Bern by Adolf Fluri (Quervain, 151).

After these trials the clergy informed the council that the Anabaptists intended to adhere to their belief and testify to it with their blood. On June 8 the council decreed that the three (Hansmann, Dreier, and Seiler) should be drowned if they still persisted in their Anabaptism after another attempt to convert them (Ratsmanual 222/153). The sentence was executed above the present railroad bridge at the "blood tower"; they were cast into the Aare in mid-July 1529. They were the first victims of the Anabaptist persecution in Bern. HEGE.

A. Fluri, "Täuferhinrichtungen in Bern im 16. Jahrhundert," in Berner Heim 1896; Müller, Berner Täufer, 24 ff. (p. 42 gives the record of the trial); Theodor de Quervain, Kirchliche und sociale Zustände in Bern unmittelbar nach der Einführung der Reformation (Bern, 1906); ML II, 251 f.

Hanston Mennonite Church (GCM), formerly known as the Einsiedel Church, located 1½ miles north and 2½ miles west of Hanston, Hodgeman Co., Kan., is a member of the Western District Conference. The original name "Einsiedel" was chosen in memory of the church in Galicia (q.v.) from which seven of the first eight families immigrated to Hanston in 1885, the eighth being a related family from the Palatinate. The eight family heads were two Johann Müllers, Johann Linscheid, Johann Ewy, Heinrich Rupp, Johann Brubacher, Peter Ewy, and Christian Hirschler. Johann P. Müller was preacher 1885-1915 (elder from 1899); Christian E. Hirschler served as preacher and elder 1915 until his death. In 1888 the first church was dedicated. In 1902 it was destroyed by a tornado, but was rebuilt from lumber salvaged from the wreckage. In 1924 this building was replaced by a larger one, still in use. The pastor in 1955 was Menno Ediger; the membership was 67. (ML I, 548.) E.E.H.

Hapsburg (Habsburg), an old ruling family or dynasty in Austria, Germany, and Spain, most ardent champions of the Catholic cause, at least after the family inherited the Spanish throne in 1516. Since the middle of the 15th century all rulers of the Holy Roman Empire were Hapsburgs. During the age of Reformation Emperor Charles V (q.v.) tried in vain to fight Lutheranism; in 1555 he had to admit the right of the German princes to decide the religion of their land for themselves. Yet in a number of momentous mandates (q.v.) he laid the legal groundwork for the persecution of the "heretical" Anabaptists. More immediate were the activities of his brother Ferdinand I (q.v.), first Archduke of Austria, after 1526 also King of Bohemia and Hungary (where he had little influence), and then after 1556 Emperor. His fight against the Anabaptists, along with the counter-reformatory activities of the Roman hierarchy and the Jesuits, was violent and relentless, and, to a certain degree, also successful. The Hutterite chronicle lists no fewer than 2,169 martyrs during the reign of Charles V and Ferdinand I. Only in Moravia could the Anabaptists persist, protected there by the nobles who, though Catholic, were loath to lose the profits accruing from these industrious settlers. During the time of Emperor Maximilian II (q.v.) a milder period set in at first (called in the Hutterite chronicles the "Golden Age"). But by the turn of the century, under the reign of the somewhat enigmatic Rudolphus II, persecution set in again with doubled effort, though only in those countries in which the emperor had full jurisdiction (i.e., the Erblande or Hapsburg domain, Austria, Tirol, Styria, etc.). Once a Hutterite physician cured the emperor, but it did not help the brotherhood as a whole very much. With the initial success of the Thirty Years' War (1618-48) the Hapsburgs gained also great power in the kingdom of Bohemia, particularly in Moravia. Under the regime of Ferdinand II (1619-37) the Anabaptists were now definitely expelled from Moravia (1622). Fortunately, the power of the Hapsburgs in Hungary was very limited. This kingdom had fallen to the Hapsburgs in 1526, but the Turks soon took over the greater part of the country (including the suzerainty of Transylvania), and the nobility in the remaining part (today Slovakia) was ready to accept the Anabaptists on their estates, as they were excellent workers. Most of these nobles were Calvinists. Thus the Hutterian Brethren could enjoy a comparatively quiet period in these eastern parts of the Hapsburg Empire, where the power of the Counter Reformation was effective only to a small extent. Soon after Emperor Leopold I (1658-1705) came to power, he even issued a special privilege of protection for the Brethren in three counties in Slovakia in 1659, most likely upon the urging of the manorial lords of that area (Beck, 496).

Around 1700 the Turks were completely expelled from Hungary and Hapsburg's power became effective also here. In general, the 18th century is called the century of enlightenment and toleration, yet little of either was felt in the huge Hapsburg realm. The great Empress Maria Theresa (1740-80) did much to strengthen her realm, but neither Lutherans nor Anabaptists were tolerated. It was under her reign that Lutherans of Carinthia (q.v.) had to transmigrate (in 1755) to far-off Transylvania (q.v.), a country which, though belonging to the Hapsburg realm, yet was judged too distant to have any "detrimental" influence on the realm in general. These transmigrants came into contact with the last remnants of the Hutterites, and revived their brotherhood to new life. But the Jesuits (though in other countries hard pressed themselves; the Jesuit order was officially suppressed by the pope in

